De Vere, AUBREY THOMAS, poet, was born 10th January 1814, third son of Sir Aubrey De Vere (1788-1846), Bart., of Curragh Chase, County Limerick, himself the author of four volumes of poetry. He had his education at Trinity College, Dublin, and first appeared as a poet in 1842 with The Waldenses, or the Fall of Rova; a Lyriical Tale. Next year his Searches after Proserpine made him widely known as a writer of verse, graceful, refined, and fluent, if somewhat lacking in genuine inspiration. Later volumes are Poems, Miscellaneous and Sacred (1853); May Carols (1857); The Sisters; Innisfall (1861); Irish Odes and other Poems (1869); The Legends of St Patrick (1872); Legends of the Saxon Saints (1870); The Foray of Queen Meave (1882), and Mediæval Sonnets (1893). From 1851 a Catholic, he died 20th January 1902. He published also poetical dramas on Alexander the Great (1874) and Becket (1876), Essays on Poetry (2 vols. 1887), and works on Irish ecclesiastical politics and literary criticism. See his Recollections (1897).

Devrient, a family of German actors, of whom the most talented was LUDWIG DEVRIENT (1784-1832), distinguished both in comedy and tragedy, and especially in Shakespearian characters.—His nephew, CARL AUGUST (1797-1872), played lovers' parts, and married the diva, Madame Schröder-Devrient (1805-60).—PHILIPP ÉDOUARD (1801-77), brother of the latter, was a baritone singer and actor, and wrote many plays and the valuable Geschichte der deutschen Schauspielkunst (5 vols. 1848-74); he edited Shakespear with his son, OTTO (1838-94), also an actor, manager, and playwright.—GUSTAV EMIL (1803-72), the most gifted of the three brothers, became identified with such characters as Hamlet, Tasso, and especially Posa. [Dev-ree-onz; properly De Vreent.]

Dewar, SIR JAMES (knighted 1904), since 1875 professor at Cambridge and F.R.S., was born 20th Sept. 1842 at Kincairdine-on-Forth, and educated at Dollar, Edinburgh, and Ghent. In 1898 he liquefied both hydrogen and helium.

D'Ewes, SIR SIMONS, antiquary, was born 18th December 1602 at Cuxden, near Chard, and in 1618 entered St John's College, Cambridge. In 1623 he was called to the bar, but in 1626 he married a rich child-heiress, and was knighted. From his historical manuscripts in 1640 he was called away to the Long Parliament as member for Sudbury. A Puritan but a moderate, he accepted a baronetcy (1641), sided with the parliament, was expelled by Pride (1648), and died 8th April 1650. His transcripts of manuscripts which else had perished possess high value, as also do his Diaries, especially the portions relating to the Long Parliament. [Deus.]

De Wet, CHRISTIAN, born in 1853, had acquired fame as a hunter ere he became conspicuous in the Transvaal war of 1880-81; and in the war of 1899-1902 he was of all the Boer commanders the most audacious, swift in movement, and fertile in expedients. He wrote a book on the war, and in 1907 he became Minister for Agriculture of the Orange River Colony.

De Wette, WILHELM MARTIN LEBERECHE, biblical critic, born at Ulla, near Weimar, 12th January 1780, studied from 1799 at Jena, and became professor at Heidelberg in 1807, in 1810 at Berlin. A letter sent in 1819 to his friend, the mother of Sand the assassin of Kotzebue, cost him his chair; and, retiring to Ulla, he completed his Christliche Sittenlehre (1819-21), his edition of Luther's letters (1825-28), and the religious novel Theodore, or the Sceptic's Conversion (1822; trans. 1849). A call to be preacher at Brunswick was vetoed by the government; in 1822 he became professor of Theology at Basel, where he died 16th June 1849. His reputation rests on his Introduction to the Old Testament (1806-7; trans. by Th. Parker, 1850), his manual of Hebrew Archaeology (1814), and his Introduction to the New Testament (1836; trans. 1858). See works by Schenkel (1849), Lücke (1850), Hagenbach (1850), Wiegand (1879), and Stähelin (1880). [Day Vet'ta.]

De Wint, PETER. See WINT.

De Witt, JAN, born at Dort in 1625, was the son of Jacob de Witt, a vehement opponent of William II., Prince of Orange. Jan was one of the deputies sent by the States of Holland in 1652 to Zealand, to dissuade that province from adopting an Orange policy. In 1653 he was made grand pensionary. The Orange party, during the war between England and Holland, was ever striving to increase the power of the young prince (afterwards William III.); the republican, or oligarchic party, composed of the nobles and the wealthier burghesses, with De Witt at their head, on the other hand sought to abolish the office of stadhouder. In 1654, on the conclusion of the war, a secret article in the treaty drawn up between De Witt and Cromwell deprived the House of Orange of all state-offices. After the restoration of Charles II., De Witt leaned to the side of France, all the more during the two years' renewal of hostilities (1665-67), in which he saved the remnant of the Dutch fleet, and which were terminated by the Peace of Breda. The Triple Alliance (1666) for a time arrested Louis XIV.'s designs upon the Spanish Netherlands; but on his invasion of the United Provinces in 1672 the Orange party raised William to the family dignity of stadhouder and commander of the Dutch forces. The first campaign proved unfortunate, which did not improve the temper of the people towards De Witt, who had resigned his office of grand pensionary. His brother Cornelius, accused of conspiring against the stadtholder's life, was imprisoned and tortured. De Witt went to see him in prison, when they were attacked by an infuriated mob, and torn to pieces, August 20, 1672. Among his writings are his Memoirs (1709) and his Letters (6 vols. 1723-25). See the Lives by Simons (1832-36), Knottenbelt (1862), J. Geddes (vol. i. Lond. 1879), and Pontalis (Eng. trans. 2 vols. 1885).

Dhuleep Singh (1838-93) in 1843 became Maharajah of the Punjab, but, after the second Sikh war, transferred his dominions to the East India Company, receiving an annuity of £50,000 (1849). Turning Christian and marrying a Christian wife, he lived for years as a Suffolk squire; but in 1886 revisiting India, he relapsed and coquetted for a while with Russia. He died in Paris.

Diane de Poitiers (1499-1566), mistress of Henry II. of France, was married at thirteen, and left a widow at thirty-two; presently she won the affections of the boy-dauphin, already wedded to Catharine de' Medici. On his accession (1547) Diane enjoyed great influence, and was made Duchess of Valentinois. After his death (1559) she retired to her Château d'Anet. See Life by Capefigue (1860). [Dee-ahn-de Pwahnt-yayf.]

Diane de France (1538-1619), Duchess of Angoulême, a natural daughter of Henry II. and a Piedmontese (according to others, of Diane de Poitiers), was formally legitimised, and married first to a son of the Duke of Parma, next to the eldest son of the Constable de Montmorency. She enjoyed great influence at court under Henry IV., and superintended the education of the future Louis XIII.

Diaz, or DIAS, BARTOLOMEU, a Portuguese navigator whose residence at the court of John II. brought him into contact with many scientific men, among others the German cosmographer Behaim (q.v.). In 1486 the king gave him the command of two vessels to follow up the discoveries already made on the west coast of Africa. Diaz soon reached the limit which had been attained in South Atlantic navigation, and first touched land in 26° S. lat. Driven by a violent storm, he sailed round the southern extremity of Africa, the Cape of Good Hope, without immediately realising the fact, and discovered Algoa Bay. The discontent of his crew compelled him to return; and arriving in Lisbon, December 1487, he was at first greeted with enthusiasm. But in the expedition of 1497 he had to act under Vasco da Gama, who even sent him back to Portugal after they had reached the Cape Verd Isles. Three years later he joined the expedition of Cabral, the discoverer of Brazil, but was lost in a storm, 29th May 1500. [Dee-ahz.]

Diaz, PORFIRIO, born at Oaxaca 15th September 1830, President of Mexico 1877-80, was re-elected in 1884, 1888, 1892, 1896, 1900, and 1910, but had to resign in 1911.

Diaz de la Peña, NARCISSE VIRGILIO (1807-76), painter, was born at Bordeaux of Spanish parentage, and, left an orphan, was educated by a Protestant pastor at Bellevue, near Paris. A snake-bite had occasioned the amputation of a leg, when at fifteen he was apprenticed to a porcelain painter; in 1831 he began to exhibit in the Salon. His favourite subjects were landscapes with nymphs, loves, and satyrs; and his forte was colour. He died at Mentone.

Díaz del Castillo, BERNAL (c. 1495-1560), the historian of the conquest of Mexico, was one of the handful of heroes who accompanied Cortes in 1519. His Historia de la conquista de la Nueva España (1632) is invaluable.

Dibdin, CHARLES, song-writer, was born at Southampton, 4th March 1745. He early attracted notice by his singing, and, still a boy, composed an operetta, The Shepherd's Artifice, which was produced at Covent Garden in 1762. He subsequently lived an unsettled life as an actor and composer of stage-music. In 1788 he commenced a series of musical entertainments, which acquired great celebrity; the first was entitled The Whim of the Moment. He retired in 1805 with a pension of £200 granted him two years before; it was withdrawn in 1807, and Dibdin returned to public life with unfortunate financial results. He died 25th July 1814. Dibdin wrote nearly a hundred sea-songs—among the best Poor Jack and Tom Bowling. He also wrote nearly seventy dramatic pieces.—Two of his sons, CHARLES (1768-1833) and THOMAS JOHN (1771-1841), wrote songs and dramas. See Dibdin's Autobiography (4 vols. 1803) and The Dibdins, by E. R. Dibdin (1888).

Dibdin, THOMAS FROGNALL, bibliographer, a nephew of Charles Dibdin, was born at Calcutta in 1776. Having lost both parents when hardly four years of age, he was brought up by a maternal uncle, studied at St John's College, Oxford, tried law, but took orders in 1804. Librarian to Lord Spencer, he proceeded D.D. in 1825; held the vicarage of Exning near Newmarket and the rectory of St Mary's, Bryanston Square, London; and died 18th November 1847. Among his works were Bibliomania (1809); The Bibliographical Decameron (1817); Bibliotheca Spenceriana (1814-15); Bibliographical Tour in France and Germany (1821); Reminiscences of a Literary Life (1836); and Bibliographical Tour in the Northern Counties of England and Scotland (1838).

Dick, JAMES (1743-1828), a West Indian and London merchant, who was born at Forres, and left over £113,000 to promote higher learning among the parish schoolmasters of Elgin, Banff, and Aberdeen shires.

Dick, ROBERT (1811-66), a self-taught Scotch geologist and botanist, was a native of Tullibody in Clackmannanshire, and from 1830 a baker in Thurso. See Life by Dr Smiles (1878).

Dick, THOMAS, LL.D. (1774-1857), the author of The Christian Philosopher (1823; 8th ed. 1842) and other religious scientific works, was born at Dundee and died at Broughty-Ferry, his home from 1827, he having for twenty years before been a schoolmaster at Methven and Perth.

Dickens, CHARLES, was born at Landport, then a little suburb of Portsmouth or Portsea, on Friday, February 7, 1812. His father was John Dickens, a clerk in the navy pay-office, and at that time attached to Portsmouth dockyard; in 1814 he was transferred to London, and in 1816 to Chatham, where the boy, already a great reader, got some schooling. In 1821 the family fell into trouble; reforms in the Admiralty deprived the father of his post and the greater part of his income; they had to leave Chatham, and removed to London, where a mean house in Camden Town received them. But not for long. The father was presently arrested for debt and consigned to the Marshalsea, and Charles, then only ten years of age, and small for his age, was placed in a blacking factory at Hungerford Market, where he labelled the blacking bottles, with half a dozen rough boys. Not only were his days passed in this wretched work, but the child was left entirely to himself at night, when he had four miles to walk to his lonely bedroom in Camden Town. On Sundays he visited his father in the prison; and presently they found him a lodging in Lant Street close by. On his father's release they all went back to Camden Town, and the boy was sent again to school, an academy in the Hampstead Road, for three or four years. When he was taken from school no better place could be found for him than a stool at the desk of a solicitor. Meantime, however, his father had obtained a post as reporter for the Morning Herald, and Charles resolved also to attempt the profession of journalist. He taught himself shorthand; and he frequented the British Museum daily to supplement some of the shortcomings of his reading. In his seventeenth year he became a reporter at Doctors' Commons; but all his ambitions were at this period for the stage. It was not until he was two-and-twenty that he succeeded in getting permanent employment on the staff of a London paper as a reporter; in this capacity he was sent much about the country.

In December 1833 the Monthly Magazine published his 'Dinner at Poplar Walk.' Other papers followed, but produced nothing for the contributor except the gratification of seeing them in print. However, they did Dickens the best service possible, in enabling him to prove his power, and he presently made an arrangement to contribute papers and sketches regularly to the Evening Chronicle, continuing to act as reporter for the Morning Chronicle, and getting his salary increased from five guineas to seven a week. The Sketches by Boz were collected and published in the beginning of the year 1836, the author receiving £150 for the copyright; he afterwards bought it back for eleven times that amount. In the last week of March in the same year appeared the first number of the Pickwick Papers; three days afterwards Dickens married Catherine, the daughter of his friend George Hogarth, editor of the Evening Chronicle. She bore him seven sons and three daughters between 1837 and 1852, three of whom predeceased him; in 1858 husband and wife separated.

Otherwise, the rest of Dickens's life has the interest which belongs to success after success. He had no failures; he suffered no defeats. There were times when his hand was not at its best, but never a time when his hand lost its power. This indeed seems the crowning happiness of a successful and singularly happy life, that when he was cut off, after fifty-eight years of continuous work, his brain was still as vigorous, his eye as keen, his hand as sure as in the first fresh running of his youth. It was indeed more than literary success which he achieved; he conquered the whole English-speaking world. This world, which now numbers over a hundred millions, loves him; all who can read his books love him, and shall continue to love him. This love cheered him in his life, and will keep his memory green.

The following is the list of Dickens's works: Sketches by Boz (1836), The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club (1837), Oliver Twist (1838), Nicholas Nickleby (1839), The Old Curiosity Shop (1840-41), Barnaby Rudge (1841), American Notes (1842), Martin Chuzzlewit (1843), The Christmas Tales—viz. A Christmas Carol, The Chimes, The Cricket on the Hearth, The Battle of Life, The Haunted Man, and the Ghost's Bargain (1843, 1846, and 1848); Pictures from Italy (1845), Dombey and Son (1846-48), David Copperfield (1849-50), Bleak House (1852-53), The Child's History of England (1854), Hard Times (1854), Little Dorrit (1855-57), A Tale of Two Cities (1859), The Uncommercial Traveller (1861), the Christmas numbers in Household Words and All the Year Round, Great Expectations (1860-61), Our Mutual Friend (1864-65), The Mystery of Edwin Drood (1870, unfinished). This long roll by no means represents the whole work of this most active of mankind. Public readings (1858-70), both in this country and in America, private theatricals, speeches, letters innumerable, journeys many, pamphlets, plays, the conduct of a popular magazine—first (1850) called Household Words and then (1859) All the Year Round—and an ever-present readiness to enjoy the society of his friends, filled up the space when he was not actually writing. That he could do so much was mainly due to his methodical habits, to his clearness of mind, and to a capacity for business as wonderful as his genius for fiction. He was incomparably the most active man, the hardest-working man of his age. He died suddenly, June 9, 1870, at Gadshill, near Rochester (the place he had coveted as a boy, and purchased in 1856), and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See his Letters (3 vols. 1880-82); his Life, by John Forster (3 vols. 1872-74); the little Life by Marzials (1887), with bibliography by Anderson; Dickens in Pen and Pencil, by Kitton (1889); Childhood of Dickens, by Langton (1891); his Letters to Wilkie Collins (1892); Miss Mamie Dickens's My Father as I recall Him (1897); and George Gissing's Dickens: a Critical Study (1898). Dicksee, FRANK, painter, born 27th Nov. 1853, in 1881 became an A.R.A., in 1891 an R.A.

Dickson, OSCAR (1823-97), born at Gothenburg of Scottish ancestry, was ennobled for his share in fitting out the Arctic expeditions of Norden-skiöld (q. v.).

Dickson, WILLIAM STEEL, D.D. (1744-1824), an Ulster Presbyterian minister and schoolmaster, withal a United Irishman (1798).

Diderot, DENIS, was born, a master-cutler's son, at Langres in Champagne, October 15, 1713. Trained by the Jesuits at home and in Paris, he refused to become either a lawyer or a physician, was thrown upon his own resources, and led (1734-44) a life of ill-paid toil as tutor and bookseller's hack. In 1743 he married a young sempstress, who contrived to bring about a temporary reconciliation between father and son; but the marriage was not happy, and Diderot formed a series of liaisons. His Pensées Philosophiques was burned by the Parliament of Paris in 1746, and in 1749 he was imprisoned for his Lettre sur les Aveugles. The bookseller Le Breton now invited him to edit an expanded version of Ephraim Chambers' Cyclopaedia (1727). But in Diderot's hands the character of the work was transformed. He enlisted nearly all the important French writers of the time as contributors, and, in place of a compendium of useful information, produced an engine of war for the philosophie party. For some twenty years he stood at his post in spite of dangers and drawbacks. The sale of the book was again and again prohibited, and its editor ran a constant risk of imprisonment or exile. D'Alembert, for a time co-editor with Diderot, forsook him in despair. But his marvellous energy, his varied knowledge, and his faculty of rallying his fellow-workers, enabled Diderot to carry his vast undertaking to a successful conclusion. The first volume appeared in 1751; the last in 1765. In his later years Diderot was rescued from pecuniary difficulties by Catharine II. of Russia, to whom in 1773 he paid a five months' visit. He died of apoplexy, 30th July 1784. One of the most prolific and versatile, Diderot was also one of the most careless of writers. He was a novelist and a dramatist, a satirist, a philosopher, a critic of pictures and books, a brilliant letter-writer; but his published works are far from embodying the results of his labours as an author. His efforts in fiction include a story in the manner of the younger Crébillon; La Religieuse, an exposure of conventual life; and the Sterne-like Jacques le Fataliste. In Le Neveu de Rameau, an imaginary conversation between the author and a parasite (translated by Goethe; Eng. trans. 1897), the follies of society are laid bare with sardonic humour and piercing insight. His plays were somewhat unsuccessful examples of melodrama, the happiest efforts being two short pieces which were never acted, La Pièce et la Prologue and Est-il Bon? Est-il Méchant? His letters addressed in 1759-74 to Mademoiselle Voland form the most interesting section of his voluminous correspondence. As a critic Diderot stood far in advance of his contemporaries, and anticipated the Romanticists. The originality, shrewdness, and abounding vivacity of his criticisms more than atone for lack of literary finish. His Salons, remarks on pictures exhibited, are the earliest example of modern aesthetic criticism. Diderot has been described as an atheist, also as a pantheist. See the edition of his works by Assézat and Tournour (20 vols. 1875-77); the study by Rosenkranz (2 vols. Leip. 1866); Morley's Diderot and the Encyclopædist (2 vols. 1878); Carlyle's Miscellanies; and monographs by Scherer (1880), Reinach (1894), Collignon (1895), and Ducros (1895). [Deed-ro'.]

Dido, or ELISSA, the legendary founder in 853 B.C. of Carthage, was the daughter of the Tyrian king Belus or Agenor. Virgil ascribes her suicide to an unrequited passion for Æneas.

Didon, HENRY (1840-1900), Dominican preacher and author, was born at Touvet, Isère.

The latter's son HENRI (1765-1852) was an engraver and letter-founder, producing very beautiful 'microscopic' types; and PIERRE (1760-1853), eldest son of François Ambroise, brought out the magnificent Louvre editions of Virgil, Horace, Racine, and La Fontaine, besides Boileau's works and Voltaire's Henriade.—His brother, FIRMIN (1764-1836), as a printer, and especially as an engraver and founder, raised the family name to the highest eminence. He revived and developed the stereotyping process, and produced singularly perfect editions of many classical, French, and English works. He became a deputy, and obtained some reputation as an author by his tragedies, La Reine de Portugal and La Mort d'Annibal, and several volumes of metrical translations from the classics.—FIRMIN'S sons, AMBROISE FIRMIN (1790-1876) and HYACINTHE FIRMIN (1794-1880), carried on and transmitted the business, as the firm of Firmin Didot Frères. His industry was enormous, embracing poetry and romances, besides Celtica (1839-40); Vergleichendes Götisches Wörterbuch (1846-51); Glossarium Latino-Germanicum mediæ et infimæ ætatis (1857); Origines Europææ; Hoch- und Niederdeutsches Wörterbuch (with Wülcker, 1874-85). Diepenbeek, ABRAHAM VAN (c. 1596-1675), painter, born at Bois-le-Duc, studied under Rubens in Antwerp, and after a residence in Italy returned to be his assistant. He first devoted himself to glass-painting, but soon turned to oil-painting and designing. He visited England in the reign of Charles I., and afterwards was much employed by the Duke of Newcastle, drawing the plates for his folio on Horsemanship (Ant. 1657). He was president of the Antwerp Academy from 1641. [Dee-pen-baik.]

In 1818 he saw Goethe at Jena, and by him was directed to the study of Provençal. From 1822 he lived at Bonn, and in 1830 became professor of the Romance Languages. His Altspan. Romanzen (1821) was followed by a series of works on the Romance languages, of which the greatest are Grammatik der Romanischen Sprachen (1836-38; 5th ed. 1882) and Etymologisches Wörterbuch der Romanischen Sprachen (1853; 5th ed. 1887; Eng. trans. 1864). Digby, SIR KENELM, was born at Gayhurst, near Newport Pagnell, 11th July 1603. His father, Sir Everard Digby (1578-1606), in 1592 came into a large estate, but seven years later turned Catholic, and was hanged as a Gunpowder conspirator. A Life of him appeared in 1896. Kenelm himself was bred a Catholic, but in 1618, after a half-year in Spain, entered Gloucester Hall, Oxford (now Worcester College). He left it in 1620 without a degree, and spent nearly three years abroad, in Florence chiefly. At Madrid he fell in with Prince Charles, and, following him back to England, was knighted, and entered his service. In 1625, after a singular courtship, he secretly married 'that celebrated beauty and comtezane,' Venetia Stanley (1600-33), who had been his playmate in childhood. With two privateers he sailed in 1628 to the Mediterranean, and on 11th June vanquished a French and Venetian squadron off Scanderon. On his beloved wife's death he withdrew to Gresham College, and there passed two hermit-like years, diverting himself with chemistry and the professors' good conversation. Meanwhile he had turned Protestant, but, 'looking back,' in 1636 he announced to Laud his reconversion; and his tortuous conduct during the Great Rebellion was dictated, it seems, by his zeal for Catholicism. He was imprisoned by the parliament (1642-43), and had his estate confiscated; was at Rome (1645-47), where he finished by 'hectoring at his Holiness;' and thrice revisited England (1649-51-54), the third time staying two years, and entering into close relations with Cromwell. At the Restoration, however, he retained his office of chancellor to Queen Henrietta Maria. He was one of the first members of the Royal Society (1663), and died 11th June 1665. 'The very Pliny of our age for lying,' said Stubbes of Digby, whom Evelyn terms 'an arrant mountebank.' Yet he was a friend of Descartes and Sir Thomas Browne; he could appreciate the discoveries of Harvey, Bacon, and Galileo. His 'powder of sympathy,' really perhaps invented by Sir Gilbert Talbot, is described in one of fifteen works by him. See his bombastic Memoirs, dealing with his courtship (ed. by Sir Harris Nicolas, 1827), his Journal of the Scanderon Voyage (Camden Soc. 1868), and Life by a descendant (1896).

Digby, KENELM HENRY, born in 1800, the youngest son of the dean of Clonfert, graduated from Trinity, Cambridge, in 1819, and in 1822 published The Broad Stone of Honour—'that noble manual for gentlemen,' as Julius Hare called it, 'that volume which, had I a son, I would place in his hands, charging him to love it next to his Bible.' It was much altered in the 1828 and subsequent editions (the latest 1877), its author having meanwhile turned Catholic. He died in London, where most of his long life was spent, 22d March 1880. Of fourteen other works (32 vols. 1831-74) all the last eight were poetry.

Diggle, JOSEPH ROBERT, born 12th May 1849, and educated at Manchester and Wadham, Oxford, was for three years a curate, and then 1879-97 a member of the London School Board, of which he was several times the (clericalist) chairman.

Dilke, CHARLES WENTWORTH, critic and journalist, was born December 8, 1789, graduated at Cambridge, edited Old English Plays (6 vols. 1814-16), and served for twenty years in the navy pay-office. In 1830 he became proprietor of the Athenæum, and edited it until 1846, when he took over the Daily News and managed it for three years. He died at Alice Holt, Hants, August 10, 1864. See short Life by Sir Charles Dilke prefixed to Papers of a Critic (2 vols. 1875).—His only son, SIR CHARLES WENTWORTH DILKE, was born in London, February 18, 1810, and educated at Westminster, and Trinity Hall, Cambridge. He studied law, but never practised. One of the most active originators of the Great Exhibition of 1851, he refused a knighthood and a large pecuniary reward; but in 1862 he accepted a baronetcy. In 1865 he became Liberal M.P. for Wallingford, in 1869 went as English commissioner to the horticultural exhibition at St Petersburg, where on 10th May he died suddenly.—His son, SIR CHARLES WENTWORTH DILKE (1848-1911), born at Chelsea, graduated from Trinity Hall, Cambridge, as head of the law tripos in 1866, and was called to the bar. His travels in Canada and the United States, Australia, and New Zealand he described in Greater Britain (1868). He was returned to parliament for Chelsea in 1868. A doctrinaire Radical, and once at least an avowed Republican, he yet held office as Under-secretary for Foreign Affairs and President of the Local Government Board under Mr Gladstone. In 1885 he married the widow of Mark Pattison (née Emilia Frances Strong), herself the author of Claud Lorrain, sa Vie et ses Œuvres (1884), The Shrine of Death (1886), &c. About the same time his name was much before the public in connection with the Crawford divorce case, and this led to his defeat at the 1886 election and temporary retirement. He still continued to influence public opinion through the press, as by his European Politics (1887), Problems of Greater Britain (1890), and The British Empire (1899). He returned to public life in 1892 as M.P. for the Forest of Dean.

Dillenius, JOHANN JAKOB (1687-1747), born at Darmstadt, from 1728 was professor of Botany at Oxford. See Life by Schilling (Hamb. 1889).

Dillmann, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH AUGUST (1823-94), orientalist, born in Würtemberg, studied at Tübingen under Ewald, and in 1846-48 visited the libraries at Paris, London, and Oxford, cataloguing Ethiopic MSS., and returning to Tübingen. In 1854 he accepted a call to Kiel, where he became professor of Oriental Languages in 1860, but was transferred in 1864 to the chair of Old Testament Exegesis at Giessen, which in 1869 he resigned to become Hengstenberg's successor at Berlin. The first authority on the Ethiopic languages, he became in 1877 a member of the Berlin Academy, was president of the fifth International Congress of Orientalists, and edited its Abhandlungen (3 vols. 1881-82).

Dillon, JOHN, the son of John Blake Dillon (1816-66), who was a leader of the Young Ireland party, an exile in 1848-55, and member for County Tipperary in 1865-66. Born in New York in 1851, and educated at the Catholic University of Dublin, he became a doctor. He early identified himself with the Parnellite movement, and in 1880 was returned for County Tipperary. In parliament he distinguished himself by the violence of his language, while speeches delivered by him in Ireland led to his imprisonment in 1881, 1881-82, and 1888. From 1883 to 1885 he was absent from political life on account of ill-health; but in the latter year he was elected for East Mayo. He was one of the chief promoters of the 'Plan of Campaign.' In 1896-99 he was Justin M'Carthy's successor as head of the Anti-Parnellite party.

Dillon, SIR JOHN TALBOT, Bart. (c. 1740-1805), an Irish writer on Spanish subjects.

Dimsdale, THOMAS (1712-1800), a physician who wrote on inoculation, went to Russia in 1768 and 1784 to inoculate the Empress Catherine, and sat for Hertford in two parliaments.

Dindorf, WILHELM (1802-83), a Greek scholar, editor of Aristophanes, Æschylus, Sophocles, &c., was born at Leipzig, where his father was Oriental professor. In 1827 he declined a chair at Berlin, but in 1828 accepted one at Leipzig, which he resigned in 1833 to devote himself to literary activity. With Hase and his brother Ludwig (1805-71) he edited Stephanus' Thesaurus Græcæ Linguae (1832-65).

Dingelstedt, FRANZ VON (1814-81), German poet, novelist, &c., born at Haldorf near Marburg, was royal librarian at Würtemberg in 1843-50, and director of the court theatres at Munich, Weimar, and Vienna. He was ennobled in 1876. His collected works fill 12 vols. (1877). See two works by Rodenberg (Berl. 1882-91).

Dinwiddie, ROBERT (c. 1690-1770), born in Scotland, was governor of Virginia from 1752 to 1758, when he was recalled, after precipitating the French and Indian war, and rendering himself generally unbearable to the Americans.

Dio Cassius. See DION CASSIUS.

Diocletian. VALERIUS DIOCLETIANUS, Roman emperor, was humbly born near Salona, in Dalmatia, in 245. He served with distinction under Probus and Aurelian, accompanied Carus on his Persian campaign, and was proclaimed emperor in 284 by the army at Chalcedon. Diocletian's first years of government were so molested by the incursions of barbarians that he took Maximian as colleague in the empire, assigning to him the western division (286). Still the Persians menaced the east, the Germans and other barbarians the west; and for its greater security Diocletian subjected the Roman empire to a fourfold division, Constantius Chlorus and Galerius being proclaimed Cæsars (292). Diocletian retained the East, with Nicomedia as his seat of government; Maximian kept Italy and Africa; Constantius took Britain, Gaul, and Spain; while Galerius had Illyricum and the valley of the Danube. Britain, after maintaining independence under Carausius and Allectus, was in 296 restored to the empire; the Persians were defeated in 298; and the Marcomanni and other northern barbarians were driven beyond the Roman frontier. In 303 there was a severe persecution of the Christians. Diocletian, after twenty-one years' cares of empire, abdicated in 305, compelling Maximian to do likewise; and building a palace (now the heart of modern Spalato, named from it) near Salona on the coast of Dalmatia, devoted himself to philosophical reflection and gardening. He died in 313.

Diodati, JEAN (1576-1649), Calvinist divine, born at Geneva, became professor of Hebrew there in 1597, pastor of the reformed church in 1608, and in 1609, on Beza's death, professor of Theology. He was a preacher at Nîmes (1614-17), and Genevese representative at the Synod of Dort. He is remembered by his Italian translation of the Bible (1607) and his Annotaciones in Biblia (1607). See Life by Budé (1869).—His nephew, CHARLES DIODATI (c. 1608-38), Milton's friend, the son of a refugee doctor, was educated at St Paul's School, and Trinity, Oxford, and practised medicine near Chester and in Blackfriars. [Dee-aw'da-tee.]

Diodorus Siculus (fl. 44 B.C.), born at Agrigum in Sicily, travelled in Asia and Europe, and lived in Rome, collecting for thirty years the materials of his great Bibliothèque Historique, a history of the world in forty books, from the creation to the Gallic wars of Cæsar. The first five books are extant entire; the next five are wholly lost; the next ten are complete; and of the remainder fragments have been preserved. The work is an immense mass of material, monotonous, but generally clear and simple. There are editions by Wesseling (1746), Dindorf (1828-31), Bekker (1854), Vogel (1888-93), Fischer (1905-6).

Dionenes (412-323 B.C.), Cynic philosopher, was a native of Sinope in Pontus, who, coming to Athens a rake and spendthrift, was fascinated by the teaching of Antisthenes (q.v.) and became at once an austere ascetic, his clothing of the coarsest, his food of the plainest, and his bed the bare ground. At length he found himself a permanent residence in a tub. The Athenians admired his contempt for comfort and allowed him a wide latitude of comment and rebuke. Practical good was the chief aim of his philosophy; for literature, poetry, art, music, technical philosophy, and oratory he did not conceal his disdain. Seized by pirates on a voyage to Ægina, he was sold as a slave. But the slave soon ruled his master, Xenades of Corinth, acquired his freedom, was appointed tutor to the children, and spent his old age as one of the household. It was here that he had his interview with Alexander the Great when, asked by the king in what way he could serve him, he answered: 'You can stand out of the sunshine,' and sent Alexander away saying: 'If I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes.' See a work by Hermann (1860). [Di-of-e-neez.]

Diogenes Lærtius, born at Laerte in Cilicia, flourished early in the 3d century A.D. His Lives of the Greek Philosophers, in ten books, contains a mass of anecdotes, but is worthless in respect of plan or criticism. See editions by Hübner (1828-31) and Cobet (1850).

Dion (409-353 B.C.), a Syracusan, both brother-in-law and son-in-law of the elder Dionysius. This connection with the tyrant brought him great wealth, but his austere manners made him hateful to Dionysius the Younger, who banished him in 366. Thereupon he retired to Athens to study philosophy under Plato. A sudden attack upon Syracuse made him master of the city (356), but his severity irritated its luxurious citizens, and he was murdered.

Dion Cassius, a Greek historian, was born at Nicea, in Bithynia, 155 A.D. About 180 he went to Rome, held successively all the high offices of state, was twice consul, and enjoyed the intimate friendship of Alexander Severus, who sent him as legate to Dalmatia and Pannonia. About 229 he retired to his native city. Of the eighty books of his History of Rome, from the landing of Æneas in Italy down to 229 A.D., but nineteen (xxxvi.-liv.) have reached us complete. These embrace the period 68 B.C.-10 A.D. The first twenty-four books exist in the merest fragments; of the last twenty we have Xiphilinus' 11th-century epitome. The Annals of Zonaras, too, followed Dion Cassius so closely as to be almost an epitome. The best editions of the History are by Sturz (1824), Bekker (1849), and Dindorf (5 vols. 1863-65; recast by Melber, 1890).

Dion Chrysostomus (c. 50-117 A.D.), Greek rhetorician, probably the maternal grandfather of Dion Cassius, was born at Prusa, in Bithynia, came to Rome under Vespasian, but was banished by Domitian. He next visited—in the disguise of a beggar, and on advice of the Delphic oracle—Thrace, Mysia, and Scythia. On Nerva's accession (96) he returned to Rome, and lived in great honour under him and Trajan. Eighty of his orations or treatises on politics, morals, philosophy, &c., are extant, with fragments of fifteen others. Good editions are by Reiske (1784), Emper (1844), Dindorf (1857), and Von Arnim (1893).

Dionysius of Alexandria (c. 200-64), 'the Great,' was a pupil of Origen, became bishop of Alexandria in 247, and showed wisdom and moderation in the controversies of his time. The fragments of his numerous writings were collected by Routh in his Reliquiæ Sacre (1814) and in Mai's Auctores Classici (1838). See works by Dittrich (Freib. 1867) and Morize (Par. 1881). [Di'o-niz'i-us.]

Dionysius of Halicarnassus, critic, historian, and rhetorician, was born about 66 B.C., came to Rome in 29 B.C., and died there about 10 A.D. His Greek Archæologia, a history of Rome down to 264 B.C., is a mine of information about the constitution, religion, history, laws, and private life of the Romans. Of its twenty books we have only the first nine complete. The best edition is by Jacoby (3 vols. 1885-91).

Dionysius the Areopagite (i.e. member of the Areopagus), one of the few Athenians converted by the Apostle Paul (Acts xvii. 34); tradition makes him the first bishop of Athens and a martyr. The Greek writings bearing his name were written, not by him, but probably by an Alexandrian. They are first mentioned in 538, from which time they were generally accepted as genuine, and had a great influence on the development of theology. They include treatises On the Heavenly and Ecclesiastical Hierarchies, On Divine Names, On Mystical Theology, and a series of ten Epistles. Various dates, from 120 to 520, have been assigned to them. The standard edition is by the Jesuit Balthasar Corderius (Antwerp, 1634). There are translations in German by Engelhardt (1823), French by Darboy (1845), and English by Parker (1897). See works by Hipler (1861), Niemeier (1869), Schneider (1884); Vidieu (1888), and Cahn (1889).

Dionysius the Elder (431-367 B.C.), tyrant of Syracuse, had been a clerk and then a soldier, when in 405 he made himself absolute ruler of his native city. After suppressing with ferocity several insurrections and conquering some of the Greek towns of Sicily, he made war with the Carthaginians in 397. At first successful, he soon after suffered calamitous reverses; but a pestilence breaking out in the Carthaginian fleet, Dionysius suddenly attacked his enemies and obtained a complete victory. In 393 and 392 the Carthaginians renewed hostilities, but were defeated on both occasions, and Dionysius concluded a most advantageous peace. He now turned his arms against Lower Italy, and in 387 captured Rhegium. From this time he exercised the greatest influence over the Greek cities of Lower Italy, while his fleets swept the Tyrrhenian and Adriatic seas. In 368 he renewed the war with the Carthaginians, whom he wished to drive out of Sicily, but died suddenly next year, not without a suspicion of poison. He was a poet and patron of poets and philosophers.—His son, Dionysius the Younger, succeeded in 367 B.C. His education had been purposely neglected, and he had grown up indolent and dissolute. Dion (q.v.) sought to improve him by bringing Plato to Syracuse, but his endeavours were frustrated by Philistus the historian. Dion was banished, but ten years afterwards expelled Dionysius. He fled to Locri, and made himself master of the city, which he ruled despotically, till in 346 dissensions in Syracuse enabled him to return thither. But in 343 Timoleon came to free Sicily, and Dionysius was exiled to Corinth.

Dionysius Exiguus (or 'the Little'), a Scythian abbot of a monastery at Rome, died in 556. One of the most learned men of his time, he fixed the Christian era and collected canons.

Dionysius Thrax ('the Thracian'), a native of Alexandria, who taught at Rhodes and at Rome about 100 B.C. His Technê Grammatikê is the basis of all European works on grammar. The best edition is by Uhlig (Leip. 1884).

Diophantus, a Greek mathematician, lived at Alexandria about 275 A.D. Of his three works, Arithmetics, Polygonal Numbers, and Porisms, the first is the earliest extant treatise on algebra, but only six of the original thirteen books are extant. Polygonal Numbers, a mere fragment, is not analytical but synthetic; in it numbers are represented by lines. The Porisms, entirely lost, were probably a collection of propositions on the properties of certain numbers. Diophantine Analysis is that part of algebra which treats of the finding of particular rational values for general expressions under a surd form. See Heath's Diophantos of Alexandria (1885; enlarged 1910).

Dioscor'ides, PEDANIUS, a Greek physician from Anazarba in Cilicia, lived in the 1st century A.D., and left a great work on materia medica. The best edition is Sprengel (2 vols. 1829-30).

Dippel, JOHANN KONRAD (1673-1734), a German chemist and alchemist, inventor of the loathsome and discarded panacea, 'Dippel's Animal Oil.' See Life by Bender (Bonn. 1882).

Dirceu. See GONZAGA, THOMAS.

Dircks, HENRY (1806-73), civil engineer, was born at Liverpool and died at Brighton. He was the author of works on perpetual motion (1861) and electro-metallurgy, of The Ghost (1863, in which he describes his invention, commonly called 'Pepper's Ghost'), of a Life of the Marquis of Worcester (1865), of Inventors and Inventions (1867), and of novels and essays.

D'Israeli, ISAAC, man of letters, was born at Enfield in May 1766, the only son of Benjamin D'Israeli (1730-1816), a Jewish merchant, who in 1801 was made an English citizen. Isaac was educated at a school near Enfield, and for two years at Amsterdam under a freethinking tutor; in 1782 he returned home, bent on authorship. He published two volumes of verse and seven romances; but his Curiosities of Literature (6 vols. 1791-1834) showed his forte. His chief other books are Calamities of Authors (1812-13); Quarrels of Authors (1814); Commentaries on the Life and Reign of Charles I. (1828-30), which won him an Oxford D.C.L.; and Amenities of Literature (1840). Though somewhat slipshod and inaccurate, they are pleasant, readable works. In 1802 he married Maria Basevi (1775-1847), and by her he had one daughter and four sons, the eldest, Lord Beaconsfield (q.v.). Always a lax observer of the Jewish faith, he broke with the synagogue in 1817, and had all his children baptised. He died at Bradenham House, Bucks, 19th January 1848. See, prefixed to the 1849 edition of the Curiosities, a memoir by Lord Beaconsfield, who also published a collected edition of his works (7 vols. 1858-59). [Diz-ray-lee, often Diz-ray-lee.]

From 1833 he was successively secretary of state, U.S. senator, and secretary of the treasury. In the civil war he raised seventeen regiments, and rendered effective service to the cause of the Union. He became minister to France in 1866, and governor of New York in 1872. He died 21st April 1879. See Memoirs (1883) by his eldest son, the Rev. Dr Morgan Dix.

Dixon, WILLIAM HEPWORTH, was born in Manchester, 30th June 1821, and came to London in 1846. Two series of papers in the Daily News on 'The Literature of the Lower Orders' and 'London Prisons' attracted attention, and in 1850 he published John Howard, and the Prison World of Europe. William Penn (1851) is a defence against Macaulay's onslaught. From 1853 to 1869 Dixon was editor of the Athenæum. His works include Life of Blake (1852), Personal History of Lord Bacon (1860), The Holy Land (1865), New America (1867), Spiritual Wives (1868), Free Russia (1870), Her Majesty's Tower (1869-71), The History of Two Queens (Catharine of Aragon and Anne Boleyn, 1873-74), The White Conquest (1875), British Cyprus (1879), and Royal Windsor (1878-80). He died 27th December 1879.—His second son, HAROLD BAILY DIXON, F.R.S., was born in London, 11th August 1852, and educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, taking a first in Natural Science (1875). The gases his chief study, in 1886 he succeeded Sir Henry Roscoe as professor of Chemistry at Manchester.

Dmitri. See DEMETRIUS.

Dobell, SYDNEY, poet, was born at Cranbrook in Kent, 5th April 1824. His father, a wine-merchant, removed to London about 1825, and in 1835 to Cheltenham; with Gloucestershire and with his father's business Sydney's whole after-life was connected. Under the influence of a sect, the 'Freethinking Christians,' founded by Samuel Thompson, his grandfather, he developed a hothouse precocity, and at fifteen became engaged to the girl whom he married at twenty. He never quite recovered from a severe illness (1847); and the chief events of his life were visits to the Continent in quest of health for himself or his wife. He died at Barton End House, among the Cotswold Hills, 22d August 1874. His principal works are The Roman, by 'Sydney Yendys' (1850); Balder (Part i. 1854); Sonnets on the War (1855), in conjunction with Alexander Smith; and England in Time of War (1856). Professor Nichol edited his collected poems in 1875 and his prose works in 1876 as Thoughts on Art, Philosophy, and Religion. See his Life and Letters (2 vols. 1878) and the memoir by W. Sharp prefixed to his selected poems (1887).

Döbereiner, JOHANN WOLFGANG (1780-1849), a Jena chemist, inventor of Döbereiner's Lamp. [Deh-be-ri-ner.]

Dobrovsky, JOSEPH (1753-1829), the founder of Slavonic philology, born at Gyermet near Raab in Hungary, studied at Prague, in 1772 became a Jesuit, and was teacher, tutor, and editor of a critical journal. In 1792 he visited Denmark, Sweden, and Russia to search for Bohemian books and MSS. carried off in the Thirty Years' War. See German Life by Palacky (1838).

Dobson, HENRY AUSTIN, poet, was born at Plymouth, January 18, 1840. He was educated at Beaumaris, Coventry, and Strasburg for a civil engineer like his father, but in 1856-1901 was a Board of Trade clerk. His earliest poems, published in 1868 in St Paul's Magazine, have been followed by Vignettes in Rhyme, and Vers de Société (1873), Proverbs in Procelain (1877), At the Sign of the Lyre (1885), The Story of Rosina (1895), and Collected Poems (1897). Often in the artificial forms of French verse, the rondeau, ballade, and villanelle, these poems are all marked by rare perfection of form, while many are informed with true pathos or genuine satire. In prose Dobson has published short Lives of Fielding (1883) and Steele (1886), Thomas Bewick and his Pupils (1884; new ed. 1889), Horace Walpole (1891), Hogarth (1891), and Eighteenth Century Vignettes (1892-96).

Dobson, WILLIAM, portrait-painter, was born in London in 1610. He succeeded Vanduyck in 1641 as serjeant-painter to Charles I., and painted portraits of him, the Prince of Wales, and Prince Rupert. His affairs got into confusion, and he was imprisoned for debt, and died in poverty, 28th October 1646, shortly after his release.

Dobson, WILLIAM CHARLES THOMAS (1817-98), painter, born at Hamburg, the son of an English merchant, was elected an R.A. in 1872.

Dockwra, or DOCKWRAY, WILLIAM, a merchant who in 1688 devised a new penny postal system in London, was alternately favoured and persecuted by the authorities, and died in poverty about 1702.

Dod, CHARLES ROGER PHIPPS (1793-1855), born at Drimlease vicarage in Leitrim, came to London in 1818, and for twenty-three years worked on the Times. He started the Parliamentary Companion (1832) and a Peerage (1841).

Dodd, RALPH (1756-1822), civil engineer, as also was his son GEORGE (1783-1827).

Dodd, ROBERT (1748-c. 1810), a marine painter.

Dodd, WILLIAM, born 29th May 1729 at Bourn in Lincolnshire, graduated from Clare Hall, Cambridge (1750), married, took orders, and became a popular preacher. He published a series of edifying books, edited the Christian Magazine, and was made a king's chaplain (1763), LL.D. (1766), and tutor to Philip Stanhope, Lord Chesterfield's nephew. But, despite his large income, his expensive habits drifted him hopelessly into debt. He purchased Charlotte Chapel in Pimlico, but a Simoniacal attempt to buy the rich living of St George's, Hanover Square, led to his name being struck off the list of chaplains (1774). Dodd left England, and was well received by his pupil, now Lord Chesterfield, at Geneva, and presented to the living of Wing in Buckinghamshire. But sinking deeper and deeper into debt, he sold his chapel, and in Feb. 1777 offered a stockbroker a bond for £4200 signed by Lord Chesterfield. It proved to be a forgery, and Dodd, though he refunded great part of the money, was tried and sentenced to death. Extraordinary efforts were made by Dr Johnson and others to secure a pardon; but the king refused to reprieve his former chaplain, and Dodd was hanged 27th July 1777. Of his fifty-five works the Beauties of Shakespeare (1752) was long popular, and Thoughts in Prison is still interesting. See A Famous Forgery, by Percy Fitzgerald (1865).

Doddridge, PHILIP, born in London 26th June 1702, determined to enter the nonconformist ministry on the advice of the famous Samuel Clarke, and from 1719 studied at Kibworth academy, Leicestershire, in 1723 became pastor of a congregation there. In 1729 he settled at Northampton as minister and president of a theological academy. He died 26th October 1751, at Lisbon, whither he had gone for his health. His Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul (1745) has been translated into Dutch, German, Danish, French, and even Syriac and Tamil. Besides this he published The Family Expositor (6 vols. 1739-56), Lectures (1763), and many sermons. His hymns include 'Hark, the glad sound, the Saviour comes,' and 'O God of Bethel, by whose hand.' See his Correspondence and Diary (1829-31) and Memoir by Stanford (1880).

Dodds, ALFRED AMÉDÉE, French general, was born at Saint-Louis in Senegal, 6th February 1842, entered the marine infantry in 1864, and served in the Franco-German war, the Cochinchina and Tonkin expeditions, and against Dahomey (1892-94). Dodge, THEODORE AYRAULT (1842-1909), born at Pittsfield, Mass., and educated at Berlin, Heidelberg, and London, lost his right leg in the Federal service at Gettysburg (1862), and was breveted colonel in 1865. Dodgson, CHARLES LUTWIDGE ('Lewis Carroll'), was born at Daresbury near Warrington, 27th Jan. 1832, and was educated at Rugby and Christ Church, Oxford, graduating B.A. in 1854 with a first-class in mathematics. He was elected a student of his college, took orders in 1861, and was mathematical lecturer 1855-81. He died 14th Jan. 1898. He issued in 1865 Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, which, with its continuation Through the Looking-glass (1872) and its illustrations by Tenniel, has become a nursery classic and has been widely translated. He also published Phantasmagoria (1869), Hunting of the Snark (1876), Doublets (1879), Euclid and His Modern Rivals (1879), Rhyme? and Reason? (1883; new ed. 1897), A Tangled Tale (1886), Game of Logic (1887), Sylvie and Bruno (1889-93, illus. by Furniss), Curiosa Mathematica (1888-93), and Symbolic Logic (1896). See Life by his nephew, S. D. Collingwood (1899).

Dodginton, GEORGE BUBB, a 'person of importance in his day,' was born plain Bubb in 1691, the son of an Irish fortune-hunter or apothecary, and took the name Dodginton in 1720 on inheriting a fine property from his uncle. Resolved 'to make some figure in the world,' he had got into parliament in 1715, and from 1722 to 1754 sat for Bridgwater. Otherwise, he was always changing his place, from Walpole's service to the Prince of Wales's, from his to Argyll's, anon back to the Prince's, and so on: his one good action, that he spoke up for Byng. He was sometimes in office but oftener out of it; and he had not long reached the goal of his ambition, a peerage with the title Baron Melcombe, when he died at Hammersmith 28th July 1762. A soi-disant Mæcenas, he passed for something of a wit and poet, but is only remembered through Browning's Parleying and by his posthumous diary (1784), that odd self-revelation of a flunky.

Dodoens, REMBERT (1517-85), botanist, was born at Malines and died at Leyden. [Do-doonz.]

Dods, MARCUS, D.D., was born at Belford, Northumberland (1834-1909), the son of Marcus Dods, D.D. (1786-1838), who had been Presbyterian minister there since 1810. He was educated at Edinburgh Academy and University, was minister of a Free Church in Glasgow in 1864-89, in 1889 became professor of New Testament Exegesis at the (United) Free Church College in Edinburgh, and in 1907 Principal. He published several theological works from 1863.

Dodsley, ROBERT, born in 1703 near Mansfield, Notts, was apprenticed to a stocking-weaver, but so ill-treated that he ran away and became a footman. His leisure he gave to reading, and in 1732 published A Muse in Livery. His Toy Shop, a dramatic piece, was, through Pope's influence, acted at Covent Garden in 1735 with great success. With his profits, and £100 from Pope, he set up as bookseller, but still continued to write bright plays—The King and the Miller of Mansfield (1737), The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green (1741), Rex et Pontifex (1745), &c., which were collected as Trifles (1748). In 1738 he bought London from the yet unknown Johnson for ten guineas; other famous authors for whom he published were Pope, Young, Akenside, Lord Chesterfield, Horace Walpole, Goldsmith, and Shenstone. Among his schemes were The Museum (1742-47), a collection of historical and social essays; The Preceptor, a book of instruction for the young; and the Annual Register, started in 1759. With a tragedy, Cleone (1758), acted at Covent Garden with extraordinary success, he closed his career as a dramatist. He is chiefly remembered by his Select Collection of Old Plays (12 vols. 1744; ed. Hazlitt, 1874-76) and his Poems by Several Hands (3 vols. 1748; 6 vols. 1758). He died on a visit to Durham, 25th Dec. 1764. See Life by Straus (1910) and Austin Dobson's Eighteenth Century Vignettes (2d series, 1894).

Dodwell, HENRY (1641-1711), nonjuror, was born in Dublin and died at Shottesbrooke, near Maidenhead. See Life by Brokesby (1715).—His son, HENRY (d. 1784), was a deistical writer.

Doggett, THOMAS, a capable London actor, who was born in Dublin and died in 1721, founded a sculling prize, 'Doggett's Coat and Badge,' still competed for by Thames watermen on 1st August.

Dohm, CHRISTIAN WILHELM VON (1751-1820), a German political and historical writer.

Dohrn, KARL AUGUST (1806-92), entomologist, was born and died at Stettin.—His son, ANTON (1840-1909), also born there, in 1870 founded the marine zoological station at Naples.

Dolabella, PUBLIUS CORNELIUS, Cicero's profigate son-in-law, was born about 70 B.C., and in 49 sought refuge from his creditors in Caesar's camp. Next year he obtained the tribuneship, and brought forward a bill cancelling all debts, which led to bloody struggles in Rome. On Caesar's murder (44) he usurped the consulate, and made a great display of republican sentiments, until Antony gave him the province of Syria. He murdered at Smyrna the proconsul Trebonius, and proceeded to wring money from the towns of Asia with a recklessness that brought about his outlawry. Laodicea, in which he had shut himself up, was taken by Cassius, and Dolabella bade one of his own soldiers kill him, 43 B.C.

Dolci, CARLO or CARLINO (1616-86), painter, was born and died at Florence. His works, which are scattered over all Europe, include many Madonnas, 'St Cecilia,' 'Christ Blessing the Bread and Wine,' and 'Herodias with the Head of John the Baptist.' [Dol-tchee.]

Dolet, ÉTIENNE, 'the martyr of the Renaissance,' was born at Orleans, 3d August 1509. At the university of Paris his attention was directed to a life-long study of the writings of Cicero; in Venice (1526-32) he imbibed the spirit of humanism. At Toulouse, after his return, he delivered a harangue which procured him three days' imprisonment; at Lyons, his residence from 1534, he came under strong suspicion of heresy. In 1542 he set up a printing-press, and was arrested more than once for publishing heretical books. In 1544 he was found guilty of heresy, on a charge mainly based on an alleged mistranslation of Plato, in which he was accused of denying the immortality of the soul, and he was burned at Paris, 3d August 1546. His chief work is Commentaries on the Latin Language. See Christie's É. Dolet (1880; new ed. 1899). [Do-lay.]

Dolgoruko'va, KATHARINA, PRINCESS YU-RIEFFSKAIA, born in 1846, was the favourite of Alexander II. (q.v.), who married her in July 1880, after his first wife's death. Under the pseudonym of Victor Laferté, she published Alexandre II., Détails inédites sur sa vie intime et sa mort (Gen. 1882). Her Mémoires (1890) were suppressed by the Russian government.

Döllinger, JOHANN JOSEPH IONAZ, theologian, was born at Bamberg, 28th February 1799. He was professor of Ecclesiastical History and Law in the university of Munich almost continuously from 1826 to 1871, when he was elected rector. A staunch Ultramontane, he published Die Reformation (1846-48) and Luther, eine Skizze (1851); but in 1857 a visit to Rome caused a change in his opinions, and in 1861 he propounded his belief that the temporal sovereignty of the pope was not essential to the well-being of Catholicism. In 1870 the Vatican Council promulgated the decree of papal infallibility, and in March 1871 Döllinger issued a letter withholding his submission, alike as 'a Christian, a theologian, a historical student, and a citizen.' Excommunicated three weeks afterwards, he took a leading part in the summoning of the congress at Munich out of which arose the Old Catholics. From this time Döllinger advocated the union of the various Christian churches, not only in a series of lectures (1872), but also by the active part he took in the Old Catholic conference at Bonn (1874-76). With Reusch he edited Cardinal Bellarmine's autobiography (1887) and a history of moral controversies in the Catholic church since the 16th century (1888). In 1888-91 he published Akademische Vorträge (Eng. trans. 1890-95), and in 1889 Beiträge zur Sektengeschichte. Döllinger also wrote Hippolytus und Kallistus (1853), Heidentum und Judentum (1857), First Age of Christianity and the Church (1860; Eng. trans. 1866), and, with Friedrich and Huber, Janus (1869; 2d ed. as Das Papsttum, 1891). He represented his university in the Bavarian Chamber from 1845 to 1847, and onwards from 1849, and sat in the Frankfort Parliament of 1848-49. He died 10th January 1890. See Louise von Kobell, Conversations of Dr Döllinger (Eng. trans. 1892). [Nearly Del'ving-er.]

Dollond, JOHN (1706-61), optician, born in London of Huguenot parentage, in 1752 from a silk-weaver turned optician, and devoted himself to the invention of an achronatic telescope. His success was rewarded with the Copley Medal (1758), and in 1761 he was elected an F.R.S. See Life by Kelly in the Philosophical Magazine (1804).—His son, PETER (1730-1820), and his nephew, GEORGE HUGGINS or DOLLOND (1774-1852), were also noted opticians.

Dolomieu, DÉODAT GUY GRATET DE (1750-1801), geologist and mineralogist, was born at Dolomieu in Dauphiné, and gave name to 'dolomite.'

Dombrowski, JOHN HENRY (1755-1818), born near Cracow, fought against Russia (1792-94), and, then taking service with France, bore a distinguished part throughout the Napoleonic campaigns. On Napoleon's fall he returned to Poland, and was appointed by the Emperor Alexander a general of cavalry and Polish senator.

Domenichino, or DOMENICO ZAMPIERI (1581-1641), a painter of the Bolognese school, was born in Bologna and died at Naples. His masterpiece is the 'Communion of St Jerome' (1614), in the Vatican; other productions are 'Diana and her Nymphs,' 'Guardian Angel,' 'St John,' 'St Sebastian,' and the 'Cure of the Demoniac Boy,' at Grotta Ferrata. [Dom-en-i-kee'no.]

Domett, ALFRED, C.M.G. (1811-87), poet and administrator in New Zealand, where he lived from 1842 to 1871. He was born at Camberwell, like his life-long friend, Robert Browning; studied at St John's College, Cambridge; and was called to the bar in 1841.

Dominic, Sr, the founder in 1216 of an order of preaching friars, was born about 1170 at Calahorra in Old Castile, and studied at Palencia. Here he acquired such a name for piety and learning that in 1193 the Bishop of Osma made him a canon, and relied mainly on his aid in reforming the whole chapter according to the Augustinian rule. The young man led a life of rigorous asceticism, and devoted himself to missionary labours among Moslems and 'heretics.' In 1204 he accompanied his bishop on a political mission, and thrice had to traverse the south of France, peopled almost entirely by Albigenses. He undertook the work of their conversion, and travelled from place to place on foot, bearing St Paul's epistles in his hands and preaching everywhere. He continued his labours for ten years, and gathered like-minded companions round him, for whom he founded the first house of his order at Toulouse. He also set up an asylum for women in danger from heretical influence, which developed into an order of nuns. Unhappily, events occurred which have left a deep stain on his memory and that of his order, associating it closely with the Inquisition. Innocent III., incensed by the murder of his legate, Peter of Castelnau, called the barons of northern France, led by Simon de Montfort, to a crusade against the heretics; and Dominic in an evil hour became a consenting party to these cruelties. In 1215 he went to the fourth Lateran Council, and Innocent III. promised approval of his new order on condition that it adopted an old rule. Dominic chose the rule of St Augustine, and next year the authorisation was given by Honorius III. Dominic became 'Master of the Sacred Palace,' an office which has continued hereditary in the order. In 1220 the Dominicans, in imitation of their Franciscan brethren, adopted a poverty so rigid that not even the order as a corporation could hold houses or lands, and thus they forced themselves to become mendicants or beggars. Dominic died at Bologna, 6th August 1221. He had lived to see his order occupying sixty houses and divided into eight provinces.

It had spread to England, where from their dress they were called Black Friars; to northern France, Italy, Spain, and Austria. He was canonised in 1233 by his friend Gregory IX. See Lives by Lacordaire and Archbishop Alemany; Danzas, Études sur l'Ordre de St Dominique (4 vols. 1874-76); and Miss Draue's History of St Dominic (1891).

Dominiſ, MARCO ANTONIO DE, born in 1566 in the Dalmatian island of Arbe, when Archbishop of Spalato became involved in the quarrel between the papacy and Venice, and resigned his see for reasons given in his Consilium Profectionis (1616). In 1616 he came to England, in 1618 was by James I. appointed Master of the Savoy, and in 1619 Dean of Windsor. In his De Republica Ecclesiastica (1617) he disputed the supremacy of the pope; in 1619 he published without authority Sarpi's History of the Council of Trent. His enemy Paul V. died in 1620, and was succeeded by Gregory XV., a relative of De Dominis, who now began to intrigue with Rome for a return to the bosom of the Church. He left England in 1622, and while waiting at Brussels denounced in his Consilium Reditus the Church of England as a wretched schism. He went on to Rome, but was seized by the Inquisition, and died in prison in 1624. De Dominis wrote his De Radix Vitis et Lucis in Vitis Persectivis et Iride in 1611.

Domitianus, T. FLAVIUS (51-96 A.D.), a son of Vespasian, succeeded his elder brother Titus as Roman emperor in 81. He ruled at first well, but, after the failure of his campaigns (87) against the Dacians and Marcomanni, gave way to the most atrocious cruelties. These became so intolerable that a conspiracy was formed against him, and he was assassinated. See a French monograph by S. Gsell (1894).

Donaldson, JAMES (1751-1830), an Edinburgh newspaper proprietor and bookseller, who left about £240,000 to found a hospital for 300 poor children. The hospital was built in 1842-51 from designs by Playfair at a cost of about £120,000.

Donaldson, SIR JAMES (1907), born at Aberdeen in 1831, was educated there, in London, and at Berlin, and became rector of Stirling High-school (1854), classical master in Edinburgh High-school (1856), its rector (1866), Humanity professor at Aberdeen (1881), principal of the United College at St Andrews (1886), and principal of its University (1890). He has written on Greek and educational subjects.

Donaldson, JOHN WILLIAM, D.D., philologist, was born in London, of Haddington ancestry, 7th June 1811. He entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and graduating in 1834 as second classic and senior optime, became a fellow and tutor of his college. From 1841 to 1855 he was headmaster of Bury St Edmunds grammar-school (he almost emptied it); thereafter he tutored at Cambridge with great success, till his death, from overwork, in London, 10th February 1861. Donaldson's New Cratylus (1839) was the first attempt on a large scale to familiarise Englishmen with German principles of comparative philology. In Varronianus (1844) he undertook for Latin what in the New Cratylus he had done for Greek; unluckily, Professor Key had here in a measure forestalled him. Jashar (Berlin, 1854) sought to distinguish by critical tests the fragments of the lost Book of Jashar embedded in the Hebrew Pentateuch. It is a clever, too clever, piece of rash speculation; nor did Donaldson better his position by Chris- tian Orthodoxy (1857). The Theatre of the Greeks, though originally by Buckham, was so recast by Donaldson as to be practically his; to him, too, belongs the completion of K. O. Müller's History of Greek Literature.—His youngest brother was the Australian statesman, SIR STUART ALEXANDER DONALDSON (1812-67).

Donaldson, THOMAS LEVERTON (1795-1885), a London architect and author.

Donat. See DONATUS.

Donatello (properly DONATO DI BETTO BARDI), the greatest of the early Tuscan sculptors, was born in Florence about 1386, and died there 13th March 1466. He may be regarded as the founder of modern sculpture, as the first producer since classic times of statues complete and independent in themselves and not mere adjuncts of their architectural surroundings. Among his works are the marble statues of SS. Peter, Mark, and George for the exterior of San Michele; and the tombs of Pope John XXIII. in the Baptistery, of Cardinal Brancacci at Naples, and of Bartolomeo Aragazzi at Montepulciano, works in which he was aided by Michelozzi. The influence of his study of the antique is very visible in his bronze statue of David, now in the Bargello Museum, Florence, where also are his celebrated marble bas-reliefs of singing and dancing children, originally designed as a balustrade for the organ of the cathedral. At Padua is the noble bronze equestrian statue of the Condottiere, Gattamelata. See works by Müntz (Par. 1885), Schmarsow (1886), Semper (1887), Trombetta (1887), Pastor (1892), Lord Calcarres (1903), A. G. Meyer (1904).

Donati, GIAMBATTISTA (1826-73), astronomer, was born at Pisa and died at Florence. He discovered the brilliant comet ('Donati's comet') of 1858. [Do-nah'tec.]

Donatus, AELIUS, taught grammar and rhetoric at Rome about 360 A.D., amongst others to St Jerome. His treatises, which are collected by Keil in vols. iv. and v. of the Grammatici Latini (1864-65), form a pretty complete course of Latin grammar, and in the middle ages were the only text-book used in the schools, so that Donat came, in western Europe, to be synonymous with grammar. He also wrote a commentary on Terence, of which we have only a part.—A later grammarian, TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS DONATUS (c. 400), wrote a very worthless life of Virgil.

Donders, FRANCISCUS CORNELIS (1818-89), oculist and professor of Physiology at Utrecht.

Donizetti, GAETANO, composer, was born 25th November 1797, at Bergamo, where and at Bologna he studied music. His first opera, Enrico di Borgogna, was produced in 1818 at Venice with success, and was followed by others in rapid succession. But the work which carried his fame beyond Italy was Anna Bolena, produced at Milan in 1830. On his earliest visit to Paris, in 1835, his Marino Faliero met with little success, but immediately afterwards Lucia di Lammermoor took the Neapolitan public by storm. In 1840 he revisited Paris, and brought out La Fille du Regiment (at first with little effect), Lucrezia Borgia, and La Favorita, the last act of which is his masterpiece, and was written in three to four hours. In 1843 the comic opera Don Pasquale was well received; but the gloomy theme of Dom Sebastian almost precluded success, and his anxious work upon it helped to bring on cerebral disease. Catarina Cornaro, given at Naples in 1844, was a failure. Stricken by paralysis in that year, he fell into imbecility; and he returned to Bergamo in 1848, only to die (8th April). [Don-i-tzel'tee.]

Donne, JOHN, poet, was born in London in 1573. His mother was daughter of John Heywood, the epigrammatist, himself related to Sir Thomas More; his father, a prosperous London ironmonger of good Welsh descent, died early in 1576, leaving a widow and six children. Young Donne was brought up a Catholic; in 1584 was admitted at Hart Hall, Oxford; and here began his life-long friendship with Sir Henry Wotton. He took a Cambridge degree, and, having spent some years in foreign travel, was admitted at Lincoln's Inn in 1592. After a careful examination of the points at issue, he joined the Anglican communion; in 1596 he accompanied the Cadiz expedition of Essex, and on his return from the 'Islands Voyage' (1597) was secretary to the lord-keeper. Here Donne made the acquaintance of many of the chief men of his day, and wrote, without printing it, great part of his poetry. His wit, beauty, and charm brought him the warmest friendships, and the passionate love withal of Anne, the young daughter of Sir George More, brother of the lord-keeper's wife. The pair were secretly married about the close of 1601, the bride being but seventeen. Sir George at once caused Donne to be committed to prison, and persuaded the lord-keeper into dismissing him. His wife's cousin gave them hospitality till 1604; then at Mitcham he assisted Thomas Morton in his controversies with Catholics. His Pseudo-Martyr (1610) was written to buttress the royal argument about the attitude of Catholics to the oath of allegiance. During this period also Donne wrote much verse. His Divine Poems he sent in 1607 to George Herbert's mother. The first poem that he printed was his famous elegy (1611) on the daughter of Sir Robert Drury, who carried Donne abroad with him for nine months. It was at Paris that he saw the vision of his wife with a dead child in her arms, which was verified by a messenger twelve days afterwards. His friend Morton, future Bishop of Durham, had long urged Donne to take orders, and, after a serious study of theology, he was ordained in 1615. The king at once appointed him a royal chaplain, and fourteen country livings were offered him within a year. He accepted in 1616 the rectory of Keyston, in Hunts, as well as that of Sevenoaks, keeping the latter until his death. As reader also at Lincoln's Inn he quickly took the front rank among the preachers of the time. In August 1617 the death of his much-loved wife, the mother of his seven living and five buried children, left him almost detached from the world; yet he continued to preach with saint-like fervour for ten years after his elevation to the deanery of St Paul's in 1621. He died 31st March 1631, and was buried in St Paul's. Ben Jonson told Drummond that he esteemed Donne 'the first poet in the world in some things,' but that he would perish 'for not being understood'; and to Dryden he seemed 'the greatest wit, though not the best poet of our nation.' Of his poems, collected by his son in 1633, the best edition is by Dr Grosart (2 vols. 1872). For his life see the masterpiece of Isaac Walton (ed. by Causton), Lives by Dr A. Jessopp (1897) and E. Gosse (1899), and Prof. Saintsbury's introduction to E. K. Chambers' edition of Donne's Poems (1896).

Donne, WILLIAM BODHAM (1807-82), born at Mattishall, Norfolk, from Bury St Edmunds grammar-school passed to Caius College, Cambridge, in 1852 became librarian of the London Library, and from 1857 to 1874 was examiner of plays. Besides writing for the Edinburgh Examiner, Westminster, &c., he published Old Roads and New Roads (1852), Essays upon the Drama (1858), Letters of George III. to Lord North (1867), Euripides (1872), and Tacitus (1873). Doo, GEORGE THOMAS (1800-86), line-engraver, was born in Christ Church parish, Surrey, and in 1851 was elected an F.R.S., in 1857 an Academician. 'Nature,' or the 'Caluadny Children,' after Lawrence, is his masterpiece.

Doran, JOHN, Ph.D., born in London 11th March 1807, brought out a melodrama, Justice, or the Venetian Jew, at the Surrey Theatre in 1824. His Sketches and Reminiscences appeared in 1828, and in 1835 a History of Reading. In 1854 he published Habits and Men, followed by Table Traits, Queens of England of the House of Hanover (1855), Monarchs retired from Business (1857), History of Court Fools (1858), The Princes of Wales (1860), Memoir of Queen Adelaide (1861), Their Majesties' Servants (1864, a history of the stage from Betterton to Kean; new ed. by Lowe, 1887), A Lady of the Last Century (1873, an account of Mrs Montagu), Mann and Manners (1876, the letters of Sir Horace Mann to Horace Walpole), London in Jacobite Times (1877), Memories of Our Great Towns (1878), and In and About Drury Lane (1885). Dr Doran was repeatedly acting-editor of the Athenaeum; edited the Church and State Gazette (1841-52); and at his death, 25th January 1878, was editor of Notes and Queries.

Doré, GUSTAVE, painter and book-illustrator, was born at Strasburg, 6th January 1833. He first made his mark by his illustrations to Rabelais (1854) and to The Wandering Jew and Balzac's Contes Drolatiques (1856). These were followed by illustrated editions of Dante's Inferno (1861), the Contes of Perrault and Don Quixote (1863), the Purgatorio and Paradiso of Dante (1868), the Bible (1865-66), Paradise Lost (1866), Tennyson's Idylls of the King (1867-68), La Fontaine's Fables (1867), and many other series of designs, which in the end deteriorated. Between 1850 and 1870 Doré earned £280,000 by his pencil. He also executed much in colour, exhibiting 'Alma' and 'Inkermann' in the Salons of 1855 and 1857. Two of his most successful oil-pictures are 'Paolo and Francesca da Rimini' (1863) and 'The Neophyte' (1868). For many years there was a Doré Gallery in London, filled with his works, among them the enormous canvases of 'Christ leaving the Praetorium' (1867-72) and 'Christ's Entry into Jerusalem.' He died 23d January 1883. See Lives by Delorme (Par. 1879), Miss Roosevelt (1886), and Blanchard Jerrold (1891). [Do-ray.]

Doria, ANDREA, Genoese admiral, was born at Oneglia of an ancient princely house, 30th November 1466 or 1468. After serving under various Italian princes he returned to Genoa in 1508. In 1513 he received command of the Genoese fleet, and in 1519 defeated the Turkish corsairs off Pianosa. In 1522 the imperial faction were restored to power in Genoa, and Doria, an anti-imperialist, transferred his allegiance to Francis I. In command of the French fleet, he defeated Charles V., blockaded Genoa, and proclaimed the independence of the republic. In 1529, fearing the predominance of Francis, Doria went over to Charles V., entered Genoa amid popular acclamation, and established an aristocratic government which lasted to the end of the republic. The emperor gave him the order of the Golden Fleece and the principality of Meli. In 1531 he made a descent on the stronghold of the corsair Barbarossa, and in 1532 took Patras from the Turks. In 1535 he took part with Charles V. in the bombardment of the Goletta forts and the destruction of Barbarossa's fleet. In 1538, with the combined fleets of the empire, the pope, and the Venetians, Doria engaged Barbarossa (indismissively) off Prevesa. At Algiers in 1541, and at Jerba in 1560, he suffered disastrous reverses from the Turks. His later years were disturbed by the conspiracy of the Fieschi and stained by his savage revenge for the murder of his nephew Gianettino. Doria died at Genoa, 25th November 1560. He was the idol of his people and the honoured counsellor of Charles V. and of his son Philip. See Lives by Guerrazzi (3d ed. Milan, 1874) and Petit (Par. 1887).

Dorisla'us, ISAAC, born in 1595 at Alkmaar in Holland, came about 1627 to England. For some months he was History lecturer at Cambridge, and in 1640 he was appointed judge-advocate. He sided with the parliament, helped to bring Charles I. to his doom, and in 1649 was sent to Holland to bring about an alliance with England. He had just reached the Hague when, on 12th May, he was assassinated by twelve royalists. His body was brought to England and buried in Westminster Abbey, whence in 1661 it was turned out into St Margaret's churchyard.

D'Orsay, ALFRED GUILLAUME GABRIEL, COUNT, the 'last of the dandies,' was born in Paris, 4th September 1801. An officer in the Garde du Corps, in 1822 at Valence he made the acquaintance of Lady Blessington (q.v.). An intimacy sprang up between them, and D'Orsay resigned his commission and attached himself to the Blessingtons. In 1827 he married Lady Harriet Gardiner, Lord Blessington's fifteen-year-old daughter by a former wife. In 1829 Lord Blessington died, and D'Orsay, separated from his wife, took up his residence next door to Lady Blessington's in London, where for twenty years they defied the conventions in the midst of a society of authors, artists, and men of fashion. An intimate friend and supporter of Louis Napoleon, he naturally looked for a position when the exile became prince-president and D'Orsay a bankrupt; but the Directorship of Fine Arts in Paris was conferred upon him only a few days before his death on 4th August 1852.

In 1856 he was permitted to return, and in 1860 published Prison Life in Siberia (trans. 1887). He bequeathed his splendid collection of books, MSS., prints, and coins to the Bodleian; his curiosities to Sir Samuel R. Meyrick; and his letters and commonplace-books to the British Museum in a chest not opened till 1900. His chief works are his Illustrations of Shakespeare (1807) and The Dance of Death (1838).

Doudney, SARAH, writer of stories for girls, was born at Portsmouth, 15th Jan. 1843.

Douglas, a family whose origin is lost in obscurity, but which in the beginning of the 15th century was thought to spring from the same stock as the Murrays.—William de Douglas, who witnessed charters between 1175 and 1213, had six sons, of whom Archibald was his heir, and Bruce became Bishop of Moray. Sir Archibald is a witness to charters between 1190 and 1232. Sir William de Douglas, apparently his son, figures from 1240 to 1273. His younger son, 'William the Hardy,' spoiled the monks of Melrose, and was the first man of mark who joined Wallace in the rising against the English in 1297. It appears that he possessed lands in one English and in seven Scottish counties—Northumberland, Berwick, Edinburgh, Fife, Lanark, Ayr, Dumfries, and Wigton. His son, the Good Sir James Douglas (c. 1286-1330), called also 'the Black Douglas' from his swarthy complexion, was Bruce's greatest captain in the War of Independence. The hero of seventy fights, he is said to have won them all but thirteen. He was slain in Andalusia, bearing the heart of Bruce (q.v.), whence the 'bloody heart' in the Douglas arms. His son William fell at Halidon Hill; and the next Lord of Douglas, Hugh, brother of Sir James, and a canon of Glasgow, made over the now great domains of the family in 1342 to his nephew Sir William.

EARLS OF DOUGLAS.—The Douglasses had since the time of William the Hardy held the title of Lords of Douglas; in 1358 Sir William (c. 1327-84) was made Earl of Douglas, and by marriage became Earl of Mar about 1374. His son, James, second Earl of Douglas (c. 1358-88), fell at Otterburn, leaving no legitimate issue. His aunt had married for her second husband one of her brother's esquires, James of Sandilands, and through her Lord Torphichen, whose barony was a creation of Queen Mary in 1564, is now the heir general of the House of Douglas.

The earldom of Douglas, meanwhile, was bestowed on an illegitimate son of the Good Sir James—Archibald (c. 1328–1400), Lord of Gallo-way, surnamed the Grim. By his marriage with the heiress of Bothwell he added that barony to the Douglas domains; and he married his only daughter to the heir-apparent of the Scottish crown, and his eldest son to the eldest daughter of the Scottish king. His son, Archibald, fourth Earl (c. 1369–1424), called 'Tyneman,' was wounded and taken prisoner by Hotspur at Homildon in 1402, next year at Shrewsbury was again wounded and taken prisoner, and, repairing to France, was made Duke of Touraine, and fell at Verneuil. His son, Archibald, fifth Earl (c. 1391–1439), fought in the French wars. His son, William, sixth Earl (c. 1423–40), was decoyed into Edinburgh Castle, and beheaded, along with his brother. His Scottish earldom was bestowed on his grand-uncle (the second son of Archibald the Grim), James, the 'Gross' (c. 1371–1443), who in 1437 had been made Earl of Avondale. His son, William, eighth Earl (c. 1425–52), was for a time all-powerful with James II., who made him lieutenant-general of the realm; but afterwards losing the royal favour, he seems to have entered into a confederacy against the king, by whom he was stabbed in Stirling Castle. His brother James, ninth Earl (1426–88), in 1454 made open war against James II. The issue seemed doubtful until the Hamiltons sided with the king, and Douglas fled to England. His brothers, who still maintained the struggle, were defeated at Arkinholm (Langholm) in May 1455; and the earldom of Douglas came to an end by forfeiture. The last earl lived many years in England, leagued himself in 1484 with the exiled Duke of Albany, was defeated and taken prisoner at Lochmaben, and died in the abbey of Lindores.

EARLS OF ANGUS.—William, first Earl of Douglas, while securing the earldom of Mar also secured the affections of the young widow of his wife's brother, Margaret Stewart, Countess of Angus and Mar. The issue of this amour was a son, George, who in 1389 had a grant of his mother's earldom of Angus. George, fourth Earl of Angus (c. 1412–62), aided the king against the Douglasses in 1454; his loyalty was rewarded by a grant of their old inheritance of Douglasdale and other lands; and so, in the phrase of the time, 'the Red Douglas put down the Black.' His son, Archibald, fifth Earl (c. 1449–1514), was nicknamed Bell-the-Cat from the lead he took against Cochrane (q.v.) at Lauder; he filled the highest offices in the state and added largely to the family possessions. His grandson, Archibald, sixth Earl (c. 1489–1557), in 1514 married Margaret, widow of James IV. of Scotland. By this marriage was a daughter, Margaret, who, marrying the Earl of Lennox, became the mother of Darnley, Queen Mary's husband and James VI.'s father. The Earl of Angus had for a time supreme power in Scotland, but in 1528 James V. escaped from his hands, and sentence of forfeiture was passed against him and his kinsmen. On James's death in 1542 Angus was restored to his estates and honours. He was succeeded by his nephew, David, whose son, Archibald, the 'Good Earl' (1558–88), died without male issue, and the earldom passed to a kinsman, William Douglas of Glenbervie.

MARQUISES AND DUKE OF DOUGLAS, AND LORDS DOUGLAS.—William, eleventh Earl of Angus (1589–1660), was created Marquis of Douglas in 1633. Archibald, third Marquis (1694–1761), was created Duke of Douglas in 1703, and died childless, when his dukedom became extinct, and his marquiseate devolved on the Duke of Hamilton. His sister, Lady Jane Douglas (1698–1753), married in 1746 Sir John Stewart of Grandtully, and gave birth to twin sons in 1748. One of them died in 1753; the other in 1761 was served heir of entail to the Duke of Douglas. This was disputed on the ground that he was not really her son; but the House of Lords in 1771 settled the famous Douglas Cause in his favour. In 1790 he was made Baron Douglas of Douglas Castle, which title became extinct on the death of his son James, fourth Lord Douglas, in 1857, when the Douglas estates devolved on his niece, the Countess of Home.

EARLS OF MORTON.—Sir Andrew de Douglas, who appears in record in 1248, was apparently a younger son of Sir Archibald, the second chief of the house. His great-grandson (?), Sir William Douglas, the 'Knight of Liddesdale' (c. 1300–53), was assassinated by his kinsman, William, first Earl of Douglas. The grandson of his nephew, Sir James Douglas of Dalkeith, married a daughter of James I., and in 1458 was created Earl of Morton. His grandson, the third earl, dying without male issue in 1553, the earldom devolved on his youngest daughter's husband, the Regent Morton (q.v.), and from him the present Earl of Morton is descended.

James, second Earl of Douglas and Mar, had an illegitimate son, Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig, whose descendants were created Viscounts of Drumlanrig in 1628, Earls of Queensberry in 1633, Marquises of Queensberry in 1681, Dukes of Queensberry in 1683, Earls of March in 1697, and Earls of Solway in 1706. On the death of the fourth Duke of Queensberry (q.v.) in 1810, that title went to the Duke of Buccleuch; the title of Marquis of Queensberry went to Sir Charles Douglas of Kelhead; and that of Earl of March to the Earl of Wemyss. In 1646 the third son of the first Marquis of Douglas was created Earl of Selkirk; in 1651 the eldest son was created Earl of Ormond, in 1661 Earl of Forfar; and in 1675 the fourth son was created Earl of Dumbarton. In 1641 the second son of the tenth Earl of Angus was created Lord Mordington. In 1633 Sir Robert Douglas (c. 1574–1639) was created Viscount Belhaven. See the histories of the house by Hume of Godscroft (1644; 2 vols. 1748) and Sir Herbert Maxwell (2 vols. 4to, 1902); and the Douglas Book, by Sir W. Fraser (4 vols. 1885). [Originally Doo'glas; now Dug'las.]

DOUGLAS, DAVID (1798–1834), botanist and traveller in North America, born at Scone, was killed by a wild bull in the Sandwich Isles.

DOUGLAS, GAWIN or GAVIN, the poet-bishop, was the third son of Archibald, fifth Earl of Angus, and was born at Tantallon Castle about 1474. Educated at St Andrews for the priesthood, in 1496 he was presented to Monymusk, Aberdeenshire, then to Prestonkirk, near Dunbar; and in 1501 he was made dean or provost of St Giles, Edinburgh. From the marriage of his nephew, the sixth Earl of Angus, to James IV.'s widowed queen, Douglas expected rapid preferment, but when, through her influence, he had obtained the bishopric of Dunkeld (January 1515), he was imprisoned on an old statute for receiving bulls from the pope, and not consecrated until more than a year after. On the fall of Angus, the bishop fled to England to obtain the aid of Henry VIII., but was suddenly cut off at London by the plague in September 1522, and buried in the church of the Savoy. His three poems are The Palace of Honour, most likely written in 1501, an allegory of the life of the virtuous man; a translation of the Aeneid, with prologues, finished about 1513, the first version of a Latin classic published in Britain; and King Hart, an allegory of the human heart, first printed apparently in Pinkerton's Ancient Scottish Poems (1786). There is also a minor poem, Conscience. His collected works were edited by Dr John Small (4 vols. Edin. 1874).

Douglas, Sir Howard, Bart., G.C.B. (1776-1861), son of Admiral Sir C. Douglas, was born at Gosport and died at Tunbridge Wells. He wrote on Military Bridges (1816), Naval Gunnery (1819; 5th ed. 1860), Carnot's Fortification (1831), and Naval Evolutions (1832). See Life by Fullon (1862).

He wrote much—a defence of Milton from Lauder's charge of plagiarism (1750), the famous Letter on the Criterion of Miracles (1754) against Hume, ironical attacks on the Hutchinsonians, and political pamphlets. See his Miscellaneous Works, with Life by Macdonald (1820).

He was returned to congress in 1843-44-46, and to the U.S. senate in 1847-52-58. His policy was to 'make the United States an ocean-bound republic,' and on the question of slavery he maintained that each territory should decide whether it should be a free or a slave state. In 1860 he was nominated for the presidency, but was defeated by Lincoln. He died at Chicago, 3d June 1861. See Lives by Sheehan (1860), Flint (1860), and Johnson (1908).

At first he practised chiefly as a landscape-painter, but he soon turned to figure-subjects, producing 'Hudibras and Ralph visiting the Astrologer' (1856), 'Love and the Antiquary' (1857), 'The Summons to the Secret Tribunal' (1860), and 'The Magic Mirror' (1872). His later years were entirely devoted to landscape water-colours. He was elected A.R.S.A. in 1851, R.S.A. in 1854, and P.R.S.A. in 1882, when he was knighted. He died 20th July 1891. In 1838 he escaped from a Baltimore shipyard to the northern states, and changed his name from Lloyd or Bailey to Douglass. He became assistant-secretary to the Santo Domingo Commission (1871), a presidential elector (1872), U.S. marshal for the District of Columbia (1876-81), recorder of deeds there (1881-86), and U.S. minister to Hayti (1889). He died at his home near Washington, 20th February 1895. See his own Life and Times (1881; new ed. 1893) and the Life by Booker T. Washington (1907).

In 1846 he commenced the manufacture of stoneware drain pipes as a substitute for the old flat-bottomed brick drains; in 1848 works, now the largest in the world, were started near Dudley. To him is mainly due the revival in art pottery; and his firm's productions have since 1870 gained the highest awards at exhibitions throughout the world. He was created a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour (1878), was awarded the Albert Medal in 1885, was knighted in 1887, and died 17th Nov. 1897. [Doal-ton.]

But it was by the preternatural acumen of the hero of his Adventures of Sherlock Holmes and Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes (1892-93, originally in the Strand Magazine) that Conan Doyle became known to a very wide circle of readers. Later novels are The Refugees (1893), Stark-Munro Letters (1895), Brigadier Gerard (1896), Rodney Stone (1896), Uncle Bernac (1897), The Tragedy of the Korosko (1898), and The Hound of the Baskervilles (1902); in 1894 he wrote a one-act play, A Story of Waterloo, and Halves in 1895. Draco, archon at Athens in 621 B.C., reorganised the laws of Athens with admirable impartiality; but the severity of his penalty—death for almost every offence—made the strict execution of his code (since proverbial for its rigour) unpopular, and it was superseded by that of Solon (q.v.).

Drake, CHARLES FRANCIS TYRWHITT (1846-74), explorer with Palmer and Burton of the Desert of the Wanderings and Syria, was born at Amer-sham, Bucks, was educated at Rugby and Wellington College, and died at Jerusalem. See his Literary Remains, edited by Sir W. Besant (1877).

Drake, SIR FRANCIS, greatest of the Elizabethan seamen, was born about 1540 at Crowndale near Tavistock. His father was seemingly in humble life, and the boy was apprenticed to the master of a small vessel, who bequeathed it to him. He followed the coasting-trade some years, but by 1565 was voyaging to Guinea and the Spanish Main. In 1567 he commanded the Judith of 50 tons in his kinsman John Hawkins's ill-fated expedition; and in 1570 and 1571 sailed to the West Indies to make good the losses he had then sustained from the Spaniards. In May 1572 he equipped two small ships, the Pasha and Swan, with seventy-three men, landed at Nombre de Dios, 29th July, and beat off the Spaniards; his severe wound alone prevented them from carrying off the 'Treasure of the World.' He burned Porto Bello, destroyed many Spanish ships, and crossed the isthmus to the highest point of the dividing ridge. There, climbing a tree, he gazed on the vast waters of the South Seas, and with that touch of romantic enthusiasm which redeemed all his piracies 'besought Almighty God of His goodness to give him life and leave to sail once in an English ship in that sea.' Drake arrived at Plymouth 9th August 1573, and the news of his exploits raised him at once to the height of popularity. In 1577 he fitted out the Pelican of 100 tons, the Elizabeth of 80 tons, and three smaller vessels, and sailed from Plymouth on 13th December; on 20th August 1578, the squadron, reduced to three ships by the burning of two, entered the Strait of Magellan, where Drake changed his own ship's name to the Golden Hind. On entering the Pacific violent tempests were encountered for fifty-two days, during which the Marrigold foundered with all hands and the Elizabeth returned home. Drake was driven far to the southward, but at Valparaiso provisioned his ship from the Spanish storehouses, and captured several rich prizes. He now determined to return home by crossing the Pacific. He touched at the northern side of the Golden Gate, then for sixty-eight days did not sight land until he made the Pelew Islands. After refitting in Java, he held for the Cape of Good Hope, and arrived in England 26th September 1580. The queen, in the face of Spanish protests, was at first uncertain how to receive Drake, but at length (April 4, 1581) paid a visit to his ship at Deptford and knighted him. In the autumn of 1585 Drake sailed with twenty-five ships against the Spanish Indies, harrying Hispaniola, Cartagena, and the coast of Florida, and, after great sufferings from sickness, brought home the 190 dispirited Virginian colonists, with tobacco and potatoes (28th July 1586). Early in 1587 he set sail with a strong squadron, and, entering the harbour of Cadiz, destroyed thirty-three ships, and escaped unscathed. He next sailed to the Azores, capturing a Portuguese carack worth £100,000. On the sailing of the Spanish Armada, Drake's division of the English fleet was stationed off Ushant, until all the ships were blown together to Plymouth by the same storm as carried the Spaniards across the Bay of Biscay. The battle began on the morning of 19th July 1588, and raged along the Channel all that week. Drake's consummate seamanship and audacious courage covered him with fresh glory, and inspired new terror in the Spaniards. He captured the Rosario off Portland, whose captain, Valdes, ransomed himself for £3000 three years later. On 29th July occurred the disastrous action after which the Spaniards resolved to return home by the Orkneys. Want of ammunition forced Drake and Howard to give up the chase, but the storms of the northern seas swept the Spaniards to destruction. Next spring a great expedition under Drake and Sir John Norreys sailed for Spain and Portugal, but had little success beyond inflicting damage upon the Spanish shipping, while sickness and hunger carried off thousands on board the crowded and ill-victualled English ships. Drake spent his next few years on shore, bringing a water-supply to Plymouth, and representing the town in parliament. In August 1595 he sailed from Plymouth to the West Indies. Ill-fortune followed the fleet from the beginning. Hawkins, the second in command, died off Porto Rico in November, and Drake himself died of dysentery off Porto Bello, 28th January 1596: his body was committed to the deep. See Life by Barrow (1843; 2d ed. 1861), Froude's English Seamen in the 16th Century (1895), and Corbett's Drake and the Tudor Navy (1898).

Drake, FRANCIS (1696-1771), a York surgeon, was born at Pontefract and died at Beverley. He was author of Eboracum (1736), and, conjointly with the bookseller Cæsar Ward, of the Parliamentary History of England (22 vols. 1751-60).

Drake, FRIEDRICH, sculptor, was born at Pyrmont, 23d June 1805. Among his works are 'The Eight Provinces of Prussia' (colossal figures in the royal palace at Berlin), and 'Warrior crowned by Victory.' His colossal statues of Frederick-William III. at Berlin, and William I. at Cologne, deserve mention; as also the busts of Bismarck and Moltke. He died at Berlin, 6th April 1882. [Drak'keh.]

Drake, NATHAN, M.D. (1766-1836), born at York, for forty years practised at Hadleigh, Suffolk. He wrote Shakespeare and his Times (1817) and Memorials of Shakespeare (1828).

Drake, SAMUEL GARDNER (1798-1875), born in Pittsfield, N.H., published many reprints and valuable works on the early history of New England.

Draper, JOHN WILLIAM, American author and man of science, was born at St Helens, near Liverpool, May 5, 1811, and in 1833 emigrated to Virginia. In 1839 he became professor of Chemistry in the university of New York, and from 1850 to 1873 was president of its medical department. Among his works are On the Forces that Produce the Organisation of Plants (1844), Physiology (1856), History of the Intellectual Development of Europe (1862), History of the American Civil War (1867-70), History of the Conflict between Science and Religion (1874), and Scientific Memoirs (1878). He died January 4, 1882.—One son, HENRY (1837-82), was an astronomer and chemist.—Another, JOHN CHRISTOPHER (1835-85), was a successful teacher of chemistry and physiology.

Drayton, MICHAEL, poet, was born at Harts-hill, near Atherstone, Warwickshire, in 1563. His earliest work was The Harmony of the Church, a metrical rendering of scriptural passages, which gave offence to the authorities, and was condemned to be destroyed. In 1593 he published a volume of eclogues, Idea, the Shepherd's Garland, which afterwards underwent considerable revision. His first important poem, Mortimeriados (1596), recast in 1603 as The Barons' Wars, abounds in fine passages, although somewhat deficient in interest. England's Heroical Epistles (1597) has more polish and less inequality than many of Drayton's works. In Poems, Lyric and Heroic (c. 1606), appeared the Ballad of Agincourt, the most spirited of English martial lyrics. The first eighteen 'songs' or books of Drayton's greatest work, Polyolbion were published in 1613, with annotations by John Selden, and the complete poem, the outcome of vast learning, and the labour of years, appeared in 1622. Drayton aimed at giving 'a chorographical description of all the tracts, rivers, mountains, forests, and other parts of Great Britain.' The inevitable monotony of the subject is amply relieved by the beauty of the pastoral descriptions. In 1619 Drayton collected in one volume all the poems (except Polyolbion) which he wished to preserve. Eight years afterwards he published a new volume of miscellaneous poems, among them the whimsical and delightful Nymphidia, the Court of Fairy, a triumph of ingenious fancy. His last work, The Muses' Elysium (1630), contains some pastoral poems of finished elegance. He died 23d December 1631, and was buried in Westminster Abbey; the inscription on his monument is probably by Ben Jonson. Drayton wrote many sonnets; one of them ('Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part') was pronounced by Rossetti to be 'almost the best in the language, if not quite.' See the Rev. R. Hooper's edition of Polyolbion (3 vols. 1876); Mr A. H. Bullen's Selections (1883), and Canon Beeching's (1899); the Spenser Society reprints (1885-92); and Oliver Elton's Drayton: a Critical Study (1905).

Drelicourt, CHARLES (1595-1669), born at Sedan, from 1620 was a Protestant pastor at Charenton, near Paris. He wrote, among other works, Consolations against the Fear of Death (1651), to a fourth edition of the English translation of which was attached Defoe's Apparition of one Mrs Veal (1716).

Drevet, a family of French copper-engravers—PIERRE (1664-1739); his son, PIERRE IMBERT (1697-1739); and his nephew, CLAUDE (1710-82). See A. Firmin Didot's Les Drevet (1876).

Drew, ANDREW (1792-1878), a British admiral, who defended Cape Coast Castle with 160 men against 50,000 Ashantis (1824), and captured the rebel Canadian steamer, the Caroline, and sent her burning over Niagara (1838).

Drew, FREDERIC (1836-91), geologist and explorer in 1862-72 of Cashmere, was born at Southampton, and died a science master at Eton.

Drew, SAMUEL (1765-1835), the 'Cornish metaphysician,' was born at St Austell, and had been a smuggler and shoemaker when in 1788 he became a Wesleyan preacher. He died at Helston.

Dreyfus, ALFRED, born about 1863 at Mülhausen in Alsace, the son of a rich Jewish manufacturer, was brought in 1874 to Paris. He was an artillery captain, attached to the General Army Staff, when in 1893-94, for delivering to a foreign government documents connected with the national defence, he was court-martialled, degraded, and transported to the Cayenne Île du Diable. The efforts of his wife and friends to prove him an innocent victim of malice, injustice, and forgery plunged France into a chaos of militarism and anti-Semitism; and he was not reinstated till July 1906. See work by Conybeare (1899), and his own Five Years of My Life (1901).

Dreyse, JOHANN NIKOLAUS VON (1787-1867), born at Sömmerda near Erfurt, worked first as a locksmith and then in a gun-factory. He found ironworks in Sömmerda, and from 1824 manufactured percussion-caps. In 1827 he invented a muzzle-loading, and in 1836 a breech-loading needle-gun—adopted in the Prussian army in 1841. In 1864 he was ennobled. [Dri-zeh.]

Drinkwater, or, later, DRINKWATER BETHUNE, JOHN (1762-1844), born at Warrington, at first obtained an ensigncy, and served through the famous siege of Gibraltar (1779-83), of which he wrote a classic History (1785). He rose to be a colonel, and was comptroller of army accounts 1811-35. He died at Thorncroft, Leatherhead.

Driver, SAMUEL ROLLES, D.D., Old Testament scholar, born at Southampton, 2d Oct. 1846, from Winchester passed to New College, Oxford, of which he was a tutor 1875-83, when he succeeded Pusey as Regius professor of Hebrew.

Droeshout, MARTIN, a Flemish engraver, resident in London, widely known by his portrait of Shakespeare, prefixed to the folio edition of 1623.—Another engraver, JOHN DROESHOUT (1596-1652), was perhaps an elder brother. [Drooz-hout.]

Drouet, JEAN BAPTISTE, COMTE D'ERLON (1765-1844), French marshal, born at Rheims, served in the campaigns of the Moselle, Mense, Sambre, and Peninsula. At the first restoration the Bourbons gave him a command, but on Napoleon's return he was under arrest in Lille citadel. He seized and held it for the emperor, who made him a peer of France; and at Waterloo he commanded the first corps d'armée. After the capitulation of Paris he fled to Bavaria, returned on the July revolution, was governor-general of Algeria 1834-35, and was made marshal in 1843.—JEAN BAPTISTE DROUET (1763-1824) was a revolutionist of the extreme Jacobin section; and LOUIS DROUET (1792-1873) was a famous flute-player. [Droo-ay.]

Drouot, ANTOINE, COMTE (1774-1847), a French general of artillery, born at Nancy, and styled by Napoleon 'le Sage de la Grande Armée.'

Drouyn de Lhuys, ÉDOUARD (1805-81), born in Paris, was ambassador in London in 1849, and thrice Foreign Minister. [Droo-ans de L'wee.]

Droz, ANTOINE GUSTAVE (1832-95), novelist, born in Paris, grandson of Jean Pierre Droz (1746-1823), an engraver of medals. He had devoted himself to art till he made his first and greatest success with Monseigneur, Madame, et Bébé (1866). Later books were Entre Nous (1867), Les Etangs (1876), L'Enfant (1885), &c. [Drō.]

Drummond, ANNABELLA (c. 1350-1402), born probably at Stobhall near Perth, about 1367 married John Stewart, afterwards Robert III.

Drummond, HENRY (1786-1860), London banker, Tory M.P., and Irvingite apostle, lived and died at Albury in Surrey.

Drummond, HENRY, born at Stirling, 17th August 1851, studied at Edinburgh, and in 1877 became lecturer on, in 1884 professor of, Natural Science at the Free Church College in Glasgow. He travelled in the Rocky Mountains, Central Africa, Japan, Australia, &c. In his Natural Law in the Spiritual World (1883; 30th ed. 1897) he sought to reconcile evangelical Christianity with evolution. The Ascent of Man (1894) attempts to christianise evolution by laying stress on altruistic elements in natural selection. A charming work on Tropical Africa (1888) was followed by Travel Sketches in Our New Protectorate (1890), The Greatest Thing in the World, Pax Yobiscum, &c. He died, after long illness, at Tunbridge Wells, 11th March 1897. See Life by Prof. G. A. Smith (1899).

Drummond, JAMES (1816-77), historical painter, who was born and died in Edinburgh, was elected an A.R.S.A. in 1846, an R.S.A. in 1852, and in 1868 became curator of the Scottish National Gallery.

Drummond, MARGARET (c. 1472-1501), youngest daughter of Lord Drummond, in 1496 became James IV.'s mistress, and bore him a daughter. She was poisoned with two of her sisters.

Drummond, THOMAS, R.E. (1797-1840), born at Edinburgh, and educated there and at Woolwich, in 1820 joined the ordnance survey, whose work was immensely facilitated by his improved heliostat and lime-light (the 'Drummond Light'); the latter, however, was really invented by Sir Goldsworthy Gurney. He became head of the boundary commission under the Reform Bill; private secretary to Lord Althorp, Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1833; and Under-secretary for Ireland (practically its governor) in 1835. Here he gained the affection of the people; his was the memorable saying, 'Property has its duties as well as its rights' (1838). Worn out by his labours, he died in Dublin. See Life by Bary O'Brien (1889).

Drummond, WILLIAM, OF HAWTHORNDEN, poet, was born at Hawthornden, 13th Dec. 1585. He graduated M.A. at Edinburgh in 1605, studied law at Bourges and Paris, and by his father's death in 1610 became laird of Hawthornden. He devoted his life to poetry and mechanical experiments. He was on the point of marrying when the lady died (1614 or 1615). He married Elizabeth Logan in 1632. He had to subscribe to the Covenant, but witnessed its triumph with a sinking of heart that the most sarcastic verses could not relieve. He died 4th Dec. 1649—his death hastened by grief for Charles I.'s execution. Drummond enjoyed the friendship of Drayton, Montrose, and Ben Jonson; the last paid him a memorable visit in 1618-19. Drummond's Notes of their talk (printed 1842) is a charming chapter of literary history. His chief works are Tears on the Death of Meviades (i.e. Prince Henry, 1613); Poems: Amorous, Funerall, Divine, Pastoral, in Sonnets, Songs, Sextains, Madrigals (1616); Forth Feasting (1617); and Flowers of Sion (1623). His prose writings include The Cypress Grove (new ed. 1907) and a History of the Five Jameses. The farcical macaronic poem Polemno-Middinia (1683), long regarded as his, was probably by Samuel Colvil. His Poems were edited for the Maitland Club (1832) by P. Cunningham (1833), by Turnbull (1857), and by W. C. Ward (1894). See Life by Masson (1873).

Drury, DRU (1725-1803), a London silversmith, devoted himself to entomology, and published Illustrations of Natural History (3 vols. 1770-82, with over 240 figures by Moses Harris of exotic insects). His Exotic Entomology was edited in 1837 by Westwood, with over 650 figures.

Drury, JOSEPH, D. D. (1750-1834), head-master of Harrow from 1785 to 1805.

Drury, ROBERT (1687-c. 1736), a London tavern-keeper's son, who, on the homeward voyage from the East Indies, was kept a prisoner in Madagascar for fifteen years, and published a most interesting account of his captivity (1729). Afterwards he was a slaver, and then porter at the India House.

Drury, SIR WILLIAM (1527-79), born at Hawstead, near Bury St Edmunds, from 1564 to 1572 was deputy-governor of Berwick, and thereafter lord-justice in Ireland.

Drusus, M. LIVIUS, tribune of the people in 122 B.C., opposed the democratic policy of his colleague, C. Gracchus.—His son and namesake, though identified by birth and sympathy with the patricians, renewed some of the most liberal measures of the Gracchi, and advocated the claims of the Italians to Roman citizenship. He was assassinated in 91 B.C.—The most illustrious of the Drusi was NERO CLAUDIUS DRUSUS, or DRUSUS Senior, the stepson of the Emperor Augustus, and younger brother of the Emperor Tiberius. His campaign against the Rhæti and other Alpine tribes (15 B.C.) is celebrated by Horace (Odes, iv. 4). Until his death in 9 B.C. he was engaged chiefly in establishing Roman supremacy in Germany, and received the title Germanicus; the celebrated Germanicus (q.v.) was his own son.

Dryander, JONAS (1748-1810), Swedish botanist, lived in London from before 1782, in which year he became librarian to Sir Joseph Banks.

Dryden, JOHN, was born in the rectory of Aldwinkle All Saints, Northamptonshire, 9th August 1631. His early youth seems to have been chiefly passed at Tichmarsh, near Aldwinkle, where his maternal grandfather, the Rev. Henry Pickering, had property; at twelve he was entered at Westminster school, and at nineteen proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, taking his B.A. in 1654. His father died in the same year, and Dryden succeeded to a small estate at Blakesley near Canons Ashby, worth £60 a year. He continued to live at Cambridge till 1657, and then he went to London. Both the Drydens and the Pickerings were strong parliamentarians, and he seems to have had some vain hopes of patronage from his cousin Sir Gilbert Pickering, a favourite of Cromwell. It is thought that he began early to do work for the booksellers. On December 1, 1663, he married Lady Elizabeth Howard, eldest daughter of the Earl of Berkshire. Much baseless scandal has been talked about this marriage, but it seems probable that it was not wholly happy, and that Lady Elizabeth, whose intellect was certainly not strong, may have had a bad temper. Three sons, Charles, John, and Erasmus Henry, were the offspring, and from this time Dryden occasionally resided at his father-in-law's Wiltshire seat of Charlton. He had several London residences, the best known of which was in Gerrard Street, Soho. Very shortly after the wedding, Pepys on 3d February 1664 met Dryden, 'the poet I knew at Cambridge,' at Will's Coffee-house. Dramatic work now occupied Dryden for many years—for fourteen he wrote next to nothing but drama. He was made poet-laureate and historiographer-royal in 1670; the emoluments (£200 a year) were increased by a pension of £100. A quarrel with the malevolent Rochester brought Dryden on 8th December 1679

a cudgelling by masked bravoes. The Popish Plot provoked the splendid series of satires beginning with Abalom and Achitophel, and rained an increasing storm of libels in prose and verse on Dryden's head. In 1683, as part compensation for great arrears in his salary, and perhaps also as a reward for his political services, a collectorship of customs in the port of London was granted him. In the epidemic of conversion which followed the accession of James II., Dryden was one of the chief seceders from the Church of England; his sincerity has been violently but, it seems, groundlessly impugned. At the Revolution he did not take the oaths, and thus lost all his places and pensions. To supply the loss, he returned to play-writing and translating. During the last ten years of his life (which saw the production of his famous Virgil and Fables) we have more personal details about Dryden than at other times. Almost immediately after the publication of the Fables (1699), an attack of gout, from which disease he had always suffered much, set in, and carried him off on May-day 1700. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. All his sons died before their mother, who lived till 1714, and was insane at the time of her death. The youngest, however, Erasmus Henry (1669-1710), a Dominican, had succeeded to the family baronetcy and to the estate of Canons Ashby, which, by a female descent, is still in the name.

Dryden began early, though not plentifully or promisingly, with some poems in the 'metaphysical' manner of Donne and Cleveland; but his stanzas on Cromwell's death (1658), though lacking ease and flow, have great merit, and the post-Restoration panegyric poems, beginning with Astræa Redux and ending with Annus Mirabilis, exhibit wonderful command of a style of verse not hitherto attempted. He confesses that his dramatic work was distasteful to him, and done for profit simply. Between The Wild Gallant (1663) and Love Triumphant (1694) he produced a great number of plays, the best of which are the Conquest of Granada (1670), Marriage à la Mode (1672), Aurungzebe (1675), All for Love (1677), The Spanish Friar (1681), and Don Sebastian (1689). His full powers were not revealed till the appearance, in his fiftieth year, of Abalom and Achitophel. This, with his contribution to its second part, The Medal, Macflecknoe (a satire on the whig Shadwell), and with the didactic poems of Religio Laici (giving the views of a half-sceptical Anglican), and The Hind and the Panther, justifying his conversion, contain by far the most powerful work of the satiric and didactic kind in English. The rhymed heroic couplet is here adjusted to the purposes of invective, insinuation, and argument with unmatched dexterity, and is charged with an overwhelming force. Dryden also wrote prologues and epilogues and Pindaric odes, one of which, that on Mrs Anne Killigrew, is rivalled only by his own later 'Alexander's Feast.' He began, too, the practice of translating the classics, which led to the great translation of Virgil and to his scarcely less popular Juvenal; and this again led him to what he also called 'translation' of authors other than the classics, such as Chaucer and Boccaccio. These later paraphrases formed the nucleus of the Fables. Scott's edition of Dryden's works (18 vols. 1808) superseded all others; it was reprinted in 1821, and re-edited by Prof. Saintsbury (18 vols. 1883-93), with some additions and corrections. Scott's Life is excellent, and is the standard; but the editions of Bell, Mitford, Christie, and especially Sargeant (1910) are useful. See also Prof.

Saintsbury's Dryden (1881), and the 'Cambridge English Literature' (vol. vii. 1912).

Du Barry, MARIE JEANNE GOMARD DE VAUBERNIER, COMTESSE, favourite of Louis XV., was born August 19, 1741, at Vaucouleurs, the daughter of a dressmaker. Brought up in a Paris convent, in 1769 as Mademoiselle Lange she won the notice of Louis XV., who married her to Comte Guillaume du Barry, brother of her former protector. Her influence henceforth reigned supreme until the death of Louis in 1774, when she was dismissed from court. She was tried before the Revolutionary Tribunal for having wasted the treasures of the state and worn mourning for the late king, and was guillotined, 'vainly whimpering,' 6th December 1793. Her Mémoires (6 vols. Paris, 1829-30; Eng. trans. by Riley, 1896) are unreliable; but see Lives by Vatel (1882-84), R. B. Douglas (1896), and Noel Williams (1904).

Dubois, GUILLAUME, CARDINAL (1656-1723), born at Brives-la-Gaillarde, the son of a poor apothecary, was tutor first and then secretary to the Duc de Chartres; and when the latter (now Duke of Orleans) became regent in 1715, Dubois was virtually all-powerful. He was appointed foreign minister and Archbishop of Cambrai (1720), a cardinal (1721), and prime-minister of France (1722). He died a victim to hard work and the wildest debauchery. Dudley, DUD (1599-1684), fifth natural son of Lord Dudley, was the first to smelt iron with coal, at Pensnet in Worcestershire (1619) and at Bristol (1651). See his Metalium Martis (1665).

Dudley, EDMOND (c. 1462-1510), lawyer and privy-councillor, was Empson's partner in carrying out the detested policy of Henry VII., whose son and successor sent him to the block. He was also father of the Duke of Northumberland. See GREY (LADY JANE) and LEICESTER.

Dudley, SIR ROBERT (1573-1649), a son of the Earl of Leicester by Lady Sheffield, studied at Christ Church, Oxford, made a voyage to the West Indies (1594-95), was knighted by Essex on the Cadiz expedition (1596), joined Essex's plot (1601), and, after a vain attempt to establish his legitimacy, quitted England (1605), deserting wife and daughters, and taking a mistress with him. He turned Roman Catholic, and lived chiefly at or near Florence, busy with naval inventions; in 1620 the Emperor Ferdinand created him Duke of Northumberland and Earl of Warwick in the Holy Roman Empire. See Life by J. Temple Leader (1895).

Duesbury, WILLIAM (1725-80), born at Cannock in Staffordshire, in 1755 moved to Derby, and founded the china manufacture there.

Dufaure, JULES ARMAND STANISLAS (1798-1881), French statesman, was born at Saujon, Charente Inférieure. See Life by Picot (1883). [Dec-foar'.]

Duff, ALEXANDER, born 26th April 1806 near Pitlochry, in 1829 was ordained the first Scottish missionary to India. His plan of combining religious teaching with western science caused opposition; but his school flourished, and in time he was encouraged by government officials. In 1843 Duff cast in his lot with the Free Church, and had to give up his college; but he began anew, and soon his work was on a greater scale than before. In 1844 he helped to start the Calcutta Review. He was moderator of the Free Church Assembly in 1851, and again in 1873; and was LL.D. of New York, and D.D. of Aberdeen. Duff was one of the founders of the university of Calcutta, but was obliged by persistent ill-health to leave India permanently in 1863. A gift of £11,000, presented to him, he gave to a fund for invalided Free Church missionaries. He raised £10,000 to endow a missionary chair in the New College, Edinburgh, of which he was the first occupant. He died 12th February 1878. See Lives by G. Smith (1879) and T. Smith (1883).

Duff, SIR MOUNTSTUART ELPHINSTONE GRANT (1829-1906), born at his father's estate of Eden in Aberdeenshire and educated at Edinburgh and Balliol, in 1854 was called to the bar, was Liberal M.P. for the Elgin Burghs 1857-81, and then was governor of Madras till 1886, when he was made a G.C.S.I. See his Notes from a Diary (1897-1905).

Duff, SIR ROBERT WILLIAM (1835-95), Liberal M.P. for Banffshire 1861-93, when he was appointed governor of New South Wales.

Dufferin and Ava, FREDERICK TEMPLE HAMILTON TEMPLE BLACKWOOD, MARQUIS OF, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., was born at Florence, June 21, 1826, succeeded his father as fifth Baron Dufferin in 1841, and from Eton passed to Christ Church, Oxford. His Letters from High Latitudes (1859) is an account of a yachting cruise to Iceland and Spitzbergen. In 1860 he was sent by Lord Palmerston to inquire into the religious massacres in Syria, and on his return was created a K.C.B. He was Under-secretary for India (1864-66) and for War (1866); Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1868-72); and Governor-general of Canada (1872-78), having been created an earl in 1871. From 1879 to 1881 he was ambassador at St Petersburg, whence he was transferred to Constantinople. After the collapse of the rebellion of Arabi Pasha, he went to Cairo to restore order in Egypt; to him was due the abolition of the Dual Control. In 1884 he succeeded Lord Ripon as Viceroy of India; his tenure of office was made memorable by measures for strengthening the Indian frontier and by the annexation of Upper Burma in December 1885. Successively ambassador at Rome, marquis (1888), and ambassador to France (1891-96), he died 12th February 1902. He suffered by the bankruptcy of the Globe Co. See his life by Lyall (1904). The Marchioness wrote Our Viceroyal Life in India (1890) and My Canadian Journal (1892).—His mother, HELEN SELINA SHERIDAN (1807-67), eldest sister of the Hon. Mrs Norton and the Duchess of Somerset, in 1825 married Commander Price Blackwood, R.N. (1794-1841), who in 1839 succeeded his father as fourth Lord Dufferin. Secondly, she married in 1862 George, Earl of Gifford (1822-62), eldest son of the Marquis of Tweeddale. She was the author of 'The Emigrant's Farewell,' 'O Bay of Dublin,' and other touching songs. See Memoir by the Marquis, prefixed to her Songs, Poems, and Verses (1894).

Duffy, SIR CHARLES GAVAN (1816-1903), made K.C.M.G. in 1873, was born in County Monaghan, helped to start the Nation (1842), the Young Ireland organ, and for twelve years engaged in Irish agitation, being tried for sedition and treason-felony. On the break-up of the Independent Irish party, he emigrated in 1856 to Australia, where, after the establishment of the Victorian constitution, he became in 1857 Minister of Public Works, of Lands in 1858 and 1862, and prime-minister in 1871. In 1877 he was elected Speaker of the Legislative Assembly. His Ballad Poetry of Ireland is a household book in his native country. In 1880, when he returned to Europe, appeared his Young Ireland, 1840-50 (final ed. 1896), followed in 1883 by Four Years of Irish History, 1845-49, and in 1898 by My Life in Two Hemispheres.

Dufresne, CHARLES. See DU CANGE.

Dugdale, SIR WILLIAM, antiquary, was born at Shustoke, near Coleshill, Warwickshire, 12th September 1605. He studied law and history under his father, to please whom he married before he was eighteen, and soon after whose death he purchased the neighbouring manor of Blythe (1625). In 1638 he was created a pursuivant-at-arms extraordinary, and in 1640 Rouge Croix pursuivant. During the Great Rebellion he adhered to the royalist cause, and from 1642 to 1646 was at Oxford, the king's headquarters, being made an M.A. and Chester herald, while pursuing his antiquarian researches. He lived in obscurity during the Commonwealth, but on the Restoration received the office of Norroy, and in 1677 was promoted to be Garter Principal King of Arms, at the same time receiving knighthood. He died 10th February 1686 at Blythe Hall. His works are the Monasticon Anglicanum (1655-61-73), a history of English religious foundations (Eng. ed. 6 vols. 1817-30); Antiquities of Warwickshire (1656; 3d ed. 1763-65); History of St Paul's Cathedral (1658); History of Imbanking and Draying (1662); Origines Juridicales (1666); and Baronage of England (3 vols. 1675-76). See his Life, Diary, and Correspondence, edited by William Hamper (1827).

Du Guay-Trouin, RENÉ (1673-1736), born at St Malo, for his daring exploits as a privateer was given the command of a frigate in 1697.

In 1707 he engaged an English fleet at the entrance of the Channel, burning one ship, and capturing three others and sixty transports. His greatest triumph was the capture, in 1711, of Rio de Janeiro, which was ransomed for £96,000. For this he was ennobled. In 1731 he was sent into the Levant to obtain reparation for the damages done to French commerce. See his Mémoires by Beauchamps (4 vols. Paris, 1740; Eng. trans. 1742); French Lives by La Landelle (2d ed. 1876), De Bona (1890), and Philipps (1892); and Prof. Laughton's Studies in Naval History (1887). [See-gay Troo-ans.]

Dühring, EUGEN KARL (1833-1901), philosopher and political economist, was born at Berlin, and became quite blind before he was thirty.

Dullius, CAIUS, as Roman consul in 260 B.C. won Rome's first great naval victory over the Carthaginians off Myle, mainly by means of his grappling-irons.

Dujardin, FÉLIX (1801-60), investigator of helminths, foraminifera, protoplasm, &c., was born at Tours and died at Rennes. [Dee-zhar-dan.]

Dumas, ALEXANDRE (in full, Alexandre Dumas Davy de la Pailleterie), born 24th July 1802 at Villers-Cotterêts, dep. Aisne, was the grandson of Count Alexandre Davy de la Pailleterie and Marie-Cessette Dumas, a Haytian negress, and the son of General Alexandre Davy-Dumas and Marie Labouret, daughter of a tavern-keeper and small landowner at Villers-Cotterêts. Dumas was therefore a quadroon. After an idle, irregular youth, he went up to Paris in 1823; obtained a clerkship in the bureau of the Duc d'Orléans; but, bent on literature, spent some years in reading and in learning to write. A volume of short stories and a couple of farces, however, were his only productions when, at twenty-seven, he became famous by his Henri Trois et sa Cour (1829), performed at the Théâtre Français. He had operated that revolution in historical drama which the Hugolater ascribes to the poet of Hernani (1830). In 1831 he did the same for domestic tragedy with Antony, failed in verse with Charles VII. chez ses Grand Vassaux, and scored a tremendous success (in collaboration with Goubaux and Dinant) with Richard Darlington; in 1832 he carried the romantic 'history' to its culmination in La Tour de Nesle (in collaboration with Gaillardet). In that same year he fell ill of cholera, went to Switzerland to recuperate, and wrote for the Revue des Deux Mondes the first of his famous and delightful Impressions de Voyage. A prodigious worker, he was wont, after months of production, to renew himself with a round of travel, and he always published his experiences. Thus, En Suisse (1832) was followed by Le Midi de la France (1840), Les Bords du Rhin and une Année à Florence (1841), Le Speronare and Le Capitaine Arena (1842), Le Corricolo (1843), De Paris à Cadix and Le Véloce (1845), and, finally, Le Caucase (1859), De Paris à Astrakhan (1860), and En Russie (1865).

But it was as a story-teller that Dumas was destined to gain enduring success. As to his own share in his own work, he exhausted, it appears, some ninety collaborators, and his debates with some of them by no means redounded to his credit. But apart from him his assistants were mostly unreadable; in conjunction with him they were Alexandre Dumas, that is, the greatest master of the art of narrative. He took whatever he could get from whomsoever he could get it, and minting it in his own die, gave it his own immense and radiant personality. Still, it is undeniable that his thefts were many and flagrant. Trelawny's Adventures of a Younger Son, for instance, appears in his collected works; and it is said that he was with difficulty restrained from signing a book of the Iliad which some one else had run into prose. From the first it was his purpose to put the history of France into novels, and his earliest essay was the Isabelle de Bavière (1836). It was followed by Pauline, Le Capitaine Paul, and Pascal Bruno (1838), Aclé (1839), and Othon l'Archer, Le Capitaine Pamphile, and Maître Adam le Calabrais (1840)—all on other lines; then the historical vein cropped up anew in Le Chevalier d'Harmenthal and Ascanio (1843). For the amazing decade that followed there is no parallel in literature except the first ten years of the author of Waverley. In 1844, with a number of digressions into new provinces—as Cécile, Fernande, Amaury, Monte Cristo—appeared Les Trois Mousquetaires; in 1845, Vingt Ans Après, La Fille du Régent, and La Reine Margot; in 1846, La Guerre des Femmes, Maison Rouge, Le Bâtard de Mauléon, La Dame de Monsoreau, and Les Mémoires d'un Médecin; in 1848, Les Quarante-Cinq and the beginnings of Bragelonne—finished in 1850; and in 1849, Le Collier de la Reine. The next two years witnessed productions so varied as La Tulipe Noire and Le Trou de l'Enfer (1850), and La Femme au Collier de Velours (1851); in 1852 the historical masterpiece Olympe de Clèves was produced. Between that year and 1854 were produced the ten delightful volumes of Mes Mémoires, with Ange Pitou and La Comtesse de Charny. Other achievements in the romance of French history were Ingénue (1854), Les Compagnons de Jésus (1857), Les Louves de Macheoul (1859), and Les Blancs et Les Bleus (1867-68), with which last the sequence ended. The list is nothing like complete, and we can only refer in passing to the cloud of drama (the great historical novels were dramatised—the Mousquetaires cycle supplied at least three plays—as also were Monte Cristo and others), history, causerie, journalism, &c., in whose midst this enormous production went on. Dumas took a conspicuous part in the Days of July; in 1837 he received the red ribbon; in 1842 he married Mlle. Ida Ferrier, from whom he promptly separated; in 1855 he went for two years into exile at Brussels; from 1860 to 1864 he was helping Garibaldi in Italy, and conducting and writing a journal; and in 1868 he produced the last but one of his plays. By this time the end was near; he sank under his work. He had got rid of a series of fortunes, and he quitted Paris for the last time with only a couple of napoleons in his pocket. He went to his son's villa at Dieppe, and there, on 5th December 1870, he died. See Lives by Percy Fitzgerald (1873), Blaze de Bury (1885), and Glinel (1885); also the Memoirs (trans. by Mrs Waller, 6 vols. 1907-9). [Dee-mah'.]

Dumas, ALEXANDRE, natural son of the preceding, was born in Paris, 28th July 1824, when his father was but twenty-one years old. He was soon legitimised, and at sixteen, after a course of training at the Institution Goubaux and the Collège Bourbon, he left school for the world and letters and the society to which his father, then almost at his apogee, belonged. He was essentially respectable, however, and, having sown a certain quantity of wild oats and made a few experiments in literature, he settled down to serious work. He started in fiction and succeeded; he went on to drama; he took to theorising about art, morals, politics, religion even, and succeeded. His novels—from La Dame aux Camélias (1848) to L'Affaire Clémenceau (1864)—are all readable. His essays, letters, speeches, prefaces, and prelections generally are brilliant and admirable in form, and daring, paradoxical, suggestive in a very high degree. Of his sixteen plays there is scarce one that is not literature, while Le Demi-Monde (1855), Le Fils Naturel (1856), Les Idées de Mme. Aubray (1867), Une Visite de Noces (1871), Monsieur Alphonse (1873), Denise (1885) are masterpieces. Other famous dramas in which he had a share are Le Supplice d'une Femme (1865), whose chaotic original is due to Emile de Girardin; Héloïse Parquet (1866), in collaboration with Durantin; and Les Danicheff (1876). He is also believed to have assisted George Sand in preparing several of her works for the stage, and is known to have completed and produced his father's Joseph Balsamo (1878). Elected to the Academy in 1875, he died 27th November 1895.

Dumas, JEAN BAPTISTE ANDRÉ, French chemist, was born at Alais, Gard, 14th July 1800. He studied at Geneva, and coming to Paris in 1821, was first a lecturer in the École Polytechnique, then professor of Chemistry in the Athénée, the École Centrale (founded by himself), and finally, the Sorbonne. He came forward into public life (1849), was appointed Master of the Mint (1868), and elected to the Academy (1875), and died at Cannes, 11th April 1884. His chief works are Traité de Chimie appliquée aux Arts et Leçons sur la Philosophie Chimique. See forty-page memoir by A. W. Hofmann in Nature, 6th Feb. 1880.

Du Maurier, GEORGE LOUIS PALMELLA BUSON, was born in Paris, 6th March 1834, but was the grandson of émigrés who fled to England at the Revolution. In 1851 he came himself to London, and studied chemistry, but returning to Paris adopted art as a profession, and studied there and at Antwerp and Düsseldorf. In England he rapidly acquired reputation as a designer of exceptional dexterity. He illustrated new editions of Thackeray's Esmond and Ballads, Foxe's Book of Martyrs, &c.; and much of his work is to be found in Once a Week and the Cornhill Magazine. Finally he joined the staff of Punch, and became par excellence the gentle, graceful satirist of modern fashionable life (see his English Society at Home, 1880). Failing eyesight led him to take for awhile to lecturing. He wrote and illustrated, originally for Harper's Magazine, three novels, Peter Ibbetson (1891), Trilby (1894; dramatised), and The Martian (1897). He died 8th October 1896. See Felix Moscheles' In Bohemia with Du Maurier (1896). [Fr. pron. Dee Moar-yauj.]

Dümichen, JOHANNES (1833–94), Egyptologist, born near Gross-Glogau, died at Strasburg.

Dumont, ALEXANDRE (1801–84), sculptor, one of a long artist line, was born and died in Paris. See two works by Battier (1885–90).

Dumont, PIERRE ÉTIENNE LOUIS, the apostle of Benthamism, was born at Geneva, 18th July 1759, and in 1783 accepted the charge of the French Protestant Church at St Petersburg. In 1785 he became tutor in London to the sons of Lord Shelburne, afterwards Marquis of Lansdowne, his talents and liberalism recommending him to the Whigs. During the early years of the French Revolution he was at Paris, and became attached to Mirabeau, regarding whom he has given much information in his Souvenirs sur Mirabeau (1832). In 1791 he returned to England, and formed an intimacy with Bentham. This was the event of his life. Convinced of the value of Bentham's views on legislation, he obtained permission to edit his unpublished writings. The results appeared in his Traité de Législation Civile et Pénale (1802), Théorie des Peines et des Récompenses (1811), Tactique des Assemblées Législatives (1816), Preuves Judiciaires (1823), and Organisation Judiciaire et Codification (1828). Dumont returned to Geneva in 1814, and became a member of the representative council. He died at Milan, September 30, 1829. [See mon.]

Dumont d'Urville, JULES SÉBASTIEN CÉSAR (1790–1842), French admiral, born at Condé in Calvados, entered the navy in 1807, and in 1826–29 sailed in search of La Pérouse (q.v.), and made coast-surveys of Australasia. In 1837–40 he made a voyage of antarctic exploration, discovering Joinville Island and Adélie Land. He was killed in a railway accident near Versailles. See the forty-nine volumes of text and maps recording his voyages, and a Life by Joubert (new ed. Tours, 1885). [See mon Déer-veel.]

Dumouriez, CHARLES FRANÇOIS, born at Cambrai, 25th January 1739, in 1757 entered the army, and served with distinction during the Seven Years' War. A year or two of secret diplomacy in Poland and Hamburg brought him three years' imprisonment in the Bastille and at Caen (1772), but Louis XVI. in 1778 made him commandant of Cherbourg. In 1790 he became one of the Jacobins, and was appointed commandant at Nantes. He now attached himself to the Girondists, and held for a short time the ministry of Foreign Affairs, which he resigned to take the field. The allies were advancing in great force. By a series of bold and rapid manœuvres Dumouriez prevented them from sweeping over Champagne, defeated the Prussians at Valmy (20th September 1792), and overthrew the Austrians at Jemappes. The campaign of 1793, aiming at the conquest of the Netherlands, opened with the siege of Maestricht; Breda and other places were taken by the French; but at Neerwinden (18th March 1793) Dumouriez sustained a severe defeat from the Austrians. His leanings towards constitutional monarchy excited the jealousy of the revolutionists; and ere long he was denounced as a traitor and summoned to Paris. To save his head he went over to the Austrian camp. After wandering through many countries of Europe, he finally settled in England, and died at Turville Park near Henley-upon-Thames, 14th March 1823. Besides a multitude of pamphlets, Dumouriez wrote Mémoires (1794; 3d ed. Paris, 1822–24). See also Life by Monchanin (1884), and that in German by Boguslawski (1878–79). [See moor-yauj.]

Dunbar, WILLIAM, born probably in East Lothian between 1460 and 1465, seems to have entered St Andrews University in 1475, and taken his M.A. in 1479. He became a Franciscan, and 'in the habit of that order made good cheer in every flourishing town in England betwixt Berwick and Calais; in it also ascended the pulpit at Dernton and Canterbury; and crossed the sea at Dover, and instructed the inhabitants of Picardy.' He appears next to have been secretary to some of James IV.'s numerous embassies to foreign courts. In 1500 he obtained from the king a pension of £10, afterwards increased to £20, then to £80. In 1501 he visited England, probably with the ambassadors sent to arrange the king's marriage. Early in 1503, before the queen's arrival, he composed in honour of the event his most famous poem, The Thirissill and the Rois, perhaps the happiest political allegory in English literature. He seems now to have lived chiefly about court, writing poems, and sustaining himself with the vain hope of church preferment. In 1508 Chepman printed seven of his poems—the earliest specimen of Scottish typography. He visited the north of Scotland in May 1511, in the train of Queen Margaret, and his name disappears altogether after Flodden. If he fell there, the Orisone (1517) usually ascribed to Dunbar, was the work of another poet; but he may have retired to some quiet church-living given him by the queen. He was certainly dead in 1530; and David Laing argues that he must have died before 1522, the year of Gavin Douglas's death, whom Lyndsay names eight years afterwards as the greatest poet recently dead. As a poet, Dunbar is at times as rich in fancy and colour as Spenser in the Faerie Queen; as homely and shrewd and coarse as Chaucer in the Miller's Tale; as pious and devotional as Cowper in his hymns; and as wildly grotesque in satire as Burns in his Death and Doctor Hornbook. He reaches his highest level in his satires, The Two Marritt Women and the Wedo, and The Dance of the Sevin Deidly Synnis. His Lament for the Makaris is a masterpiece of pathos. His one fault is grossness. His works have been edited by David Laing (1834-65), Small and Mackay (S.T.S. 1884-93), Schipper (Vienna, 1891-95, and Baildon (1907).

Duncan I. See MACBETH.

Duncan, ADAM, VISCOUNT, admiral, was born at Dundee, 1st July 1731, and, entering the navy in 1746, commanded the Valiant at Havana (1762). He distinguished himself at Cape St Vincent (1780), and as admiral took command in 1795 of the North Sea Squadron to watch the Dutch fleet—Holland and France being at war with Britain. His blockade of the Texel was most effective, and Dutch trade was almost ruined. In the spring of 1797 the mutiny of the Nore spread to Duncan's seamen, and his position was for some weeks critical. On 11th Oct. he gained the brilliant victory of Camperdown, and was rewarded with a pension of £2000 and the title of Viscount Duncan of Camperdown. He died suddenly at Cornhill Inn, Coldstream, 4th August 1804; his elder son was in 1831 made Earl of Camperdown. See Life by third Earl (1898).

Duncan, ANDREW (1744-1828), Edinburgh medical professor, like his son ANDREW (1773-1832).

Duncan, HENRY, D.D. (1774-1846), from 1798 minister of Ruthwell, Dumfriesshire, in 1810 established there the first savings-bank.

Duncan, JAMES MATTHEWS (1826-90), born at Aberdeen, in 1877 was appointed to the chair of Obstetric Surgery at St Bartholomew's, London.

Duncan, JOHN (1794-1881), a self-taught botanist, was born at Stonehaven, and lived in the Vale of Alford, Aberdeenshire.

Duncan, THOMAS, born at Kinclaven, Perthshire, May 24, 1807, was elected an A.R.S.A., an R.S.A., and in 1843 an A.R.A. His principal works are 'Anne Page and Slender,' an illustration from Auld Robin Gray; 'Prince Charles's Entry into Edinburgh after Prestonjans'; and 'Prince Charles Edward concealed in a Cave.' He died in Edinburgh, 25th May 1845.

Duncker, MAXIMILIAN WOLFGANG (1811-86), historical writer, was born at Berlin, son of the well-known bookseller, Karl Duncker (1781-1869). He became extraordinary professor of History at Halle in 1842; sat in the National Assembly (1848), and as a Liberal in the Prussian chamber (1849-52); was called to a Tübingen chair in 1857, and thence recalled in 1859 to Berlin to fill a post in the ministry of state. From 1867 to 1874 he was director of the state archives of Prussia. His greatest work is his History of Antiquity (5th ed. 7 vols. 1878-83; sup. 1884-85; Eng. trans. 1877-82). In 1883-86 was published the translation of an only less admirable history of Greece to the end of the Persian war. Other works were Die Krisis der Reformations (1845) and Feudalität und Aristokratie (1858). See Life by Haym (1891). [Doon-ker.]

Dunckerley, THOMAS (1724-95), a natural son of George II., who was present at the taking of Quebec, and devoted himself to the promotion of Freemasonry. See Life by H. Sadler (1891).

Duncombe, THOMAS SLINGSBY (1796-1861), Radical M.P. for Hertford (1826-32), and for Finsbury from 1834, was born near Borough-bridge, and educated at Harrow. See Life (1868).

Dundas (of Arniston), a Scottish family distinguished for legal and political talent. Sir James Dundas, the first of Arniston, was knighted by James VI., and was governor of Berwick. His son, Sir James, was a judge of the Court of Session, under the title of Lord Arniston (1662), but was deprived of his office for refusing to abjure the Covenant. He died in 1679. His eldest son, Sir Robert, who also rose to the bench, died in 1726.—His son, ROBERT (1685-1753), in 1717 became Solicitor-general, in 1720 Lord Advocate, and as M.P. for Midlothian from 1722 distinguished himself by his attention to Scottish affairs. Sir Robert Walpole coming into power in 1725, Dundas resigned his office, when he was elected Dean of the Faculty of Advocates. In 1737 he was raised to the bench, also as Lord Arniston. He became President of the Court of Session in 1748.—His son, ROBERT (1713-87), was admitted to the Scottish bar in 1738, and rose to be Lord Advocate (1754) and President of the Court of Session (1760). HENRY DUNDAS, VISCOUNT MELVILLE and BARON DUNIRA, brother of the preceding, was born 28th April 1742, and was admitted to the Scottish bar in 1763. His assiduity, ability, and family influence soon procured him advancement, and he was successively Depute-advocate and Solicitor-general. In 1774 he became M.P. for Midlothian, in 1775 Lord Advocate, in 1777 Keeper of the King's Signet for Scotland. Dundas's career in parliament was highly successful, though not very creditable to his consistency. Elected in opposition to the ministry, he soon became a strenuous supporter of Lord North, and one of the most obstinate defenders of the war with America. When North resigned in 1781, Dundas continued Lord Advocate under Rockingham. On the formation of the Coalition Ministry he passed over to Pitt, and became his ablest coadjutor. When Pitt returned to power in 1784, Dundas was appointed President of the Board of Control, and he introduced a bill for restoring the Scottish estates forfeited after the '45. Secretary of State for the Home Department (1791), he also held a number of other offices; and many of the most important public measures originated with or were promoted by him. He resigned with Pitt in 1801, and in 1802, under the Addington administration, was made Viscount Melville and Baron Dunira. In 1805 he was impeached of 'gross malversation and breach of duty' as treasurer of the navy. The fortnight's trial before his peers acquitted him on all charges involving his honour. Thereafter he lived mostly at Dunira, his seat near Comrie. He died at Edinburgh, 28th May 1811. See Omond's Lord Advocates of Scotland (1883) and his Arniston Memoirs (1887).

Dundonald, THOMAS COCHRANE, EARL OF, seaman, was the eldest son of Archibald, ninth Earl (1749-1831), who beggared himself over chemical discoveries. Born at Annisfield, Hamilton, 14th December 1775, he entered the navy in 1793, and in 1800 received the command of a sloop, with which he took in fifteen months over fifty prizes; his most dashing achievement the capture of a Spanish 32-gun frigate with a loss of but 3 killed and 18 wounded. He was captured shortly afterwards by the French, but was speedily exchanged, and promoted to post-captain. After protecting the Orkney fisheries for fifteen months, he returned (February 1805) to prize-taking, and by April had made £75,000 of prize-money for his own share. The next four years were mainly spent in harassing the enemy's coasts, and in 1808, with a small force, defending for twelve days the almost untenable Fort Trinidad at Rosas. Meanwhile in 1805 he had stood unsuccessfully for Honiton, but by judicious non-bribery was elected next year. In 1807 he was returned for Westminster, and at once proceeding to war against naval abuses, was ordered off to the Mediterranean. In April 1809 he was selected to burn the French fleet then blockaded in Aix Roads by Lord Gambier. On the night of the 11th he shattered the boom at the entrance, but the twenty-one fireships did no damage. Still, daylight showed almost all the French fleet aground, but Gambier was fourteen miles away, and Cochrane's signals met with no response. At last, single-handed, he destroyed four of the enemy's ships. He received the Knighthood of the Bath, and Gambier the thanks of parliament, after an acquittal by the court-martial which ensued on Cochrane's protest against the vote. Discredited and on half-pay, Cochrane pursued his crusade against naval corruption, until in 1814 he was arrested on a charge of fraud. A rumour of Napoleon's overthrow had sent up the funds, and he, with two others, was tried for propagating it and selling out upwards of a million sterling worth a gross profit of £10,000. The others were guilty, Cochrane was innocent, yet he was sentenced to pay a fine of £1000, to suffer a year's imprisonment, and to stand for an hour in the pillory. This last was remitted, but he was struck off the navy list, expelled from parliament, and degraded from his knighthood. Westminster re-elected him; and in March 1815 he broke out of gaol and reappeared in the House, to be forcibly removed and re-imprisoned for the remaining three months of his sentence, and further fined in £100. In 1818 he proceeded to aid Chili and Peru in their war of freedom; and in command of Chili's little navy he stormed the fifteen strong forts of Valdivia (1819), and cut out a frigate from under the batteries of Callao (1820), in two and a half years making Chili mistress of her own waters. He reaped no reward; neither did he (beyond the marquise of Maranhão) for his brilliant services on behalf of the infant empire of Brazil (1823-25). For the cause of Greek independence he could do little through lack of ships and men (1827-28); so, returning to England, he devoted himself to procuring his reinstatement in the navy. But it was not till 1832 that a 'free pardon' was granted to the Earl of Dundonald—he had succeeded to the title ten months earlier—and that he was gazetted a rear-admiral. Restored to the honour of knighthood (1847), commander-in-chief on the North American station (1848-51), and rear-admiral of the United Kingdom (1854), he died at Kensington, 31st Oct. 1860, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Lord Dundonald advocated the application of steam-power to warships; his 'secret war-plan,' which he claimed would in four hours annihilate Sebastopol, is a secret still. It was submitted to committees in 1812 and 1846, and condemned as too inhuman, though infallible. See his own Narrative of Services in the Liberation of Chili, Peru, and Brazil (1859), and Autobiography of a Seaman (1860-61), which breaks off in 1814, and is completed in the Life by the eleventh Earl and Fox-Bourne (2 vols. 1869). See also sketch by Hon. J. W. Fortescue (1896) and Atlay's Trial of Lord Cochrane (1897).

Dunglison, ROBLEY (1798-1869), born at Keswick, studied medicine in London, Edinburgh, and Erlangen, and from 1824 held chairs in the United States, where he was the friend of Presidents Jefferson and Madison. See Life (1870).

Dunlop, JOHN BOYD, born at Dregghorn, Ayrshire, in 1840, was a flourishing veterinary surgeon near Belfast, when, before 1889, he invented the pneumatic tyre.

Dunlop, JOHN COLIN (c. 1782-1842), Scottish advocate, author of The History of Fiction (1814).

Dunne, FINLEY PETER, born at Chicago in 1867, edited papers there, and as 'Mr Dooley' became from 1900 the exponent of American-Irish humorous satire on personages and events of the day, in Mr Dooley in Peace and War, &c.

Dunois, JEAN, the 'Bastard of Orleans,' Count of Dunois and Longueville, was born in Paris, 23d November 1402, the natural son of Louis, Duke of Orleans, brother of Charles VI. His first great achievement was the defeat of the English at Montargis (1427); next he threw himself into Orleans with a small force, and defended it till its relief by Joan of Arc forced the English to raise the siege. In 1429 Dunois and the Maid of Orleans won the battle of Patay, after which he marched through the provinces overrun by the English, and took the fortified towns. Shortly after Joan's tragical death, Dunois took Chartres, the key of Paris, forced Bedford to raise the siege of Lagny, chased the enemy from Paris, and soon deprived them of all their conquests except Normandy and Guienne. In 1448-50 he drove them from Normandy, and in 1455 from Guienne also, and secured the freedom of France. For joining the league of the nobles against Louis XI. he was deprived of all his possessions, which were, however, restored to him under the treaty of Confians (1465). He died 24th November 1468. No French hero is more popular than Dunois. Although he never commanded a force large enough to win a victory to balance Agincourt or Crécy, his numerous petty successes served the cause of France better than greater and more dear-bought victories would have done. Dunraven, WINDHAM THOMAS WYNDHAM-QUIN, EARL OF, born at Adare Manor, Limerick, 12th February 1841, studied at Christ Church, Oxford, served in the 1st Life Guards (1865-67), acted as Daily Telegraph correspondent in the Abyssinian expedition and the Franco-German war, and succeeded his father as fourth earl in 1871. He was under-secretary for the colonies (1885-87); has written on hunting, 'Fair Trade,'

The Great Divide (1874), The Soudan (1884), &c.; and has thrice (1893-94-95) attempted to wrest the America Cup from the New York Yacht Club with his Valkyrie versus the Vigilant.

Duns Scotus, JOHANNES, one of the greatest of the mediæval schoolmen, was born about 1265 or 1274, and from his name it is conjectured that his birthplace was either Dunstane in Northumberland, Dun (now Down) in Ulster, or Duns in Berwickshire. Joining the Franciscan order, he studied at Merton College, Oxford, and lectured there on philosophy and theology; the report that 30,000 students then thronged to Oxford may be taken as an exaggerated testimony to his fame. In 1304 he was transferred to Paris, and in 1308 to Cologne, where he died in November of the same year. His works are chiefly commentaries on the Bible, on Aristotle, and on the Sentences of Peter Lombard. The first are not contained in the collected edition (edited by Luke Wadding, Lyons, 1639). The last occupy seven out of its twelve vols. (vols. v.-x. called Opus Oxoniense, vol. xi. called Opus Parisiense—the latter edited from students' note-books). Duns Scotus was the critic of preceding scholasticism, and the founder of a new type of thought. The schoolmen of the 13th century, especially Thomas Aquinas, had systematised and defended the Christian theology by means of the philosophy of Aristotle. On certain points Aquinas diverged from Aristotle, but the disagreement of Duns Scotus went much deeper. He contended that Aquinas was wrong in subordinating the practical to the theoretical, and seeking in speculation instead of in practice for the foundation of Christian theology. This contention struck at the root of the whole Aristotelico-Christian philosophy. Theology, he holds, rests in faith, and faith is not speculative but practical—an act of will. The system of theology built up by Aquinas is subjected by Duns Scotus to a searching criticism, conducted with consummate dialectical skill, and abounding in refined distinctions, which gained him the title of 'Doctor Subtilis.' In his own system he maintained a strict orthodoxy. He carried on a zealous controversy against the Dominicans (Aquinas' order) in defence of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. See monographs in German by K. Werner (1880) and French by Pluzanski (1887).

Dunstable, JOHN, a native of Dunstable, who died in 1543, and who, it has been exaggeratedly claimed, 'invented the art of musical composition.'

Dunstan, ST (c. 910-988), Archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of a West Saxon noble, and was born near Glastonbury. Educated at the abbey, he lived for some time at the court of Athelstan, but his companions ill-used him and procured his banishment on the charge of practising unlawful arts. He took the monastic vows and retired to Glastonbury, where he gave himself up to study. The accession of Athelstan's brother, Edmund, recalled him to court, and he was appointed Abbot of Glastonbury in 945. He began a great work of reformation, and soon the abbey became a centre of religious teaching and influence. At the same time he became the treasurer and adviser of Edmund, whose death in 955 led to the accession of Edwy and the fall of Dunstan's power. He took refuge in Flanders, and at Ghent he first saw the strict Benedictine discipline he was yet to introduce into England. In 957 he was recalled by Edgar, who had become king of the country north of the Thames, and was created Bishop of Worcester, in 959 of London also. In that year Edwy's death made Edgar king of the whole country, and one of his first acts was to appoint Dunstan to the see of Canterbury. The wise measures that made Edgar's reign so peaceful and prosperous were in great part due to the counsels of Dunstan. With Oswald, Archbishop of York, he solemnly crowned Edgar at Bath (973)—a formal declaration of the unity of the kingdom. Dunstan laboured to elevate the lives of the clergy, raise their social status, and make them the real teachers of the people in secular as in religious matters. He made obligatory the payment of tithes by landowners, while he did not entirely surrender the liberties of the church to Rome. On Edgar's death in 975, Dunstan declared for Edward, elder son of the late king, and crowned him at Winchester. On Edward's murder in 978, the two archbishops crowned Ethelred, whose hostility put an end to the great churchman's political career. See the six early biographies collected in Bishop Stubbs' Memorials of St Dunstan ('Rolls' series, 1875).

Dunton, JOHN (1659-1733), born at Graftham, Hunts, refused to make the fourth in a direct line of clergymen, so was apprenticed to a London bookseller, and managed to acquire much varied knowledge, in spite of love, politics, and other distractions. He took a shop, married happily, made some lucky ventures, but foolishly became security for the debts of some relatives, and was involved in financial troubles. He visited America, Holland, and Cologne, settled somehow with his creditors, and kept shop for ten years with fair prosperity; his Athenian Gazette being specially successful. He married a second time unhappily, and under the real and imaginary troubles of his later years his mind seems to have crossed the line between crack-brained flightiness and sheer lunacy. See his extraordinary Life and Errors of John Dunton (1705).

Düntzer, HEINRICH, writer on classical subjects, Goethe, Schiller, &c., was born at Cologne in 1813, lived there from 1846, and died in 1901.

Dupanloup, FÉLIX ANTOINE PHILLIBERT, born at St Félix in Savoy, 3d January 1802, became vicar-general of Paris in 1838 and Bishop of Orleans in 1849. Though he had advocated tolerance for the Jesuits, and defended the temporal authority of the pope, he protested openly against the infallibility dogma; once, however, it was published, he signified his acceptance of it. In 1871 he was elected deputy for Orleans to the National Assembly; and from this time until his death, 11th October 1878, he struggled manfully against the constant attacks upon the church both in the Assembly and outside of it. He was nominated a senator in 1876, and from 1854 had been a member of the Institute. He published a great many works on education, marriage, &c. See Life by Lagrange (trans. by Lady Herbert, 1885) and Lettres choisies (2 vols. 1888). [Dee-pan'-loo.]

Dupin, FRANÇOIS-PIERRE-CHARLES, BARON (1784-1873), author of Voyages dans la Grande Bretagne (1820-24), was made a baron in 1824, a peer in 1837, and filled several posts, which he resigned in 1852. His elder brother, ANDRÉ (1783-1863), a statesman and lawyer, wrote legal works and memoirs (4 vols. 1855-61). [Dee-pan'.]

Dupleix, JOSEPH FRANÇOIS, born 1st January 1697 at Landrecies, in 1720 was appointed to a seat in the French East India Council at Pondicherry. In 1730 he became superintendent at Chandernagore, in 1741 governor-general of all the French Indies; and his skilful diplomacy among the native princes almost made the Carnatic a French province. His power alarmed the English Company. When war broke out in Europe between France and England, Labourdonnais, who had taken Madras, was bribed with £40,000 to restore it to the English on payment of a ransom. This Dupleix refused to accede to, and violent disputes resulted in Labourdonnais' recall. Several brilliant engagements took place between the French and the Nawab of the Carnatic, who endeavoured to seize Madras, but was forced to raise the siege. An attack on the English at Fort St David failed, but Dupleix's science and courage were displayed in the defence of Pondicherry, which Admiral Boscawen vainly attacked for five weeks. But Dupleix's ambitious project of founding a French empire in India on the ruins of the Mogul monarchy was frustrated by Clive; though the struggle continued until Dupleix's recall in 1754. The French Company refused to reimburse him for the vast sums he had spent out of his private fortune, and he died in poverty and neglect in 1763. See Hamont, Dupleix d'après sa Correspondance; Malleson, French in India (new ed. 1884); Rapson, England and France in India (1887); Lives by Malleson (1890), Guérin (1908), Biddulph (1910).

Dupont, GAINSBOROUGH (c. 1754-97), portrait-painter and mezzotinter, was a pupil and imitator of the great painter, his uncle.

Dupont, PIERRE (1821-70), French popular poet, was born and died at Lyons.

Dupont, SAMUEL FRANCIS (1808-65), a Federal naval commander in the American Civil War.

Dupré, GIOVANNI (1817-82), sculptor, was born of French ancestry at Siena, and died at Florence. See English Life by Frieze (1886).

Dupré, JULES (1812-89), landscape-painter, was born at Nantes, and died in Paris. [Dee-pray.]

Dupuis, CHARLES FRANÇOIS (1742-1809), was professor of Rhetoric in the Collège de France, member of the Académie des Inscriptions, and during the Revolution a member of the Convention, of the Council of Five Hundred, and of the legislative body, of which he became president. His Origine de tous les Cultes (10 vols. 1795) originated the commission appointed by Napoleon to explore Upper Egypt. [D-pwee.]

Dupuytren, GUILLAUME, BARON (1777-1835), from 1812 professor of Clinical Surgery in Paris, invented many surgical instruments. See Life by Cruveilhier (1841). [D-pwee-trong.]

Duquesne, ABRAHAM, MARQUIS (1610-88), French naval officer, born at Dieppe, distinguished himself in 1637-43 in the war with Spain. In the Swedish service he rose to vice-admiral; and then returning to France, reduced Bordeaux, which had declared for the Fronde. He defeated De Ruyter and Van Tromp several times in 1672-73, and the united fleets of Spain and Holland off Sicily in 1676. On the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, Duquesne was the only Protestant excepted. See Life by Jal (1872). [D-Kayn.]

Duran, CAROLUS ÉMILE AUGUSTE, French painter, was born at Lille, 4th July 1837. For 'L'Assassiné' (1866) he gained his first medal; and in 1878 he exhibited his 'Gloria Mariæ Medicis' for a ceiling in the Luxembourg. He is best known, however, by his portraits of Émile Girardin, Mlle. Croizette, &c. [Dee-ronn.]

Durand, SIR HENRY MARION (1812-71), the son of a cavalry officer, was trained at Addiscombe, served in the Afghan war (bursting in the gates of Ghazni, 1839) and the Sikh war. As agent in Central India he rendered very valuable service during the mutiny; and was subsequently a member of the Indian Council, K.C.S.I., major-general, and governor-general of the Punjab.—His second son, SIR HENRY MORTIMER DURAND, K.C.S.I., G.C.M.G., born in 1850, has done valuable work, military and diplomatic, in the East, and as ambassador to Spain and the U.S.

Durand, MADAME. See GRÉVILLE (HENRY).

Durandus, GULIELMUS (1237-96), born at Puissein near Béziers, studied canon law at Bologna and Modena, and had held various offices under several popes, when in 1286 he became Bishop of Mende, still, however, remaining in Rome, where he died. His Speculum Judiciale (1271; first printed 1474) is his most famous work; of his Rationale Divinorum Officiorum (Mainz, 1459), book i. was translated by J. M. Neale and B. Webb as The Symbolism of Churches (1843).—Another GULIELMUS DURANDUS (d. 1332), from 1327 Bishop of Puy-en-Velay, was called 'Doctor Resolutissimus'; he first supported and then opposed Thomas Aquinas.

Durante, FRANCESCO (1684-1755), a Neapolitan composer of church and chamber music.

Dürer, ALBERT, was born at Nuremberg, 21st May 1471, the son of a goldsmith from Hungary. In 1486 he was apprenticed to Michael Wohlgemuth, the chief illustrator of the Nuremberg Chronicle, and in 1490 started on his four years' travels to Colmar, Basel, and Venice. Then, having married the beautiful Agnes Frey, who was certainly not the Xanthippe of tradition, he worked again for a while under Wohlgemuth, and in 1497 started on his own account, and, aided by Schänflein, Baldung, and others, executed many paintings, among them the Dresden triptych, and the Paumgartner altar-piece at Munich. In 1498 he published his first great series of designs on wood, the illustrations of the Apocalypse, which, like Dürer's other work of the kind, were cut by a professional engraver. The copper-plates of this period include 'The Prodigal Son' (1500) and 'Adam and Eve' (1502). In 1505-6 Dürer revisited Venice, and here produced the 'Feast of the Rosaries,' now in the Rudolphinum at Prague. On his return he painted 'Adam and Eve' (1507), now at Madrid; and 'Assumption of the Virgin'—a triptych, whose centre was destroyed by fire at Munich in 1673. It was followed in 1511 by the 'Adoration of the Trinity,' in the Imperial Gallery, Vienna. Dürer was much employed by Maximilian I., of whom he executed several portraits, for whose prayer-book he made forty-three pen and ink drawings, and in whose honour he drew the 'Triumphal Car' and the 'Triumphal Arch,' which were engraved on wood, the latter on ninety-two blocks, forming a surface 11½ by 10 feet—the largest known woodcut. In 1520-21 Dürer visited the Netherlands. At Antwerp he made the acquaintance of Erasmus; and he was present at the coronation of Charles V., who appointed him his court-painter. He died at Nuremberg, 6th April 1528. During his later years Dürer manifested great sympathy with the Reformation.

Dürer's drawings and studies are very numerous, and are to be found in most public collections, those of the Albertina in Vienna and of the British Museum being the richest. As an engraver on metal and a designer of woodcuts he ranks even higher than as a painter. His work is distinguished by an unerring perception of the capabilities of the material, his metal-plates being executed with extreme finish and refinement; while his woodcuts are boldly drawn with a broad expressive line, such as could be easily followed by the engraver. His copper-plates, over 100 in number, include the 'Little Passion' (16 plates, 1508-13); the 'Knight, Death, and the Devil' (1513); 'St Jerome in his Study,' and 'Melancolia' (1514). Dürer may also be regarded as the inventor of etching, as he produced several plates in which all the lines are bitten with acid. His woodcuts are about 200 in number, including the 'Greater Passion,' 12 subjects; 'The Little Passion,' 37 subjects; and 'The Apocalypse,' 16 subjects. Of his various scientific writings the Instructions in Measurement (1525), Treatise on Fortification (1527), and Treatise on Human Proportion (1528) are the most important. An English translation of his writings, abridged, was published in 1839 by Sir W. M. Conway. The best life is Thausing's Albert Dürer (2d ed. 1884; trans. by Eaton, 1882). See also works by Ephrussi (Par. 1881), A. von Eye (Wandsbek, 1892), Lionel Cust (Portfolio, Nov. 1894 and Jan. 1897), Lange and Fuhsse (Dürer's Schriftlicher Nachlass, Halle, 1893), and Knackfuss (Dürer und Holbein, Bielefeld, 1895). D'UrfeY, THOMAS, dramatist and song-writer, was born at Exeter in 1653 of Huguenot ancestry, a nephew of Honoré d'Urfé (1568-1625), author of the famous romance of Astrée. He early became a busy playwright, his comedies especially being popular. Among these were The Fond Husband (1676), Madame Fickle (1677), and Sir Burnaby Whig (1681). In 1683 he published his New Collection of Songs and Poems, which was followed by a long series of songs, collected as Wit and Mirth, or Pills to Purge Melancholy (6 vols. 1719-20; repr. 1872). Meanwhile he had been busy with plays, for whose morals he suffered like the rest from the heavy hand of Jeremy Collier. He never married; and though he was not particularly prolific, his fortunes had declined as his comedies ceased to please. He died 26th February 1723.

Durham, JAMES (1622-58), born at Easter Powrie in Forfarshire, fought as captain in the Civil War, and in 1647 became a Covenanting minister at Glasgow—chaplain to Charles II. in 1650-51. His twelve posthumous works include Clavis Cantici, or an Exposition of the Song of Solomon (1668).

Durham, JOHN GEORGE LAMBTON, EARL OF, was born in London, 12th April 1792, and on his father's death in 1797 inherited Lambton Hall, Durham, which had been in the family for over six centuries. Educated at Eton, he served for two years in the dragoons, and in 1813 was returned as a Whig for his native county. He was a strong liberal, and in 1821 brought forward a scheme for parliamentary reform much more advanced than that of 1832. In 1828 he was elected Baron Durham. In the administration of his father-in-law, Lord Grey (1830), he was Lord Privy Seal, and one of the four persons who drew up the Reform Bill. Resigning office in 1833, he was made an earl, and from 1835 to 1837 was ambassador-extraordinary to St Petersburg. In 1838 he was appointed Governor-general of Canada, where, owing to the revolt of the French in Lower Canada, the constitution had been suspended. His measures were statesmanlike but dictatorial; and the House of Lords voted disapproval of some of his acts. Thereupon in five months' time he returned to England without being recalled. Lord Durham's famous report on Canada was ascribed by Brougham and many contemporaries to his secretary, Charles Buller (q.v.)—erroneously, according to Stuart Reid in the Life and Letters of Lord Durham (2 vols. 1906), who died 28th July 1840.

Durnford, RICHARD, D. D. (1802-95), from 1870 Bishop of Chichester, was born at Sandleford, Berks. See Life by Dean Stephens (1899).

Duruy, VICTOR (1811-94), historian and educationist, was born and died in Paris. He became professor of History in the Collège Henri IV. (1833), and as Minister of Public Instruction (1863-69) carried out important reforms. His works include historical geographies of the Roman empire, the middle ages, and France, histories of France and Greece, and Histoire des Romains jusqu'à la mort de Théodose (Eng. trans. 1883-86). He became a Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour (1867), and an Academician (1885). See Life by Lavisse (1895). [Deer-uee'.]

Duse - Checchi, ELEONORA, actress, born at Venice, 3d October 1861, played during the eighties in Rome and other Italian cities, and appeared at Vienna and Berlin (1892), New York and London (1893), Paris (1897), &c. [Doo-say.]

Dushan, STEPHEN, Serbia's greatest czar (1836-56), the subjugator of Bulgaria, Macedonia, and Albania.

Dussek, JAN LADISLAW, composer and pianist, born 9th February 1761 at Czeslau in Bohemia. At Amsterdam he was successful both as a teacher and performer, and produced his earliest works for the piano; he afterwards resided at the Hague, &c., and in London (1788-1800) was very popular. In 1803-6 he was instructor to Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia; in 1808 he entered Talleyrand's service. He died at St Germain-en-Laye, 20th March 1812. [Du-shek'.]

Dutens, LOUIS (1730-1812), born at Tours of Huguenot parentage, came to England, went to Turin as chaplain to the English embassy (1758-62), and remained as chargé d'affaires. He held a pension of £300, in 1766 was presented to the rich sinecure living of Elsdon in Northumberland, travelled much, and was made historiographer-royal. He undertook the first comprehensive edition of Leibnitz's works (1768), and wrote over twenty French miscellaneous works. See his Mémoires d'un Voyageur qui se repose (3 vols. 1806).—His nephew, JOSEPH MICHEL DUTENS (1765-1848), wrote a Philosophie de l'Économie Politique (1835). [Dee-tonz'.]

Dutt, TORU. See TORU DUTT.

Duval, CLAUDE (1643-70), highwayman, was born at Doufront, Normandy, and came to England at the Restoration in the train of the Duke of Richmond. Taking soon to the road, he pursued a successful career till, having been captured drunk, he was hanged at Tyburn.

Dvořák, ANTONÍN, the Bohemian composer, was born at Mühlhausen, 8th September 1841. His father was a butcher, who at a great sacrifice sent his son in 1857 to Prague. In 1873, after years of hack-work, he composed a hymn which attracted attention; and two years afterwards received a pension. Brahms introduced his compositions to Vienna; but the work which won for him the ear of all Europe was his Stabat Mater, which was first performed in London in 1883. Other compositions are songs, &c., very spontaneous and delicate (Seven Gypsy Songs, op. 55), and pianoforte compositions, in all of which he had made large use of national melodies and dance rhythms; also chamber music of great beauty (E-flat Quartette, op. 51). His most ambitious work is orchestral and choral—a cantata, the Spectre's Bride (Birmingham, 1885); an oratorio, St Ludmila (Leeds, 1886); and several operas—none of them really successful. In 1892-95 he was director of the Conservatory at New York (where he wrote an American symphony), but subsequently lived at Prague, where he died 1st May 1904. See W. H. Hadow's Studies in Modern Music (2d series, 1895). [Dvorzhak.]

He discovered and published (1875) the celebrated hieratic medical Papyrus Ebers. Two works of travel have been translated—Through Goshen to Sinai (1872); Egypt, Descriptive, Historical, and Picturesque (1880). [Etch-ay-gah-rah'ee.]

Eck, JOHANN MAYER VON (1486-1543), born at Eck in Swabia, became professor of Theology at Ingolstadt (1510), and was the ruling spirit of that university until his death. After his Leipzig disputation with Luther, Eck wrote his De Primatu Petri, and went to Rome in 1520, to return with the bull which declared Luther a heretic; henceforth he continued with passionate violence his struggle with the Reformation. See Life by Wiedemann (1865), with a list of Eck's eighty-one writings.

Eckart. See ECKHART.

Eckermann, JOHANN PETER (1792-1854), born at Winsen in Hanover, after serving in the war of 1813-14, was employed in the war office at Hanover, and studied at Göttingen. The publication of his Beträge zur Poesie (1823) led to his removal to Weimar, where he assisted Goethe in preparing the final edition of his works. He won for himself a lasting name by his Conversations with Goethe (1837), translated into English by Margaret Fuller (1839) and John Oxenford (1850).

Eckhart's teaching is a mystic pantheism, and influenced later religious mysticism and speculative philosophy; in 1325 he was arraigned for heresy by the Archbishop of Cologne, an accusation revived two years after his death, when his writings were condemned by Pope John XXII. Eckhart's extant works consist of sermons and tracts. These, written in German, are printed in Pfeiffer's Deutsche Mystiker des Isten Jahrhunderts (1857). See also Preger's Deutsche Mystik (1874), and monographs by Lasson (Berl. 1868) and Franz Jostes (Freib. 1895).

Edgar, or EADGAR (944-975), king of the English, was the younger son of Edmund the Magnificent. In 957 he became ruler over Northumbria and Mercia, and in 959, on his brother Eadwig's death, king of Wessex besides. His reign, whose policy was largely shaped by Dunstan (q.v.), was one of peace and prosperity.

Edgar Atheling (c. 1050-c. 1125), grandson of Edmund Ironside, was born probably in Hungary. The heir of Edward the Confessor, he was kept from the throne by William the Conqueror (1066); and having engaged in revolts against the Norman, he sought refuge in Scotland (1068) with Malcolm Canmore, who married his sister Margaret. Edgar embraced the cause of Robert, Duke of Normandy, against William Rufus, and was again driven (1091) to Scotland, where in 1097 he reasserted his nephew Edgar on the throne, which had been usurped by Donald Bane. In 1099 he embarked on a bootless crusading expedition to the East; and finally was taken prisoner at Tinchebrai (1106) fighting for Duke Robert against Henry I.

Edgeworth, HENRY ESSEX, the 'Abbé Edgeworth,' was born in 1745. His father was then Protestant rector of Edgeworthstown, but three years later turned Catholic, and, quitting Ireland, settled at Toulouse. Young Edgeworth was trained for the priesthood, and at his ordination assumed the surname De Firmont from Firmont, the family property. In 1791 he became confessor to the Princess Elizabeth, in 1793 to her brother, Louis XVI., just sentenced to death. He attended him to the foot of the scaffold; but the 'Son of St Louis, ascend to heaven,' was an invention, it seems, of the journalist Lacretelle. He got safely to England (1796), and as chaplain attended Louis XVIII. to Mitau, where he died of a fever, caught attending French prisoners, 22d May 1807. See his Memoirs by C. Sneyd Edgeworth (1815), and his Letters (1818).

Edgeworth, RICHARD LOVELL, born at Bath, 31st May 1744, came of a family that for 160 years had been settled at Edgeworthstown, County Longford. After five months of dissipation at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1761 he was removed to Oxford, where he passed two 'delightful, profitable' years. At Blackbourn, fourteen miles distant, lived a friend of his father's, Paul Elers, and with one of his daughters Edgeworth eloped to Scotland (1763). The young couple settled at Hare Hatch, near Reading, Edgeworth meanwhile keeping terms in the Temple till his father's death (1769). As a boy of seven he had become 'irrecoverably a mechanic' through the sight of an electrical machine; and his whole life long he was always inventing something—a semaphore, a velocipede, a pedometer, and so forth. One of his inventions brought him across Dr Darwin; and at Lichfield, in 1770, he conceived a passion for lovely Honora Sneyd. His wife was away in Berkshire ('she was not of a cheerful temper'); but Thomas Day (q.v.) was with him, and urged him to flight. So with Day and his eldest boy, whom he was educating on Rousseau's system, he fled to France, and at Lyons diverted himself and the course of the Rhone. Then his wife died, and four months afterwards he wedded Honora (1773), to lose her in 1780, and the same year marry her sister Elizabeth. She too died of consumption (1797); but the next wife, Miss Beaufort (1798), survived him by many years. In all he had nineteen children. He advocated parliamentary reform and Catholic emancipation; his house was spared by the rebels (1798); and in the last Irish parliament (1798-99) he spoke for the Union, but voted against it. He died 13th June 1817.

His daughter, MARIA EDGEWORTH, was born at

Blackbourton, on New-year's Day, 1767. As quite a child she was famed for her story-telling powers, and at thirteen wrote a tale on Generosity. 'Excellent,' said her father, 'and extremely well written; but where's the generosity?' She accompanied him to Ireland in 1782, and until his death the two were inseparable. For his sake and that of her friends and country she sacrificed her one romance—refused the Swedish count, M. Edelcrantz, not without much suffering then and long afterwards. This was in 1802 at Paris, where, as again in 1820, and during frequent visits to London, she was greatly lionised. She was at Bowood (Lord Lansdowne's) in 1818, and at Abbotsford in 1823, Scott two years later returning the visit at Edgeworthstown. At seventy she learned Spanish, at eighty-two could thoroughly enjoy Macaulay's History. She died 22d May 1849. To the literary partnership between Mr and Miss Edgeworth we owe directly Practical Education (1798) and the Essay on Irish Bulls (1802). But most of her other works were inspired by her father, and gained or (it may be) lost by his revision. Published between 1795 and 1847, they filled over 20 volumes. Besides the Tales from Fashionable Life and Harrington (an apology for the Jews), there are her three Irish masterpieces, Castle Rackrent (1800), The Absentee (1812), and Ormond (1817). Her novels may be too didactic, and the dramatis personae sometimes wooden; the whole may have too much the tone of a moral Lord Chesterfield; but for wit, pathos, lively dialogue, and simple directness, for bright vivacity and healthy realism, as a mirror, moreover, of the age when they were written and of that 'most distressful country' in which their best scenes are laid, they still deserve to be read. The Memoirs of Richard Lovell Edgeworth (1820; 3d ed. 1844) are autobiographical up to 1782; the completion, less interesting, is by Miss Edgeworth. See her Life and Letters (privately printed, 1867; ed. by A. J. C. Hare, 1894), the Lives by Miss Zimmern (1883) and the Hon. Emily Lawless (1904), and Lady Richmond-Ritchie's Book of Sibyls (1883).

Edinburgh, DUKE OF. See SAXE-COBURG.

Edison, THOMAS ALVA, born at Milan, Ohio, 11th February 1847, at twelve became a railroad newsboy, and began to experiment in chemistry. Gaining the exclusive right of selling newspapers on his line, and purchasing some old type, he published the Grand Trunk Herald, the first newspaper printed in a train. A station-master taught him telegraphy, and he invented an automatic repeater, by which messages could be sent from one wire to another without the intervention of the operator. He developed his system of duplex telegraphy while he was a telegraph operator in Boston. In 1871 he invented the printing-telegraph for quotations, for whose manufacture he established a workshop at Newark, N.J., removed to Menlo Park, N.J., in 1876. His inventive faculties now getting full play, he took out over 1400 patents in connection with telegraphy, including quadruplex and sexplex systems, megaphone, phonograph, various adaptations of the electric light, the kinetoscope, and metallurgic methods. He is a chevalier of the Legion of Honour. See Life by Dyer and Martin (1910).

Edmund, Sr (c. 841–870), said to have been born in Franconia, the son of King Alkmund, in 855 succeeded Offa, king of the East Angles, as his adopted heir. In the Danish invasion of 866–870 he was defeated, and shot to death with arrows because he refused to abjure his faith. In 903 his remains were translated from Hoxne to Bury St Edmunds. See Life by J. R. Thompson (1891).

Edmund (c. 922–946) in 940 succeeded his brother Athelstan as king of the English. He conquered Mercia and the 'Five Boroughs' of the Danish confederacy in 941 or 944, and also Cumbria, which he entrusted to Malcolm of Scotland; but was slain by an outlaw at Pucklechurch, Gloucestershire.

Edmund, Sr. Edmund Rich, born at Abingdon about 1170, studied and taught at Oxford and Paris. He acquired fame as a preacher, was commissioned by the pope to preach the sixth crusade throughout England (c. 1227), and in 1234 was made Archbishop of Canterbury. He attached himself to the national party, whose spokesman he became with Henry III., even threatening him with excommunication if he did not dismiss foreign favourites. But his gentleness, generosity, austerity, and purity put him out of joint with the age; and in 1240 he retired to the abbey of Pontigny in France, and died the same year, 16th Nov., at Soisy. See Lives by Dom W. Wallace (1895) and F. de Paravicini (1899).

Edmund Ironside (c. 981–1016), king of the English, was son of Etheled the Unready, and was chosen king by the Londoners on his father's death (April 1016), while Canute was elected at Southampton by the Witan. Edmund hastily levied an army in the west, defeated Canute twice, raised the siege of London, and again routed the Danes. Levying a fresh army, he defeated them at Otford—his last victory. At Assandun (Ashington, in Essex), after a desperate fight, he was routed. By a compromise with Canute, the latter retained Mercia and Northumbria, Edmund all the south and the headship, the survivor to succeed to the whole. A few weeks after Edmund died.

Edmunds, GEORGE FRANKLIN, senator, born at Richmond, Vt., 1st February 1828, sat in the state legislature and senate, and in 1866–91 in the U.S. senate, of which he was president pro tempore after Mr Arthur became president. He took an active part in the prosecution of President Johnson, and was author of the 'Edmunds Act' for the suppression of polygamy in Utah.

Edric Streona, the wicked ealdorman from 1017 of the Mercians, who, a traitor and murderer, was himself at last slain by Canute's order in 1017.—His nephew, EDRIC SILVATICUS, in 1067–70 opposed the Conqueror.

Edrisi (c. 1100–64), Arabic geographer, was born at Ceuta, studied at Cordova, and travelled in Spain, Barbary, and Asia Minor. He then settled at the court of Roger II. of Sicily, for whom he made a silver map of the world and a celestial sphere, and who invited him to write a description of the earth. For this end travellers were sent on journeys of exploration, and were directed to send him an account of all they had seen or heard. This occupied many years, and Edrisi's Description of the World (Nuzhat-el-Mushtāk), or 'Book of Roger,' as it was also called, was not completed till 1154. Unequal in execution, it yet stands in the very first rank of mediæval geographies. Am. Jauber translated the whole, unsatisfactorily, into French (2 vols. 1836–40); and the portion relating to Africa and Spain has been edited, with a French translation, by Dozy and

De Goeje (Leyd. 1866), that relating to Italy, with Italian translation, by Amari and Schiaparelli (Rome, 1883). [Ed-ree-zee.]

Edward THE ELDER (c. 870—c. 924) about 901 succeeded his father, Alfred the Great, and raised the supremacy of Wessex into something little short of an imperial authority, extending his sway over Mercia, East Anglia, and Northumbria.

Edward THE MARTYR (c. 963—978) in 975 succeeded his father, Edgar, as king, and was murdered at Corfe Castle by his step-mother, Elfrida.

Edward THE CONFESSOR, the last Anglo-Saxon king of the old line, was born at Islip in Oxfordshire, the elder son of Ethelred the Unready, by his marriage in 1002 with Emma, daughter of Richard the duke of the Normans. On the death of Ethelred in 1016, Canute obtained possession of the throne, and next year married the widowed Queen Emma, by whom he had two children, Gunhild and Hardicanute. He lived in Normandy, but was invited to his court by his half-brother Hardicanute in 1041, and next year succeeded him as king. This was brought about mainly by the great Earl Godwin, whose only daughter, Edith, Edward married in 1045. He was perpetually influenced by his foreign favourites, and the history of his reign is merely the record of the struggle of the Norman or court party with the national party, led by Godwin and his son Harold. Edward died 5th January 1066, and was canonised for his monk-like virtues by Pope Alexander III. in 1161. See Freeman's Norman Conquest and the early lives of Edward, edited by H. R. Luard ('Record' series, 1858).

Edward I., the elder son of Henry III. and Eleanor of Provence, was born at Westminster, June 17, 1239. In 1254 he married Eleanor of Castile, receiving from his father Gascony, Ireland, and Wales, where, in fighting with the turbulent Welshmen, he learned his first lessons in warfare. At the Parliament of Oxford (1258) he took part with his father against the barons, but thereafter at first sided with Simon de Montfort, without, however, impairing his own personal loyalty to his father. By his rashness he lost the battle of Lewes (1264), and was imprisoned as a hostage for his father's pledges. Conditions for his liberation, discussed at Simon's famous parliament of 1265, were frustrated through his escape from Hereford Castle; and at Evesham (August 4) the struggle ended with Simon's death on the battlefield. In 1270 he started to join the last crusade, but at Tunis found that Louis IX. was dead. He went on to Acre, and won renown as a knight, narrowly escaped death from an assassin's dagger, but failed to save the Frankish kingdom in the East from its inevitable fate. At Capua, on his way home, in January 1273, he heard of his father's death two months before; but he did not get back to England till August 1274. At his coronation he received the homage of Alexander III. of Scotland for his lands in England, but Prince Llewelyn of Wales only paid his homage in 1276. Edward at once commenced that wise and large policy of domestic consolidation and financial as well as legal reform that has made his reign so important an epoch. His first warfare, with the disaffected Welshmen, ended in the defeat and death of Llewelyn in 1282. By the famous Statute of Wales (1284) the principality was finally annexed to the English crown. Edward devoted the next year to legislation, then went abroad to mediate between France and Aragon. He had soon to return to quell fresh disturbances in Wales, and even in England, where the great Statute of Winchester (1285), for putting the defence of the country on a national basis, had not had time to effect its end. Finding most of his judges corrupt, he punished them with an iron hand, next banished in 1290 all the Jews (16,000) on the plea of extortionate usury. Earlier in the reign he had handed 280 for money-clipping and forgery. The death (1290) of the young Scottish queen, the Maid of Norway, whom Edward had betrothed to his son, Edward of Carnarvon, opened up a contest for the Scottish crown, which gave Edward a chance of reasserting a shadowy claim to the over-lordship of Scotland. After an inquiry into the rival claims, he decided against Bruce (q.v.) and in favour of John Baliol, who on his accession paid homage for the whole kingdom of Scotland. Meantime the ambitious projects of the new French king, Philip IV., compelled Edward to take measures to preserve his French possessions. He at once began preparations for war, and summoned in 1295 an assembly of the estates of the realm, practically the first representative parliament. The growing exasperation of the Scots broke out into open warfare in 1296. Edward marched northwards, captured Berwick, penetrated to Aberdeen, Banff, and Elgin, accepted Baliol's surrender of the crown at Montrose, and returned to Berwick with the coronation-stone. Here he received the fealty of the Scottish clergy, barons, and gentry, whose names fill the Ragman Roll. He could now turn to France, but the clergy refused fresh subsidies. At the Salisbury parliament (1297) the great barons also refused to take part in foreign war. A compromise was effected with the clergy, and a temporary illegal grant procured from the nobles and commons who were with him. Edward sailed for Flanders, and at Ghent confirmed the Charter with supplementary clauses establishing the people's right to determine taxation. It was the dangerous aspect of affairs in Scotland that forced him to yield to the barons. Already, in 1297, Wallace (q.v.) had commenced a guerilla warfare, had won the great victory of Stirling Bridge, and ravaged England from Newcastle to Carlisle. Edward concluded a truce with Flanders, cementing it by his betrothal to Philip's sister Margaret (Queen Eleanor had been dead nine years). Meantime, Wallace's success had merely earned him the bitter jealousy of the Scottish nobles, and his power was finally broken by his defeat by Edward at Falkirk in July 1298. In 1305, the year of Wallace's execution, Edward prepared a new constitution for Scotland, divided it into sheriffdoms, and arranged for the representation of the Scots in the English parliament. But Scotland was not subdued; Robert Bruce, who had hitherto played a dubious game, murdered his rival Comyn in 1306, was crowned at Scone, and kept up an incessant struggle. Edward, though old and infirm, began preparations for a fourth expedition, but died 7th July 1307 at Burgh-on-Sands near Carlisle. He charged his son Edward to carry his bones with the army until he had utterly subdued the Scots; but the young prince buried him in Westminster, where a slab is inscribed: 'Eduardus primus, Scotorum malleus, hic est.' See Seeley's Life and Reign of Edward I. (1871), vol. ii. of Stubbs's Constitutional History, his Early Plantagenets (1876), and his prefaces to the Chronicles of Edward I. and Edward II. in the 'Rolls' series (2 vols. 1882—83); and Tout's Edward I. (1893).

Edward II., son of the preceding, was born at Carnarvon, 25th April 1284, and in 1301 was created Prince of Wales, the first English heir-apparent who bore that title. In 1297, as regent in his father's absence, he signed the famous Confirmatio Cartarum. He accompanied his father on his Scottish expeditions, but was absent at his death, and, instead of carrying out his dying behest, returned to London to unworthy pleasures and the companionship of his favourite, the Gascon, Piers de Gaveston. He created him Earl of Cornwall, and on his departure for France in 1308 to marry Isabella, daughter of Philip IV., left him guardian of the kingdom. The indignant nobles demanded his banishment, and twice he was forced to leave England; at length they rose, captured Gaveston, and executed him in 1312. In 1314 Edward invaded Scotland with an army of 100,000 men. At Bannockburn, on 24th June, he was defeated with immense slaughter by Bruce, who thus secured the final independence of his kingdom, and who by the capture of Berwick in 1318 undid every trace of the conquest of Edward I. This disaster was followed by risings in Wales and Ireland, and two seasons of unexampled famine and pestilence. From this time the influence of Lancaster was supreme, but in 1321, with the aid of his new favourites, Hugh le Despenser and his son, Edward overthrew Lancaster, and put him to death. He then invaded Scotland for the last time with no particular success, and in 1323 concluded a truce for thirteen years. A dispute now arose with Charles IV. of France, brother of his wife, Isabella, in regard to Edward's territories in that country. Charles seized these, whereupon Edward sent Isabella to effect an amicable arrangement. She despised her husband, hated the Despensers, and had contracted a guilty passion for Mortimer, one of the disaffected nobles; so, having obtained possession of the young Prince Edward, she landed with a large body of malcontents on the coast of Suffolk, 24th September 1326. Edward fled, but was taken prisoner in Glamorganshire. The Despensers were executed, and the monarch compelled to resign the crown. He was murdered in Berkeley Castle, 21st September 1327.

Edward III., son of the preceding, was born at Windsor, 13th November 1312, and was crowned 29th January 1327. During his minority the country was really governed by Mortimer and Isabella. Early in 1328 Edward married Philippa of Hainault, and two years later put Mortimer to death, and banished his unworthy mother to Castle Rising. He next invaded Scotland to assist Edward Baliol, who, on the death of Bruce, had got himself crowned at Scone. In the battle of Halidon Hill, near Berwick, 19th July 1333, the Scots were defeated, whereupon Baliol did homage to Edward for his possessions, but a few months later had to flee the kingdom. In three years Edward thrice invaded Scotland with overwhelming armies, but the people rallied after each invasion. Charles IV. of France having died without a son, Philip of Valois, the nearest heir by the male line, ascended the throne as Philip VI. Edward claimed the crown in right of his mother, Isabella, sister of Charles; but as the law of France excluded females from the throne, his claim was utterly groundless. Edward admitted that his mother could not inherit the crown, but affirmed that he, as her son, might. He declared war against Philip in 1337, raising money by tallages, forced loans, and by seizing wool. Spite of the brilliant sea-victory at Sluys in 1340, he was at first unsuccessful, and soon found himself compelled to purchase the grants of money necessary for the war with concessions of privileges, which he occasionally evaded. At length in 1346, accompanied by his eldest son, the Black Prince, he again invaded France, conquered a great part of Normandy, marched to the gates of Paris, and on 26th August 1346 inflicted a terrible defeat on the French at Crécy. After some further successes, and the fall of Calais after a year's siege, a truce for a few months was concluded, afterwards from time to time extended. Meanwhile the Scots, in 1346, had been defeated at Neville's Cross near Durham, and their king, David II., taken prisoner, while in 1349 the Black Death had carried off a third of the population of England, and permanently changed the whole relations between labourer and master. The war began anew in 1355, and next year, on 19th September, the Black Prince obtained a brilliant victory at Poitiers, where King John of France was taken prisoner. The Scotch monarch was released under promise of a ransom of 100,000 merks in 1357, and King John in 1360, when a peace was concluded. John, finding it impossible to raise his proposed ransom, returned to captivity, and died in London in 1364. Shortly before this date, David of Scotland made a secret agreement with Edward, by which his kingdom, if he died without male issue, was to be handed over to the English sovereign. The Black Prince was obliged in 1374 to conclude a truce for three years; and, for all his brilliant victories, Edward was at the last unsuccessful. Neither in Scotland nor in France did he realise his desires. Affairs at home were no less unsatisfactory in his last years, and public finance drifted hopelessly into ruin. He quarrelled with his parliaments, and saw public discontent sap loyalty, while he gave himself up to the influence of the rapacious Alice Perrers, his mistress from 1366, and let the government slip into the hands of his third son, John of Gaunt. The Black Prince, who had headed a party opposed to his father's policy, died 8th June 1376, and the king himself expired almost alone on 21st June 1377. See Lives by Longman (1869), Warburton (1875), and Mackinnon (1900).

Edward IV., son of Richard, Duke of York, and Cicely Nevill, daughter of the first Earl of Westmorland, was born at Rouen, 28th April 1442, and bore the title of Earl of March. On his father's defeat and death at Wakefield (December 30, 1460), he found himself head of a strong party. He at once set out from Gloucester, defeated the Lancastrians at Mortimer's Cross (Feb. 2, 1461), lost in the person of Warwick the second battle of St Albans (Feb. 17); but on the 26th, taking advantage of the reaction of the south, entered London in triumph as king. On 29th March he secured the crown by the battle of Towton, near York. Queen Margaret kept up the struggle in the north, but her defeats at Hedgeley Moor and Hexham (1464) and the capture of Henry VI. (1465) in the meantime crushed her hopes. The young Edward was handsome and frank in manners, and quickly became popular. The commons granted him the wool-tax and tonnage and poundage for life. But he imperilled his popularity by his licentiousness; and his ill-advised marriage (1464) with Elizabeth Woodville displeased Warwick and many of his nobility, whose disaffection was increased by the honours heaped upon the queen's relations. Warwick gained over the king's brother, the Duke of Clarence, and married him to his daughter Isabel. Meantime popular discontent culminated in insurrections in the north. Warwick crossed to France, and made friends with his ancient enemy, Queen Margaret, and cemented the alliance by marrying his daughter Ann to her son, Prince Edward. In September 1470 Warwick landed in England, and Edward, deserted on every side, fled to Flanders; six months later he landed at Ravenspur to meet Warwick. Clarence now came over to his side, and in the battle at Barnet, April 14, 1471, the 'King-maker' fell on the field of his defeat. Edward put an end to the war by the victory over Queen Margaret at Tewkesbury (May 4). He showed his savagery by the murder of Prince Edward and his vengeance upon the other captives. The night of his arrival in London Henry VI. died in the Tower—of a broken heart, as was given out; and Edward securely used his power to extort money by forced loans. In 1478 he stained his name by the private execution of Clarence in the Tower. Edward's partisanship of Burgundy against France brought no glory; he died suddenly, April 9, 1483, worn out before his time by his debaucheries. See Life by Stratford (1910), Gardner's Houses of Lancaster and York (1874), and the Paston Letters (1872-75: Introductions).

Edward V., son of the preceding, was born in the Westminster Sanctuary, 3d November 1470. At the death of his father, his maternal uncle, Earl Rivers, set out with him from Ludlow for London. But Richard, Duke of Gloucester, got possession of him at Northampton, brought him to the capital on 4th May 1483, and the same month was appointed Protector. In June his brother, the young Duke of York, also fell into Richard's hands. The two boys were removed to the Tower, and never more heard of. In 1674 some bones were discovered and re-interred as theirs in Westminster Abbey. There is at least no doubt that they were murdered. See Gardner's Richard III. (1878).

Edward VI., born at Hampton Court, 12th October 1537, was Henry VIII.'s son by his third queen, Jane Seymour. On 21st January 1547 he succeeded Henry, when Edward Seymour, Earl of Hertford, his uncle, got himself made Protector, allied himself with the reformed party, and invaded Scotland to enforce the marriage-contract between Edward and Mary Queen of Scots. At Pinkie the Scots were defeated, and Scotland lay at the mercy of Seymour, now self-created Duke of Somerset. Two rebellions—of Catholics in Devon, and of agrarian malcontents, under Ket the tanner, at Norwich—were suppressed in 1549; but soon afterwards the Protector was accused of over-ambition, and executed (22d January 1552), John Dudley, Earl of Warwick, being created Duke of Northumberland. The people regretted Somerset, for Dudley was a worse and a weaker man. Indifferent in matters of religion (though he died a professed Catholic), he too let the Reformation take its course under Cranmer. Aiming to secure the succession for his family, he married his fourth son, Lord Guildford Dudley, to Lady Jane Grey (q.v.); and he worked upon the dying boy-king to exclude his sisters and nominate Lady Jane as his successor. Edward consented, but lived only a few weeks after, dying on 6th July 1553, probably from the effect of quack nostrums on a consumptive frame. See his Literary Remains (with memoir by Nichols, Roxburghe Club, 1857).

Edward VII., King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of all the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, was the eldest son of Queen Victoria, and was born at Buckingham Palace, 9th November 1841, and as Prince of Wales bore his full name of Albert-Edward. In 1860 he visited the United States and Canada; in 1862 travelled with Dean Stanley in the East; and on 10th March 1863 married the Princess Alexandra (born 1st December 1844), eldest daughter of Christian IX. of Denmark. Besides three daughters, two sons were born of this marriage—the eldest, Prince Albert-Victor, Duke of Clarence (1864-92), and Prince George, who succeeded as George V. (born 3d June 1865; created Duke of York in 1892, became in 1901 Duke of Cornwall and, by patent, Prince of Wales; married in 1893 the Princess May of Teck, with issue of five sons and one daughter). Recovery from a six weeks' attack of typhoid was celebrated in St Paul's in 1872 with great enthusiasm. He made a visit to India in 1875-76. He constantly manifested a lively interest in exhibitions, charitable institutions, the housing of the poor, and agriculture; and, for the Queen his mother, he as Prince of Wales bore much of the burden of court ceremonials and public functions. He assisted in promoting the Royal College of Music; and the Imperial Institute was due to his suggestion. In 1900 he was shot at by a young anarchist, Spido, in a train at Brussels; on 22d January 1901 he succeeded his mother as Edward VII. His coronation, fixed for the 26th June 1902, had to be postponed on account of a severe surgical operation, but was carried out on 9th August. By visits to continental capitals the King did much to allay international animosities and promote peace and goodwill, especially as between Britain and France. He died 6th May 1910.

Edward the Black Prince (1330-76), eldest son of Edward III., was created Earl of Chester (1333), Duke of Cornwall (1337), and Prince of Wales (1343). In 1345, boy though he was, he fought at Crécy, and is said to have won from his black armour his popular title—a title first cited in the 16th century. In 1355-56 he undertook two marauding expeditions in France, the second signalled by the great victory of Poitiers. In 1361 he married his cousin, Joan, the 'Fair Maid of Kent' (1328-85), who bore him two sons, Edward (1365-70) and the future Richard II.; in 1362 his father created him Prince of Aquitaine, and next year he departed to take possession of his principality. In 1367 he espoused the cause of Pedro the Cruel (q.v.), and at Navarrete won his third great victory, taking Du Guesclin prisoner; in 1370, worn out by sickness, he mercilessly sacked Limoges. A great soldier, he was a failure as an administrator. See Lives by G. P. R. James (1822), Mrs Creighton (1876), and Dunn-Pattison (1910).

Edward, THOMAS (1814-86), shoemaker in Banff and naturalist. See his Life by Smiles (1876).

Edwardes, MRS ANNIE, author from 1858 of a score of novels, The Morals of Mayfair the first.

Edwardes, SIR HERBERT BENJAMIN (1819-68), entered the East India Company's army in 1840, fought at Mudki and Sobraon (1845), and was assistant to Sir Henry Lawrence. At the Mutiny he was commissioner of the Peshawur frontier.

Edwards, ANELIA BLANDFORD, was born in London, 7th June 1831. Her first novel, My Brother's Wife (1855), was followed by a dozen others, among them Barbara's History (1864), Debenham's Vow (1869), and Lord Brackenbury (1880). She also published a volume of Ballads (1865), and, besides books of holiday travel in Belgium and the Dolomites, A Thousand Miles up the Nile (1877). Miss Edwards was the founder of the Egyptian Exploration Fund, and contributed papers on Egyptology to the principal European and American journals. She died at Weston-super-Mare, 15th April 1892.

Her cousin, MATILDA BARBARA BETHAM-EDWARDS, was born at Westerfield, Ipswich, in 1836. Her first novel, The White House by the Sea, appeared in 1857, Dr Jacob in 1864, Kitty in 1869, and The Dream-Charlotte in 1896. Besides other stories, many of them translated into French, German, &c., and Poems (1884), she has published A Winter with the Swallows (1867), A Year in Western France (1875), and France of To-day (1894), Home Life in France (1905), Literary Rambles in France (1907), and edited guides and Young's Travels (1889). See her Reminiscences (1898).

EDWARDS, BRYAN (1743-1800), born at Westbury, Wilts, spent some thirty years in Jamaica, in 1796 became M.P. for Granpound, and wrote History of the British West Indies (1793), &c.

EDWARDS, EDWARD (1738-1806), a painter who worked for Boydell, was born and died in London.

EDWARDS, EDWARD (1812-86), librarian and the historian of libraries, was born in London, and died at Niton in the Isle of Wight.

EDWARDS, HENRY SUTHERLAND (1828-1906), a writer on Russia, music, &c., was born in London.

EDWARDS, JONATHAN, theologian and metaphysician, was born at East Windsor, Conn., 5th October 1703, graduated at Yale in 1720, and was ordained in 1727 colleague to his grandfather, Solomon Stoddard (1643-1729), at Northampton, Mass. The happiness and success of his first seventeen years was broken by a bitter dispute with his people about the circulation of certain books which he considered immoral; he advocated a return to the earlier Congregational rule of refusing to admit persons to communion who were not consciously converted, and resigned his ministry in 1750. He next laboured as missionary to the Housatonnuck Indians until he was called to the presidency of Princeton College, but he died thirty-four days after his installation, 22d March 1758. Edwards is still America's most original thinker in metaphysics, in virtue of his rigidly Calvinist treatise on the Freedom of the Will (1754). Other works were Original Sin (1758), Christian Virtue (1788), and The End for which God created the World (1789). See Leslie Stephen's Hours in a Library (2d series, 1876), and Life by Prof. Allen (1889).—JONATHAN EDWARDS, his second son, born in Northampton, Mass., 26th May 1745, graduated at New Jersey in 1765. He became in 1769 pastor at White Haven, Conn., in 1796 at Colebrook, Conn., and in 1799 president of the new college at Schenectady, New York. He died 1st August 1801. His works include A Dissertation concerning Liberty and Necessity (1797) and On the Necessity of the Atonement (1785). See A. V. G. Allen's monograph (1889).

EDWARDS, MILNE. See MILNE-EDWARDS.

EDWARDS, OLIVER, born at Springfield, Mass., in 1835, rose in the civil war to a Federal brigadier-general in 1865. His services were conspicuous in the battle of the Wilderness (1864), and at Sailor's Creek, where he captured Generals Custis, Lee, and Ewell. After the war he returned to mercantile pursuits.

EDWARDS, RICHARD (c. 1523-66), an early English playwright, was born in Somerset, studied at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and became choir-master of the Chapel Royal.

EDWIN (585-633), king of Northumbria, was the son of Ella, king of Deira, who died in 588, whereupon Ethelric, king of Bernicia, seized his territories. He was brought up in North Wales, and at length found refuge with Redwald, king of East Angia, who took up arms on his behalf against Ethelfrith, the son of his oppressor, who was defeated and killed in a great battle (617). Edwin now obtained Deira, and overrunning Bernicia, formed a united Northumbria, extending northward to Edinburgh, which he fortified, and which still retains his name. He next conquered the West Riding, and pushed his power westward as far as Anglesea and Man. After Redwald's death he also obtained the overlordship of East Angia, and by a victory over the West Saxons that of all England, save Kent. Edwin had already married Ethelburga, daughter of Ethelbert, the convert of Augustine. Under Paulinus' influence he was converted to Christianity, and baptised with his nobles in 627. He fell in battle with the heathen Mercian, Penda, probably at Hatfield Chase, Yorkshire, and was afterwards canonised. See Alexander Smith's poem, Edwin of Deira (1861).

ECKHOUT, GERBRAND VAN DEN (1621-74), religious painter, a pupil of Rembrandt, was born and died at Amsterdam. [Ailk-howtt.]

EGAN, PIERCE (1772-1849), was the author of many works, including Boxiana and Life in London. The last, immortalised in Thackeray's Roundabout Papers, had coloured illustrations by the brothers Cruikshank.—His son, PIERCE EGAN (1814-80), wrote innumerable novels, for Reynolds' Miscellany chiefly and the London Journal.

EGBERT, king of the West Saxons, was the son of Ealhmund, king of Kent. For laying claim to the West Saxon kingship after the death of Cynegils (786), he was driven to Charlemagne's court, whence he returned in 802 to fill the throne of Wessex. For his first twelve years he reigned in peace; then followed a war with the Cornish, and one with the Mercians, in which the great victory of Ellandune (probably near Winchester) secured him the overlordship of Mercia. In 829 the Northumbrians also accepted him as their suzerain, and thus Egbert became the first real king of England, though he did not assume that style. In 835 Egbert was defeated by Scandinavian pirates in a battle in Dorsetshire, but in 837 he defeated, at Hengestdune near the Tamar, a huge northern host allied with Cornish insurgents. He died in 839.

EGBERT, ST (639-729), a Northumbrian who lived much in Ireland, and died in Iona.

EGEDE, HANS (1686-1758), the apostle of Greenland, was born in Norway, and was pastor of Vagen 1707-17. In 1721, after studying the language, he embarked for Greenland, with his wife, two sons, and some companions. He remained there fifteen years, labouring zealously among the people, and secured a permanent footing for the Christian mission. Latterly some Moravian missionaries invaded his province, with whom Egede failed to agree. The death of his wife in 1736 drove him from Greenland, but at Copenhagen he was busy promoting the Greenland mission, of which in 1740 he became bishop. See his Det gamle Grønlands nye Perlestrætion (1729 and 1741).—His son, PAUL (1708-89), born in Norway, succeeded his father in Greenland, and, as bishop, completed in 1766 the translation of the New Testament, besides a catechism (1756) and prayer-book (1783). [Ay/ge-day; y hard.]

Eginhard, or EINHARD (c. 770-820), born at Maingau in East Franconia, was sent to the court of Charlemagne, where he became a pupil of Alcuin and a favourite of the emperor. Louis, successor of Charlemagne, continued his father's favour. For years Eginhard was lay abbot of various monasteries, but ultimately retired to Mülheim. Here he died, and was buried beside his wife, Emma, whom a baseless tradition makes a daughter of Charlemagne. His Vita Caroli Magni (c. 820) is the great biographical work of the middle ages. The best editions are by Jaffé (1876) and Holder (1882). There is an English translation by Glaister (1877). Eginhard's Annales Francorum embraces the period 741-829; his Epistole number sixty-two. See French edition of his works by Teulet, with translation and Life (1848).

Eginton, FRANCIS (1737-1805), a reviver in 1781 of glass-painting at Birmingham.

Eginton and Winton, ARCHIBALD WILLIAM MONTGOMERIE, EARL OF, K.T. (1812-61), twice Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, was a well-known patron of the turf and field-sports, and is chiefly remembered for his splendid reproduction of a tournament at Eglington Castle in 1839. Amongst the knights was Louis Napoleon. See Sir W. Fraser's Memorials of the Montgomeries (1859).

Egmont, JUSTUS VON (1602-74), portrait-painter, born at Leyden, died at Antwerp.

Egmont, LAMORAL, COUNT OF, PRINCE OF GAVRE, was born at the castle of La Hanaide, in Hainault, 18th November 1522. He accompanied Charles V. to Algiers in 1541 and in all his later campaigns, married the sister of the Elector Palatine in 1545, was invested with the Golden Fleece, and in 1554 went to England to negotiate the marriage between Philip and Mary. He distinguished himself at St Quentin (1557) and Gravelines (1558), for which he was made governor of Flanders and Artois. He now sided with the party in the Netherlands that were dissatisfied with Philip's Catholic policy, and from a courtier became a hero of the people. His imperious character, however, and his subsequent conduct, make it doubtful whether he was actuated by high motives or by self-interest and disappointed ambition. When Margaret, Duchess of Parma, was made regent, Egmont sided with the Prince of Orange; but when insurrections took place, he broke with the Prince of Orange and the 'Beggars' League. He seemed to have restored order, when, in April 1567, the Duke of Alva was sent as lieutenant-general to the Netherlands. The Prince of Orange and other chiefs of the insurrection left the country; Egmont remained, and seemed to have gained his confidence, but suddenly he and Count Horn were seized and carried to Ghent. They were condemned to death, and on June 5, 1568, beheaded at Brussels. See Juste's Le Comte d'Egmont (1862); and Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic.

Ehrenberg, CHRISTIAN GOTTFRIED (1795-1876), naturalist, born at Delitzsch in Prussian Saxony, travelled in Egypt, Syria, Arabia, and Central Asia, and in twenty-four works gave the fruits of his study of microscopic organisms, of which branch of science he was the founder. See Life by Hanstein (Bonn, 1877). [Ay/ren-berg.]

Eichendorff, JOSEPH, FREIHERR VON (1788-1857), a German Romanticist poet, novelist, and critic, by birth a Silesian, by religion a Catholic. See Life by Keiter (Cologne, 1887).

Eichhorn, JOHANN ALBRECHT FRIEDRICH (1779-1856), Prussian statesman and jurist.

Eichhorn, JOHANN GOTTFRIED (1752-1827), born at Dörrenzimmern in Franconia, became in 1775 professor of Oriental Languages at Jena, in 1788 at Göttingen. His Introductions to the Old and New Testaments (1780-1814) were the first attempt to apply the ordinary methods of literary criticism to Scripture. He derived each of the four gospels from one original Greek gospel. [Eikh'horn; kh guttural.]

Eichwald, KARL EDUARD (1795-1876), Russian naturalist, was born at Mitau, and filled chairs at Kasan, Vilno, and St Petersburg. He wrote records of his scientific journeys to the Caspian, the Caucasus, Persia, Algeria, Italy, Scandinavia, &c., with works on the mineral wealth, zoology, and palaeontology of Russia. Eiffel, GUSTAVE, engineer, born at Dijon, 15th December 1832, in 1858 constructed the iron bridge over the Garonne at Bordeaux, and was one of the first to utilise air-caissons. The bridge over the Douro at Oporto, the great viaduct of Garabit in Cantal, and that over the Tardes near Montluçon, were designed by him; while in the huge framework erected for Bartholdi's statue of Liberty may be seen the germ of the iron Eiffel Tower, 985 feet high, erected in 1887-89, on the Champ-de-Mars in Paris, at a cost of £260,000. In 1893 he was condemned to two years' imprisonment and a fine of 20,000 francs for breach of trust in connection with the Panama Canal works. Eldon, JOHN SCOTT, EARL OF, Lord Chancellor, born at Newcastle, 4th June 1751, entered University College, Oxford, in 1766, with a view to the church, and obtained a fellowship. A runaway marriage with a Miss Surtees in 1772 threatened to ruin him, but he turned to the study of law, and in 1776 was called to the bar. By his father's death in the same year he became possessed of £3000. Success dawned on him, his ambition expanded, and he took to politics. A silk gown and a seat in parliament were but steps towards knighthood and the Solicitor-generalship (1788). In 1793 he became Attorney-general, in 1799 Chief-justice of the Court of Common Pleas as Baron Eldon; and in 1801 he ascended the woolsack. He remained Chancellor almost continuously until 1827, in 1821 having been made an earl. He died in London, 13th January 1838, leaving a fortune of over half a million. Eldon was a great lawyer, but was charged with undue delay. He was no statesman; for forty years he opposed reform and religious liberty. He was parsimonious, but capable of generous actions, and his devotion to 'Bessy' his wife was beautiful. Lord Stowell was his elder brother. See Life by Twiss (1846), and Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors.

Eldred, JOHN (1552-1632), a merchant, born in Norfolk, who made a great fortune by three trading voyages to Bagdad (1583-88).

Eleanor of Aquitaine (c. 1122-1204) in 1137 married the future Louis VII. of France, by him was divorced in 1152, and straightway married the future Henry II. (q.v.) of England.

Eleanor of Castile in 1254 married Edward I. of England, and died in 1290. That she sucked the poison from Edward's wound is mythical.

Eleanor of Provence, queen of Henry III., died a nun in 1291.

Elgar, Sir Edward (knighted 1904), O.M., was born 2d June 1857, at Broadheath near Worcester, the son of an organist, and made a name for himself as a composer by his Black Knight (1892), Luz Christi, a Te Deum, The Dream of Gerontius (1900), Cockaigne, the Coronation Ode (1902), The Apostles (1903), symphonies, a violin concerto (1910), &c.

Elgin and Kincardine, James Bruce, Earl of, was born in London, 20th July 1811, succeeded his father, the seventh Earl (1766-1841), who in 1812 brought from Athens the Elgin Marbles, and himself was first Baron Elgin in the United Kingdom peerage (1849). As governor of Jamaica (1842-46), and as governor-general of Canada (1847-54), he displayed great administrative abilities. While on his way to China in 1857, as plenipotentiary, he heard at Singapore of the Indian mutiny, and diverted the Chinese expedition thither—thus delaying his own operations, which, after some military operations and diplomacy, issued in the treaty of Tientsin (1858). He also negotiated a treaty with Japan, and on his return home became Postmaster-general. In 1860 he was again in China to enforce the treaty, and in 1861 became governor-general of India. He died at Dharmasala in the Punjab, 20th November 1863. See his Letters and Journals (1872); and Lives by Bourinot and J. M. Wrong (1905).—VICTOR ALEXANDER BRUCE, ninth Earl of Elgin, born at Montreal, 16th May 1849, was educated at Eton and Balliol College, Oxford, in 1898-98 was governor-general of India, and in 1905-8 Colonial Secretary. Eliot, Charles William, LL.D., born in Boston, 20th March 1834, was president of Harvard University in 1869-1909. Under him it doubled in strength, and the old curriculum been abandoned for an optional system of studies. He published, with Storer, two manuals of chemistry.

Eliot, George, the nom de guerre of the great English novelist, Mary Ann or Marian Evans. The youngest daughter of the second family of Robert Evans, a Warwickshire land-agent, she was born at Arbury Farn, near Nuneaton, 22d

November 1819. Four months after her father removed to the farm of Griff, and here she spent the first twenty-one years of her life. Evans was a man of strongly-marked and strenuous character, many of the leading traits of which were transferred by his daughter to Adam Bede and Caleb Garth. Of the life at Griff, many of the features are given in the sketch of Maggie Tulliver's and Tom's childhood in the Mill on the Floss, especially her relation to her brother Isaac. Between five and nine she was at school at Attleboro, then at Nuneaton, and between thirteen and sixteen at Coventry, where she became for a time a fervent evangelical. She lost her mother, whom she loved devotedly, in 1836, and in 1837 her elder sister married; from this time she took entire charge of her father's house. Masters came over from Coventry to teach her German, Italian, and music—of the latter she was passionately fond throughout life. She was also an immense reader. In 1841 her brother Isaac married and took Griff, and her father removed to Coventry. Here she became acquainted with Charles Bray, a writer on the philosophy of necessity from the phrenological standpoint, and with his brother-in-law, Charles Hennell, who had published in 1838 a rationalistic Inquiry concerning the Origin of Christianity. She seems at first to have hoped to convert her new friends; but before the end of the year she had so greatly offended her father by refusing to go to church that he threatened to break up his household and go to live with his married daughter. Subsequently she withdrew her objection to church-going, and the breach was avoided. At the opening of 1844, the work of translating Strauss's Leben Jesu was transferred from Mrs Hennell to Marian Evans, and at this she worked laboriously and in very scholarlike fashion until its publication in 1846. Her father died on 31st May 1849, and in June she went abroad with Mr and Mrs Bray, who left her at Geneva. In March 1850 she returned to London, and began to write for the Westminster Review, and in September 1851 she became its assistant editor, and the centre of a literary circle, two of whose members were Herbert Spencer and G. H. Lewes (q.v.). It was then that she translated Feuerbach's Essence of Christianity, the only book that bore her real name.

Gradually her intimacy with Mr Lewes grew, and in 1854 she formed a connection with him—the great false step of her life—which lasted until his death in 1878. In July 1854 she went abroad with him, staying three months at Weimar, where he was preparing for his Life of Goethe. After a longer stay at Berlin, they returned and took up their abode first at Dover, then at East Sheen, and then at Richmond. In 1856 she attempted her first story, The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton, the commencement of the Scenes of Clerical Life. It came out in Blackwood's Magazine in 1857, and at once showed that a new author of great power had risen. Mr Gilfil's Love Story and Jane's Repentance followed quickly. Adam Bede (1859) had the most marvellous success; a Mr Liggins claimed the authorship. The Mill on the Floss (1860), Silas Marner (1861), Romola (1863), and Felix Holt (1866) appeared next in succession. Her first poem, The Spanish Gypsy (1868), was followed next year by Agatha, The Legend of Jubal, and Armstrong; and in 1871-72 appeared Middlemarch, by some considered her greatest work. After that Daniel Deronda (1876) showed a marked falling-off; so, too, did Impressions of Theophrastus Such (1879), a volume of somewhat miscellaneous essays. After the death of Lewes on 28th November 1878, George Eliot, who was always exceedingly dependent on some one person for affection and support, fell into a very melancholy state, from which she was roused by the solicitous kindness of Mr John Cross, an old friend of her own and of Mr Leves's, and to him she was married on 6th May 1880. Their married life lasted but a few months; she died in Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, on 22d December, and was buried in Highgate Cemetery, in the grave next to that of Lewes. As a novelist, George Eliot will probably always stand among the greatest of the English school; her pictures of the English farmers and tradesmen, and the lower middle class generally of the Midland counties, are hardly surpassed in English literature. See her Life, as unfolded in her Letters and Journals, by J. W. Cross (3 vols. 1885-86), sketches by Mathilde Blind (1883) and Oscar Browning (1890); and Sir Leslie Stephen's monograph for the 'Men of Letters' series (1902).

Eliot, SIR JOHN, statesman, was born at Port Eliot near St Germans, Cornwall, 20th April 1592. He studied three years at Exeter College, Oxford, on the Continent met Villiers, afterwards Duke of Buckingham, married, entered parliament in 1614, was knighted in 1618, in 1619 was appointed vice-admiral of Devon, and in 1624 figured as an adherent of Buckingham. But in 1625 he broke with Buckingham, and in the parliament of 1626, in which Eliot was the leading spirit, his policy, one of antagonism to the king, culminated in Buckingham's impeachment. For this he was confined for eight days in the Tower. In the parliament of 1628 Eliot denounced arbitrary taxation, and helped to force the Petition of Right from Charles. For again protesting against the king's proceedings he was, on 4th March 1629, sent with eight other members to the Tower, and, refusing to acknowledge himself in error, was kept in confinement until his death of consumption, 27th November 1632. In prison he wrote an account of Charles's first parliament, Negotium Posterorum (first printed in 1881); a philosophico-political treatise, The Monarchy of Man (1879); and An Apology for Socrates (1881), a vindication of his own public conduct; also De Jure Majestatis and his Letter-book, both published in 1882. See Life by John Forster (1864; 2d ed. 1871).

Eliot, JOHN, the 'Indian Apostle,' was born probably at Widford, Herts, in 1604. He graduated from Jesus College, Cambridge, in 1622, and, after taking orders, quitted England for conscience' sake, and landed at Boston in 1631. Next year he settled at Roxbury, and in 1646 began to preach in the native dialect to the Indians at Nonantum, five miles off. He shortly after established his converts in regular settlements; and in England a corporation was founded in 1649 for propagating the Gospel among the Indians of New England. In 1674 the number of 'praying Indians' was estimated at 3600, but the decay of the 'praying towns' was rapid after the war with a native king, Philip (1675), in which the converts suffered equal cruelties at the hands of their countrymen and of the English. Eliot died at Roxbury, 21st May 1690. He assisted in preparing an English metrical version of the Psalms, 'The Bay Psalm-Book' (Camb. 1640), the first book printed in New England. Among his works are The Christian Commonwealth (1659) and The Communion of Churches (1665). He also translated several religious works into the Indian tongue. But his greatest work was the translation of the Bible into the tongue of the Massachusetts Indians (1663). See Lives by Francis (Boston, 1836) and Caverby (2 vols. Lowell, 1882).

Eliot, SAMUEL, LL.D. (1821-98), born in Boston, was president of Hartford (1860-64) and superintendent of public schools at Boston (1876-80), and wrote a History of Liberty and a Manual of United States History.

Elisha, the successor of Elijah, who prophesied under Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoshaphat, and Jehoash.

Elizabeth (c. 1437-92), eldest of the thirteen children of Sir Richard Woodville (afterwards Lord and Earl Rivers) and the Dowager-Duchess of Bedford, married first Sir John Grey, who fell at St Albans (1461), and next, in 1464, Edward IV. She died in the abbey of Bermondsey.—Her eldest daughter, ELIZABETH (1465-1503), in 1486 married Henry VII.

Elizabeth, Queen of England and Ireland, was the daughter of Henry VIII. by his second wife, Anne Boleyn, and was born in Greenwich Palace, 7th September 1533. When her father married Jane Seymour in 1536, she and her half-sister Mary were declared illegitimate, and her early years were passed under a cloud, though profitably so far as intellectual discipline was concerned. Her governesses and teachers were almost all devotees of the New Learning, while some were adherents of Reformation principles. During Edward VI.'s reign Elizabeth was subjected to the dubious attentions of Lord Seymour, High Admiral of England; on Edward's death (1553) she sided with Mary against Lady Jane Grey and the Duke of Northumberland, but her identification with Protestantism aroused the suspicion of Mary and her counsellors, and led to her being implicated in Wyatt's rebellion (1554), and imprisoned in the Tower and at Woodstock.

When Mary died, 17th November 1558, Elizabeth, then twenty-five years of age, ascended the throne amid the acclamation alike of Protestants, who saw in her advent a cessation to the persecutions, and of Catholics, who had more than a suspicion of her indifference in ecclesiastical matters. But her political sagacity enabled her at once to perceive that her part in Europe must be that of a Protestant sovereign, while her courage led her to act promptly. Presumably by the advice of Sir William Cecil (afterwards Lord Burghley), whom she appointed Chief Secretary, she issued a proclamation to the effect that the church service be read in English, and the elevation of the host be discontinued. That she notified Pope Paul IV. of her acceptance of the throne is denied. Paul held that, being illegitimate, she must resign all pretensions to the crown, which he claimed a right to dispose of, England being a fief of the holy see; the sole result was to make Protestantism and patriotism synonymous in England. The Anglican Church, with its Thirty-nine Articles, its Book of Common Prayer, and its acknowledgment of the headship of the sovereign, was then and there virtually established in its present form. Of the prelates who were in office only Kitchin, Bishop of Llandaff, agreed to the innovations, but of 9000 clergy, fewer than 200 resigned their livings. The policy of Elizabeth's ministry was one of peace and economy. They found the nation at war with France and Scotland, and one of their first acts was to secure peace upon favourable terms. To strengthen her own throne, Elizabeth secretly succoured the Protestants in Scotland, France, and the Low Countries. To prevent foreign interference in English matters was the mainspring of her foreign policy; and she lost no opportunity of weakening any power that unduly threatened her authority.

The great blot upon Elizabeth's name was the execution of Mary Queen of Scots (q.v.). Had she pursued a straightforward course when her rival was thrown into her hands in 1568, much evil might have been spared. Some of her ministers were prepared to remove a life which might be turned into a dangerous tool in the hands of the Catholics. Elizabeth shrank from that course, but had not the courage or generosity to liberate Mary. Instead, she retained her a prisoner, and thus for years gave cause for conspiracy after conspiracy among the English Catholics; one of them cost the Duke of Norfolk his head. The discovery of every new plot led to demands on the part of parliament for the execution of Mary. The plots then took a graver aspect; the assassination of Elizabeth and the placing of Mary on the throne became their object. On the discovery of Babington's conspiracy (1586) the popular cry was irresistible, and was joined in by Cecil, Walsingham, and others, who had aimed too deeply against Mary to run the risk of her succession to the throne. With apparent reluctance, Elizabeth consented, and Mary was executed at Fotheringay Castle, 8th February 1587. The participation of the Catholic party in the plots was met by persecution. Many suffered under an Act passed in 1585, making it treason for a priest to be in England, and felony to harbour one. These cruel measures brought upon England the most menacing foreign attack she had yet suffered. Philip of Spain had long meditated vengeance. He could ill brook that England should incite rebellion among his subjects in the Netherlands, and allow her sea captains to devastate the Spanish harbours. His ostensible reasons for war, however, were to restore the Catholic faith, and to avenge the death of a Catholic queen. Years had been spent in preparation. In 1588 the 'Invincible Armada' sailed from the Tagus, with 8000 sailors and 20,000 soldiers, while a land army of 100,000 men was to be transported from the Netherlands under the Duke of Parma. The news aroused all England, and every man who could carry arms—Protestant and Catholic alike—was enrolled in the forces. Elizabeth herself was slow to admit the danger, although it was apparent to all her advisers, and she hesitated lamentably as to the steps to be taken to meet it. Her parsimony in such matters as the naval commissariat led to the risk of disaster, and prevented the victory from being so complete as it else would have been. But to the army assembled at Tilbury she showed the courage of her race; her speech has the true ring of patriotism. A fleet of 200 vessels and 15,000 seamen was with great difficulty gathered on the southern coasts, and waited the attack. It came in July 1588, and was only repelled by the skill and daring of the great captains of the time, Howard, Drake, Hawkins, and Frobisher, providentially assisted by the elements.

Elizabeth died at Richmond, 24th March 1603. From her father she inherited physical strength, resolution, energy, hauteur, a fiery temper, an inclination to cruelty and to coarseness, and a passion for splendour; to her mother may be attributed such physical attractions as she possessed, and probably also her insincerity, jealousy, and love of artifice. It would be hard to say whether the romantic side of Elizabeth's life is more notable for its prominence or for its farcicality, if not unreality. From her sixteenth year to her fifty-sixth, one matrimonial scheme or violent passion, not always remarkable for delicacy, succeeded another. But her heart was most profoundly touched by Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, a handsome and clever, though shallow and dissolute man. Beyond a doubt she would have married him but for Cecil's remonstrances. After Leicester's death, Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, succeeded to his position as favourite. Elizabeth's relations towards him, however, were rather those of a mother towards a spoiled child. When he was beheaded for rebellion in 1601 she does not seem to have exhibited much grief. She had inherited Tudor views as to the absolute supremacy of the crown over parliament. During the last thirteen years of her reign parliament assembled in 1592, 1597, and 1601; and although, partly owing to her tact and partly to its timidity, no actual collision occurred between them, it protested against monopolies, and sought to curtail Elizabeth's expenditure. 'The golden days of good Queen Bess'—of Shakespeare, too, and Sidney, and Spenser, and Marlowe, and many more—are the period of English history of which we as a nation have most cause to be proud. It is emphatically the period in which England took up her position as a 'world power,' and it is impossible to believe that Elizabeth had no personal part in making it what it was. The 'Virgin Queen' was cruel, capricious, insincere, at once unpleasantly masculine and weakly feminine, but she was highly popular with her subjects, and this popularity cannot be quite explained away by circumstances outside of herself. She had unquestionably the invaluable faculty—in her case it almost amounted to genius—of selecting as her political advisers the most capable of the men around her. See Lives by Miss Strickland (new ed. 1864), Prof. Beesly (1892), and Bishop Creighton (sumptuously illustrated, 1896); also Miss Aikin's Memoirs of the Court of Queen Elizabeth (new ed. 1875), Wiesener's La Jeunesse d'Elizabeth d'Angleterre (Paris, 1878; Eng. trans. 1879), and Major Hume's Courtships of Queen Elizabeth (1896), besides the calendars of state papers at Hatfield, &c., and the histories of Froude, Lingard, Motley, &c.

Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia, eldest daughter of James VI. and I., was born at Falkland, 19th August 1596, brought up from 1603 in England, and in 1613 married to Frederick V. (q.v.), Elector Palatine, who in 1619 was chosen to fill the throne of Bohemia. Next year the 'Winter King' was routed by the Catholic League, and the royal family endured sore poverty in Holland. Among their thirteen children were Charles Louis (1617-80), restored to the electorate in 1648, Rupert (q.v.), Maurice, and Sophia (q.v.), George I.'s mother. Elizabeth died in England, Feb. 13, 1662. See Mrs E. Green's Princesses of England (1851).

Elizabeth (1635-50), second daughter of Charles I., died a prisoner in Carisbrooke Castle.

Elizabeth, St (1207-31), born at Presburg, the daughter of Andreas II. of Hungary, at four was affianced to Louis IV. of Thuringia, and educated at his father's court, the Wartburg, near Eisenach. At fourteen she was married, and a boy and two girls were the fruit of their union. Louis who admired her for her long prayers and ceaseless almsgiving, died as a crusader at Otranto in 1227. The saintly landgravine was deprived of her regency by her husband's brother, and exiled on the plea that she wasted state treasures by her charities. After severe privations, she was received into the monastery of Kitzingen by the abbess, her aunt. When the warriors who had followed her husband to the crusade returned, steps were taken to restore to Elizabeth her sovereign rights. She retired to a cottage near the castle of Marburg, and devoted the remainder of her days to incessant devotion, almsgiving, and mortification. She was canonised in 1235. See Montalembert's monograph (1836; 17th ed. 1880) and Kingsley's Saint's Tragedy (1848).

Elizabeth Petrovna (1709-62), Empress of Russia, the pre-nuptial daughter of Peter the Great and Catharine I., was passed over in 1727, 1730, and 1740, but in 1741, on the deposition of Ivan VI., was raised to the throne. During her reign, in which throughout she was guided by favourites, a war with Sweden was brought to a successful conclusion by the peace of Abo. Her animosity towards Frederick the Great led her to take part in the war of the Austrian Succession and in the Seven Years' War.

Elkington, GEORGE RICHARDS (1801-65), a Birmingham manufacturer, from 1832 the introducer of electro-plating in conjunction with his cousin, HENRY ELKINGTON (1810-52).

Ellenborough, EDWARD LAW, EARL OF, was eldest son of Baron Ellenborough (1750-1818), Chief-justice from 1802 of the King's Bench. Born 8th September 1790, and educated at Eton and St John's College, Cambridge, he entered parliament as a Tory in 1813, held office under several administrations, and in 1841 was appointed Governor-general of India. He received the thanks of parliament in 1843 for his Afghan policy, but his treatment of the civil servants, and his policy of conciliating the natives by proclamations which appeared to sanction idolatry, led to his recall in 1844. He was created Viscount Southam and Earl of Ellenborough, and in 1846 was First Lord of the Admiralty under Peel. In 1858 he was Minister for India, but the publication of a despatch in which he rebuked Viscount Canning forced him to resign. In 1863 he expressed strong sympathies with Poland, and in 1864 advocated British intervention in favour of Denmark. He died December 2, 1871. There is a history of his Indian administration by Lord Colchester (1874), who also edited his Political Diary, 1823-30 (1881).

El'ery, WILLIAM (1727-1820), born in Newport, Rhode Island, sat in the congress of 1776, and was a signer of the Declaration of Independence.

Ellesmere, FRANCIS EGERTON, EARL OF (1800-57), second son of the first Duke of Sutherland, was born in London, and educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford. He was Irish Secretary (1828-30) and Secretary for War (1830). In 1833, on succeeding to the Bridgewater estates, he assumed the name of Egerton, and in 1846 was created Earl of Ellesmere. He translated Faust, &c.

Ellicott, CHARLES JOHN (1819-1905), after 1897 Bishop of Gloucester (the divided see), born at Whitwell rectory near Stamford, graduated at Cambridge in 1841, and was elected a fellow of St John's. He became rector of Filton, Rutland, in 1848, professor of Divinity at King's College, London, in 1858, Hulsean lecturer at Cambridge in 1859, Hulsean professor of Divinity in 1860, Dean of Exeter in 1861, and Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol 1863-97. Chairman for eleven years of the New Testament Revision Committee, he published commentaries on Galatians, Ephesians, &c., besides works on the Sabbath, Scripture, and Scepticism.

Elliot, JEAN (1727-1805), the author of 'The Flowers of the Forest,' was the daughter of Sir Gilbert Elliot of Minto House, Teviotdale. She lived in Edinburgh 1756-1804, but died at the family seat, or at Monteviot.—Her eldest brother, SIR GILBERT ELLIOT (1722-77), was himself a song-writer; whilst JOHN (d. 1808), the third brother, was a distinguished admiral. See MINTO.

Elliot, SIR WALTER (1803-87), Indian numismatist, was born and died at Wolfeke, Hawick, from 1820 to 1860 was an Indian civil servant, and in 1866 was created a K.C.S.I.

Elliottson, JOHN (1791-1868), physician, born in London, became in 1831 professor in London University, and helped to establish University College Hospital. His conversion to mesmerism (1837) cost him his professorship in 1838, but hardly injured his large practice. One of the first to use the stethoscope, he experimented on the action of drugs, encouraged clinical study, and founded the Phrenological Society. His name will live from the dedication of Thackeray's Pendennis.

Elliott, EBENEZER, the Corn-law Rhymer, was born at the New Foundry, Masbro', in Rotherham parish, Yorkshire, on 17th March 1781. A shy and morbid boy, who proved a dull pupil at school, he worked in his father's foundry from his sixteenth to his twenty-third year, and threatened to become a 'sad drunken dog,' till the picture of a primrose in Sowerby's Botany 'led him into the fields, and poetry followed.' His Vernal Walk, written at sixteen, was published in 1801; to it succeeded Night (1818), The Village Patriarch (1829), Corn-law Rhymes and the Ranter (3d ed. 1831), and other volumes—collected in 1840 (new ed. 2 vols. 1876). He had married early, and sunk his wife's fortune in his father's business; but in 1821, with a borrowed capital of £100, he started as bar-iron merchant at Sheffield, and thrived exceedingly. Though in 1837 he lost one-third of his savings, in 1841 he was able to retire with £300 a year. He died at Great Houghton, 1st December 1849. Elliott the poet is well-nigh forgotten. But Elliott the Corn-law Rhymer is still remembered as the Tyrants of that mighty conflict whose triumph he lived to witness. He had been bred a 'Berean' and Jacobin, yet he hated Communists, Socialists, and physical-force Chartists; he lies buried in Darfield churchyard; he left two sons Established clergymen. His whole life long he looked on the Corn-laws as the 'cause of all the crime that is committed; agriculturists, he maintained, 'ought not to live by robbing and murdering the manufacturers.' On the other hand, 'Capital has a right to rule the world,' and 'competition is the great social law of God.' There are two poor memoirs of Elliott, by his son-in-law, John Watkins (1850), and by 'January Searle'—i.e. George S. Phillips (1850).

Elliott, GRACE DALRYMPLE (c. 1758-1823), the daughter of an Edinburgh advocate, Hew Dalrymple, in 1771 married Sir John Elliott, M.D. (1736-86), who divorced her in 1774, and was the mistress successively or simultaneously of Lord Valentia, Lord Cholmondeley, the Prince of Wales, Charles Windham, George Selwyn, Philippe Egalité, &c. She died at Ville d'Avray near Sèvres, leaving an interesting but untrustworthy Journal of My Life during the Revolution, published in 1859 by her granddaughter, Miss Bentinck.

Elliott, HENRY VENN (1792-1866), born at Clapham, from 1827 was an Evangelical clergyman at Brighton. See Life by Josiah Bateman (1868).

Ellis, or (till 1825) SHARPE, ALEXANDER JOHN, F.R.S., LL.D., philologist, was born at Hoxton, 14th June 1814, and educated at Shrewsbury, Eton, and Trinity College, Cambridge, graduating as sixth wrangler in 1837. He wrote much on mathematical, musical, and philological questions, and did more than any other scholar to advance the scientific study of phonetics, of early English pronunciation, and of existing English dialects. He died at Kensington, 28th October 1890.

Ellis, GEORGE (1758-1815), contributor to the Rolliad and Anti-Jacobin, and author of Specimens of the Early English Poets (1790), Specimens of Early English Metrical Romances (1805), &c.

Ellis, GEORGE JAMES WELBORE AGAR (1797-1833), Liberal politician, entered parliament in 1818, and in 1831 was created Baron Dover. He wrote or edited nine works.

Ellis, SIR HENRY, antiquary, born in London, 29th November 1777, from Merchant Taylors' passed to St John's College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. Having been for two years assistant-librarian to the Bodleian at Oxford, in 1800 he received an appointment at the British Museum, and was principal librarian from 1827 to 1856. He was knighted in 1833. His works include Introduction to Domesday Book (1833), Original Letters illustrative of English History (1824-46), and an edition of Brand's Antiquities (1813). He died 15th January 1869.

Ellis, ROBINSON, Corpus professor of Latin at Oxford since 1893, was born at Barming near Maidstone, 5th September 1834, from Rugby proceeded to Balliol, and in 1858 was elected a fellow of Trinity. He is best known as the editor and translator of Catullus.

Ellis, WILLIAM, missionary, born in London, 29th August 1794, was despatched by the London Missionary Society in 1816 to the South Sea Islands. The illness of his wife obliged him to return home in 1825, after which he became secretary to the Society. His wife died in 1835, and two years later he married Sarah Stickney, who wrote The Women of England (1838), The Daughters of England (1842), The Wives of England (1843), Hearts and Homes (1848-49), and The Mothers of Great Men (1859). Ellis published in 1838 a history of Madagascar, and after 1853 he made four visits to the island. He wrote Madagascar Revisited (1867), The Martyr Church of Madagascar (1870), &c. He died 9th June 1872; his wife a week later. See Life by his son (1873).

Ellis, WYNNE (1790-1875), a London haberdasher, who was twice Liberal M.P. for Leicester, and a great picture-collector.

Elliston, ROBERT WILLIAM (1774-1831), born in London, in 1791 ran away and made his début on the stage at Bath. In 1796 he appeared at the Haymarket and Covent Garden; in 1804-9 and 1812-15 he was a member of the Drury Lane company; and in 1819 he became lessee and manager of the theatre, from which in 1826 he retired a bankrupt. He afterwards played in the Surrey Theatre; but dissipation shattered his health. Lamb's eulogy is well known; and to Leigh Hunt he was the 'best lover on the stage.' See Life by Raymond (1845).

Ellwood, THOMAS (1639-1713), born at Crowell in Oxfordshire, was converted at twenty to Quakerism; in 1662 made Milton's acquaintance; and soon, visiting him almost daily, 'read to him in such books in the Latin tongue as he pleased to hear read.' In 1665 he hired a cottage at Chalfont St Giles, where Milton might escape the plague in London. Milton gave him the MS. of Paradise Lost to read, and on returning it Ellwood said, 'Thou hast said much of "Paradise Lost," but what hast thou to say of "Paradise Found"?' Ellwood was busy in controversy, and had more than his share of persecution as a Quaker almost till his death. Of his many writings, only his Autobiography (1714; new editions by Morley, 1885, and Crump, 1900) is now interesting for Milton's sake. See work by Frances A. Budge (1891).

Elmore, ALFRED (1815-81), historical painter, was born at Clonakilty, and became an A.R.A. in 1845, an R.A. in 1857.

Elmsley, PETER (1773-1825), editor of Euripides, Sophocles, &c., from 1798 was incumbent of Little Horkelesley near Colchester.

Eloi, or ELIGIUS, ST (588-658), Bishop of Noyon and apostle of Flanders, was originally a goldsmith, and so became patron of smiths.

Elphinstone, ADMIRAL. See KEITH (VISCOUNT).

Elphinstone, MOUNTSTUART, fourth son of the eleventh Lord Elphinstone, was born 6th October 1779, was educated at Edinburgh and Kensington, and entered the Bengal civil service in 1795. In 1803 he served with distinction on Wellesley's staff, and was appointed resident at Nagpur; in 1808 was sent as envoy to Shah Shuja at Cabul; and as resident from 1810 at Poona both ended the Mahratta war of 1817 and organised the newly-acquired territory. During his governorship of Bombay (1819-27) he founded the present system of administration, and greatly advanced public education. He returned to England in 1829, and, declining the governor-generalship of India, lived in comparative retirement until his death at Hookwood, in Limsfield parish, Surrey, 20th November 1859. His well-known History of India appeared in 1841 (7th ed. 1889). See his Life (1884) by Sir E. Colebrooke, who also edited his Rise of British Power in the East (1887); his Official Writings, with Memoir by Forrest (1884); and the Life by Cotton ('Rulers of India' series, 1892).

Elphinstone, WILLIAM, was born in 1431, the natural son of William Elphinstone, a canon of Glasgow. He took his M.A. at Glasgow in 1452, was ordained priest, spent five years in France, and lectured on law at Paris and Orleans. He returned to Scotland, and became rector of the university and official-general of the diocese of Glasgow (1474), official of Lothian (1478), Bishop of Ross (1481) and of Aberdeen (1488); was engaged in embassies; and for four months before the death of James III. (1488) was Chancellor. Under James IV. he was ambassador to France (1491), and keeper of the Privy Seal from 1492. It was chiefly through his influence that the first printing-press—that of Chepman (q.v.) and Myllar—was established in Scotland. The University of Aberdeen (King's College) was founded by him in 1500. Additions to the cathedral and a stone bridge over the Dee were also due to him. The fatal battle of Flodden broke his spirit; and he died at Edinburgh, 25th October 1514. His Breviarium Aberdonense, printed in 1509-10, was reprinted in 1853.

Elssler, two celebrated dancers, sisters, and natives of Vienna—THERESE (1808-78) and FANNY (1810-84). Their first triumph was at Berlin in 1830; in 1841, after a tour through Europe, they went to America, and excited unwonted enthusiasm. Fanny retired from the stage in 1851, and Therese in 1850 married Prince Adalbert of Prussia, and was ennobled.

Elstracke, RENOLD (c. 1590-1630), one of the earliest engravers in England, was born probably at Hasselt in Belgium. He worked chiefly for the booksellers, and his engravings, including portraits of the kings of England, Mary Stuart, &c., are sought after for their rarity.

Elton, CHARLES ISAAC, of Whitestaunton, Somerset, jurist and ethnologist, was born in 1839, maternal grandson of Sir Charles Abraham Elton (1778-1853), translator of Hesiod. He was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, became fellow of Queen's, was called to the bar in 1865, and became Q.C. He was Conservative member for West Somerset 1884-85 and 1886-92. He died 23rd April 1900. He published The Tenures of Kent (1867), Commons and Waste Lands (1868), Copyholds and Customary Tenures (1874), Custom and Tenant Right (1882), the masterly Origins of English History (1882), and books on Columbus, Shelley's travels, and Shakespeare (1904, with a memoir of Elton by A. Lang).

Elton, JAMES FREDERIC (1840-77), explorer of Lake Nyasa, had previously seen active service in the Indian Mutiny, in China, and in Mexico.

Elvey, SIR GEORGE (1816-93), born at Canterbury, from 1835 to 1882 was organist of St George's Chapel, Windsor, and in 1871 was knighted. He was a great choir-trainer, and did much to improve church music. See Life by Lady Elvey (1894).—His elder brother, STEPHEN (1805-60), was an organist at Oxford from 1830.

Elwes, JOHN (1714-89), miser, was the son of a successful brewer named Meggot. He hunted and gamed, but would sit for hours in wet clothes to spare a fire. M.P. for Berks 1774-87, he died worth half a million. [Elwez.]

Elwin, WHITWELL (1816-1900), rector of Boston, Norfolk, was editor of the Quarterly Review (1853-60), and part-author of the standard edition of Pope's works (completed by Courthope).

Elyot, SIR THOMAS, born about 1490 in Wiltshire, became in 1523 clerk of the king's council. In 1531-32, as ambassador to Charles V., he visited the Low Countries and Germany, having orders to procure the arrest of Tyndale. In 1535 he went on a second embassy to the emperor, whom he seems to have followed to Tunis and Naples. Member for Cambridge in 1542, he died at Carlton, Cambridgeshire, 20th March 1546. His chief work, The Boke named the Governour (1531), is the earliest English treatise on moral philosophy. An elaborate tenth edition appeared in 1880, with life, notes, and glossary by Mr Croft. Other works were, Of the Knowledge which maketh a Wise Man (1533); Pasquill the Playne (1533); Isocrates' Doctrinal of Princes (1534); Pico de Mirandola's Rules of a Christian Life (1534); The Castel of Helth (1534); The Bankette of Sapience (1534); Bibliotheca (1538), the first Latin-English dictionary; The Image of Governour (1540); Defence of Good Women (1545); and Preservative against Deth (1545). Elze, FRIEDRICH KARL (1821-89), Shakespearian scholar, was born at Dessau, studied at Leipzig and Berlin, and in 1875 became professor of English Literature at Halle. In editions of Hamlet, Chapman's Alphonsus, and Rowley's When you see me, he applied the strict methods of classical philology. An English translation of his life of Byron appeared in 1872; and in 1872 of his Essays on Shakespeare. Other works are his Shakespeare (1876; trans. 1888) and Notes on Elizabethan Dramatists (1880-84). [Elz-zeh.]

Elzevir, a family of printers at Leyden, Amsterdam, and elsewhere, who in 1592-1681 issued some 1600 beautiful editions of Latin, French, and Italian classics—many of them bibliographical prizes. The founder of the family, Louis (1540-1617), was born at Louvain, and settled at Leyden. Five of his sons carried on the business—Matthias, Louis, Ægidius (Giles), Jodocus (Joost), and Bonaventura; and Abraham and Isaac, sons of Matthias, were also notable. A Daniel, another Louis, another Abraham, and Peter, all maintained the traditions of the house. See French works by Pieters (2d ed. 1858), A. de Reunne (1847), and Willems (1880); Andrew Lang's Books and Bookmen (1888); and Goldsmid's Complete Catalogue (1888). [Elz-zeh-veer.]

Emanuel I. (1469-1521), king of Portugal, styled 'the Great' or 'the Fortunate', succeeded John II. in 1495. His reign was the golden age of Portugal. He prepared the code of laws which bears his name, and made his court a centre of chivalry, art, and science. Vasco da Gama's voyage round the Cape, Cabral's discovery of Brazil, and the expeditions under Albuquerque and others, encouraged by Emanuel, went far to make Portugal the first naval power of Europe and the centre of the commerce of the world.

Emerson, RALPH WALDO, poet and essayist, was born in Boston of a long line of ministers, 25th May 1803. He graduated at Harvard in 1821, and after teaching at different places, became in 1829 pastor of the Second Church (Unitarian) in Boston, and married his first wife, Ellen Louisa Tucker, who died in 1832. In that year he preached a sermon whose views on the Lord's Supper were disapproved by the majority of his congregation; this led him finally to resign his pulpit. In 1833 he came to Europe, and visited Carlyle at Craignputtock, next year beginning that thirty-eight years' correspondence which shows the two men with all their characteristics, different as optimist and pessimist, yet with many profound sympathies. On Emerson's return from Europe he preached in different pulpits, lectured, and wrote essays. In 1834 he fixed his residence at Concord, where he died, 27th April 1882, having in 1835 married his second wife, Lidian Jackson (1802-92). In 1836 Emerson published a prose rhapsody entitled Nature, which, like his earlier poems, was read by few, and understood by fewer still, but which contains the germs of many of his later essays and poems. It was followed by 'The American Scholar,' an oration delivered at Harvard University. These two publications, the first in the series of his collected works, strike the keynote of his philosophical, poetical, and moral teachings. The 'Address before the Divinity Class, Cambridge, 1838,' which follows them, defined his position in, or out of, the church in which he had been a minister. A plea for the individual consciousness as against all historical creeds, bibles, churches, for the soul of each man as the supreme judge in spiritual matters, it produced a great sensation, especially among the Unitarians, and much controversy followed, in which, however, Emerson took no part. In 1849 he revisited England to deliver a series of lectures on Representative Men. The idealist or transcendentalist in philosophy, the rationalist in religion, the bold advocate of spiritual independence, of intuition as a divine guidance, of instinct as a heaven-born impulse, of individualism in its fullest extent, making each life a kind of theocratic egoism—this is the Emerson of his larger utterances. For him nature was a sphinx, covered with hieroglyphics, for which the spirit of man is to find the key. His works are collected in eleven volumes, the titles of which are: Vol. i. Nature: Addresses and Lectures; ii. and iii. Essays; iv. Representative Men; v. English Traits; vi. The Conduct of Life; vii. Society and Solitude; viii. Letters and Social Aims; ix. Poems; x. Lectures and Biographical Sketches; xi. Miscellanies. See the authoritative memoir by J. E. Cabot (1887), Emerson in Concord, by his son (1889), and his Correspondence with John Sterling (1898).

Emery, JOHN (1777-1822), comedian, born in Sunderland, father of SAMUEL ANDERSON EMERY (1817-81), actor, born in London, whose daughter, WINIFRED (Mrs Cyril Maude), born at Manchester, 1st August 1862, has played with distinction since 1881.

Emin Pasha was originally Eduard Schnitzer, born of Jewish parents at Neisse in Silesia, 29th March 1840. He studied medicine at Breslau and Berlin, practised as Scutari in Turkey, where he adopted the Moslem faith and usages, and after 1876, as Emin Effendi, was in the Egyptian service, becoming Bey and Pasha. Gordon appointed him chief medical officer of the Equatorial Province, employed him in diplomacy and administration, and in 1878 made him governor of the province. This post he held, cut off from the world, till 1889. A skilful linguist, he added enormously to our knowledge of African languages, anthropology, zoology, botany, and meteorology: he made important surveys and wrote most valuable geographical papers, and sent to Europe rich collections of plants and animals. An enlightened ruler, and a bitter foe to the slave-dealers, he did much to civilise his subjects; but, isolated and hemmed in by enemies, was 'rescued' by Stanley's expedition in 1889. He accompanied Stanley to Zanzibar, but immediately returned to continue his labours and extend the German sphere of influence about the Victoria Nyanza. He never regained his old influence, and was marching for the west coast when he was murdered by Arabs in the Manyaema country, 23d October 1892. See Emin Pasha in Central Africa (his letters and journals, 1888); Stanley's In Darkest Africa (1890); German works by Vita Hassan (1893), Stuhlmann (1894), and G. Schweitzer (trans. 1898); and the records of Parke, Junker, Gessi, Casati, and others.

Emlyn, THOMAS (1663-1741), a Presbyterian minister who first described himself as 'Unitarian,' and was imprisoned and fined for blasphemy. Born at Stamford, he died in London.

Emma. See ETHELRED and EGINHARD.

Emmerich, ANNA KATHARINA (1774-1824), the 'Nun of Dülmen,' who bore the stigmata of Christ's passion. See BRENTANO, and Life by Schmöger (Freib. 1885; trans. New York, 1895).

Emmet, ROBERT, Irish patriot, was born in Dublin in 1778, son of the viceroy's physician. He left Trinity College to join the United Irishmen, travelled on the Continent, interviewed Napoleon and Talleyrand in 1802 on behalf of the Irish cause, and returned the next year to spend his fortune of £3000 on muskets and pikes.

With a few confederates he plotted to seize Dublin Castle and secure the viceroy, but the rising resulted only in a few ruffianly murders. Emmet escaped to the Wicklow mountains, but returning for a last interview with his sweetheart, Sarah Curran, daughter of the orator, was arrested, tried on 19th September 1803, condemned to death, and hanged the following day. See Madden's Lives of the United Irishmen (1846).—His brother, THOMAS ADDIS EMMET (1764-1827), was a very successful Irish barrister, when in 1798 he was arrested as a United Irishman. After three years' detention he went in 1802 to Holland and France, and thence in 1804 to New York. See Memoirs by Haynes (1829), and MacDonagh, The Viceroy's Postbag (1904).

Empedoclo, the nickname of DON JUAN MARTIN DIAZ (1775-1823), who acquired great distinction during the Peninsular struggle, became in 1814 a general, but for petitioning Ferdinand to re-establish the Cortes was banished to Valladolid (1818). On the outbreak of the insurrection in 1820 he joined the constitutionalists; and on the absolutists' triumph in 1823 was exposed in an iron cage, and finally stabbed by a soldier. [Em-pay-thee-nal' do.]

Empedocles of AGRIGENTUM, philosopher, lived about 450 B.C. Such was his fame as physician, soothsayer, and magician, that the people offered him the sovereignty; but instead he brought in a democracy. It is a myth that he threw himself into the crater of Etna, to seem to have been translated, and that Etna rejected his sandals. His philosophic thought is bound up with poetry and myth, and was determined by the influence of the Eleatic school upon the physical theories of the Ionic philosophers. He assumed four primitive independent elements, air, water, fire, and earth, and two moving and operating powers, love and hate, or affinity and antipathy. His theory of the universe seems to assume a gradual development of the perfect out of the imperfect, and a periodical return of things to the elemental state. The fragments of Empedocles have been edited by Sturz (1805), Karsten (1838), and Stein (1852). See monographs by Lommatsch (1830), Raynaud (1848), Gladisch (1858), and Baltzer (1879), also Matthew Arnold's poem. [Em-ped'o-kleez.]

Empson, SIR RICHARD, the son of a wealthy citizen of Towcester, was trained for the bar, in 1491 became Speaker of the House of Commons, and in 1504, now a knight, High Steward of Cambridge University and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Throughout Henry VII.'s reign he was employed in exacting taxes and penalties due to the crown. His conduct, defended by himself as strictly legal, was by the people regarded as infamous and tyrannical, and in the second year of Henry VIII.'s reign he was convicted of tyrannising and of constructive treason, and beheaded on Tower Hill with his partner Dudley (q.v.), 17th August 1510.

Empson, WILLIAM (1791-1852), educated at Winchester and Trinity College, Cambridge, from 1824 was a law professor at Haileybury, and from 1847 editor of the Edinburgh Review.

Encina, or ENZINA, JUAN DE LA (c. 1469-1534), dramatist and poet, born near Salamanca, was successively secretary to the first Duke of Alba, musical director in Pope Leo X.'s chapel at Rome, and prior of Leon in Spain. Besides his Cancionero (1496), he wrote in 1521 a poetical account of his pilgrimage to Jerusalem. But his fame rests on his fourteen rather poor dramatic poems, half of them religious, but the other half secular, these last the first of the kind to be acted in Spain, in 1492. See edition by Cafete and Baobieri (Mad. 1891). [En-thée-na.]

Encke, ERDMANN (1843-96), a Berlin sculptor.

Encke, JOHANN FRANZ (1791-1865), born at Hamburg, studied at Göttingen, served in the army until 1815, and then became astronomer at Seeberg Observatory near Gotha, and in 1825 secretary of the Academy of Sciences at Berlin and director of the Observatory. Having determined the orbit of the comet of 1680, he next solved the problem of the distance of the sun. In 1819 he proved that the comet discovered by Pons in 1818 revolves in about 1200 days, and had been already observed in 1786, 1795, and 1805; it is since called Encke's comet. See Life by Bruhns (1869). [Eng-ka.]

Enderby, SAMUEL, General Gordon's grandfather, one of a firm of London merchants who in 1830-39 fitted out three Antarctic expeditions.

Endecott, JOHN (c. 1588-1665), Puritan governor of Massachusetts, was born at Dorchester, England, and landed as manager of a plantation near Salem in 1628. He headed a sanguinary expedition against the Indians in 1636, was deputy-governor in 1641-44, 1650, and 1654, and governor six times from 1644 to 1665. He died at Boston. See Life by C. M. Endicott (1847).

Endlicher, STEPHEN LADISLAS (1804-49), botanist, was born at Presburg, committed suicide at Vienna, professor of Botany there from 1840. Genera Plantarum (1836-40) is his great work.

Enfantin, BARTHÉLEMY PROSPER, a leader of the Saint-Simonians, was the son of a Paris banker, and was born 8th February 1796. He was expelled from the Ecole Polytechnique in 1814 for having with other pupils fought against the allies on Montmartre; then he was a traveller for wine in Belgium, Germany, and Russia, and a banker in St Petersburg and Paris. From 1825 an ardent follower of Saint Simon (q.v.), whom, however, he saw only once, after the July revolution of 1830 he associated himself with Bazard for the propagation of Saint-Simonism, but they soon quarrelled over the question of marriage and the relation of the sexes. Enfantin recognised two sorts of marriage, one permanent, the other temporary; the government prosecuted him, and in 1832 'Père Enfantin' was sentenced to two years' imprisonment and a fine of 100 francs. Released in a few months, he found employment in Egypt as an engineer; went out to Algiers as one of a scientific commission, and wrote a sensible book, Colonisation de l'Algérie (1843); after the revolution of 1848 edited the short-lived Crédit Public; and subsequently held an important post in a railway office. He died August 31, 1864. He projected the Suez Canal. His principal works are Doctrine de Saint-Simon, in conjunction with others (1830); Traité d'Économie Politique (1831); La Religion Saint-Simonienne (1831). See Life by Castelle (Par. 1859). Engelhardt, JOHANN GEORG VEIT (1791-1855), professor of Theology at Erlangen, wrote a church history (1834), a history of dogma (1839), &c.

Engels, FRIEDRICH (1820-96), the fellow-labourer with Marx and founder of 'Scientific Socialism,' was born at Barmen, and from 1842 lived mostly at Manchester and in London; Marx he first met at Brussels in 1844. See English Life by Bernstein (1897). [Eng'cls.]

Enghien, LOUIS ANTOINE HENRI DE BOURBON, Duc d', only son of the Duc de Bourbon, was born at Chantilly, 2d August 1772. In 1792 he entered the corps of émigrés assembled by his grandfather, the Prince of Condé, on the Rhine, and commanded the vanguard from 1796 until 1799. At the peace of Lunéville (1801) he went to reside in Baden. When Cadoudal's conspiracy was discovered, Bonaparte chose to believe in D'Enghien's complicity, and, violating the neutral territory of Baden (14th March 1804), captured the duke and carried him to Vincennes. In the early morning of 21st March he was sentenced by a military commission, and shot in the castle moat. Fouché said of this act that it was worse than a crime—it was a blunder. See French works by Boulay de la Meurthe (1886) and Welschinger (1888); and his Correspondance (1904-10).

Ennemoser, JOSEPH (1787-1854), born at Hintersee in Tyrol, studied medicine, but engaged in the Tyrolese risings against the French. Professor of Medicine at Bonn from 1819 to 1837, he then practised at Innsbruck, and in 1841 removed to Munich, where he obtained a great reputation as a mesmeric doctor. He wrote many works on Animal Magnetism, Magic, and Psychology. [En-neh-mo'zer.]

Ennius (c. 239-169 B.C.), a Roman poet, born at Rudia in Calabria, and probably of Greek extraction. He is said to have served in the wars, and returned from Sardinia to Rome with Cato the Elder. Here he taught Greek, gained the friendship of Scipio Africanus the Elder, and attained the rank of Roman citizen. Ennius wrote in almost every style of poetry, and his versification, if rough and unpolished, is vigorous. Of his tragedies, comedies, satires, and Annales, an epos in eighteen books, only fragments survive; although all, it is thought, were extant as late as the 13th century. The fragments have been edited by Vahlen (1854) and L. Müller (1885); the dramatic fragments by Ribbeck (1873). See Müller's Quintus Ennius (1884), and Sellar's Roman Poets of the Republic (2d ed. 1881).

Enoch, 'the seventh from Adam,' 'walked with God,' and, after a life of 365 years, 'was not, for God took him'—i.e. 'was translated that he should not see death' (Heb. xi. 5). For the 'Book of Enoch' see Charles's edition (1893).—For the Glasgow 'St Enoch' or Thenew, see KENTIGERN.

Enriquez Gomez, ANTONIO (properly ENRIQUEZ DE PAZ), a Spanish playwright and poet, the son of a baptised Portuguese Jew, was born at Segovia, in 1636 fled to Amsterdam, and, having there professed the Jewish faith, was in 1660 burned in effigy at a Seville auto-da-fé. The date of his death is unknown. [En-ree'-keth Go'-meth.]

Éon de Beaumont, CHARLES GENEVIÈVE TIMOTHÉE D', the 'Chevalier d'Éon,' was born at Tonnerre in Burgundy, 5th October 1728. In 1756 he was introduced by the Prince de Conti to Louis XV., who employed him in diplomatic missions to Russia and Austria. He was sent to London in 1762 as secretary of embassy, and in 1763 was made minister plenipotentiary. On the death of Louis (1774) the French ministry recalled him, as they were afraid he might betray secrets to the English government. After much negotiation Éon surrendered certain compromising papers, and submitted to the condition imposed by Louis XVI. of wearing feminine garb, which he had often before assumed as a disguise. In 1785 he returned to London, where he gave exhibitions in fencing, till in 1796 he was disabled by an accidental wound, and where he died, 21st

May 1810, when a post-mortem examination settled the moot-question of his male sex. He published Loisirs du Chevalier d'Éon (13 vols. Amst. 1774), &c., but the Mémoires (1837) which bear his name are not genuine. See Life by Homberg and Joussetin (1904; Eng. trans. 1911). [D'Ay-on's deh Bo-mom.]

EÖTVÖS, JOSEPH, BARON (1813-71), Hungarian author, was born and died at Budapest. He became an advocate in 1833, but soon devoting himself to literature, published two comedies and a tragedy, a work on prison reform, his first great novel, The Carthusian (1838-41), The Village Notary (1846; Eng. trans. 1850), &c. In the revolution of 1848 Eötvös was Minister of Public Instruction, as again under Andrássy (1867) after three years of exile. [Ay-et-vest.]

Epaminondas (c. 418-362 B.C.), the greatest of Theban generals and statesmen, led a retired life till his fortieth year. After the stratagem by which his fellow-citizens expelled the Spartans (379), he joined the patriots; and, when sent to Sparta in 371 to negotiate peace, displayed as much firmness as eloquence. When war was resumed, he received the command, and with 6000 men defeated twice that number at Leuctra (371). Two years later, with Pelopidas, he marched into the Peloponnese, and incited several of the allied tribes to desert Sparta. On his return to Thebes, he was accused of having retained the supreme power beyond the lawful time, but was acquitted in consequence of his able defence. In 368 war was renewed, and Epaminondas made a somewhat unsuccessful invasion into the Peloponnese. To atone for this he advanced with 33,000 men into Arcadia, and near Mantinea broke the Spartan phalanx, but was mortally wounded.

Épée, CHARLES MICHEL, ABBÉ DE L' (1712-89), born at Versailles, became a preacher and canon at Troyes, but was deprived as a Jansenist. In 1765 he began to educate two deaf and dumb sisters; and invented a language of signs. His attempts succeeding, at his own expense he founded a deaf and dumb institute, which was converted into a public institution two years after his death. See Life by Bélanger (Par. 1886).

Ephraem Syrus (c. 306-78), Syrian churchman, was born at Nisibis, and, after its capture by the Persians in 363, removed to a cave near Edessa, and devoted himself to prayer, fasting, and the study of the Scriptures. Ephraem's orthodoxy, asceticism, and learning were the admiration of his contemporaries; and his works, written in a fervid and popular style, sustain his reputation as an orator and poet. Part of them have come down to us in Syriac, part in Greek, Latin, and Armenian translations. Of the Syriac writings the chief are his commentaries, discourses, elegies, and hymns. The standard edition is that of Assemani (Rome, 1732-46); and an English translation of some of his pieces was published by Henry Burgess in 1853. See works by Lengerke (1831), Alsleben (1853), Gerson (1868), Zingerle (1876), Lamy (1882-86), Eirainer (1889), and Grime (1893).

Epicharmus (c. 540-450 B.C.), Greek poet, born in Cos, spent his last years at the court of Hiero of Syracuse. We possess fragments of his works and the titles of thirty-five, on topics mythological, social, and political. See German monograph by Lorenz (1864).

Epictetus, Stoic philosopher, born at Hierapolis about 50 A.D., was at first a slave at Rome. On being freed he devoted himself to philosophy, was banished by Domitian, and settled at Nikopolis in Epirus. He left no works, but his pupil Arrian the historian collected his maxims in the work entitled Enchiridion and in eight books of Commentaries, four of which are lost. His ethics teach self-renunciation. The best edition is by Schweighäuser (1799-1800). See German monograph by Bonhöffer (1890).

Epicurus (c. 341-270 B.C.), Greek philosopher, born in Samos, at eighteen visited Athens, and then returned to Asia. In 310 he opened a school at Mitylene, and taught there and at Lampsacus; in 305 he returned to Athens, and established a school of philosophy. His success as a teacher was signal; great numbers flocked to his school from all parts of Greece and Asia Minor, most of whom became greatly attached to their master and his doctrines. Although he held that pleasure is the chief good, the life that he and his friends led was one of the greatest temperance and simplicity. According to Diogenes Laertius, he left 300 volumes on Natural Philosophy, Atoms and the Vacuum, Love, the Chief Good, Justice, &c. These are lost: the only extant writings are three letters, a few fragments from the Volumina Herculanensia, and a number of detached sayings. The principal sources of our knowledge of the doctrines of Epicurus are Cicero, Plutarch, and Lucretius, whose great poem, De Rerum Natura, contains substantially the Epicurean philosophy. According to him, the great evil that afflicted men was fear—fear of the gods and fear of death. To get rid of these two fears was the ultimate aim of all his speculations on nature. He regarded the universe as corporeal, and as infinite in extent and eternal in duration. He recognised two kinds of existence—that of bodies, and that of vacuum. Of his bodies, some are compounds, and some atoms or invisible elements. The world, as we now see it, is produced by the collision and whirling together of these atoms. He did not deny that there are gods; but he maintained that as 'happy and imperishable beings' they could have nothing to do with the affairs of the universe. In psychology Epicurus was a materialist: the dissolution of the body involves that of the soul, and he argues that the most terrible of all evils, death, is nothing to us, 'since when we are, death is not; and when death is, we are not.' He held that pleasure was the chief good, but it is from misapprehension that the term Epicurean came to signify one who indulged his sensual appetites without stint. 'When we say that pleasure is the end of life, we do not mean the pleasure of the debauchee or the sensualist, as some from ignorance or from malignity represent, but freedom of the body from pain, and the soul from anxiety.' In modern times Epicureanism was resuscitated in France by Père Gassendi, who in 1646-49 published a Latin Life of Epicurus and a defence of his philosophy. See Zeller's Philosophy of the Stoics, Epicureans, and Sceptics (trans. by Reichel; new ed. 1880); W. Wallace, Epicureanism (1880); and German monographs by Gizycki (1879) and Kreibitz (1885).

Epimenides, a Greek poet and priest, was born in Crete in the 7th century B.C., and is said to have lived 299 years, during fifty-seven of which he received in sleep the divine inspiration that determined his future career. (Goethe wrote a poem on the subject, Des Epimenides Erwachen.) Epimenides went to Athens about 596 B.C., where he stayed a plague by mystical rites, and with

Solon reformed the Athenian constitution. He was the 'prophet' quoted by St Paul in Tit. i. 12. That he wrote the epic poems ascribed to him is highly improbable. See Latin monograph by Schultess (1877). [Ep-i-men'i-decz.]

EPINAY, MADAME D' (1726-83), born at Valenciennes, an nineteen married a worthless cousin, and subsequently formed liaisons with Rousseau, Grimm, &c. Her Conversations d'Émilie (1774), a work on education, received the prize of virtue from the French Academy. See her Mémoires et Correspondance (1818), and two works by Perey and Maugras (1882-83). [Ay-pee-nay.]

Epiphanius, born in Palestine, and educated by Egyptian monks, who imbued him with piety and bigotry, was Bishop of Constantia in Cyprus from 367 till his death in 403. He proclaimed Origen a heretic, in 394 called upon John Bishop of Jerusalem to condemn him, and was intolerant to Chrysostom also. His chief work is Panarion, a catalogue of eighty heresies. See a monograph by Lipsius (1865).

Episcopopus, or BISHOP, SIMON (1583-1643), born at Amsterdam, studied at Leyden under Arminius and Gomarus, and on Arminius' death in 1609 was obliged to leave Leyden. In 1610 he became pastor at Bleyswich, near Rotterdam, and was one of five 'Remonstrants' appointed to meet five 'Contra-Remonstrants' at the Hague (1611). When Gomarus resigned his chair at Leyden, Episcopopus was appointed his successor (1612). He and twelve other Arminians were banished by the Synod of Dort (1618); and in the Spanish Netherlands he wrote his famous Arminian Confessio (1622). On the renewal of the war between Spain and Holland, he found refuge in France, and published a series of able controversial treatises. Permitted in 1626 to return, he was for several years a preacher at Rotterdam, and from 1634 a professor at the Arminian College at Amsterdam, where he produced his Institutiones theologice and Responsio. Episcopopus lays the utmost stress on the personal responsibility of man in relation to divine grace, denies the doctrine of original sin, and treats Christian faith as the potentiality of moral conduct. The Son and the Holy Spirit are only subordinately partakers of divine power and glory—a rationalist development of Arminian doctrine far beyond the Five Articles, but ultimately generally adopted by the Arminian party. See Life by Limborch (1701).

Érard, SÉBASTIEN (1752-1831), born at Strasbourg, started business as a pianoforte-maker in Paris about 1776, but at the Revolution went to London; in 1796 he returned to Paris. He was the inventor of the harp with double pedals and of the piano with double escapement.

Erasi'stratus, founder of a school of medicine, was born in Ceos about 300 B.C., settled in Alexandria, and died in Samos. Of his writings only some fragments have been preserved.

Erasmus, DESIDERIUS, was born at Rotterdam, apparently on 28th October 1466, the illegitimate son of a physician's daughter by a young man, Gerrit Elias, who afterwards turned monk, and whose story forms the theme of Charles Reade's Cloister and the Hearth. He was called Gerrit Gerritszoon (Dutch for 'Gerard Gerardson'), but himself adopted the tautological double name by which he is known, the Latin half and the Greek half equally meaning 'to be desired, lovable.' Gerhard (Gerard, &c.) means 'strong with the spear.' When a child he was a chorister in the cathedral of Utrecht, but was removed to the school of the 'Brothers of the Common Life' at Deventer. On his parents' death he was left to the care of guardians, who insisted on his entering a monastery; and in the Augustinian college of Stein near Gouda he spent six years—it was undoubtedly this personal experience of the ways of monks that made Erasmus their relentless enemy. He was at length delivered by the Bishop of Cambrai, who made him his private secretary. After taking priest's orders Erasmus went to Paris, where he studied at the Collège Montaigu. He resided in Paris till 1498, gaining a livelihood by teaching; among his pupils was Lord Mountjoy, on whose invitation probably Erasmus made his first visit to England in 1498. He resided chiefly at Oxford, and through the influence of Colet his contempt for the schoolmen was intensified. In 1500 he was again in France, and for the next six years lived chiefly in Paris; to this time belong his Adagia (enlarged in 1515) and his Enchiridion Militis Christiani. In 1506 he made a short visit to England, carried out a long-desired journey to Italy, and at Padua acted as tutor to Alexander, Archbishop of St Andrews, natural son of James IV. of Scotland. His visit closed with a short stay in Rome, whence he carried away a far more friendly impression than Luther did. The accession of Henry VIII., and the invitation of Lord Mountjoy, induced Erasmus once more to make England his home. In his satire, Encomium Moria (1509), we have him in his happiest vein, as the man of letters and the general critic of men and things. While its general tone is that of playful banter, it is yet inspired by the most serious purpose, as appears in its sarcasm at the expense of kings and churchmen. Erasmus resided chiefly at Cambridge, where he acted as Margaret professor of Divinity and professor of Greek. After 1514 he lived alternately in Basel and England, and from 1517 to 1521 at Louvain. Meanwhile his literary labours were unceasing. In 1519 appeared the first edition (afterwards greatly enlarged) of his Colloquia, usually regarded as his masterpiece; the audacity and incisiveness with which it handles the abuses of the church prepared men's minds for the work of Luther. In 1516 was published his annotated New Testament, virtually the first Greek text; and in 1519 his edition of St Jerome in nine folio volumes. In both of these works the aim of Erasmus was to introduce a more rational conception of Christian doctrine, and to emancipate men's minds from the frivolous and pedantic methods of the scholastic theologians. But when the Lutheran revolution came he found himself in the most embarrassing position. Those of the old order fell upon him as the author of all the new troubles; the Lutherans, on the other hand, assailed him for his cowardice and inconsistency in refusing to follow up his opinions to their legitimate conclusions. From the date of Luther's final breach with Rome, the life of Erasmus was one long controversy. In 1521 he left Louvain, where the champions of the old faith had made his stay unendurable; and with the exception of six years in Freiburg, he spent the rest of his life at Basel. To the last his labours were incessant; besides editing a long succession of classical and patristic writers, he was engaged in continual controversies. The most important of these were with Ulrich von Hutten, Luther, and the Sorbonne. Hutten judged Erasmus harshly for not taking his place by the side of Luther; and with Luther himself Erasmus, after long hesitation, crossed swords in his De Libero Arbitrio (1523). Attacked by men like Hutten on the one side, he was as fiercely assailed on the other by the Sorbonne. By his Ciceronianus he raised against himself new adversaries—those humanists, namely, who set style above matter. Yet during his last years Erasmus enjoyed fame and consideration beyond that of any man of letters before or since. He died 12th July 1536. Erasmus stands as the supreme type of cultivated common sense applied to human affairs. He rescued theology from the pedantries of the schoolmen, exposed the abuses of the church, and did more than any other single person to advance the Revival of Learning. An edition of his works appeared at Basel (9 vols. 1540); the standard edition is Le Clerc's (1703-6). See Lives by Knight (1720), Jortin (1748), Burigny (1752), Drummond (1873), Durand de Laur (1874), Feugère (Paris, 1874), Amiel (1889), Jebb (Rede Lecture, 1890), and Froude (1894).

Erastus, THOMAS (properly Liebler or Lieber), was born at Baden in Switzerland, 7th September 1524. He studied theology at Basel, philosophy and medicine for nine years in Italy, and was appointed physician to the counts of Henneberg, then (from 1558) professor of Medicine at Heidelberg and physician to the Elector Palatine. He became professor of Medicine at Basel in 1580, and died there, 1st January 1583. Erastus was a skilful physician, a vigorous writer against Paracelsus and witchcraft. In theology he was a follower of Zwingli, and represented his view of the Lord's Supper at Heidelberg in 1560 and Maulbronn in 1564. For ten years (from 1560) he resisted successfully the Calvinist party at Heidelberg; but in 1570 Presbyterianism was introduced by the Elector Frederick III. Erastus was excommunicated on suspicion of heresy, founded on a correspondence with Unitarians of Transylvania, but was restored in 1575. He had carried on a correspondence on church discipline with Beza, and after his death there was published at London (1589) a treatise entitled Explicatio utrum Excommunicatio mandato nitatur divino. This was answered by Beza (1590). Erastus, fearing that the system he opposed might become as tyrannical as the Inquisition, maintained that no member of the church should be excluded from her communion as a punishment for sin; punishment is 'the special duty and office' of the civil magistrate. In England the name of Erastians was applied to the party that arose in the 17th century, denying the right of autonomy to the church—a right neither maintained nor denied by Erastus; Lightfoot and Selden were Erastians in this sense. See Dr R. Lee's translation (1844) of Erastus's treatise.

Eratosthenes of Cyrene (c. 276-194 B.C.), mathematician, astronomer, and geographer, was called to Alexandria by Ptolemy Euergetes to superintend his great library. Here, at eighty, he died of voluntary starvation, having become blind and wearied of life. Eratosthenes measured the obliquity of the ecliptic with wonderful accuracy, made a catalogue, now lost, of 675 fixed stars, and attempted to measure the magnitude of the earth. He wrote a great treatise on geography, used by Strabo; also on moral philosophy, history, and grammar. Bernhardy edited his fragments (1822). See Berger (1880). [Er-a-tos-the-neez.]

Ercilla y Zuñiga, ALONSO (1553-c. 1595), a Spanish poet, born at Bermeo on the Bay of

Biscay, entered the service of Philip, son of Charles V., and accompanied him in 1554 to England on the occasion of his marriage to Queen Mary. Shortly after, he joined the expedition against the Araucanians in Chili, whose heroism suggested an epic poem. An unfounded suspicion of his having plotted an insurrection nearly led to his execution. Deeply wounded, he returned to Spain, but, Philip treating him with neglect, made a tour through Europe, and for some time was chamberlain to the Emperor Rudolf II. In 1580 he returned to Madrid, where he struggled with poverty till his death. Cervantes compares the Araucana (1569-97; best ed. 1828) with the finest Italian epics. See Royer's Étude (1880). Ercmann-Chatrian, the compound name of two French romancists—Lorrainers both, Émile Ercmann having been born 20th May 1822 at Phalsbourg, and Alexandre Chatrian 2d December 1826 at Soldatenthal. Their literary partnership dates from 1848, but they had little success till the publication of L'illustre Docteur Mathéus (1859). Le Fou Yégo (1862) is one of a series of novels, to which also belong Histoire d'un Concert (1864), Waterloo (1865), Le Blocus (1867), &c. These and many more have been translated into English. Well-known plays by them are Le Juif Polonais (1869; in English The Bells), L'Ami Fritz (1876), Les Rantzeau (1882), and La Guerre (1885). After the annexation of Alsace-Lorraine to Germany, a strong anti-German feeling was manifested in several of their books—the best of these L'Histoire d'un Plébiscite (1872). They had quarrelled latterly (on pecuniary arrangements), when Chatrian died in Paris, 4th September 1890. Ercmann died at Luneville in March 1899. [Erk-man Sha-tree-on'.]

Erdmann, JOHANN EDUARD (1805-92), German philosopher, born at Wolmar in Livonia, studied at Dorpat and Berlin, and became professor of Philosophy at Halle in 1839. His chief work is a History of Philosophy (3d ed. 1877). He also wrote on logic, psychology, &c.

Eric, the name of several Danish and Swedish kings.—ERIC VII. (1382-1459), the son of Duke Wratislaw of Pomerania, in 1412 succeeded Queen Margaret of Denmark on the throne of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, united by the treaty of Calmar. Cruel and cowardly, he lost Sweden in 1437 through a revolt in Dalecarlia, and in 1439 was deposed also in Denmark.—ERIC VIII., the Saint, became king of Sweden in 1155, did much to extend Christianity and to improve the laws, and fell in battle with the Danes in 1160.—ERIC XIV. (1533-77) of Sweden succeeded his father, the great Gustavus Vasa, in 1560, and at once began to exhibit the folly that disgraced his reign. His matrimonial schemes reached even Elizabeth of England and Mary of Scotland, until at length (1567) his roving fancy found rest in the love of a peasant-girl, who alone was able to control his paroxysms of blind fury. His cruelties and follies, leading to disastrous wars, alienated his subjects, who deposed him in 1569, and elected his brother John to the throne; eight years later Eric was poisoned. He had a genuine love of letters, and solaced his captivity with music and the composition of psalms.

Erichsen, SIR JOHN ERIC (1818-96), in 1850 became professor of Surgery at University College, London, and was created a baronet in 1895.

Ericsson, JOHN, born at Langbanshyttan in the Swedish province of Vermland, 31st January 1802, after serving as an officer of engineers in the Swedish army removed in 1826 to England, and continued to occupy himself with inventions. In 1829 he built a formidable rival to Stephenson's Rocket; in 1836 patented the first successful screw-propeller. In 1839 he went to the United States, where he designed the warship Princeton, the first steamer with engines and boilers entirely below the water-line, and brought out his improved caloric engine and numerous other inventions. In 1861, during the civil war, he built the ironclad Monitor, and in 1862 a number of similar vessels for the American navy. The Destroyer, a vessel with submarine guns, was tried in 1881, but failed to come up to requirements. In 1883 he erected a 'sun motor' in New York. He died in New York, 8th March 1889, and was buried next year at his birthplace. His inventions have largely revolutionised navigation and the construction of warships. See Life by W. C. Church (2d ed. 1893). [Er'-ic-son.]

Erigena, JOHANNES SCOTUS (c. 813–880), philosopher, was doubtless a native of Ireland (then 'Scotia'). He resided at the court of Charles the Bald in France, where he was from c. 843 the head of the 'court school.' He came (851) to the help of Hincmar in the Predestination controversy with the doctrine that evil is simply that which has no existence, and that therefore damnation consists only in the consciousness of having failed to fulfil the divine purpose. The Council of Valence condemned this pulvis Scotorum ('Scots porridge') as 'an invention of the devil.' He translated into Latin (860) the writings of the pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, and Greek scholia to Gregory Nazianzen. His chief work, De Divisione Naturæ (854), was condemned by a council at Sens and by Pope Honorius III. (1225). It was edited by Schlüter (1638) and by Gale (1681), and was placed on the Index by Gregory XIII. in 1685. In it he sought to reconcile the fundamental truths of Christianity with human reason, but his system is simply Pantheism, in which God and the world are merged in the higher unity of 'Nature.' Recent writers have shown that Erigena is mainly a skillful reproducer of Greek speculations. A complete edition of his works by Floss forms vol. ccxii. (1853) of Migne's Patrologia. See works by Staudenmaier (1834), St René Taillandier (1843), Christlieb (1860), Huber (1861), Hermens (1868), Hoffmann (1876), and Buchwald (1884).

Erinna, a Greek poetess, the intimate friend of Sappho, born either at Rhodes or at Telos about 600 B.C. Though she died at nineteen, she won fame by her epics, only four lines of which are extant.

Ernest Augustus (1771–1851), George III.'s fifth son, in 1786 was sent to the university of Göttingen; in 1790 entered the Hanoverian army; at Tournay lost his left eye (1794); in 1799 was created Duke of Cumberland; and in the House of Lords showed himself a strong Tory and staunch Protestant. Half-murdered by his valet in 1810, in 1815 he married the Princess Frederica of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, and in 1837 under the Salic law succeeded William IV. as King Ernest I. of Hanover. His policy was in all respects reactionary; but in 1848 he did so far yield to the storm as just to save his throne by the unwilling concession of liberal reforms. See Wilkinson's Reminiscences of the Court of King Ernest (1886).

Ernesti, JOHANN AUGUST (1707–81), biblical critic, born at Tennstedt in Thüringen, became professor of Humanity at Leipzig in 1742, of Rhetoric in 1756, and of Theology in 1750. He edited Homer, Callimachus, Polybius, Suetonius, Tacitus, Xenophon's Memorabilia, Aristophanes' Clouds, and Cicero (3d ed. 1776–77), to which he added a valuable Clavis Ciceroniana (6th ed. 1831). Ernesti was the chief founder of a correct exegesis of Scripture by the laws of grammar and history. Of his numerous theological writings the most notable is his Institutio Interpretis Novi Testamenti (1761; 5th ed. 1809; Eng. trans. 1832–33). In his Anti-Muratorius (1755) he argues that a thorough investigation of the history of doctrines is the best polemic against Roman Catholicism. His Latin speeches were collected under the title Opuscula oratoria.

Ernulphus, or ARNULF (1040–1124), a French Benedictine, appointed prior of Canterbury by Anselm, was subsequently abbot of Peterborough (1107) and bishop of Rochester (1114). He was equally remarkable for skill in canon law and personal saintliness; and compiled a great collection of documents about his own church, laws, and papal decrees, &c., which from the old name of the see (Hrofe-ceaster) was known as the Textus Roffensis: it is to an extract from this that he owes the invidious distinction given him in Tristram Shandy. Sterne makes the pious bishop the most profound master of cursing on the strength of the excerpt called The Pope's Dreadful Curse: being the Form of Excommunication taken out of the leger-book of the Church of Rochester, writ by Ernulphus the bishop (Harleian Miscellany, vol. vi.).

Erpenius (Latinised from Thomas van Erpen), orientalist, was born at Gorkum in Holland, 7th September 1584, studied at Leyden, and at Paris learned Arabic from an Egyptian. In 1613 he became professor of Oriental Languages at Leyden, where he erected an Arabic press in his own house. As oriental interpreter to the government, he read and wrote replies to all official documents coming from the East. He died 13th November 1624. His famous Grammatica Arabica (1613) enjoyed undisputed supremacy for two hundred years; many still think his Rudimenta (1620) unsurpassed. Other works are his Proverborum Arabicorum Centuria Duæ (1614), and his edition of El-Mekîn (1625).

Ersch, JOHANN SAMUEL (1766–1818), born at Grossglogau in Lower Silesia, studied at Halle, and became in 1800 librarian to the university of Jena; in 1803 professor of Geography and Statistics at Halle, and in 1808 also principal librarian. In 1818, along with Gruber, he commenced the publication at Leipzig of the famous yet unfinished Allgemeine Encyclopädie. By his Handbuch der Deutschen Literatur seit der Mitte des 18 Jahrh. (1812–14) he established modern German bibliography. [Ersch.]

Erskine, EBENEZER, the founder of the Secession Church in Scotland, was born at Chirnside, Berwickshire, 22d June 1680. The popular preacher of Portnoak in Kinross-shire from 1703, on the rise of the Marrow Controversy he took a prominent part on the evangelical side; in 1731 he was translated to Stirling. In the patronage dispute he advocated the right of the people to choose their own pastors, and, with other three ministers, was in 1733 suspended and then deposed. The sentence was recalled next year, but Erskine declined to return unless the evils he contended against were removed. The invitation remained open until 1740, when he was finally deposed. On the first deposition, Erskine and his adherents at Gairney Bridge near Kinross erected themselves into the 'Associate Presbytery.' This was the origin of the Secession Church. In the division in 1747 of the Seceders into Burghers and Anti-burghers, Erskine headed the Burghers. He married twice, and had fifteen children. He died 2d June 1754. See Lives by D. Fraser (1831) and Harper (1849); and The Erskines, by Dr John Ker and Miss Watson (1882).

Erskine, HENRY, second son of the tenth Earl of Buchan, was born in Edinburgh, 1st November 1746. He joined the Scottish bar in 1768, became Lord Advocate (1783), and Dean of the Faculty of Advocates (1785), but was deposed in 1796 for supporting at a public meeting a resolution against the government's 'Seditious Writings Bill.' Returned by the Haddington burghs in March 1806, and in November by the Dumfries burghs, he was again Lord Advocate (1806-7), and died 8th October 1817. He published metrical translations from the classics, The Emigrant (1773), &c. The recorded fragments of his speeches justify his high reputation as an orator and a wit. See Colonel Fergusson's Henry Erskine (1882).

Erskine, JOHN (1509-91), of Dun, Reformer, took an active share in public affairs, steadfastly supporting the reformed preachers, especially Wishart and Knox, whilst his moderate and conciliatory temper gave him influence even with the Catholics and the Court. From 1560 to about 1589 he was superintendent for the reformed district of Angus and Mearns. Although a layman, he was five times moderator of the General Assembly, and was one of the compilers of the Second Book of Discipline (1578).

Erskine, JOHN (1695-1768), of Carnock, Scottish jurist, was called to the bar in 1719, and in 1737 became professor of Scots Law at Edinburgh. His two works are still held in deserved repute—Principles of the Law of Scotland (1754; 17th ed. 1836), and the more important Institutes of the Law of Scotland (1773; 9th ed. 1871).—His son, JOHN ERSKINE, D.D. (1721-1803), was minister successively of Kirkintilloch (1744), Culross (1753), New Greyfriars, Edinburgh (1758), and, with Dr Robertson as colleague, of Old Greyfriars (1767). He was for many years the leader of the evangelical party in the church. Erskine's works consist of letters, sermons, essays, &c., mainly of a religious character. See Life by Sir Henry Moncrieff Wellwood (1818).

Erskine, RALPH (1685-1752), brother of Ebenezer, was born at Monilaws in Northumberland, and was appointed minister of Dunfermline in 1711. Sympathising with his brother, he joined the Associate Presbytery in 1737, and also took part with the Burghers. His sermons were greatly prized, and many of them were translated into Dutch. His Gospel Sonnets and Scripture Songs are well known. See Life prefixed to his Practical Works (1764).

Erskine, THOMAS, LORD, the youngest son of the tenth Earl of Buchan, was born in Edinburgh, 21st January 1750. In 1764 he was sent to sea, in 1768 bought a commission in the 1st Royals, and at Minorca (1770-72) studied English literature. Quitting the army he entered Lincoln's Inn (1775), and Trinity College, Cambridge (1776), where he took an honorary M.A. in 1778, just before being called to the bar. His success was immediate and unprecedented. His brilliant defence (1778) of Captain Baillie, lieutenant-governor of Greenwich Hospital, who was threatened with a criminal prosecution for libel, overwhelmed him with briefs. The next year saw an equally successful defence of Admiral Lord Keppel, and in 1781 he secured the acquittal of Lord George Gordon (q.v.). In 1783 Erskine became a King's Counsel, and M.P. for Portsmouth. His first appearance in the House of Commons was a failure; and he never became a parliamentary orator. His sympathy with the French Revolution led him to join the 'Friends of the People,' and to undertake the defence in many political prosecutions of 1793-94. His acceptance of a retainer from Tom Paine cost him the attorney-generalship to the Prince of Wales (held since 1786); his speeches for him and Frost (1793), Hardy (1794), and Horne Tooke (1794) are among the finest specimens of forensic skill. That for Hadfield (1800), indicted for shooting at George III., was a destructive analysis of the current theory of criminal responsibility in mental disease. In 1802 Erskine was appointed Chancellor to the Prince of Wales, an ancient office revived in his favour. In 1806 he was raised to the peerage and the woolsack, but resigned next year, and gradually retired into private life. He died at Amondell, Linlithgowshire, 17th November 1823. In 1821 he had made a second marriage, this time at Gretna Green. He published a pamphlet on army abuses in 1772; a discussion of the war with France in 1797; a political romance, Armata; a pamphlet in favour of the Greeks; and some poems. His decisions as Lord Chancellor were styled the 'Apocrypha,' and have added nothing to his fame. His reputation was solely forensic, and in this respect is unrivalled in the history of the English bar. See Campbell's Lives of the Chancellors, vol. viii.; and Fergusson's Henry Erskine (1882).

Erskine, THOMAS (1788-1870), of Linlathen, was admitted advocate in 1810, but ceased to practise after his elder brother's death gave him the estate of Linlathen, near Dundee, and devoted himself to theological studies. He published several religious works, his cardinal belief being the ultimate universal salvation of mankind. See his Letters (1878), and Life, with selections from his works, by Henderson (1899).

Escobar y Mendoza, ANTONIO (1589-1669), casuist, born at Valladolid, became a Jesuit in 1604, and wrote over 40 volumes of theology and casuistry, the chief being the Liber Theologicus Moralibus (1646). [Es-ko-bar' ee Men-do'tha.]

Espartero, BALDOMERO (1792-1879), the son of a cartwright in a village of La Mancha, was destined for the priesthood, but in 1808, on the French invasion of Spain, joined a volunteer battalion, and after the close of the war in 1814 went to South America, where he fought against the insurgents. As captain-general (1836) of the Basque provinces, he next year twice defeated the Carlists, and drove Don Carlos into France; for this he was created Duke of Victoria. In 1841 he was made regent until Queen Isabella should reach her majority; he guided the state through Socialist and Carlist troubles, until a combination of Republicans and Moderates caused his fall in 1843. He resided for four years in England, then, returning to Spain, lived quietly at Logroño till 1854, when he was again called to the head of the government; but in 1856 he was supplanted by O'Donnell. After the revolution of 1868 Espartero supported the provisional government. In 1870 his name was put forward for the throne; but in 1875 he tendered his adhesion to Alfonso. See Life by Florez (1843-45). [Es-par-tay-ro.]

Espinel, VICENTE DE (1551-1624), born at Ronda, served as a soldier in France and Italy, meeting with some of the adventures related in his Life of Marcos de Obregon (1618 and 1804; Eng. trans. 1816)—a book largely drawn upon by Lesage for his Gil Blas. After his return to Spain he took holy orders. He also published a volume of poems (1591) and a translation of the Ars Poetica of Horace. He was, if not the inventor, the improver of the ten-line octosyllabic stanza, and added the fifth string to the guitar. See Life by Perez de Guzman (Barc. 1881).

Espronce'da, JOSÉ DE (1810-42), Spanish poet and revolutionist, born at Almonte in Estremadura. See Life by Solis (Madr. 1883).

Espy, JAMES POLLARD (1785-1860), meteorologist, was born in Pennsylvania. His Philosophy of Storms (1841) was commended by the Académie des Sciences. Appointed in 1843 to the Washington Observatory, Espy laid the basis of the Weather Bureau.

Esquirol, JEAN ÉTIENNE DOMINIQUE (1772-1840), born at Toulouse, served in the military lazaretto at Narbonne (1794), and was appointed physician to the Salpêtrière at Paris (1811). After 1817 he delivered clinical lectures on brain diseases; in 1818 he secured the appointment of a commission on abuses in mad-houses; in 1825 he became first physician to the Maison des Aliénés, while managing his private asylum at Charenton. The July Revolution deprived him of his public offices. Esquirol's writings embrace the whole treatment of insanity. [Es-kee-rol.]

Esquiros, HENRI ALPHONSE, poet and politician, was born at Paris, 24th May 1814. At twenty he published a volume of poems, followed by two romances, Le Magicien (1837) and Charlotte Corday (1840). For his Évangile du Peuple (1840), a democratic commentary on the life of Jesus, he was fined and imprisoned; this inspired his Chants d'un Prisonnier. His Virgées Folles, Virgées Martyrs, and Virgées Sages (1841-42) showed further his socialistic sympathies. After the Revolution of February 1848, he became a member of the Legislative Assembly, but the coup d'état of 1851 drove him to England, where he gathered the materials for his English at Home, Cornwall and its Coasts, and Religious Life in England. In 1870 he was administrator of Bouches-du-Rhône, was sent to the National Assembly (1871) and the Senate (1875), but died 12th May 1876. [Es-kee-rôs.]

Essex, EARL OF, a title conferred in 1572 on Walter Devereux (1541-76), scion of an old Herefordshire house, the coloniser of Ulster. It had been previously borne by Mandevilles, Bohuns, Bourchiers (Devereux's ancestors), and Thomas Cromwell.—ROBERT DEVEREUX, Walter's eldest son, was born at Netherwood near Bromyard, 10th November 1567, and at thirteen took his M.A. from Trinity College, Cambridge. He had been taken to court in 1577; in 1580 Leicester had become his step-father. Under him he first saw service in the Netherlands (1585-86), and distinguished himself at Zutphen. Back at court, he quickly rose in the favour of Elizabeth, only seriously interrupted by his clandestine marriage in 1590 with Sir Philip Sidney's widow. In 1591 he commanded the forces despatched to help Henry IV. against the League; in 1593 was sworn a privy-councillor, and by 1594 was acting as a sort of foreign secretary. His was the principal glory of the capture of Cadiz (1596); but his, too, largely the failure next year of the 'Islands Voyage.' In 1597 Essex became Earl Marshal, in 1598 Chancellor of Cambridge; but meanwhile occurred his great quarrel with Elizabeth, when he turned his back on her, and she boxed his ears—they never were properly reconciled. His six months' lord-lieutenancy of Ireland proved a failure; and, concluding a truce with Tyrone, he hurried back to England. Elizabeth received him not ungraciously at first; still, imprisonment followed, and deprivation of all his dignities. Now he formed the mad plot for removing Elizabeth's counsellors, and on 8th February 1601 attempted to raise the city of London. On the 19th he was found guilty of high-treason, on the 25th beheaded in the Tower. A patron of letters, Essex was himself a sonneteer; and Cooper's Athenæ Cantabrigienses (1861) gives a list of his writings.—ROBERT DEVEREUX, his eldest son, was born in January 1591, and in 1604 was restored as third Earl of Essex. From 1626 he attached himself to the popular party; in July 1642 he received the command of the parliamentary army. He was brave personally, but a very poor general; and to him the prolongation of the war was largely due. The drawn battle of Edgehill, the capture of Reading, and the relief of Gloucester were followed by his blundering march into Cornwall, whence he fled by sea. In April 1646 he resigned the command, and on 14th September he died. The title died with him; but in 1661 it was revived in favour of Arthur, Lord Capel (1631-83), ancestor of the present earl. See OVERBURY, and W. BOURCHIER DEVEREUX'S Lives of the Devereux Earls of Essex (1853).

Essex, JAMES (1722-84), a Cambridge architect.

Estaing, CHARLES HECTOR THÉODAT, COMTE D' (1729-94), French naval officer, served in the East Indies. In 1778 he co-operated with the American colonists against the British, and captured St Vincent and Grenada in 1779, but his efforts on the mainland were unfortunate. In 1780 he persuaded the French ministry to send 6000 men to the colonists' aid. He was guillotined as a royalist. [Es-tang.]

Es'te, one of the oldest and most illustrious families of Italy. In 1097 it divided into a German and an Italian branch. The former was founded by Welf IV., made Duke of Bavaria by the Emperor Henry IV. in 1070. From him are descended the Este-Guelph Houses of Brunswick and Hanover, and the sovereigns of Great Britain. The Italian branch was founded by Welf's brother, Fulco I. As heads of the Guelph or imperial party they gained possession of Ferrara, Ancona, Modena, and Reggio, and were famous as patrons of art and literature. Alfonso I. (died 1535), soldier and a statesman, had Lucrezia Borgia (q.v.) as second wife. By a quarrel with Popes Julius II. and Leo X. he forfeited his papal fiefs, which were restored by Charles V. after the siege of Rome in 1527. Ercole II., who married Renata, daughter of Louis XII. of France, attached himself to Charles V. His brother, a church dignitary, erected the magnificent Villa d'Este at Tivoli. Alfonso II. (died 1597), splendid and ambitious, showed great cruelty to Tasso. Rinaldo (died 1737) by his marriage with Charlotte of Brunswick united the German and Italian houses. The male line of the House of Este became extinct on the death of Ercole III. in 1803, whose only daughter married the Archduke Ferdinand of Austria. Their eldest son, Francis IV., by the treaty of 1814-15 was restored to the duchy of Modena, and afterwards held Massa and Carrara. He was succeeded in 1846 by his son, Francis V. (1819-75), who in 1859 had to resign his territories to Victor Emmanuel.

Esterházy, a powerful family of Hungary, divided into several branches. Count Paul Esterházy of Fraknó (1635-1713), Austrian field-marshal, for his successes against the Turks was made a prince of the empire in 1687. Prince Nicholas IV. (1765-1833) formed a splendid collection of pictures at Vienna, and by extravagance brought his vast estates into sequestration. Napoleon in 1809 made overtures to Prince Esterházy respecting the crown of Hungary. His son, Prince Paul Anton (1786-1866), represented Austria at London until 1842, and in 1848 was Minister of Foreign Affairs. He added by his magnificence to the burdens on the family property, which was again sequestered in 1860.

Esther, a foster-daughter of the Jew Mordecai, according to the Book of Esther was chosen by the Persian king Abasuerus (Xerxes) as his wife in room of the disgraced queen Vashti, and brought about the deliverance of her people.

Estrées, GABRIELLE D' (c. 1570-99), mistress of Henry IV. of France from about 1590, was married to M. de Liancourt. Henry was about to divorce his queen in order to marry her, when she died suddenly at Paris. See monograph by Desclozeaux (Par. 1889). [Es-tray.]

Ethelbert (556-616), king of Kent, was about 500 Anglo-Saxon Bretwalda. In his reign Christianity was introduced by St Augustine (597), and to him we owe the first written Saxon laws.

Etheldreda, St (630-679), daughter of the king of East Anglia, was twice married, but withdrew first to the monastery founded by her aunt, Ebba, on St Abb's Head, and then to the Isle of Ely, where in 673 she founded a nunnery. Her name was corrupted into St Audrey.

Ethelred I., elder brother of Alfred the Great, king of Wessex and Kent from 866 till his death in 871, shortly after his victory over the Danes at Ashdown. — ETHELRED II. (968-1016), the 'Unready,' was seven when his father, King Edgar, died, and ten when the murder (978) of his half-brother, Edward the Martyr, placed him on the English throne. From boyhood he was swayed by unworthy favourites, and his reign was a series of raids by the Northmen, and endeavours to buy them off. 'Unready' stands for 'redeless,' void of foresight. He misplaced energy enough in his treacherous massacre of the Danish settlers on St Brice's Day, 13th November 1002, a crime punished by fierce invasions until in 1014 he was forced to fly to Normandy. In 1002 he had married Duke Richard's daughter, Emma—the earliest link between England and Normandy. Sweyn's death allowed his recall, but in 1016 he himself died in London. He was succeeded by Edmund Ironside, third son by a first marriage; by Emma he was the father of Edward the Confessor.

Etherege, SIR GEORGE, a Restoration dramatist, was born probably in 1634. He lived much in his early life at Paris, studied law, had an intrigue with the actress, Mrs Barry, afterwards settling £6000 on her daughter, was knighted and married a wealthy widow, and in 1686 was Resident at the Imperial court at Ratisbon. He varied the monotony of this banishment with courting, drinking, play, flirtation with actresses, and correspondence with Middleton, Dryden, and Betterton. 'Gentle George' seems to have died in Paris in 1691. In English literature he is founder of the comedy of intrigue. He sought his inspiration in Molière, and out of him grew the legitimate comedy of manners and the dramatic triumphs of Sheridan and Goldsmith. His three plays are The Comical Revenge; or, Love in a Tub (1664); She Would if She Could (1668); and The Man of Mode; or, Sir Fopling Flutter (1676)—all highly popular in their day. See Gosse's Seventeenth Century Studies (1883), and the edition of Etherege's works by A. W. Verity (1888).

Ettmüller, ERNST MORITZ LUDWIG (1802-77), born at Gersdorf in Saxony, and from 1863 professor of German Literature at Zurich, contributed enormously to the knowledge of Middle High and Low German. In 1840 he edited Beowulf; in 1851 appeared his Lexicon Anglo-Saxonicum. He also worked in old Norse. [Ett-muel-ler.]

Etty, WILLIAM, R.A., painter, was born at York, 10th March 1787, the son of a miller, and for seven years was apprenticed to a printer in Hull, working at art during every moment that could be spared. In 1806 he removed to London, and studied in the Royal Academy schools; for a year he was a pupil of Lawrence. In 1822-23 he spent eighteen months in Italy, founding his practice as a colourist upon the Venetians. In 1828 he was elected R.A. He died 13th Nov. 1849. See Life by Gilchrist (1855).

Eucken, RUDOLF CHRISTOPH, born in 1846 at Aurich in East Friesland, studied at Göttingen and Berlin, and became a professor at Basel (1871) and at Jena (1874). Like Bergson's, his philosophy is an activism, nearer the ethical idealism of Kant and Fichte than the intellectualism of Hegel, and is the struggle for the spiritual control of life, a vindication of the significance and worth of life, man being a co-worker with the divine.

Euclid taught in Alexandria about 300 B.C., and probably was the founder of its mathematical school. His chief extant work is the Elements in thirteen books. Besides there are the Data, geometrical theorems, and the Phenomena, or appearances of the heavens. The authenticity of the Section of the Scale, Introduction to Harmony, Optics, Catoptrics, and Divisions of Superficies is doubtful. A treatise on Porisms, now lost, is attributed to him. Euclid's Elements is probably better known than any other mathematical book, and, with extensive modifications, is still widely used in Britain as a text-book of geometry; on the Continent it has been almost universally given up, as also in America. See Dodgson's Euclid and his Modern Rivals (1879). The first printed edition of Euclid was a translation from Arabic into Latin (1482); the first printed Greek text was published at Basel in 1533. Heiberg's edition is in five volumes (1883-88). See Allman's Greek Geometry (1889).

Euclid of MEGARA, founder of the Megaric philosophy (c. 399 B.C.), was a disciple of Socrates, but had studied the Eleatic system.

Eudocia (401-465 A.D.), a Byzantine princess, the beautiful and accomplished daughter of an Athenian sophist, was chosen by the all-powerful Pulcheria to be the wife of her brother, the weak-mind emperor, Theodosius II. She renounced paganism, took the name of Eudocia instead of Athenais, and was married to Theodosius in 421. Soon violent rivalry arose between the sisters-in-law. Eudocia supported Nestorius and was worsted; later Pulcheria was banished, and Eudocia triumphantly backed Eutyches, head of an opposite heresy. But shortly before the emperor's death (450) Pulcheria regained her influence, while Eudocia retired to Jerusalem to end her life in works of piety. She wrote a panegyric on Theodosius' victories over the Persians, paraphrases of Scripture, and a poem on St Cyprian. See F. Gregorovius, Athenais (1882).

Eudoxus of Cnidus, a Greek astronomer, flourished about 370 B.C. He studied in Egypt.

Eugene, PRINCE, of Savoy, was born at Paris, 18th October 1663. He was the youngest son of the prince of Savoy Carignan and a niece of Cardinal Mazarin. After his father's death (1673), his mother's banishment from court by Louis XIV., and Louis's refusal to give him a commission, he renounced his country, and at twenty entered the service of the Emperor Leopold against the Turks. He displayed extraordinary courage and talent at the siege of Vienna in 1683, and rose rapidly. In the war against Louis XIV. in Italy, he covered himself with glory; field-marshal in 1693, he defeated the Turks with immense slaughter in 1697, putting an end to their power in Hungary. The Spanish War of Succession (1701) recalled him to the army of Italy, but though he inflicted several defeats upon the French, he was prevented from effecting much by the smallness of his forces and the skill of the Duc de Vendôme, who defeated him at Luzzara in 1702. In command of the imperial army he helped Marlborough at Blenheim (1704). Eugene was checked at Cassano (1705) by Vendôme, but afterwards crushed the French in a defeat which closed their career in Italy. He shared with Marlborough the glory of Oudenarde (1708) and Malplaquet (1709), but, crippled by the withdrawal of Holland and England, was unable to withstand the enemy on the Rhine, and his defeat by Villars at Denain (1712) was followed by other disasters, until the peace of Rastadt (1714) ended the war. On the renewal of the war (1716) against the Turks, Eugene defeated an army of 150,000 men at Peterwardein, took Temesvár, and in 1717, after a desperate battle, carried Belgrade. In a new war with France over the crown of Poland, Eugene was only able to keep the enemy out of Bavaria. After the peace he returned to Vienna, where he died, 21st April 1736. Although a strict disciplinarian, he was worshipped by his men, and lives a hero in song. His rapidity and decision raised the prestige of the Austrian arms to unequalled eminence. See works by Dumont (1823), Kausler (1839), Arneth (1859), Von Sybel (1861), and Col. Malleon (1888).

Eugénie, EMPRESS. See NAPOLEON III.

Eugenius, the name of four popes—EUGENIUS I., Saint, pope from 655 to 657; (II.) pope 824-827; (III.) 1145-53, twice driven out of Rome by rebellion, promoted in France a Second Crusade; (IV.) a Venetian, born 1383, became pope in 1431, and quarrelled with the reforming Council of Basel convoked by his predecessor, Martin V., which sought to limit the papal power. Driven from Rome in 1434 by the Colonnas, he opened a new council, first at Ferrara, next at Florence, and excommunicated the bishops assembled at Basel. The Council of Basel deposed him in 1439, and elected Amadeus, Duke of Savoy, as Felix V.

At the Council of Ferrara, John Palæologus II., emperor of Constantinople, appeared with twenty Greek bishops, and a union between the Greek and Latin Churches was for a moment effected in 1439. In 1444 Eugenius again entered Rome, and three years later he died.

Euhæmerus, a Greek philosopher, a native of Messene, who flourished about 300 B.C., and who saw deified heroes in the gods of mythology.

Euler, LEONHARD, mathematician, was born 15th April 1707, at Basel, where he studied under John Bernoulli. The Bernoullis, called to St Petersburg by Catharine I., in 1727 induced Euler to settle there, and in 1730 he was appointed to the chair of Physics, in 1733 of Mathematics. More than half the mathematical treatises in the 26 quarto volumes published by the St Petersburg Academy from 1727 to 1783 are by Euler, and at his death he left 200 treatises in MS., which were afterwards published by the Academy. In 1741 he went to Berlin, in 1766 returned to St Petersburg, where he died, totally blind, September 18, 1783. His Lettres à une Princesse d'Allemagne (1768-72) are an exposition of the most important facts in physics. His principal works include his Theory of Planetary Motion, Analysis of Infinities, Differential and Integral Calculus, and Dioptrics, which are all, as well as his Opuscula Analytica, in Latin. His Introduction to Algebra is well known. See two works by Rudol (1884). [Of-ter.]

Eunomius, the leader of an extreme sect of Arians, was born in Cappadocia, laboured under the Arian Aëtius at Alexandria, was Bishop of Cyzicum about 360, but soon compelled to resign, and died in his native country about 399.

Euph'ra'or, a Corinthian sculptor who flourished about 350 B.C.

Euripides, latest of the three Greek tragedians, was born at Salamis in 480 B.C., the son of wealthy parents. He abandoned painting for literature. How many dramas he wrote we do not know, but the names and some fragments of about eighty are known to us, and of these we possess eighteen complete. He won the tragic prize only five times, and he died 406 B.C. at the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia. He did not take much part in public life; in politics he was a moderate, approving of a democracy, but not of demagogues. The names and probable order of his plays are: Alextis, Medea, Hippolytus, Hecuba, Andromache, Suppliees, Heraclida, Troades, Helena, Phœnisce, Orestes; the Bacchæ and Iphigenia in Aulis were put on the Athenian stage only after the author's death; and it is uncertain to what period belonged the Ion, Hercules Furens, Iphigenia in Tauris, Electra, and Cyclops, whilst it is doubtful whether the Rhesus is genuine. The skill of Euripides as a playwright is of the highest order; he can construct plots which are exciting beyond anything attempted by his predecessors, and he has an unerring instinct for a 'situation.' But in his desire to get on to the situation as rapidly as possible, he substitutes a bald prologue for a proper exposition, and instead of working out the dénouement, makes a Deus ex machina cut the knot of the situation. To the same end he sacrifices consistency in character-drawing. His popularity increased after his death; his plays were 'revived' more frequently than those of Æschylus or Sophocles; and the number that have survived is greater than both theirs put together. The oldest MSS. known to us go back only to the 12th century, and are very corrupt. The editio princeps (Florence, 1496) contains only 4 plays; the Aldine

(1503), 18. The critics who have done most for the text are Porson (1797), Elmsley (1813), Hermann (1838), Badham (1851). Nauck's (1885) is the best text; A. S. Way has a good verse rendering (3 vols. 1894-98). Verrall's Euripides the Rationalist (1895) maintains that the plays were designed to shake faith in pagan theology. [Eu-ri-pi-deez.]

Eusden, LAURENCE (1688-1780), from 1718 poet-laureate, was born at Spofforth, Yorkshire, and died rector of Coningsby, Lincolnshire.

Eusebius of CÆSAREA (c. 264-340 A.D.), the Father of Church History, was born probably in Palestine, became Bishop of Cæsarea about 313, and in the Council of Nice was the head of the semi-Arian or moderate party, which, averse to discussing the nature of the Trinity, would have preferred the language of Scripture to that of theology in speaking about the Godhead. His Chronicon, a history of the world to 325 A.D., is valuable as containing extracts from lost works. His Præparatio Evangelica is a collection of such statements in heathen authors as support the evidences of Christianity; its complement is the Demonstratio Evangelica, in twenty books, ten of which are extant, intended to convince the Jews of the truth of Christianity from their own Scriptures. His great work, the Ecclesiastical History, is a record of the chief events in the Christian church till 324. Other works, all likewise in Greek, are his De Martyribus Palestine, treatises against Hierocles and Marcellus, the Theopneustius (discovered in 1839), and a Life of Constantine. The first complete edition appeared at Basel in 1542; the best are by Heinichen (1668-70), Dindorf (1867-71), the Berlin Academy (1902). See monographs by Hely (1877) and Overbeck (1892).

Eusebius of EMESA, born at Edessa, in 341 declined the bishopric of Alexandria, vacant by the deposition of Athanasius, but was afterwards Bishop of Emesa in Syria. He died c. 359. The homilies under his name are probably spurious.

Eusebius of NICOMEDIA, Patriarch of Constantinople, was bishop first of Beryta (Beyrout) in Syria, and then of Nicomedia. He defended Arius at the Council of Nicæ, and afterwards became the head of the Arian party. He baptised the Emperor Constantine in 337, became Patriarch of Constantinople in 339, and died in 342. His enemies represented him as cunning and double-tongued, but imperious and violent when he had power in his hands.

Eustachio, BARTOLOMMEO, anatomist, who died professor of Medicine in Rome in 1574. He made important discoveries regarding the ear and the heart, to which his name is attached. See his Opuscula Anatomica (1564) and Tabulæ Anatomice (1714). [Eus-tak-kee-o.]

Eusta-thius, Greek commentator, was born at Constantinople. Archbishop of Thessalonica from 1160 and of Myra from 1174, he died at an advanced age some time after 1198. He was a man of prodigious acquirements; and his commentary on Homer and other writings contain extracts from works no longer extant.

Eutro-pius, a Latin historian, was secretary to the Emperor Constantine, fought against the Persians under Julian, and died about 370 A.D. His Breviarum Historiæ Romanæ, a narrative of Roman history from the foundation of the city to 364 A.D., is written in a simple style, and probably was intended for the use of schools. The best modern editions are by Droysen (1878), Wagener (1884), and Rühl (1887).

Eutyches, archimandrite at Constantinople, held that after the incarnation the human nature became merged in the divine, and that Christ had therefore but one nature. He was condemned by a synod at Constantinople in 448; but the council of Ephesus (449) decided in his favour and restored him, deposing his opponents. The council of Chalcedon (451) annulled this decision, and Eutyches died in banishment. His sect was put down by penal laws. [Foo-ti-keez.]

Evagrius, surnamed SCHOLASTICUS, was born at Epiphania in Syria in 536. His Greek Ecclesiastical History, 431-594, continuing that of Eusebius, was edited by Parmentier and Bidez (1898).

Evald, JOHANNES. See EWALD.

Evans, SIR FREDERICK JOHN OWEN (1815-85), hydrographer, in 1828 entered the navy as a second-class volunteer, and was made a C.B. in 1873, a K.C.B. in 1881.

Evans, SIR GEORGE DE LACY, general, was born at Moig in Ireland in 1787, and served three years in India and three in the Peninsula. In 1814 he was present at the capture of Washington, the attack on Baltimore, and the operations before New Orleans; in 1815 at Waterloo. An advanced Liberal, he sat for Rye 1831-32, and for Westminster 1833-65, with the exception of 1841-46. During 1835-37 he commanded the 'Spanish Legion' for Queen Isabella against the Carlists, and performed notable exploits. In the Crimea (1854) he commanded the second division, was hotly engaged at Alma, and during the siege of Sebastopol gallantly repelled a fierce sortie. Invalided home in Feb. 1855, he received the thanks of parliament, and was created a G.C.B. He died in London, 9th Jan. 1870.

Evans, SIR JOHN (1823-1908), born at Britwell Court, was a paper-manufacturer, and from 1864 was a well-known antiquary through his Ancient Stone Implements of Great Britain (1872, new ed. 1897), &c.—His son, SIR ARTHUR, born 1851, has written on Illyria and Bosnia, on numismatics, and on Celtic art, and made epoch-making explorations and discoveries at Knossos and elsewhere in Crete.

Evans, MARIAN. See ELIOT, GEORGE.

Evans, OLIVER (1755-1819), born at Newport, Delaware, improved flour-mills, and is said to have invented the first high-pressure steam-engine. His steam dredging-machine (1804) is considered the first American steam land-carrage.

Evans, THOMAS (1766-1833), a Carmarthenshire preacher and poet, pilloried in 1797 for singing a Welsh song on Liberty.

Evarts, WILLIAM MAXWELL, lawyer and statesman, was born in Boston, 6th February 1818. He was counsel for President Johnson in 1868, U.S. attorney-general, U.S. counsel before the Alabama Tribunal in 1872, in 1877-81 secretary of state, and sat in the senate in 1885-91. He died in 1901.

Evelyn, JOHN, born of wealthy parentage at Wotton, near Dorking, 31st October 1620, was brought up at Lewes (1625-37), then entered Balliol College, Oxford, and in 1640 the Middle Temple. He witnessed Strafford's trial and execution, travelled for three months in Holland and Flanders, and in November 1642 joined the king's army, only to leave it in three days' time, lest he and his brothers should be 'exposed to ruin, without any advantage to his majesty.' The Covenant being pressed on him, he travelled for four years on the Continent; at Paris in 1647 married the ambassador's daughter, Mary Browne (1635-1709); and in 1652 settled at Sayes Court, Deptford. He was much at court after the Restoration; acted on public committees; in 1685-87 was one of the commissioners of the privy seal, in 1695-1703 treasurer of Greenwich Hospital; and from the first was a prominent member of the Royal Society. In 1694 he removed to his brother's at Wotton, and let Sayes Court to Admiral Benbow, who sublet it to Peter the Great (a 'right nasty' inmate). In 1699 he succeeded his brother; and, vigorous in intellect to the last, he died at Wotton, 27th February 1706. Evelyn, as active and intelligent as he was honest and God-fearing, was yet neither a Sage nor a Hero. His pen dealt with a multitude of subjects — 'architecture, painting, engraving, numismatics, history, politics, morals, education, agriculture, gardening, and commerce.' Of all his thirty-five works the chief are Sculptura, or the Art of Engraving on Copper (1662); Sylva, or a Discourse of Forest-trees (1664); and the delightful Diary (discovered in an old clothes-basket at Wotton in 1817), to which he owes his celebrity. See Lives by Wheatley and Austin Dobson, prefixed to editions of the Diary (1879 and 1906).

Everdingen, ALLART VAN (1621-75), a Dutch landscape-painter and etcher; his brother, CÆSAR (1606-79), was an historical and portrait painter.

Everett, ALEXANDER HILL (1792-1847), born at Boston, U.S., was appointed minister at the Hague in 1818, at Madrid in 1825. Proprietor and editor of the North American Review (1829-35), and elected to the Massachusetts legislature, in 1840 he was appointed U.S. agent in Cuba, and in 1845 commissioner to China. He died at Macao. His principal works are two series of Critical and Miscellaneous Essays (1845-47).—His brother, EDWARD EVERETT (1794-1865), born at Dorchester, Mass., graduated at Harvard in 1811, and in 1815 was elected professor of Greek there. In 1820 he became editor of the North American Review, and in 1824 a member of the U.S. congress. In 1835-38 he was four times governor of Massachusetts, and in 1841-45 minister at the court of St James. While in England he was made D.C.L. by Oxford, and LL.D. by Cambridge and Dublin. He was president of Harvard 1846-49, in 1852 succeeded Daniel Webster as secretary of state, and in 1853 was returned to the U.S. senate. His chief works are A Defence of Christianity (1814); several poems; his Orations and Speeches (1836-50); and the memoir prefixed to Daniel Webster's works (1852).

Eversley, CHARLES SHAW LEFEVRE, VISCOUNT (1794-1888), from Winchester passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, was called to the bar in 1819, in 1830 entered parliament as a Liberal, and was Speaker 1839-57, being then made a peer.

Ewald, GEORG HEINRICH AUGUST VON, the orientalist, was born 16th November 1803 at Göttingen, son of a cloth-weaver. From 1820 he studied theology, philology, and oriental languages. He published a work on the composition of Genesis (1824), and was appointed a theological tutor. He became in 1827 extraordinary, and in 1831 ordinary, professor of Philosophy, and in 1835 professor of Oriental Languages. For his share in the protest of the seven Göttingen professors against the annulling of the Hanoverian constitution he was deprived of his chair in 1837; and after some months in England was called to a chair at Tübingen. He was ennobled by the king of Württemberg in 1841, and in 1848 was recalled to Göttingen, where he spent the remainder of his life; but refusing to take the oath of allegiance to Prussia, he was pensioned off in 1867. Of his earlier works, chiefly devoted to the grammar and metres of the oriental languages, the most important is his critical Hebrew Grammar (1827; 8th ed. 1870). The rich fruit of his lifelong study is stored in his Poetical Books of the Old Testament (1835-39; 2d ed. 1866-67; trans. 1881-82), and The Prophets of the Old Testament (2d ed. 1867-68; trans. 5 vols. 1875-81), and in his magnificent masterpiece, The History of Israel (3d ed. 1864-68; Eng. trans. in 8 vols. 1867-86), with the supplement, The Antiquities of Israel (3d ed. 1866; Eng. trans. 1876). To the study of the New Testament Ewald contributed works on the first three gospels, Paul's Epistles, and the Johannean books, as also a translation of and commentary to the New Testament. Other notable works are on Phœnician inscriptions, the Sibylline books, the Bible doctrine of God, and the Book of Enoch. From 1869 Ewald represented Hanover in the Reichstag, and was a keen opponent of Prussian policy. He died 4th May 1875. Ewald's scholarship and sympathetic insight were profound; but he was over-confident, polemical, and intolerant. See two papers by Professor Cheyne in the Expositor (1886). [Ay-vallt.]

Ewald, JOHANNES (1743-81), Danish poet, born at Copenhagen, entered the Prussian army, soon deserted to the Austrians, and, having taken part in several engagements in 1759-60, returned to theological study at Copenhagen. After a disappointment in love he devoted himself solely to poetry; but it was in his elegy on the death of Frederick V. (1767) that he first gave clear proof of his lyrical power. His other writings include the biblical drama, Adam og Eva (1769); a series of satiric plays; the prose tragedy, Rolf Krage (1770); and the two masterpieces, Balders Død and Fiskerne, the latter containing 'King Christian stood by the lofty mast,' which has become the national song of Denmark. Ewald was the founder of Danish tragedy, yet his noblest productions are his lyrical poems and odes. See the edition of his works by Liebenberg (1850-55), and Lives by Hammerich (1860) and Jørgensen (1888).

Ewart, WILLIAM (1798-1869), Liberal M.P. from 1828 to 1868 for Bletchingley, Liverpool (his native town), Wigan, and the Dumfries Burghs. He carried a free libraries bill in 1850.

Ewell, RICHARD STODDERT (1817-72), Confederate soldier, was born in Georgetown, D.C., served in Mexico and against the Apaches, in the civil war was promoted lieutenant-general, but at Sailor's Creek was captured with his entire force, 6th April 1865.

Ewing, JULIANA HORATIA ORR (1842-85), writer for children, was the daughter of the Rev. Alfred Scott Gatty and his wife Margaret Gatty (1809-73), the author of Parables from Nature, &c. Born at Ecclesfield, Yorkshire, she early began to compose nursery plays, which are said to have suggested to her mother the starting of Aunt Judy's Magazine (1866). After Mrs Gatty's death she edited the magazine with her sister for a time, and published in it many of her charming stories. These include Mrs Overthway's Remembrances, Jackanapes, Jan of the Windmill, A Flut Iron for a Furthing, We and the World, Lob-lie-by-the-Fire, Six to Sixteen, A Great Emergency, Old- fashioned Fairy Tales, and The Story of a Short Life. In 1807 she married Major Alexander Ewing, author of translations from Turkish and German. See Life by Horatia Gatty (1885).

Ewing, THOMAS (1789-1871), born in Virginia, sat in the U.S. senate 1831-37, was secretary of the treasury in 1841, and in 1849-50 organised the department of the interior, afterwards returning to the senate.

Exelmans, Remy Joseph Isidore, Comte (1775-1852), born at Bar-le-Duc, entered the army in 1791, served with distinction in Italy, was made general of brigade after Eylau, and followed Murat to Spain, where he was taken prisoner and sent to England. For his conduct in the disastrous Russian campaign Napoleon created him a general of division. On Napoleon's fall he was banished from France, but permitted to return in 1823. Louis Napoleon made him Grand Chancellor of the Legion of Honour, and in 1851 a Marshal.

Exeter, EARL OF. See BURGHEY.

Exmouth, EDWARD PELLEW, VISCOUNT, admiral, was born at Dover, 19th April 1757; entered the navy at thirteen; and attracted notice in the battle on Lake Champlain (1776). In 1793, in command of a frigate, he captured a much larger French frigate, and was knighted; in 1796, for acts of personal bravery, he was created a baronet. In 1798 he was sent to the French coast, where many of his most brilliant actions took place. In 1804 he was appointed commander-in-chief in India, from whose seas he drove the French cruisers; he was afterwards made commander-in-chief in the North Sea and in the Mediterranean. In 1814 he was created Baron Exmouth, with a pension of £2000 a year; in 1816 was sent to Algiers to enforce the treaty abolishing Christian slavery. With a fleet of twenty-five English and Dutch vessels he bombarded the city for nine hours, and inflicted such immense damage that the Dey consented to every demand; and he was now made a viscount. He died 23d January 1833. See his Life by Osler (1835).

Eyck, HUBERT and JAN VAN, early Flemish painters, were probably born at Eyck on the Maas, Hubert about 1370, and Jan about 1389. They perfected the mode of mixing colours with oil; while for transparent and brilliant colouring and minute finish their works have never been surpassed. The brothers generally painted in conjunction until the death of Hubert on 18th September 1426. Their greatest work was 'The Adoration of the Lamb,' an altarpiece commissioned by Jodocus Vydt for the cathedral of Ghent. Only the four central of its twelve panels are still there, six having found their way to Berlin. In the National Gallery, London, there are three portrait-pictures by Jan van Eyck; and the Louvre has an exquisitely finished little picture by him. Jan died at Bruges, 9th July 1440. See French Life by Lalaing (Lille, 1887).

—MARGARET VAN EYCK, their sister, is believed to have executed the miniatures in the missal of the Duke of Bedford. She died before 1431.

Eyre, EDWARD JOHN, the son of a Yorkshire clergyman, was born in August 1815, and, emigrating to Australia at seventeen, settled on the Lower Murray, and was appointed a magistrate. In 1840 he failed in an attempt to explore the region between South and Western Australia, though he discovered Lake Eyre; but he succeeded in spite of enormous difficulties in 1841 (Discoveries in Central Australia, 1845). In 1847 he became governor of New Zealand, in 1854 of St Vincent, and in 1862 of Jamaica. The negro outbreak there in 1865 was suppressed with stern severity, martial law being proclaimed. A wealthy mulatto named Gordon, a Baptist, and member of the Jamaica House of Assembly, was court-martialed, and hanged two days after, the sentence being confirmed by Eyre. A commission found that Gordon had been condemned on insufficient evidence, and Eyre was recalled. On his return he was prosecuted by a committee including J. S. Mill; Carlyle, Charles Kingsley, and Sir R. Murchison promoted the Eyre defence fund. The prosecution failed; and in 1872 the government refunded Eyre the costs of his defence. He died 30th November 1901. [Ait.]

Eyton, ROBERT WILLIAM (1815-81), author of The Antiquities of Shropshire, was born at Wellington vicarage, and from 1841 to 1863 was rector of Ryton, also in Shropshire.

Ezekiel, Hebrew prophet, was carried captive to Mesopotamia by Nebuchadnezzar about 599 B.C. The text of the Bible book still accepted as mainly his is corrupted by glosses, and has been retouched by later hands. See Cornill's reconstructed text (1886), Ewald's and other works on the prophets, and commentaries by Hävernick, Hitzig, Fairbairn, Kliefoth, Hengstenberg, Keil, Schröder, and Davidson.

Ezra, the Scribe, was living in Babylon during the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, who commissioned him to lead a band of his fellow-countrymen from Babylon to Jerusalem (458 B.C.), there to reorganise the returned Jews. He is believed to have arranged the books of the Mosaic law (the Pentateuch) as it is now. The book which bears his name was anciently and justly regarded as forming one book with Nehemiah; and in their present shape Ezra and Nehemiah are simply the continuation of Chronicles. See Wellhausen's Prolegomena (trans. 1885), Robertson Smith's The Old Testament in the Jewish Church (1881), commentaries by Bertheau, Keil, Schultz, and Neteler (1877), and the introductions by Rosenzweig (1876) and Sayce (2d ed. 1887).

being Brother Wilfrid, from his Life of St Wilfrid (1844). With his companions he joined in 1848 the Oratory of St Philip Neri; next year a branch under his care was established in London, and finally located at Brompton in 1854, where he died, 26th September 1863. Faber wrote many theological works; but his fame will rest upon his hymns—'The Pilgrims of the Night,' 'The Land beyond the Sea,' &c. A collection of 150 of them was published in 1862. See the Lives by J. E. Bowden (1869; new ed. 1892) and his brother, F. A. Faber (1869).

Faber, GEORGE STANLEY (1773-1854), Anglican

Already he had come under the influence of Newman, and in 1845, after three years' tenure of the rectory of Elton in Huntingdonshire, he followed him into the fold of Rome. He founded a community of converts at Birmingham—'the Wilfridians,' he himself divine, and uncle of the preceding, was born at Calverley vicarage, near Bradford, was fellow and tutor of Lincoln College, Cambridge, Bampton Lecturer (1801), rector of Stockton-on-Tees, and master of Sherburn Hospital near Durham. Of his numerous theological works, those upon prophecy have enjoyed the greatest popularity.

Faber, JOHN (1684-1756), mezzotint-engraver, like his father, John Faber (c. 1660-1721). His chief works are the portraits of the 'Kit-Cat Club' and 'The Beauties of Hampton Court.'

Fabius, the name of a patrician family of Rome. In 481 B.C. the Fabii were decimated in an ambush by the Veientes, and, save one member, the entire gens of 306 men was put to the sword.—QUINTUS FABIVS RULLIANUS, general in the second Samnite war, was dictator (315), censor (304), and six times consul.—QUINTUS FABIVS MAXIMUS VERRUCOSUS, five times consul and twice censor, was elected dictator (221) after the Roman defeat at Trasimenus, and by his tactics in the second Punic war was known as Cunctator ('Delayer'). Avoiding a great battle, he carried on guerilla warfare and allowed Rome to muster her forces. He died in 203.—CUNCTATOR FABIVS, surnamed Pictor, executed in 302 upon the walls of the temple of Salus the earliest known Roman painting.—His grandson, QUINTUS FABIVS PICTOR, was the first Roman historian.

Fabre, FERDINAND (1830-98), novelist, was born at Bédarieux, and trained for the priesthood, but took up medicine, and finally devoted himself to literature. L'Abbé Tigrane (1873) and Lucifer (1884) are his best-known works.

Fabricius, DAVID (1564-1603), astronomer, was pastor at Resterhaave and Oostel in East Friesland.—His son JOANNES (1587-1615), an M.D., discovered the sun's spots and its revolution.

Fabricius, or FABRIZIO, GIROLAMO (1537-1619), anatomist, born at Acquapendente near Orvieto, was from 1562 professor of Anatomy at Padua. Harvey was one of his pupils. He discovered the valves of the veins in 1574. His Opera Chirurgica (1617) passed through seventeen editions.

Fabricius, JOHANNES CHRISTIAN (1745-1808), one of the founders of scientific entomology, was born at Tondern in Sleswick, and in 1775 became professor of Natural History at Kiel. His classification of insects is based upon the structure of the mouth.

Fabroni, ANGELO (1732-1803), wrote Vite Italorum Doctrina Excellentium (1778-1805), besides separate biographies of Lorenzo and Cosmo de' Medici (1788).

Fabyan, ROBERT, English chronicler, was a clothier in London, where he was sheriff in 1493, and died 28th February 1513. His history, The New Chronicles of England and France (1516), comes down in its second edition (1533) to the death of Henry VII. From the accession of Richard I. it takes the form of a London chronicle, as such its chief value. The best edition is that by Sir Henry Ellis (1811).

Facciolati, JACOPO (1682-1769), professor at Padua, brought out (1715-19) a new edition of the Lexicon Undecim Linguarum, in its first form the work of Ambrose Calepino (1502). In this undertaking he was assisted by his pupil and brother-professor, EGIDIO FORCELLINI (1688-1768), to whom is mainly owing the conception of a totally new Latin dictionary. This Facciolati continued till his death, and it finally appeared in 1771 (new ed. by De Vit, 1858-87; Eng. ed. 1826). See Lives by Ferrari (1799) and Gennari (1818). [Fatsh-o-lah'-tee.]

Faed, JOHN (1819-1902), a Scottish painter, was born at Burley Mill, near Gatehouse-of-Fleeë, Kirkcudbrightshire. In 1841 he went to Edinburgh, and was elected an A.R.S.A. in 1847, an R.S.A. in 1851. [Faid.]

Faed, THOMAS, R.A., brother of the preceding, was born at Burley Mill, 8th June 1826, and in 1842 began to study in Edinburgh. His first picture was a water-colour of an incident from the Old English Baron; but he discovered his true strength in 'Reading the Bible.' He was made an A.R.S.A. in 1849, in which year he produced 'Scott and his Friends at Abbotsford,' which was engraved by his brother James Faed. In 1852 he removed to London, where his 'Mitherless Bairn' was produced in 1855. Later works were 'Home and the Homeless,' 'The First Break in the Family,' 'Sunday in the Backwoods,' 'From Dawn to Sunset,' 'Baith Faither and Mither,' and 'The Last o' the Clan.' Faed was made an A.R.A. in 1859, an R.A. in 1864, but resigned in 1893; and he died 17th August 1900.

Fahrenheit, GABRIEL DANIEL (1686-1736), physicist, was born at Danzig. About 1714 he first used quicksilver instead of spirits of wine for thermometers. He fixed his freezing-point at 32° to avoid negative measurements. In 1724 he was elected F.R.S. [Fah'ren-hite.]

Faidherbe, LOUIS LÉON CÉSAR, general, was born at Lille, 3d June 1818, and served in Algiers and Guadeloupe. As governor of Senegal (1854) he greatly extended the frontiers of his province (1858-61). Gambetta gave him the command of the army of the North. After withstanding Mantuffel's attack (23d December) he was defeated near St Quentin on 19th January 1871. After the peace he was despatched by the French government to Egypt to study the monuments, and he died in Paris, 28th September 1889. He published useful books on Numidian and Phœnician inscriptions (1870-74), the anthropology of Algiers and the French Soudan (1874-84), a work on Sénégal (1889), and treatises on the Foulah (or Poul) and Berber languages (1875-77), besides Campagne de l'Armée du Nord (1871). Fairbairn, ANDREW MARTIN (1838-1912), theologian, born at Inverkeithing, after studying there and in Germany, preached in Aberdeen until his theological writings earned him in 1878 the principalship of the Airedale Congregational College at Bradford. In the same year he was made D.D. His brilliant essays in the Contemporary Review attracted attention, and works such as Studies in the Philosophy of Religion and History (1876), Christianity in the First and Nineteenth Centuries (1883), Religion in History and in the Life of To-day (1884), and Christ in Modern Theology (1894) established his reputation.

In 1838-1909 he was principal of Mansfield College (Congregationalist) at Oxford.

Fairbairn, SIR WILLIAM, engineer, was born at Kelso, 19th February 1789. He was apprenticed (1804) to an engine-wright in a colliery at North Shields, where he studied mathematics, and made acquaintance with George Stephenson. In Manchester (1817) he took a lead in making iron boats; and his works at Millwall, London (1835-49), turned out hundreds of vessels. For the Menai tubular bridge (Robert Stephenson's idea) Fairbairn invented the rectangular tube ultimately adopted; and he erected a thousand bridges upon this principle. He aided Joule and Thomson (Lord Kelvin) in 1851 in investigations, and guided the experiments of the government committee (1861-65) on the use of iron for defensive purposes. A chevalier of the Legion of Honour, he was created a baronet in 1869. He died at Moor Park, Surrey, 18th August 1874. See his Autobiography (1877).—His youngest brother, SIR PETER FAIRBAIRN (1799-1861), from 1828 was a machine-manufacturer in Leeds, of which he was mayor during 1857-59.

Fairfax, EDWARD (c. 1580-1635), translator of Tasso, was a son (perhaps a natural son) of Sir Thomas Fairfax of Denton, Yorkshire. His life was spent in literary pursuits at Fawston, near Otley; and his translation of Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata (1600) has been universally praised. His Discourse of Witchcraft (1621) was published by Monckton Milnes in the Miscellanies of the Philobiblon Society (1858-59).

Fairfax, THOMAS, LORD, parliamentary general, was the son of Ferdinando, Lord Fairfax, and was born 17th January 1612, at Denton, Yorkshire. From 1629 he served in Holland, under Lord Vere, whose daughter Anne he married (1637). In the Civil War (from 1642) he was general of parliamentary horse; and, distinguished especially at Marston Moor (1644), was in 1645 appointed to succeed Essex in the supreme command. In 1650, on Fairfax's refusal to march against the Scots, who had proclaimed Charles II. king, Cromwell was appointed commander-in-chief, and Fairfax withdrew into private life. After Cromwell's death he gathered troops to assist Monk against Lambert; and he was head of the commission despatched to the Hague in 1660 to arrange for the return of Charles II. He died at Nunappleton, Yorkshire, 12th November 1671. Fairfax wrote works in prose and verse, including two memoirs on the Civil War. See his Correspondence (4 vols. 1848-49), and a Life by Markham (1870).—THOMAS, sixth Lord Fairfax (1692-1782), went out to America about 1746, and his successors have become American citizens.

Faithfull, EMILY, born at Headley Rectory, Surrey, in 1835, in 1860 founded in London a printing-house with women compositors, and was appointed printer and publisher in ordinary to Her Majesty. In 1863 she started the Victoria Magazine, advocating the claims of women to remunerative employment; and in 1868 she published Change upon Change, a novel. She lectured in the United States 1872-73 (see Three Visits to America, 1884). In 1889 she received a pension of £50, and she died 31st May 1895.

Faithorne, WILLIAM (1616-91), engraver, whose works were catalogued by Fagan in 1888.

Falb, RUDOLF, born at Obdach in Styria, 13th April 1838, was trained for the priesthood, but took to science, had written on astronomy and meteorology, and from Berlin issued half-yearly weather prognostications till his death (1904).

Falcone, ANIELLO (1600-1665), founded a school of painters at Naples. [Fal-ko'neh.]

Falconer, HUGH, palaeontologist, was born at Forres, 29th February 1808. He graduated M.D. at Edinburgh in 1829, joined the Bengal medical service, became (1832) keeper of the botanic garden at Saháranpur, and discovered many fossils in the Siwálik hills. He made the first experiments in growing tea in India. Back in England for his health (1842), he wrote on Indian botany and palaeontology, arranged Indian fossils in the British Museum and East India House, and prepared his great illustrated folio, Fauna Antiqua Sivalensis (1846-49). He returned to India in 1847 as superintendent of the botanic garden and professor of Botany at Calcutta, came home in 1855, and died in London, 31st July 1865. His Palaeontological Memoirs and Notes were published in 1868.

Falconer, ION KEITH (1856-87), orientalist, missionary, and athlete, was third son of the Earl of Kintore. While at Cambridge he began evangelistic work, continued at Mile End in London. A keen cyclist, he defeated the then fastest rider in the world (1878), and rode from Land's End to John o' Groats's. Lord Almoner's professor of Arabic at Cambridge, he had settled at Shaikh Othman near Aden as a Free Church missionary, when he died of fever, 10th May 1887. In 1885 he translated the Fables of Bidpai. See Memorials by Sinker (1888).

Falconer, WILLIAM, poet, was born in Edinburgh on 11th February 1732. A barber's son, he went to sea, and before he was eighteen was shipwrecked off Cape Colonna in Greece. The incidents of this voyage form the subject of his Shipwreck (1762). He then entered the royal navy, being appointed in 1769 purser on the Aurora frigate, which foundered with all hands near Capetown about the end of December. His Demagogue is a satire on Wilkes and Churchill (1764), and he was also author of the Universal Marine Dictionary (1769).

Falguière, ALEXANDRE, sculptor and painter, was born at Toulouse in 1831 and died in 1900.

Faliero, MARINO, Venetian doge, was born about 1274. He defeated the Hungarians at Zara in 1346, captured Capo d'Istria, was ambassador to Rome and Genoa, and was elected Doge of Venice in 1354. Next year, dissatisfied with the punishment inflicted by a patrician tribunal upon a young noble who had insulted his youthful wife, Faliero conspired with the plebeians to assassinate the oligarchs and make himself ruler of Venice; but the conspiracy was betrayed, and Faliero was arrested and beheaded on the 17th of April 1355. His fate is the theme of tragedies by Byron and Swinburne. [Fah-lee-ay-ro.]

Falk, ADALBERT, Prussian statesman, was born at Metschkau in Silesia, 10th August 1827, and as minister of Public Worship and Education (1872) was instrumental in carrying the May laws (passed in May 1873, 1874, and 1875) against the hierarchical supremacy of the Church of Rome. When Bismarck bade for the support of the clerical party, Falk resigned in 1879, and retired from political life. He died in 1900. [Fahlk.]

Falkland, LUCIUS CARY, VISCOUNT, was born probably at Burford, Oxfordshire, in 1610, son of Sir Henry Cary, created Viscount Falkland in the Scottish peerage in 1620, the well-meaning but unfortunate lord-deputy of Ireland from 1622 to 1629. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, succeeded to his maternal grandfather's property at nineteen, and soon after married Letice, daughter of Sir Richard Morrison. He next crossed to Holland to volunteer into the service of the young republic, but soon returned to devote himself to study, especially of Greek. His father's death in 1633 gave him the title, and after a time he settled down in his house at Tew, in Oxfordshire, to a severe course of study, and to that convivium philosophicum which Clarendon described with so peculiar a charm. Hither came constantly the brightest intellects of the university, but sixteen miles distant, as well as the poets and wits from London. In the group of closest intimacy Clarendon enumerates Sheldon, Morley, Hammond, Earle, and Chillingworth, and to these may be added John Hales and the historian himself. To this period belong Falkland's pleasing but not striking poems, edited by A. B. Grosart in 1871. His Discourses of Infallibility, and the longer Reply to the Answer thereto, are a truer index to what lay closest to his heart. For some years high thinking entirely occupied Falkland's mind, but in 1639 he accompanied Essex in the expedition against the Scots. After his return he entered parliament as member for Newport (Isle of Wight), and distinguished himself by his ardour and eloquence in behalf of constitutional liberty. But the popular party moved too fast for his wise and temperate patriotism, and, in his alarm at the threatening domination of an intolerant Presbyterianism, he found himself reluctantly compelled to take the king's side, although mistrusting his character; in 1642 he accepted the secretaryship of state, and when the war broke out he gave his sword loyally to the king. He was killed at the battle of Newbury, 20th September 1643. Though sensitive and noble-minded, he remorselessly persecuted Strafford to death. See Clarendon, both in the History and the Life; S. R. Gardiner's History; Tulloch's Rational Theology (1872); and the Life and Times, defending him against Macaulay's charge of weakness, by J. A. R. Marriott (1907).

Fallersleben. See HOFFMANN, AUGUST.

Fallerayer, JAKOB PHILIPP (1790-1861), was born at Tschötsch in the Tyrol, and in 1826 became professor of History and Philology at Landshut. He travelled (1831, 1840, 1847) in the East, and in 1848 sat in the Frankfort parliament. His principal works are histories of the empire of Trebizond (1827) and of the Morea (1830-36). He insisted that the modern Greeks are substantially Slavonic in origin. His complete works, with a Life, were edited by Thomas (3 vols. 1861). [Fal-mer-ÿ-er.]

Fallopius, GABRIEL (1523-62), became professor of Anatomy at Pisa (1548) and Padua (1551), studied specially the bones and the organs of generation; the Fallopiian tube connecting the ovaries with the uterus is named after him.

Falloux, FRÉDÉRIC ALFRED PIERRE, COMTE DE (1811-86), was born at Angers. A liberal Catholic, he drew attention by two legitimist works—L'Histoire de Louis XVI. (1840) and L'Histoire de Saint Pie V. (1844). In 1846 he was chosen deputy for the department Maine-et-Loire. When Louis Napoleon became president, Falloux was minister of Public Instruction for ten months; but after the coup d'état he retired from public life. He was a member of the French Academy. His writings include Souvenirs de Charité (1857) and Méditations et Prières (1863). [Fal-loo'.]

Falstaff. See OLDCASTLE and FASTOLF.

Faneuil, PETER, merchant in Boston, U.S., was born at New Rochelle, N.Y., in 1700, and died in 1743. He built the Faneuil Hall in Boston, known as 'the cradle of American liberty' (1742), and presented it to the town. [Popularly Fan'nel.]

Fanshawe, CATHERINE MARIA (1765-1834), a poetess, heiress, and draughtswoman; her best-known effusion the riddle on H, 'Twas whispered in heaven,' &c.

Fanshawe, SIR RICHARD, born at Ware Park, Hertfordshire, in 1608, studied at Jesus College, Cambridge, and went abroad to study languages. In the civil war he sided with the king, and while at Oxford married in 1644 the lively and brave Anne Harrison (1625-80). In 1648 he became treasurer to the navy under Prince Rupert, in 1651 was taken prisoner at Worcester, and on Cromwell's death withdrew to the Continent. After the Restoration he was appointed ambassador at the courts of Portugal and Spain, and died suddenly at Madrid, 26th June 1666. Fanshawe's works include The Faithfull Shepheard (1647), a translation from the Italian of Guarini; Selected Parts of Horace (1652); and The Lusian (1655), a translation from Camoens. Lady Fanshawe's charming Memoirs was first printed by Sir Harris Nicolas in 1829.

Faraday, MICHAEL, chemist and natural philosopher, was born, a blacksmith's son, at Newington Butts near London, 22d September 1791. At thirteen he was apprenticed to a bookbinder, but devoted his leisure to science. Chance having procured him admission in 1812 to the chemical lectures of Sir H. Davy, the latter engaged him as his assistant at the Royal Institution; and with him he visited the Continent. On their return Davy confided to Faraday the performance of experiments, which led to the condensation of gases into liquids by pressure. In 1827 he succeeded to Davy's chair of Chemistry in the Royal Institution; and he was created D.C.L. in 1832. His treatise on Chemical Manipulation (1827; 2d ed. 1842) is even now a very valuable book of reference. His suggestions as to the preparation of the lungs for diving and the ventilation of light-house lamps are notable, as are also his letter on table-turning and his lecture on mental education. The most prominent of his publications on physical science were on the condensation of the gases, limits of vaporisation, optical deceptions, acoustical figures, re-gelation, relation of gold and other metals to light, and conservation of force. His Christmas lectures at the Royal Institution, though the subjects were often most abstruse, charmed and attracted all classes of hearers. Besides his lectures on The Non-metallic Elements and on The Chemical History of a Candle, we have his Various Forces in Nature. But the great work of his life is the series of Experimental Researches on Electricity, published in the Philosophical Transactions during forty years and more. The following are almost all discoveries of the first importance: Induced electricity (1831); the electrotonic state of matter (1831); identity of electricity from different sources (1833); equivalents in electro-chemical decomposition (1834); electrostatic induction—specific inductive capacity (1838); relation of electric and magnetic forces (1838); the electricity of the Gymnotus (1839); hydro-electricity (1843); magnetic rotatory polarisation (1846), effected by means of the optical glass; diamagnetism (1846-49); relation of gravity to electricity (1851); and atmospheric magnetism (1851). Faraday, who had received a pension in 1835, was in 1858 given a house in Hampton Court. In 1862, as adviser to the Trinity House, he advocated the use of magneto-electric light in lighthouses. A devout Christian, a member of the body called Sandemianians or Glassites, he died at Hampton Court, 25th August 1867. See Lives by Tyndall (1868; 5th ed. 1894), Bence Jones (1870), J. H. Gladstone (1872), and W. Jerrold (1891).

Far'el, GUILLAUME, SWISS Reformer, was born in 1489 at Gap in Dauphiné, and studied at Paris. A convert to Protestantism, he in 1524 sustained at Basel thirty Protestant theses. After being twice compelled to leave Geneva, he once more entered it in 1534; and in 1535 the town-council proclaimed the Reformation. The organisation of the Genevan Church was undertaken by Calvin, and the severity of the ecclesiastical discipline produced a reaction, so that in 1538 the two Reformers were expelled from the city. In 1557, along with Beza, Farel was sent to the Protestant princes of Germany to implore their aid for the Waldenses; and he next laboured in the Jura Mountains. When about seventy he married a young wife. In 1560 he was in Dauphiné preaching against Catholicism; and in 1561 he was thrown into prison. He died at Neuchâtel, 13th September 1565. See the German Life by Kirchhofer (1831-33), two works in French and in German by E. Schmidt (1834 and 1860), and a Life in French by Goguel (1873).

Fargus, FREDERICK JOHN. See CONWAY.

Faria y Sousa, MANUEL DE (1590-1649), Portuguese historian and poet, was born near Pombreiro, and became in 1631 secretary to the Spanish embassy at Rome. Three years later he returned to Spain. His writings comprise works on Portuguese history, on Portugal and its possessions in America and Africa, and commentaries on Camoens. His Portuguese poems comprise about two hundred sonnets and twelve eclogues; and he wrote three treatises on poetry.—MANUEL SEVERIN DE FARIA (1583-1655) was a learned numismatist. Farina, JOHANN MARIA (1685-1766), a native of Piedmont who settled in Cologne in 1709, and invented Eau-de-Cologne.

Farinelli, CARLO. See BROSCHI.

Farini, LUIGI CARLO (1812-66), Italian statesman, born near Ravenna, studied medicine, and practised with success, but in 1841, for political reasons, had to leave the Papal States for Thrin. The amnesty called him to Rome in 1846, where he became an under-secretary for Home Affairs, and held office under Rossi. In 1851 he became minister of Public Instruction in Piedmont, in 1859 provisional governor of Modena, in 1861 minister of Commerce in Cavour's last cabinet, and he was himself premier from December 1862 till the following March. His Il Stato Romano was translated into English by Mr Gladstone (1851-54); his Storia d'Italia is a continuation of Botta's work. [Far-ee'-nee.]

Farjeon, BENJAMIN LEOPOLD, novelist, was born in England of Jewish ancestry in 1833, and spent some years in Australia and at Dunedin as journalist. Before his death in 1903 he had published upwards of thirty works—Joshua Marvel, In a Silver Sea, Toilers of Babylon, &c.

Farley, JAMES LEWIS (1823-85), born in Dublin, lived much in, and wrote much on, Turkey.

Farmer, ANTHONY, the ne'er-do-weel Catholic convert whom James II. tried to get made president of Magdalen College, Oxford (1687).

Farmer, GEORGE (1732-79), captain R.N., was born at Youghal, and perished in a gallant engagement with a French frigate off Ushant.

Farmer, RICHARD, D.D. (1735-97), born at Leicester, in 1753 entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, graduated four years later, and became classical tutor. He served the curacy of Swavesey, nine miles from Cambridge, joined the Literary Club, and helped Johnson with Cambridge notes for his Lives of the Poets. His only work, the once famous Essay on the Learning of Shakespeare (1767), showed that the great dramatist derived his knowledge of the ancients from translations. He was successively master of Emmanuel (1775), chief-librarian to the university (1778), and prebendary at Lichfield (1780), Canterbury (1782), and St Paul's (1788).

Farnborough, LORD. See MAY.

Farnese, an illustrious Italian family.—ALESSANDRO, raised to the papal see in 1534 as Paul III., founded the duchy of Parma and Piacenza.—ALESSANDRO (1546-92), son of the second duke, and one of the most skillful generals of his age, distinguished himself at Lepanto (1571), as governor of the Spanish Netherlands captured Antwerp (1585), and compelled Henry IV. of France to raise the siege of Paris (1590).—ELIZABETH (1692-1766) became the wife of Philip V. of Spain in 1714, and warmly supported Alberoni's policy (Life by Armstrong, 1892).—The three antique sculptures (the Farnese Hercules, Flora, and Bull) were removed about 1790 from the Farnese Palace at Rome to Naples. [Far-nay' zeh.]

Farquhar, GEORGE, was born at Londonderry in 1678, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He next became an actor at one of the Dublin theatres, but proved an indifferent performer. The accidental wounding of a brother-performer so shocked him that he quitted the boards, went to London, and shortly after received a commission in a regiment stationed in Ireland. His first comedy, Love and a Bottle (1698), proved a success. His Constant Couple (1700) met with a brilliant reception, and to it he wrote a sequel, Sir Harry Wildair. In 1703 he produced The Inconstant, founded on the Wild-goose Chase of Beaumont and Fletcher. Having married in the same year, he fell into pecuniary difficulties, sold his commission, and, struggling with adverse fortune, succumbed, and died in April 1707. During his last illness he wrote the best of his plays, The Beaux' Stratagem, and died while its wit and invention were making the town roar with delight. The Recruiting Officer had been produced with success in 1706. Farquhar, though coarse, is one of the best of our comic dramatists, and possesses on the whole more variety and character than any of his competers. See Ewald's edition of his Dramatic Works (1893). [Far'-kar.]

Farr, WILLIAM, D.C.L., C.B., statistician, born at Kenley, Shropshire, 30th November 1807, studied medicine and worked at medical statistics. Entering the Registrar-general's Office in 1838, he became superintendent of the statistical department, retired in 1880, and died 14th April 1883. His chief books are Tables of Lifetimes, Annuities, and Premiums (1864), English Reproduction Table (1880), and Net Premiums for Insurance against Fatal Accident (1880). See Memoir by Humphreys prefixed to his Vital Statistics (1885).

Farragut, DAVID GLASGOW, American seaman, was born of Spanish origin, near Knoxville, Tennessee, 6th July 1801. Entering the navy in 1810, he became captain in 1855. In the civil war he commanded the armament fitted out (1862) for the capture of New Orleans. The approach to the city was strongly defended by batteries and a Confederate fleet, and Farragut bombarded them for six days without effect; but at length, during the darkness, he forced the river, destroyed the Confederate vessels, and entered the city on 25th April. On 5th August 1864 he destroyed the enemy's gunboats in Mobile Bay; and a few days later Mobile surrendered. He was made vice-admiral, the grade being created for him by congress, as was also that of admiral (1866). He died 14th August 1870. See Lives by his son (1879) and Mahan (1892).

Farrant, RICHARD (1530-85), musician, was organist of St George's Chapel and of the Chapel Royal. His name is best known by the anthem, 'Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake,' which, however, seems certainly not to be his. He actually composed a morning and evening service, two anthems, and parts of other services.

Farrar, FREDERIC WILLIAM, D.D., Dean of Canterbury, was born in Bombay, 7th August 1831, and graduated at London University and at Cambridge, where he was fourth classic. Ordained in 1854, he was for many years a master at Harrow, and in 1871-76 head-master of Marlborough College; in 1868 and 1874-75 he was a select preacher before the University of Cambridge, in 1869-73 honorary chaplain to the Queen, and afterwards a chaplain-in-ordinary. He became canon of Westminster and rector of St Margaret's in 1876, archdeacon of Westminster in 1883, chaplain to the House of Commons in 1890, and Dean of Canterbury in 1895. An eloquent preacher, a zealous temperance reformer, and a productive and popular writer, he died 22nd March 1903. His writings included, besides articles in magazines and encyclopedias, Eric (1858) and other stories of school-life, and early works on philology and education, The Witness of History to Christ (Hulsean Lectures for 1870); The Life of Christ (1874), which passed through twelve editions in as many months; a Life of St Paul (1879); Early Days of Christianity (1882); History of Interpretation (Baumton Lectures for 1885); Lives of the Fathers (1888), and The Bible, its Meaning and Supremacy (1897). One of several volumes of sermons is his Eternal Hope (1878), denying the probability of eternal punishment. Darkness and Dawn (1892) is a story of Nero's days, and Gathering Clouds (1895) of Chrysostom's.

Farre, ARTHUR (1811-87), a great London midwifery doctor, professor at King's College 1841-62.

Farren, WILLIAM (1786-1861), an actor and actor's son, and the father of the actor Henry Farren (c. 1826-60), as he, again, was of the burlesque actress, Miss Nelly Farren (1848-1904).

Fastolf, SIR JOHN, was born about 1378 at Caistor near Yarmouth. He distinguished himself at Agincourt (1415), and still more in the 'Battle of the Herrings' (1429), so called because, while conveying supplies to the English besiegers of Orleans, he formed a laager of herring-barrels, and beat off a whole French army. Later in the same year he was less successful against Joan of Arc, and at Patay, according to Monstrelet, displayed such cowardice that the Duke of Bedford stripped him of his Garter. This, however, is questionable; he rather seems to have retained all his honours till in 1440 he came home to Norfolk, and in 1441 he was granted a pension of £20 'for notable and praiseworthy service and good counsel.' His Norfolk life is mirrored faithfully in the Paston Letters, where we see him adding to his broad possessions, heaping up riches, building a huge new castle at Caistor—a hard old man, yet not without love of learning and the Church. He died 5th November 1459. His identification with 'Sir John Falstaff' is at least incomplete, for Oldecastle (q.v.) was certainly Shakespeare's prototype.

Fa'tima, the only daughter of Mohammed, was the wife of Ali; from them are descended the Fatimites, who ruled over Egypt and North Africa (969-1171), and later over Syria and Palestine.

Faucher, LÉON, publicist and statesman, was born at Limoges, 8th September 1803. From 1830 to 1842 he was editor of the Temps and other newspapers, and wrote for the Revue des Deux Mondes a series of articles on the industrial condition of England, collected as Études sur l'Angleterre (2 vols. 1845). After the revolution of 1848 he was elected to the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies. When Louis Napoleon was chosen president, Faucher became minister of Public Works, and subsequently minister of the Interior; after the coup d'état he withdrew from political life. He died at Marseilles, 14th December 1854. See his Life (1875). [Fo'shay.]

Faucit, HELEN. See MARTIN, LADY.

Fauntleroy, HENRY, forger, was born in 1785, and at fifteen entered the London banking-house of Marsh, Sibbald & Co. His father had been one of the original founders, and on his death in 1807 the son became a partner, and ere long almost its sole manager. In 1824 it was discovered that the signatures of two trustees for £1000 had been forged in 1820 for the purpose of selling the stock, while Fauntleroy had been paying the dividends regularly ever since. Much larger transactions of the same nature were discovered, and Fauntleroy was tried, condemned, and hanged 30th November 1824.

Faure, FRANÇOIS FÉLIX, president of the French Republic, was born in Paris, 20th January 1841. A Roman Catholic, though of Protestant ancestry, and a Moderate Republican, he was quite a self-made man, having been first a journeyman carrier in Touraine, but ultimately a merchant and ship-owner at Havre. He served as a volunteer in the Franco-German war, in 1881 became deputy for Havre, and, after holding posts in several administrations, in January 1895 succeeded Casimir-Périer as president. He died of apoplexy, 16th February 1899.

Fauriel, CLAUDE CHARLES, born at St Étienne, 21st Oct. 1772, in 1799 was secretary under Fouché, but resigned to devote himself to letters. After the July revolution he was a professor in the Paris Faculté des Lettres, and was elected to the Academy in 1836. He died 15th July 1844. In 1836 he published his Histoire de la Gaule Méridionale sous les Germains; in 1837 an edition of the Provençal rhymed chronicle on the crusade against the Albigenes. His Histoire de la Poésie Provençale (1846) was based on his lectures. See Sainte-Beuve's Portraits Contemporains, vol. iv. [Fo'-ree-d.]

Faust, JOHANN. See FUST.

Faustina, mother and daughter, wives of two of the noblest among the Roman emperors. The elder, Annia Galeria, usually spoken of as Faustina Senior, was the wife of Antoninus Pius, and died 141 A.D.; the younger, Faustina Junior, was married to his successor, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, and died in 175 A.D. Both, unless maligned by partisans, were notorious for profligacy, yet after death their memories were signally honoured by their forgiving husbands.

Favart, CHARLES SIMON (1710-92), dramatist, was born at Paris. In 1745 he, as director of the Opéra Comique, and his wife made the first attempt to harmonise the actors' costume with their impersonations. This excited the jealousy of the other theatres, and the Opéra Comique was closed in its first year. After spending some time in Flanders in the army under Marshal Saxe, Favart returned to Paris and continued to write operas. His most celebrated pieces are Le Coq du Village, Bastien et Bastienne, Ninette à la Cour, Les Trois Sultanes, and L'Anglais à Bordeaux. See his Mémoires et Correspondance (1809). [Fa-vahr'.]

Favre, JULES CLAUDE GABRIEL, was born at Lyons, 21st March 1809, studied for the bar, and was engaged in the July revolution of 1830. After this he took a prominent part in politics as an uncompromising republican. The coup d'état closed his political career, and he returned to his profession. In 1858 he defended Orsini; this procured his election to the Legislature for Paris, and he became one of the leaders of the republicans against Napoleon III. In September 1870, after the fall of the empire, he was appointed minister of Foreign Affairs, and in January 1871 settled the terms for the capitulation of the capital. He resigned office in July 1871, resumed practice at the bar, and died 20th January 1880. His Mélanges politiques et littéraires were edited by Maritain (1882). [Fah'vr.]

Fawcett, HENRY, was born at Salisbury, 26th August 1833, son of the mayor of the city, a decided Liberal. He went in 1852 to Cambridge, where in 1856 he graduated as seventh wrangler, and was elected to a fellowship at Trinity Hall, and commenced to read for the bar. In September 1858, when they were shooting, shots from his father's gun entered both Fawcett's eyes, totally blinding him. He was a candidate for parliament at Southwark in November 1860, and was defeated at Cambridge in 1863 by the Conservative candidate. His Manual of Political Economy (often re-edited) led to his election to the chair of Political Economy at Cambridge in 1863, a post which he held until his death. Other writings are The Economic Position of the British Labourer and Protection and Free Trade. In 1864 he stood for Brighton, but was defeated; but in 1865 he was elected, and again in 1868. His independence of party ties was often misconstrued as half-hearted Liberalism. His so-called 'Tea-room' party virtually ensured the passing of Mr Disraeli's Household Suffrage Bill of 1867. He urged forward measures for the abolition of religious tests at the universities, the extension of the Factory Acts to agricultural children, the promotion of compulsory education, the preservation of commons and open spaces, and the better government of India. He strongly opposed in 1873 Gladstone's Irish University Bill; and he introduced a bill for the abolition of tests in Trinity College, Dublin. In 1874 Fawcett lost his seat for Brighton, but was elected for Hackney. He joined cordially with his party in opposing Beaconsfield's policy on the Eastern question; and continuing his work for India, was popularly known as 'the member for Hindustan.' He opposed legislative restrictions upon the industry of women, and was a warm supporter of their claims to representation. In 1880 Fawcett was again elected for Hackney, and Gladstone offered him the Postmaster-generalship, which he accepted. Here he carried several reforms—the introduction of the parcel post, postal orders, and sixpenny telegrams. He died 6th November 1884. See Life by Leslie Stephen (1885); and his article in the Dic. Nat. Biography (1889).

Fawcett, MRS HENRY (Millicent Garrett), born at Aldeburgh, Suffolk, 11th June 1847, wife of the above from 1867, is the author of Political Economy for Beginners, Tales in Political Economy, &c. She has taken a keen interest in the higher education of women and the extension of the franchise to women. She was made president of the Women's Unionist Association in 1889. She is the sister of Mrs Garrett Anderson (q.v.); and her daughter Philippa in 1890 came out at Cambridge 'above the senior wrangler.'

Fawkes, FRANCIS (1720-77), poet and translator, for twenty years vicar of Orpington in Kent. 'The Brown Jug' is his best-known piece.

Fawkes, GUY, was born in York of Protestant parentage in 1570. Becoming a Catholic before he was of age, he served in the Spanish army in the Netherlands 1593-1604, then crossed to England at Catesby's invitation. Inspired with fanatical zeal for his religion, he plotted with several Catholic gentlemen to blow up the king, his ministers, and the members of both Houses of Parliament, 5th November 1605. Taken with the match in his possession, he was tried and hanged 31st Jan. 1606. See works by Jardine (1857), Father Gerard (1896), and S. R. Gardiner (1897).

Fay, ANDRÁS (1786-1864), a Hungarian poet, playwright, and novelist, lived and died in Budapest. See Life by Erdélyi (1890).

Faye, HÉRY AUGUSTE ÉTIENNE (1814-1902), astronomer, born at Benoit-du-Sault, became in 1873 professor of Astronomy at the École Polytechnique, and in 1878 director of the Paris Observatory. In 1843 he discovered Faye's comet.

Fazy, JEAN JAMES (1796-1878), journalist and publicist, was born at Geneva, founded the Revue de Genève, became the leading spirit in the Radical movement (1846), and until 1861 was the real ruler of Geneva. He wrote a History of Geneva (1838-40) and on constitutional law. [Fah-ze.]

Fearon, WILLIAM ANDREWES, D.D., canon (1906) of Winchester, in 1884-1901 head-master of Winchester School, was born at Assington near Sudbury, 4th February 1841, from Winchester passed to New College, and, having taken a double first in 1863, was elected a fellow.

Fechner, GUSTAV THEODOR (1801-87), became professor of Physics at Leipzig in 1834, working mainly at galvanism, electro-chemistry, and the theory of colour. In 1839, from disease of the eyes, he abandoned these branches for philosophy and psycho-physics, or the study of the relations of physiology and psychology, expounded in his Elemente der Psychophysik (1860). Besides works on galvanism he wrote some books on belief and on the soul, and smaller miscellaneous works. For his psycho-physical law see Ward in Mind for 1876. See his Correspondence (1890), and Life by Kuntze (1891). [Fekh'ner.]

Fechter, CHARLES ALBERT, actor, was born in London, 23d October 1824. He was educated in France as a sculptor, but, making his début on the stage in 1840, he soon was popular. In 1860 he appeared in London in an English version of Ruy Blas, and next year astonished Londoners by his impersonations of Hamlet and of Othello. He became lessee of the Lyceum Theatre, playing the chief part in most of the pieces produced. In 1869 and 1872 he paid visits to the United States, where he thenceforward remained. He died at his farm near Quakertown, Pennsylvania, 5th August 1879. [Fekht-ter.]

Feith, RHLJNVIS, Dutch poet, was born 7th February 1753, at Zwolle, became mayor of Zwolle in 1780, and died 8th February 1824. His Oden en Gedichten (1796-1810) are lyrical. Of his tragedies the best known are Thirza (1784), Johanna Gray (1791), and Iuc de Castro (1793). His polished prose, Brieven (1784-94), contains much fine criticism. [Fit.]

Felix, ANTONIUS, or CLAUDIUS, a Roman procurator of Judæa in the time of the apostle Paul (Acts xxiv.), was a freedman of Claudius I. and brother of his favourite Pallas. Josephus says he cleared the country of robbers and suppressed the chaotic seditions of the Jews; but his cruelty, lust, and greed were unbounded. Recalled in 62 A.D., he narrowly escaped execution.

Felix, the name of five popes.—FELIX I., who succeeded in 269, has been put, doubtfully, amongst the martyrs.—FELIX II. was the first antipope, being consecrated when Liberius was banished (356) for refusing to condemn Athanasius. When Liberius was restored (357) Felix retired; but he was ultimately regarded as a saint and martyr.—Under FELIX III., pope in 483-492, began the first disruption between the Churches of the East and West.—FELIX IV. was appointed by Theodoric in 526, and died in 530.—For FELIX V. see AMADEUS.

Felix, St, with his sister and fellow-sufferer Regula, the patron saint of Zurich. Early in the 3d century he preached Christ there, and was beheaded on the site of the great cathedral.—Another St FELIX, a Burgundian, was first Bishop of Dunwich from 631 to 647.

Fell, JOHN, Dean of Christ Church and Bishop of Oxford, was born 23d June 1625, his father, Dr Samuel Fell (1534-1649), being also Dean of Christ Church, of which the boy became a student. He volunteered for the king, and with three others contrived to maintain the Church of England services during the Commonwealth; at the Restoration he was made Canon and four months later Dean of Christ Church, royal chaplain, and D.D. He governed the college strictly, restored its buildings, was liberal to poor scholars, and did much to promote learning. In 1676 he became Bishop of Oxford, without giving up his deanery. He rebuilt the episcopal palace at Cuddesdon, and died 10th July 1686. 'I do not like thee, Doctor Fell,' is ascribed to Tom Brown (q.v.).

Fellows, SIR CHARLES, archaeologist, was born at Nottingham in 1799. He discovered (1838) the ruins of Xanthus, capital of Lycia in Asia Minor, and those of Tlos. His Journal written during an Excursion in Asia Minor (1839) had drawings of the architecture and sculpture, and copies of inscriptions. On another visit to Lycia in 1839 he discovered the ruins of thirteen cities, which he described in Discoveries in Lycia (1841). For the British Museum, Fellows went out to Lycia twice, in 1841-44, to select marbles, casts, &c. Knighted in 1845, he died 8th November 1860.

Felltham, OWEN (c. 1602-68), author of Resolves, Divine, Morall, Political (1620-28), was born in Suffolk, and lived at Great Billing, Northants.

Felton, CORNELIUS CONWAY (1807-62), born at West Newbury, Mass., became in 1834 Eliot professor of Greek at Harvard College, and in 1860 president. He published translations of modern European works and editions of Greek classics; also Greece, Ancient and Modern (1867).

Felton, JOHN (c. 1595-1628), a Suffolk captain, the assassin of the Duke of Buckingham.

Fénelon, FRANÇOIS DE SALIGNAC DE LA MOTHE, was born August 6, 1651, at the château de Fénelon in Périgord. At twenty he entered the seminary of St Sulpice in Paris, and received holy orders in 1675. After some time spent in parochial duties, he was in 1678 named director of an institution for women converts to the Catholic faith. Here he wrote De l'Éducation des Filles; and next he became head of a mission sent, on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685), to preach among the Protestants of Poitou. In 1689 he was appointed by Louis XIV. preceptor of his grandson, the young Duke of Burgundy; and as such wrote the Fables, the Dialogues of the Dead, and the History of the Ancient Philosophers. He was presented by the king to the abbey of St Valery (1694) and to the archbishopric of Cambrai (1695). He had formed in 1687 the acquaintance of the celebrated quietist mystic, Madame Guyon (q.v.); and, convinced of the unfairness of the outcry which made her responsible for the grosser quietism of Molinos, he advised her to submit her book to Bossuet (q.v.). In the condemnation of the book by this prelate Fénelon acquiesced; but, as Madame Guyon made a formal submission to the Church, he refused to join in any personal condemnation. Bossuet then prepared the Instruction; this Fénelon disapproved, and composed his own Maximes des Saints sur la Vie intérieure in defence of certain of Madame Guyon's doctrines. A fierce controversy ensued, and in the end Fénelon submitted his book to the judgment of the Holy See. But the controversy was maintained till the long-delayed decision of the pope brought it to a close in 1699, by a brief condemning the Maximes des Saints. The readiness with which Fénelon accepted this decision constitutes, in the eyes of his fellow-churchmen, one of his highest titles to glory. Fénelon's Télémaque (1699) was regarded by the king as a masked satire upon his court. Louis's anger knew no bounds, and Fénelon was strictly restrained within his diocese. From this date he lived almost exclusively for his flock; but in the revived Jansenistic dispute he engaged earnestly on the side of orthodoxy. He died January 7, 1715. The works of Fénelon are very voluminous, and on every variety of subjects—Dialogues des Morts, Dialogues sur l'Éloquence, Lettres sur Religion et Métaphysique, Traité sur l'Existence de Dieu, a work on the temporal power of the popes, &c. His correspondence is very extensive. See Bausset's edition of the Works (22 vols. 1821-24), his Histoire de Fénelon (1808; new ed. 1862), the Correspondance (1727-29), and Marten's edition of the Works (3 vols. Paris, 1874); German Lives by Hunnius (1873) and Wunderlich (1873); Fénelon à Cambrai, by E. de Broglie (1884); a monograph by Paul Janet (1896); and English lives by Mrs Lear (1876), Miss Sanders (1901), and the Viscount de Cyres (1901). Douen, in L'Intolérance de Fénelon (1872), sought to prove that Fénelon was guilty of inexcusable severity and even cruelty towards the Protestants. [Fayn-lon⁹.]

Fenn, GEORGE MANVILLE (1831-1909), a popular and voluminous writer of novels, stories for boys, &c., was born in London.

Fenning, ELIZABETH (1792-1815), a London servant, hanged for attempting to poison her employers, though she to the last protested, and thousands believed in, her innocence.

Fenwick, SIR JOHN (c. 1645-97), after serving in the army, in 1688 became Tory M.P. for Northumberland. He entered ardently into the Assassination Plot, and in 1696, being committed to the Tower, made an artful confession involving several Whig leaders in the Jacobite intrigues. The only witness against him had been spirited out of the country, but the Whig party secured the passing of a bill of attainder under which he was beheaded.

Ferdinand the Catholic, V. of Castile, II. of Aragon and Sicily, and III. of Naples, was born at Sos in Aragon, 10th March 1452, the son of John II. of Navarre and Aragon. In 1460 he married Isabella, sister of Henry IV. of Castile. On Henry's death in 1474 most of the nobles refused to acknowledge the legitimacy of his daughter Juana, and proclaimed Isabella and Ferdinand, who in 1479 emerged victorious from the civil war that ensued. On the death of John (1479) the crowns of Aragon and Castile were united under Ferdinand and Isabella; Isabella retaining sole authority in Castilian affairs. Ferdinand's talents found scope in his own kingdom, faction, robbery, and outrage being rife throughout the country. The suppression of the banditti he accomplished by reorganising the santa hermandad, or 'holy brotherhood,' a kind of militia-police, which also helped to break the power of the feudal aristocracy. The establishment of the Inquisition in 1478-80 likewise helped to lessen the nobles' influence; and Ferdinand increased his power by vesting in himself the grand-mastership of the military orders. In all his schemes he was ably seconded by his queen and by Cardinal Ximenes. The year 1492 opened with the fall of Granada, which marked the end of the long struggle with the Moors; and in August Columbus set sail from Palos. The Jews were immediately expelled from the conquered kingdom; and, a few years after, the privileges secured to the Moors were faithlessly withdrawn, baptism or exile being offered as alternatives. By these two acts the most industrious and civilised inhabitants of the Peninsula were driven from it. The discovery of America gave Spain for a time supremacy on both sides of the Atlantic. From France Ferdinand recovered by treaty the counties of Rousillon and Cerdagne (now the Pyrénées-Orientales); in 1495 he formed the Holy League with the pope, the emperor, Milan and Venice, and ultimately England, under which Gonsalvo de Cordova twice drove the French out of Naples, the second time in 1503, after which it remained in Ferdinand's possession.

In 1504 Isabella died, and Ferdinand at once had his insane daughter Juana proclaimed queen of Castile, and himself regent. In 1505 he married Germaine de Foix, a niece of Louis XII. of France. After Isabella's death he was compelled to reverse his former policy and buy off French claims on Naples, besides being frequently in straits for money, so that he was for some time unable to complete the dowry required to secure the marriage of his daughter Catharine with Henry, Prince of Wales. But he took part in the league of Cambrai against Venice in 1508, conquered Oran in 1509, and in 1512 made himself master of Navarre—thus becoming monarch of Spain from the Pyrenees to Gibraltar. He died 23d January 1516, and was succeeded by his grandson, best known as the Emperor Charles V. Ferdinand was unsurpassed in an age of cunning diplomats. To him and Isabella Spain owes her unity and greatness as a nation and the foundation of the imperial influence which she exercised over Europe. See Prescott's Ferdinand and Isabella (1838) and the Baron de Nervo's Isabella the Catholic (trans. from French, 1897).

Ferdinand I., German emperor from 1556 to 1564, was born in Spain in 1503. He was the son of Philip I., and succeeded his brother, Charles V., in the empire in 1556, having been elected king of the Romans in 1531. In 1521 Ferdinand had married the daughter of the king of Bohemia and Hungary; and when her childless brother Louis fell in 1526 in battle with the Turks he claimed the crown. This involved him in a struggle with John Zápolya, who laid claim to Hungary, and who was supported by the sultan Soliman. Ferdinand at last bought off the Turks and secured Hungary and Bohemia. He attempted to reconcile his Protestant and Catholic subjects, and urged, though fruitlessly, the reformation of abuses on the Council of Trent. He died in 1564, and was succeeded by his son, Maximilian II. See a work by Bucholtz (1838).

Ferdinand II., German emperor, was born at Gratz, 9th July 1578. He was grandson of Ferdinand I., his father being the younger brother of Maximilian, and was educated by the Jesuits. As soon as he succeeded to his own duchy of Styria, he set about putting down Protestantism by force. He attempted the same in Bohemia and Hungary, of which countries he had been elected king during the lifetime of the childless emperor Matthias, and with the aid of the Catholic League and of the Elector of Saxony subdued them, while by merciless persecution he re-established Catholicism. Meanwhile he had been elected emperor of Germany (1619); and the war now became the terrible 'Thirty Years' War.' The imperial generals, Tilly and Wallenstein, were opposed by the Protestant states of Lower Saxony, headed by Christian IV. of Denmark; but the confederates, defeated by Tilly, were forced to conclude peace at Lubeck in 1629. Ferdinand now issued an edict taking away from all German Protestants nearly all the rights they had acquired by a century of struggles; and the troops of Wallenstein and of the League were immediately set to work to carry it out—an enterprise arrested by the dismissal of Wallenstein, the opposition of Richelieu, and the advent of Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden. After the murder of Wallenstein, at which Ferdinand connived, the imperial commander, Gallas, by the victory of Nordlingen (1634) detached Saxony from the Swedish alliance; but the ability of the Swedish generals and the open part that France now took in the contest brought back the balance of victory to the Protestant arms. Ferdinand died 15th February 1637. See German Life by Hurter (1864).

Ferdinand III., German emperor from 1637 to 1657, was the son of Ferdinand II., and was born at Gratz, 11th July 1608. He was not so much under Jesuit influence as his father, and was inclined for peace; and though the conflicting interests of the belligerents made this impossible for years, a congress met at Münster in 1643, and the Peace of Westphalia was secured in 1648. He died 2d April 1657.

Ferdinand I., emperor of Austria from 1835 to 1848, the eldest son of Francis I. by his second marriage with Maria Theresa, princess of the Two Sicilies, was born at Vienna, 19th April 1793. When he succeeded his father in 1835 it was expected that he would inaugurate a liberal policy, but absolutist principles triumphed, and Metternich governed. When the revolutionary movement broke out in 1847-48, Ferdinand consented to the dismissal of Metternich and the appointment of a responsible ministry, and granted the outlines of a constitution. But the October insurrection in Vienna obliged him to retire to Olmütz, where, on 2d December 1848, he abdicated in favour of his nephew, Francis Joseph. He afterwards lived in retirement at Prague, and died there 29th June 1875.

Ferdinand I., king of the Two Sicilies, third son of Charles III. of Spain, was born 12th January 1751. When Charles ascended the Spanish throne in 1759 Ferdinand succeeded him in Naples, under a regency, as Ferdinand IV. After his marriage, in 1768, with Maria Carolina, daughter of Maria Theresa, he fell completely under her influence, and lost his popularity. He joined England and Austria against France in 1793, but in 1801 he was forced to make a treaty with Napoleon. A violation of this treaty compelled him in 1806 to take refuge in Sicily, under English protection. The French took possession of Naples, which Napoleon bestowed first on his brother Joseph, and afterwards on Murat. Ferdinand was reinstated by the Congress of Vienna in 1815, and next year united his two states into the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. His queen had died in 1814. A popular movement in 1820 compelled him to introduce a constitution, but with Austrian help he established a rigorous despotism. He died 4th January 1825, and was succeeded by his son, Francis I. See Corly Jeaffreson, The Queen of Naples and Lord Nelson (1889).

Ferdinand II., king of the Two Sicilies, son of Francis I., was born 12th January 1810, and succeeded his father in 1830. His first wife, a daughter of Victor Emmanuel I., dying in 1836, he married Maria Theresa, daughter of the Archduke Charles of Austria, and gave himself up to Austrian counsels. Henceforward Naples became the scene of incessant conspiracy, insurrection, and political prosecutions. Ferdinand yielded to the storm of 1848, and granted a constitution, but the Sicilians mistrusted his pledges and declared that he had forfeited the Sicilian crown. Ferdinand called the promised national parliament, but quickly dismissed it. He subdued the revolt in Sicily by the bombardment of its chief cities that earned him the epithet of 'Bomba.' He now set aside the constitution, while all who had taken part in reforms were subjected to those persecutions which the Letters of Mr Gladstone in 1851 held up to the execration of the world. Bomba died 22d May 1859, and was succeeded by his son Francis II. (1836-94), the weak and cowardly 'Bombino,' who fell in 1860-61 before Garibaldi and Italian unity. See Nisco, Ferdinando II. (1884).

Ferdinand III., Grand-duke of Tuscany and Archduke of Austria, was born at Florence, 6th May 1769. On his father's succeeding to the imperial throne in 1790, he became Duke of Tuscany. Here he inaugurated many reforms, encouraged commerce, and opened up good roads. He was the first to recognise the French Republic in 1792. Next year Russia and England constrained him to become a passive member of the coalition against France, but on the French occupation of Piedmont in 1795 he resumed friendly relations with France. In 1797, to save his states from annexation, Ferdinand concluded a very unfavourable treaty with Bonaparte. French intrigues drove him into an Austrian alliance, and Bonaparte declared war against Austria and Tuscany. In 1799 Ferdinand retired to Vienna, and at the peace of Lunéville (1801) renounced all claim on Tuscany, but the peace of Paris reinstated him in 1814. He died 17th June 1824. See German work by Emmer (1878).

Ferdinand I., King of Bulgaria, was born in Vienna, 26th February 1861. He was the youngest son of Prince Augustus of Saxe-Coburg and Princess Clementine of Orleans, daughter of Louis Philippe, and served as an officer in the Austrian army. On the deposition of Prince Alexander of Bulgaria, Ferdinand was offered and accepted the crown in August 1887. Under his rule the condition of Bulgaria has been comparatively peaceful and prosperous, although at first Ferdinand was thwarted in every possible manner by Russia. In 1893 he married Princess Maria Louisa, daughter of the Duke of Parma, and in 1908 Princess Eleonore of Reuss-Köstritz. In 1908 he proclaimed Bulgaria independent, and took the title of king or czar. A son, Boris, born in 1894, was admitted to the Greek Church in 1896.

Ferguson, ADAM, philosopher and historian, was born 20th June 1723, at Logierait in Perthshire, where his father was parish minister. He studied at St Andrews and Edinburgh, and as chaplain to the Black Watch was present at Fontenoy (1745). In 1757 he succeeded David Hume as keeper of the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh, and was next professor, first of Natural Philosophy (1759), and subsequently (1764) of Moral Philosophy. He accompanied the young Earl of Chesterfield (1774) on his travels on the Continent, and acted as secretary to the commission sent out by Lord North to try to arrange the disputes with the North American colonies (1778-79). Ill-health compelled him in 1785 to resign his professorship, in which he was succeeded by Dugald Stewart. He next travelled on the Continent, then lived at Neidpath Castle, and latterly at St Andrews, where he died 22d February 1816. His works are an Essay on Civil Society (1766), Institutes of Moral Philosophy (1772), History of the Roman Republic (1782; long a standard authority), and Moral and Political Science (1792). See Memoir by John Small (1864).

Ferguson, DAVID (c. 1523-98), a witty Scotch reformer, originally a glover, and for more than thirty years minister at Dunfermline.

Ferguson, JAMES. See FERGUSON, ROBERT.

Ferguson, JAMES, astronomer, was born, a day-labourer's son, at Rothiemay, Banffshire, 25th April 1710. While keeping sheep he was constantly busy in making mechanical models, and at night in mapping the stars with a stretched thread and beads strung upon it. After working at various employments, he took to drawing patterns for embroidery, copying pictures and prints with pen and ink, and drawing portraits, first in Edinburgh, and then in London; his leisure time being given to astronomical pursuits. In 1748 he began lecturing on astronomy and mechanics. In 1761 he received from George III. a pension of £50, and was elected F.R.S. in 1763. He now lectured throughout the country, and wrote assiduously on his favourite subjects. He died 16th November 1776. Ferguson's principal works are Astronomy explained upon Newton's Principles (1756; 13th ed. revised by Brewster, 1811) and Lectures on Mechanics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, and Optics (1760; also edited by Brewster, 1805). See Life by Henderson (1867; 2d ed. 1870).

Ferguson, JOHN (1787-1856), an Irvine millionaire who left £400,000 for religious purposes.

Ferguson, PATRICK, inventor of the breech-loading rifle, was born in 1744 at Pitfour, Aberdeenshire, and served in the army in Germany and Tobago. In 1776 he patented his rifle, firing seven shots a minute, and sighted for ranges of from 100 to 500 yards; and with it he armed a corps of loyalists, who helped at the battle of Brandywine (1777) to defeat the Americans. On 7th October 1780 Major Ferguson fell, defending King's Mountain, South Carolina. See James Ferguson's Two Scottish Soldiers (1888).

Ferguson, ROBERT, the 'Plotter,' was born about 1637, near Alford, in Aberdeenshire, and in 1662 was onsted as a Presbyterian from the Kentish vicarage of Godmersham. He played for ten years a leading part in every treasonable scheme against the last two Stuart kings, and twice had to flee the kingdom. But after the Revolution, of which in 1706 he published a History, he conspired as busily for the Jacobite cause. He died in 1714.—His younger brother, JAMES, commanded a brigade at Blenheim, and died at Bois-le-Duc in 1705. See Ferguson the Plotter (1887), by James Ferguson, and his Two Scottish Soldiers (1888).

Ferguson, SIR SAMUEL, poet and Celtic scholar, was born at Belfast, 10th March 1810, and called to the Irish bar in 1838. He was appointed in 1867 first Deputy-keeper of Irish Records. As president of the Royal Irish Academy he gave a powerful impetus to the study of early Irish art. Knighted in 1878, he died 9th August 1886. His spirited poems were published as Lays of the Western Gael (1865), Congal (1872), Poems (1880), and The Forging of the Anchor (1888). His edition of the Leabhar Breac appeared in 1876; his Ogham Inscriptions in 1887. See Life by his widow (2 vols. 1896).

Ferguson, WILLIAM GOUW (c. 1633-95), a Dutch painter of dead game and still life, born in Scotland.

Ferguson, JAMES, historian of architecture, was born at Ayr, 22d January 1808, and after ten years as an indigo-planter in Bengal, explored nearly every corner of India, studying the rock-temples, which were illustrated in his earliest works. His History of Architecture (1865-76; 3d ed. 1894) appeared first as a Handbook in 1855. Besides works on fortification, he also published The Palaces of Nineveh and Persepolis Restored (1851), Tree and Serpent Worship (1869), and Rude Stone Monuments (1872). He died 9th Jan. 1886.

Ferguson, SIR JAMES, statesman, was born at Edinburgh, 18th March 1832, and educated at Rugby and Oxford. He succeeded as sixth baronet in 1849, entered the army in 1854, and was wounded at Inkermann. He represented Ayrshire in 1854-57 and in 1859-68 in the Conservative interest. In 1866-67 he was under-secretary for India, and in 1867-68 under-secretary of state. He was governor of South Australia (1868-73), governor of New Zealand (1873-74), and governor of Bombay (1880-85). In 1885 elected for Manchester, he was Foreign under-secretary in 1886-91, and Postmaster-general in 1891-2. He perished in the earthquake at Kingston, Jamaica, 14th January 1907.

Ferguson, ROBERT, Scottish poet, born at Edinburgh, 5th September 1750, was educated there, at Dundee, and at St Andrews University, where he wrote verses. He returned to Edinburgh, and was employed in the office of the commissary clerk, contributing to Ruddiman's Weekly Magazine poems which gained him such local reputation as proved his ruin—convivial excesses permanently injured his health. Religious melancholy became complete insanity after an accidental injury to his head. He died 16th Oct. 1774, and was buried in Canongate churchyard, where fifteen years later Burns placed a stone over his grave. His poems had been collected in 1773. There are editions by Ruddiman (1779), Irving (1880), Robert Chambers (1840), Grosart (1851; also Life, 1898), and Ford (1905). Ferguson possessed vigour, fancy, fluency, and humour, but lacked imagination and passion.

Ferguson, SIR WILLIAM, surgeon, was born at Prestonpans, 20th March 1808. He studied medicine in Edinburgh, and in 1836 became a surgeon in the Infirmary. In 1840 he went to London to occupy the chair of Surgery in King's College. In 1866 he was made a baronet, in 1867 serjeant-surgeon to the Queen, and in 1870 president of the Royal College of Surgeons, London. He died 10th February 1877. See Life by H. Smith (1877).

Ferrar, NICHOLAS, born in 1592, entered Clare Hall, Cambridge, studied medicine, travelled on the Continent (1613-18), engaged in business, and in 1624 was returned to parliament. But in 1625 he retired to Little Gidding in Huntingdonshire, and founded the religious community familiar to readers of Mr Shorthouse's John Inglesant; next year Laud ordained him deacon. The community numbered some thirty persons, who with constant services and perpetual prayer combined the occupation of fine bookbinding. Nicholas died 4th December 1637; but the 'Arminian Nunnery' was not broken up by the Puritans till ten years afterwards. See the two Lives of Ferrar, one by his brother John, edited by Mayor (1855), and Nicholas Ferrar, edited by the Rev. T. T. Carter (1892).

Ferrara, ANDREA, a broadsword-maker of the 16th century, probably born in Ferrara, who with his brother was in great repute as an armourer at Belluno in 1535. It is said that he tempered sword-blades by the method employed by the smiths of Damascus. See Cornhill Magazine, vol. xii. (1865). [Fer-rah-ra.]

In 1872 he was appointed professor at King's College, London, and afterwards physician to its and other hospitals. In 1876 he published The Functions of the Brain; in 1878 The Localisation of Cerebral Disease. He founded and edited the journal Brain. He was knighted in 1911.

Ferrier, JAMES FREDERICK, metaphysician, was born in Edinburgh, 16th June 1808. His father was a brother of Miss Ferrier, the novelist; his mother, a sister of Christopher North. He graduated B.A. at Oxford in 1831, and next year was admitted to the Scottish bar, but never practised. In 1842 he became professor of History at Edinburgh, in 1845 of Moral Philosophy at St Andrews. Ferrier early attracted notice by his metaphysical essays in Blackwood's Magazine. In his Institutes of Metaphysics (1854) he endeavours to construct a system of idealism in a series of propositions demonstrated after the manner of Euclid. He died at St Andrews, 11th June 1864. See Life by his son-in-law, Sir Alexander Grant, prefixed to his Lectures on Greek Philosophy (1866).

Ferrier, SUSAN EDMONSTONE, novelist, was born in Edinburgh, 7th September 1782. Her first work, Marriage (1818), was followed by The Inheritance (1824) and Destiny (1831); for the three she received £150, £1000, and £1700. Miss Ferrier enjoyed the friendship of Sir Walter Scott, who was by some for a time credited with the authorship of her tales. Her 'Recollections of Visits to Ashiestiel and Abbotsford' were published, with a Memoir, in Bentley's edition of her works (1881). She died at Edinburgh, 5th Nov. 1854. See Life by her grand-nephew (1899).

In 1869 he was elected to the Corps Législatif, where he voted against the war with Prussia; and during the siege of Paris (1870-71) he was mayor of the city. He was minister to Athens in 1872-73, and as minister of Public Instruction (1879) brought forward a bill excluding Jesuits from the schools. The clause was twice thrown out in the senate, but the expulsion of the Jesuits was effected by decrees founded on obsolete laws, and brought about the dissolution of the ministry in September 1880. M. Ferry then formed a cabinet, which lasted till November 1881. His last ministry (1883-85) fell through his policy of 'colonial expansion,' involving war in Madagascar and Tonquin. He died March 17, 1893. His Discours were edited by Robiquet (1893-97). [Ferree.]

Fersen, HANS AXEL, COMTE DE (1755-1810), a Swedish marshal, some time in the French service, who, disguised as a coachman, drove the royal family in the flight to Varennes (1791), and who was murdered by a Stockholm mob on a false charge of having poisoned the crown-prince. See Gaultot's A Friend of the Queen (Eng. tr. 1893).

Fesch, JOSEPH, Cardinal Archbishop of Lyons, was born 3d January 1763, at Ajaccio, the half-brother of Letizia Ramolino, Bonaparte's mother. He took holy orders, but became commissary to the revolutionary Army of the Alps in Italy. Having resumed the clerical habit, he helped on the concordat with Pope Pius VII. in 1801, and was raised to be Archbishop of Lyons (1802) and cardinal (1803). In 1804 he was French ambassador to Rome, and two years later he was appointed associate and successor of Dalberg, Prince Primate of the Confederation of the Rhine. At a conference of clergy in Paris in 1810 he gave utterance to views which lost him the favour of Napoleon, who was further exasperated by his letter to the pope, then (1812) in captivity at Fontainebleau. At the approach of the Austrians in 1814 he fled to Rome, where he died, 13th May 1839. See Life by Ricard (Par. 1893). [Fesch.]

Of his alphabetical epitome of the lost work of Verrius Flaccus, De Verborum Significatione, in twenty books, only the latter half (M-V) survives in a mutilated MS. at Naples. There is a (9th c.) meagre abstract of the whole. See K. O. Müller's edition (1839).

Fétis, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH, musician, was born at Mons, 25th March 1784, and became professor at the Paris Conservatory (1821) and director of the Brussels Conservatory (1833). He died 25th March 1871. He composed, wrote on the theory of music, and produced a Universal Biography of Musicians (1835-44; 2d ed. 1860-65) and General History of Music (1868-76). [Fay-teess.]

Fettes, SIR WILLIAM (1750-1836), merchant and lord-provost of Edinburgh, from 1804 a baronet, left £166,000 to found Fettes College (1870).

Feuerbach, LUDWIG ANDREAS, German philosopher, fourth son of the following, was born at Landshut, 28th July 1804. In 1828 he became privatdocent at Erlangen, but failed as a lecturer, and lived in studious quiet at Bruckberg for twenty years. He wrote against immortality (1830) and works on Bacon, Spinoza, Leibnitz, and Pierre Bayle; also Das Wesen des Christenthums (1841), on the nature of religion, which was translated into English by George Eliot. Feuerbach maintains that all authority above man, and all moral obligation, is a delusion; and the highest good is that which is on the whole most pleasurable, and consists in resemblance to that ideal humanity which man creates for himself, and worships as God. The German communists degraded this into an atheism which ignored any moral or social law imposed on the individual from any other source than himself. Feuerbach died 13th September 1872. His works were collected in ten volumes (1846-66). See books by Ludwig Grün (1874), Beyer (1872), Starcke (1885), Engels (1888), and Bolin (1891). [Fo'er-bach.]

Feuerbach, PAUL JOHANN ANSELM VON, jurist, was born 14th November 1775, at Jena, where he studied law. He had made a brilliant reputation by his Kritik des natürlichen Rechts (1796) and his Anti-Hobbes (1798); his Lehrbuch des gemeinen peinlichen Rechts (1801; 14th ed. 1847) placed him at the head of the new school of Rigorists. His penal code for Bavaria (1813) was taken as a basis for amending the criminal law of several other countries. In 1808-11 he published a great collection of criminal cases. In his Geschworenen-gericht (1813-25) he maintained that the verdict of a jury is not adequate legal proof of a crime. Appointed a judge at Bamberg (1814) and at Anspach (1817), he died at Frankfort, 25th May 1833. See the Life by his son Ludwig (1852).

Feuillel, OCTAVE, novelist, born at Saint-Lô in La Manche, 11th August 1812, was one of Dumas' literary assistants, and began his own career with Le Fruit défendu. From 1848 he published in the Revue des Deux Mondes a series collected in Scènes et Proverbes and Scènes et Comédies (1853-56). Elected Scribe's successor in the French Academy (1862), and afterwards librarian to the emperor, he died in Paris, 29th December 1890. His popularity began with Le Roman d'un Jeune Homme Pauvre (1858), and was increased by Sibylle (1862), La Mort (1866), &c. He wrote many successful comedies. [Feh-yay.]

Féval, PAUL HENRI CORENTIN, novelist, born at Rennes, 27th September 1817. Of his many novels may be named Les Mystères de Londres (1844), Le Fils du Diable (1847), and Le Bossu (1858); some had an extraordinary run when dramatised. He died 8th March 1887. [Fay-val.]

Feydeau, ERNEST (1821-73), a French novelist whose stories depict the worst features of society in the time of the Empire. But Sylvie is a novel of much more than ordinary power. [Fay-do.]

Foulkes, EDMUND SALSBURY (1819-94), an Oxford tutor and clergyman, from 1855 to 1870 a R.C. convert, and author of sixteen works.

Fiacre, or FIACHRACH, Sr, an Irish anchorite, who founded a monastery in France, and died about 670. In 1640 one Nicholas Sauvage, a hirer of hackney carriages, lived at the Hôtel St Fiacre in the Rue St Martin, Paris; hence to cabs generally was given the name fiacre.

Fichte, JOHANN GOTTLIEB, philosopher, was born at Rammenau in Upper Lusatia, 19th May 1762; and entering the university of Jena, devoted himself first to theology, then to philosophy. In 1791 he went to Königsberg to see Kant, and wrote his Kritik aller Offenbarung (1792), the fame of which led in 1794 to his appointment to the chair of Philosophy at Jena, where he expounded his system of transcendental idealism. His Wissenschaftslehre (1795), his Grundlage des Naturrechts (1796), and the System der Sittenlehre (1798) exhibit his philosophy in its earlier form. In 1799 an accusation of atheism, fruitlessly refuted, led to his removal to Berlin, where he gave private lectures on philosophy. In 1800 appeared his work On the Vocation of Man. In 1805 he obtained the chair of Philosophy at Erlangen, and delivered his lectures 'On the Nature of the Scholar' (1805-6). In 1806 appeared his Characteristics of the Present Age, and in the same year his Way to the Blessed Life. In these works we find his philosophy in its mature form. The victories of Napoleon at Auerstadt and Jena drew forth the Addresses to the German Nation, in which he pointed out the true means of national regeneration in a system of public education. After the peace the king requested him to draw up a constitution for a new university in Berlin, which was opened in 1810, Fichte being elected rector. In 1813 the war of independence broke out, and the hospitals of Berlin were soon crowded with patients. Fichte's wife offered her services as a nurse, was seized with fever, and recovered, but her husband caught the infection, and died 27th January 1814. The fundamental idea of the Wissenschaftslehre is that of a primitive act of consciousness; the Ego, or I, affirms itself, simply and unconditionally. But in this self-affirmation it necessarily posits a negative, a Non-ego, an opposite which is not itself—i.e. the objective world, or nature. In his more popular writings, from 1800 onward, Fichte's transcendentalism assumes a more profoundly religious character, the centre of the system being now an Absolute Ego, in whose self-determination all the Non-ego is determined—the One Universal Being or God, of whom all finite existence is but a manifestation. See Fichte, by Prof. Adamson (1881); Fichtes Leben, by his son (1831); Kröger's translation of the Wissenschaftslehre and the Naturrecht (Phil. 1868-69; London, 1889); and the Memoir by Dr William Smith, prefixed to his translation of the Popular Works (4th ed. 1889).—His son, IMMANUEL HERMANN VON FICHTE, born at Jena, 18th July 1797, was appointed professor of Philosophy at Bonn in 1836, and from 1842 to 1863 held a chair at Tübingen. He was ennobled in 1867, and died at Stuttgart, 8th August 1879. He wrote, as a decided theist, works on speculative theology (1847), ethics (1850), anthropology (1856), psychology (1864), and immortality (1873). [Fikh-eh.]

Finco, MARSILIO, Platonist, born at Florence in 1433, was appointed by Cosmo de' Medici in 1463 president of an academy for the diffusion of the Platonic doctrines, which Finco held to be the basis and confirmation of Christianity. Having at the age of forty entered the Church, he was made rector of two churches in Florence and canon of the cathedral. His theological system is a strange medley of incongruous views. He died in 1499. His works were published at Basel in 1491. See R. L. Poole's Medieval Thought in Theology (1884). [Fi-tchee no.]

Fick, AUGUST, philologist, was born near Minden, 5th May 1833, studied at Göttingen, and became professor there (1876) and (1887) at Breslau. He retired in 1891. His great comparative Indo-germanic dictionary (1870; 4th ed. 1890-94) has been followed by works on Greek personal names, the original language of the Iliad, &c.

Field, DAVID DUDLEY, jurist, was born in Haddam, Conn., 13th February 1805, and was admitted in 1828 to the New York bar, and laboured to reform the judiciary system. In 1857 he was appointed by the state to prepare political, civil, and penal codes, of which the last has been adopted by New York, and all have been accepted by some other states. He did much for international law and for law reform generally. His Outlines of an International Code (2d ed. 1878) were translated into various tongues; his Speeches, Arguments, and Papers fill 3 vols. (1884-91). He died at New York, 13th April 1894.—His brother, STEPHEN JOHNSON FIELD (1816-1899), born in Haddam, settled in California, where he helped to draw up the state laws, and was judge of the Supreme Court in 1857-59. Appointed chief-justice in 1859, he was raised to the supreme bench of the United States in 1863.—Another brother, CYRUS WEST FIELD, was born in Stockbridge, Mass., 30th November 1819, built up a paper-manufacturing business, and engaged with enthusiasm in promoting the Atlantic telegraph. He organised the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company in 1854, and the Atlantic Telegraph Company in 1856; and devoted himself wholly to this work until the establishment of permanent telegraphic communication between the two continents. In 1866 he received the nation's thanks, but died poor on 12th July 1892.

Field, EUGENE (1850-95), born at St Louis, Missouri, became a journalist at twenty-three, and was soon known as humorist and poet. A Little Book of Western Verse (1889) was a notable example of his work; With Trumpet and Drum (1892) contains his best child's verses.

Field, JOHN (1782-1837), composer of nocturnes and Chopin's model, was born in Dublin, but settled in 1804 in Russia as music teacher, returning to London in 1832. He died at Moscow on a Continental tour.

Fielding, ANTHONY VANDYKE COPLEY, water-colour landscape-painter, was born near Halifax in 1787. In 1810 he began to exhibit with the Water-colour Society, of which he became president in 1831. He died at Worthing, 3d March 1855.

Fielding, HENRY, born at Sharpam Park, Glastonbury, 22d April 1707, was the son of General Edmund Fielding, of the Denbigh family. — A sister, SARAH (1710-68), wrote David Simple and other novels; and his half-brother, SIR JOHN FIELDING (d. 1780), was the blind Bow Street magistrate. Henry went to Eton; in 1725 he failed in an attempt to carry off a Lyme Regis heiress; his first comedy, Love in Several Masques, was produced in 1728; and in 1728-30 he was a student (of literature—not civil law) at Leyden University. The Temple Beau was played in 1730; and till 1734 he wrote comedies and farces. He married in 1734 Charlotte Cradock, his model for 'Sophia Western'; and for a year or more led the life of a country gentleman at East Stour. But his wife's fortune of £1500 was not inexhaustible, and early in 1736 he took the Little Theatre in the Haymarket, where he brought out two successful burlesques—Pasquin (1736) and the Historical Register (1737). The bold satire on the ministry contained in these pieces led to the Licensing Act of 1737, which closed Fielding's theatre, and in Nov. 1737 he became a student of the Middle Temple. Called to the bar in 1740, he did not relinquish literature; and his début came in 1742 with Joseph Andrews, not long after Richardson published his popular Pamela. Fielding saw how ridiculous the feeble side of Richardson's morality might be made by transferring his heroine's difficulties to a male hero. Designing at first no more than raillery, his plan grew, and Joseph Andrews became a novel of life and manners, with a group of characters of which one, Parson Adams, is immortal. Three volumes of Miscellanies, made up mainly of early work (1743), included the surpassing study in irony, Mr Jonathan Wild the Great. At this time Fielding's means were uncertain, his health already broken, and his wife an invalid. Her death (1743) left him heart-broken. In 1745 he started the True Patriot, a government organ, succeeded in 1747 by the Jacobite's Journal. In November 1747 he married his wife's maid, Mary Daniel; and a year later, by the interest of his school-fellow Lyttelton, he became a justice of the peace for Westminster. In 1749 he published Tom Jones; less than three years later came a third novel, Amelia. The remainder of his life was a continued struggle with ill-health and a harassing vocation. His further literary efforts were a few pamphlets and the Covent Garden Journal (1752). In 1754 he quitted England for Lisbon in search of health, but died there, 8th October 1754, aged forty-eight. Fielding is styled by Scott the 'Father of the English Novel.' In Joseph Andrews he first felt his feet; in Tom Jones he perfected his method and put forth his full powers. The skill and variety of the book, its close characterisation, its happiness of illustration, and the wealth of wit, wisdom, and irony cannot be contested, though there is an over-indulgence to certain forms of masculine frailty. See Lives by Murphy (1762), Watson (1807), Lawrence (1855), Austin Dobson (1889), and Miss Golden (1909); Thackeray's lecture; and Sir Leslie Stephen's and Henley's introductions to the editions of 1882 and 1904.

Fields, JAMES THOMAS, American publisher, was born in Portsmouth, N.H., in 1817, edited the Atlantic Monthly in 1862-70, and lectured on literary subjects; he also wrote books of verse, besides volumes on Hawthorne and Dickens. He died 24th April 1881.

Fieschi, COUNT GIOVANNI LUIGI DE', of an illustrious Genoese house, was born about 1523. He belonged to a race hereditarily at feud with that of the famous admiral, Andrea Doria, who had restored republican government in Genoa. Fieschi organised a plot for the overthrow of Doria and the establishment of an oligarchy, and enrolled a formidable array of accomplices, his three brothers among the foremost. Complete success seemed at first to crown the conspirators; the gates of the city were forced, 2d January 1547, the fleet captured, Doria in flight. But Fieschi, stepping from one galley to another at night, fell overboard, and was drowned in the harbour. The scheme ended here, and Doria returned to wreak merciless vengeance on the other participators in the plot. See monographs by Brea (1863), Celesia (1864), Gavazzo (1886), and Callegari (1892). [Fees-ee'kee.]

Fieschi, JOSEPH, known by his attempt on the life of Louis-Philippe, was born in Corsica in 1790. In 1830 he got a small government appointment, but was dismissed for fraud. With several accomplices he constructed an infernal machine, which was fired while the king and his party were passing the house, 28th July 1835. Eighteen people were killed, but Louis-Philippe escaped almost unhurt. Fieschi was seized, tried, and executed 16th February 1836. See Ducamps, L'Attentat Fieschi (1877).

He became A.R.A. in 1879, R.A. in 1887, a knight in 1906.

In 1318 Robert Bruce re-established here an Augustinian priory. His square-shaped bronze bell, and the Quigrich, or bronze head of his pastoral staff, are in the Antiquarian Museum at Edinburgh. St Fillans, on Loch Earn, is associated with an earlier saint called 'the leper.'

Fillmore, MILLARD, from 1850 to 1853 thirteenth president of the United States, was born at Summer Hill, Cayuga County, New York, 7th January 1800, and died at Buffalo, 8th March 1874. A farmer's son, and bred a wool-carder, he educated himself, and became a law-clerk, comptroller of New York State (1847), and vice-president (1848). See Life by Chamberlain (1856).

Filmer, SIR ROBERT (c. 1590-1653), an extreme advocate of the divine right of kings, was born at East Sutton, Kent, and in 1604 entered Trinity College, Cambridge. His views are expounded in his Patriarcha, first printed in 1630, and Freeholder's Grand Inquest (1648). He strenuously opposed the witch mania.

Finch, HENEGAGE, first Earl of Nottingham and Lord Chancellor, was born in Kent, probably at Eastwell, 23d December 1621. He was the nephew of SIR JOHN FINCH (1584-1660), speaker and lord-keeper. Educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, he was called to the bar in 1645. After the Restoration as solicitor-general he took part in the trial of the regicides, and became attorney-general (1670) and lord chancellor (1674). As high steward he presided at the trial of Stafford in 1680. He died 18th December 1682.—His son DANIEL (1647-1730), a Tory but not a Jacobite statesman, succeeded him as second Earl of Nottingham, and in 1729 became also sixth Earl of Winchelsea.

Finlay, GEORGE, the historian of Greece, was born of Scottish parents at Faversham in Kent, 21st December 1799. After studying at Glasgow and Göttingen, Philhellenism carried him to Greece, where almost all the rest of his life was spent. His History of Greece from the Roman conquest to the Greek Revolution appeared in four sections (1844-61; new ed. by Tozer, 7 vols., 1877, with autobiography). Finlay died at Athens, 26th January 1875.

Finlay, SIR ROBERT BANNATYNE, K.C., born at Edinburgh, 11th July 1842, studied medicine at the university there, was called to the English bar in 1867, and as M.P. for the Inverness Burghs and Edinburgh University was a conspicuous Unionist. In 1895-1900 he was solicitor-general for England, and was knighted, and in 1900-6 attorney-general.

Finlayson, JOHN. See BROTHERS, RICHARD.

Finnian, SR, an Irish saint, said to have taught 3000 pupils at Clonard, died there in 550.

Finsen, NIELS R. (1861-1904), discoverer of the curative power of the chemical rays of light (sunlight, electric light, Röntgen rays, &c.) and founder of phototherapy, was born in the Faeroe Isles, and taught anatomy at the university of Copenhagen, where he had studied. He accomplished his epoch-making work in spite of the disabilities of chronic illness.

Firdausi, or FERDUSI, the pen-name of Abū'l Kásim Mansūr, greatest of Persian poets, was born about 940 A.D. near Tūs in Khorassan, and after his fifty-eighth year spent some years at the court of Mahmūd of Ghazni. When the Shah Nāma was finished in 1008, the poet, receiving 60,000 silver dirhams instead of the promised 60,000 gold dinars, fled from Ghazni, leaving behind him a scathing satire on the sultan. Mahmūd at length sent the 60,000 gold dinars to Firdausi at Tūs, just as his remains were being carried to the grave (1020). The Shah Nāma, based on actual events from the annals of Persia, is for the most part composed of mythological and fanciful incidents. Firdausi also wrote a number of shorter pieces, kasidas, ghazals, &c. His Yūsuf ū Zulaykhā is on the story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife. See Atkinson's epitome of the Shah Nāma (1832; new ed. 1892), Miss Helen Zimmern's Epic of Kings (1882), and Robinson's Life of Ferdusi (1876). The complete text was edited by Turner Macan (1829). There is a complete French translation by Julius Mohl, with the Persian text (1838-78); and another edition by Vullers, continued by Landauer (Paris, 1877 et seq.). [Firdaw'-zee.]

Firenzuola, AGNOLO (1493-1548), born at Florence, became abbot of Prato, paraphrased the Golden Ass of Apuleius, and wrote a couple of comedies and some licentious poems.

Firishta. See FERISHTAH.

Firth, CHARLES HARDING, born at Sheffield in 1857, became professor of Modern History at Oxford in 1904, and has written much on Cromwell and the Protectorate.

Firth, MARK (1819-80), born at Sheffield, in 1849 with his father and brother established there the great Norfolk steel-works. He was a munificent benefactor to Sheffield, his gifts including almshouses, a park, and the Firth College (1879), now included in the university.

Fischart, JOHANN (c. 1550-90), German satirist, born either at Mainz or Strasburg, studied law at Strasburg, became in 1581 advocate to the Imperial Chamber at Spire, and in 1585 magistrate at Forbach, and died there. In his Rabelaisian works he lashes with inexhaustible humour the corruptions of the clergy, the astrological fancies and other folies of the time. Flöhzhatz, Weibertratz (1573) is outrageously comic and original. Essentially different are Das glückhafte Schiff von Zürich (in verse, 1576) and his spiritual songs. See works by Vilmar (2d ed. 1865), Meusebach (1879), Ganghofer (1881), and Besson (Par. 1880). [Fishart.]

Fischer, Kuno (1824-1907), born at Sandewalde in Silesia, studied at Leipzig and Halle. In 1850 he became enormously popular as a privat-docent of philosophy at Heidelberg; but in 1853, because of charges of pantheism made against vol. i. of his History of Modern Philosophy, the Baden government deprived him of his position. In 1856 he received a call to Jena; and at last, in 1872, he was recalled to Heidelberg. In his Geschichte der Neuern Philosophie (1852-93) he has done for modern philosophy what Zeller did for the old-world systems. His other great work is his Logik und Metaphysik (1852). The Critique of Kant, like Descartes and his School, has been translated into English. Other writings deal with Goethe, Lessing, and Schiller. See a monograph by Falkenheim (Berl. 1892). [Fish-er.]

Fish, HAMILTON (1808-93), diplomatist, born at New York, graduated at Columbia in 1827, and admitted to the bar, was elected congressman in 1842, lieutenant-governor of the state in 1847, governor in 1848, and in 1851 a member (Republican) of the U.S. senate. Secretary of state under Grant from 1869 to 1877, he signed the Washington Treaty of 1871, and completed the settlement of the Alabama Question.

Fisher, JOHN, Bishop of Rochester, was born about 1469 at Beverley, and in 1483 entered Michael-house, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow in 1491, and master in 1497. In 1502 Margaret, Countess of Richmond, Henry VII.'s mother, made him her chaplain and confessor; and in 1503 he was appointed first Lady Margaret professor of Divinity. Next year he was elected chancellor of the university, and consecrated to the see of Rochester. He zealously promoted the New Learning, and advocated reformation from within; as zealously he resisted the Lutheran schism. In 1527 he pronounced firmly against the divorce of Henry VIII.; and having lent too ready an ear to the 'revelations' of the Holy Maid of Kent, Elizabeth Barton, in 1534 he was attainted of treason, and, for refusing the oath of succession, was sent with More to the Tower. In May 1535 Pope Paul III. made him a cardinal; on 17th June the old man, worn by sickness and ill-usage, was tried for denial of the king's supremacy; on the 22d he was beheaded on Tower Hill. In 1886 he was beatified. See Bridgett's Life of Blessed John Fisher (1888).

Fiske, JOHN (1842-1901; originally called Edmund Fiske Green), was born at Hartford, Conn., and studied at Harvard, where for a time he was tutor and librarian. He wrote much on evolution—his Cosmic Philosophy is an expansion of Herbert Spencer, and in Man's Destiny he defended spiritual religion. His Discovery of America (1892) was but one of a long series of important works on American history.

Fitch, JOHN (1743-98), born in Connecticut, was gunsmith to the American troops. In 1785 he completed his model steam-boat with wheels at the sides; larger vessels were built in 1788-90. In 1793 he went to France, to find his projects frustrated by the Revolution; but it is said that his plans were shown to Robert Fulton (q.v.). Penniless, Fitch worked his passage back to America, and there poisoned himself.

Fitch, SIR JOSHUA GYRLING, LL.D., born in 1824, and educated at University College, London, in 1863 became a school inspector, as inspector of training colleges retired in 1894, and was knighted in 1896. He wrote much on education, and died 14th July 1903.

Fitch, RALPH, an English merchant who in 1583-91 by way of the Euphrates travelled to and returned from India, Burma, and Siam.

Fitch, ROBERT (1802-95), geologist and anti-quary, was born at Ipswich, and from 1827 was a chemist at Norwich.

Fitton, MARY, the mistress in 1600 of William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, by Mr Tyler (Shakespeare's Sonnets, 1886) has been identified with the 'dark lady' of Sonnets cxxvii.-clvii.

Fitzgerald. See DESMOND.

Fitzgerald, LORD EDWARD (1763-98), a younger son of the Duke of Leinster, was born near Dublin, served with distinction in the American war, sat for Athy in the Irish parliament, and was drawn to Paris by the Revolution. Here he renounced his title, and in 1792 married Pamela (c. 1776-1831), daughter (perhaps) of Madam de Genlis by Egalité Orleans, returning to Ireland in 1793, to plunge into political conspiracy. He joined the United Irishmen in 1796, and went to France to arrange for a French invasion of Ireland. Soon after his return the plot was betrayed and Fitzgerald seized in Dublin, in the desperate scuffle receiving mortal wounds. See Lives by Moore (1831; new ed. by MacDermott, 1896), Ida A. Taylor (1903), and G. Campbell (1904).

Fitzgerald, EDWARD, was born March 31, 1809, at Bredfield House in Suffolk. He entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1830. He lived at or near Woodbridge all his life, in 1874 removing to Little Grange, a house he had built for himself. With the exception of periodical visits to London, he led a quiet country life, his chief amusements gardening and yachting. He numbered among his friends Spedding, W. B. Donne, Thackeray, Prof. Cowell, the Rev. G. Crabbe, son of the poet, Archdeacon Groome, Bernard Barton, whose daughter Lucy (1808-98) he married, and Tennyson, who dedicated Tiresias to him. He died 14th June 1883. Fitzgerald published anonymously his dialogue on youth, Euphranon, in 1851, which was followed by Polontus in 1852. A translation of six of Calderon's dramas (1853) was soon withdrawn from circulation. About this time he took up Persian, and in 1856 published an anonymous version of Jami's Salamán and Absál. The quatrains of Omar Khayyám, the Persian astronomer poet of the 11th century, were then little known, as they were first printed at Paris in 1857 by M. Nicolas; but Fitzgerald at once recognised their beauty, and his and Omar's names will remain indissolubly linked together through his rendering of them (1859). He possessed to an extraordinary degree the power of reproducing the effect of the original; and, although Omar's ideas are often altered, condensed, and transposed in an apparently reckless way, these lawless alterations are like those of Dryden, they all tell. See his Letters and Collected Works, &c., edited by Aldis Wright (1889-1901); Letters to Fanny Kemble (1895); Groome's Two Suffolk Friends (1895); and Lives by Glyde (1900) and Wright (1904).

Fitzgerald, PERCY HETHRINGTON, author (his works number over 200 vols.), was born at Fane Valley, Co. Louth, in 1834, educated at Stonyhurst and Trinity College, Dublin, and called to the Irish bar. See his Memoirs of an Author (1895).

Fitzherbert, MRS., a Roman Catholic lady, born Maria Anne Smythe in 1756, to whom, after she had been a second time left a widow, the Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV., was secretly married in 1785 by an Anglican clergyman. This marriage, contracted without the king's consent, was invalid under the Royal Marriage Act of 1772; the prince afterwards denied that there had been a marriage at all. On his marriage to the Princess Caroline in 1795 the connection was interrupted, resumed with the pope's consent, and finally broken off in 1803. Mrs Fitzherbert died at Brighton, 29th March 1837. See her Memoirs by Langdale (1856).

Fitzroy, ROBERT, admiral and meteorologist, grandson of the Duke of Grafton, was born at Ampton Hall near Bury St Edmunds, July 5, 1805, and, entering the navy, surveyed the coasts of Patagonia and Tierra del Fuego, 1828-30; this work he continued on his reappointment to the Beagle in 1831, when he was accompanied by Darwin, the two together publishing in 1839 a Narrative of the Voyages of H.M.S. 'Adventure' and 'Beagle.' Governor of New Zealand (1843-45), he was promoted rear-admiral (1857) and vice-admiral (1863) on the retired list. In 1854 he was attached to the meteorological department of the Board of Trade. The 'Fitzroy barometer' was invented by him; and he instituted the storm-warnings that developed into daily weather forecasts. Worn out by overwork, he committed suicide at Norwood, 30th April 1865.

Fitzwilliam, RICHARD, VISCOUNT (1745-1816), an Irish peer, founder at his death of the Fitzwilliam Museum in Cambridge.

Fitzwilliam, WILLIAM, EARL (1748-1833), succeeded his father in 1756. As lord-lieutenant for three months of Ireland (1794-95), while his warm support of Catholic emancipation aroused enthusiastic hopes, he was considered by Pitt too liberal; and his recall was followed by the Rebellion of 1798. He was president of the Council in the Grenville ministry in 1806.

Flaccus, C. VALERIUS, a Roman poet of the time of Vespasian, wrote the Argonautica, an unfinished epic of learned mediocrity. See editions by Thile (1863) and Schenkl (1871).

Flacius, OF VLACICH, MATTHIAS (1520-75), was born at Albona in Illyria, became professor of Hebrew at Wittenberg in 1544, but for his attacks upon Melancthon's compromise, known as the Leipzig Interim, was deprived of his chair. In 1557-62 he was professor of Theology at Jena, but was again deprived for teaching that original sin was inherent in man's nature. After this he led a wandering life. His principal works are Clavis Scripture Sacre (1567), Catalogus Testium Veritatis (1556), and Ecclesiastica Historia (1559-74). The church history called Magdeburg Centuries was only partly his. See Preger's monograph (1861).

Flahault de la Billarderie, AUGUSTE CHARLES JOSEPH, COMTE DE (1785-1870), French soldier and diplomatist. He distinguished himself in the Peninsular war and the Russian campaign, and in 1813 was made a count and general of division. An exile after Waterloo, he married the Baroness Keith and Nairne (1788-1867). After 1830 he returned to France, was ambassador at Vienna (1842-48) and at London (1860-62), and was Grand Chancellor of the Legion of Honour. [Fla'o de la Beel-yard'ree.]

Flambard, RANULF or RALPH, justiciar of England under William II., became Bishop of Durham in 1099, but ministered to the king's vicies and extravagances by oppressive extortion of the people. He died 5th September 1128.

Flameng, LÉOPOLD, a copper-engraver, born in Brussels, 22d November 1831, and from 1853 resident in Paris.

Flammarion, CAMILLE, astronomer, born at Montigny-le-Roi, 25th February 1842, entered the Paris Observatory in 1858. Some of his books are: The Plurality of Inhabited Worlds (1862), God in Nature (1866), Celestial Marvels (1865), Studies and Lectures on Astronomy (1866-81), The Atmosphere (1872), The Lands of the Heavens (8th ed. 1882), and The Planet Mars (1892). He wrote a work on ballooning entitled Travels in the Air (1868; Eng. trans. by James Glaisher, 1871). See Life by S. Hugo (Par. 1891). [Flam-mah-ree-on'.]

Flamsteed, JOHN, the first astronomer-royal of England, was born at Denby near Derby, 19th August 1646. His success in mathematics and astronomy procured him the appointment of astronomer to the king in 1675. Next year Greenwich Observatory was built, and Flamsteed began the observations that commenced modern practical astronomy. He formed the first trustworthy catalogue of the fixed stars, and furnished those observations by which Newton verified his lunar theory. His great work is Historia Caelestis Britannica, an account of astronomical observation (3 vols. 1723). Flamsteed took holy orders, and from 1684 till his death, 31st December 1719, held the Surrey living of Burstow. See Bailly's Account of Flamsteed (1835).

Flandrin, JEAN HIPPOLYTE, born at Lyons, 23d May 1809, in 1832 won the Prix de Rome, and during his five years' residence in Italy produced 'St Clare healing the Blind,' now in Nantes Cathedral. In 1842 he began his great frescoes in the church of St Germain-des-Prés, Paris. After this he was mainly engaged in fresco painting, although he executed many fine portraits. He died at Rome, 21st March 1864. See his Lettres et Pensées (1865), and Lives by Poncet (1864) and Montrard (1876). [Flaw-dran's.]

Flaubert, GUSTAVE, novelist, was born at Rouen, 12th December 1821. After long hesitation between medicine and literature, he chose literature, beginning with poetry, which ere long he gave up for prose. Flaubert's life was extremely uneventful; in his youth some obscure form of brain-disease to some extent arrested his intellectual development. He was a very late producer, and his work, when it did appear, was marked by a strong and morbid idiosyncrasy. Madame Bovary (1857) is the painful but powerful story of an unhappily mated wife who lapses into vice and dies by suicide. His second work, Salammô (1862), dealt with the last struggle of Rome and Carthage, and is rather overweighted with archaeological detail. L'Education Sentimentale (1869) was far less popular. In 1874 appeared the splendid phantasmagoria of La Tentation de St-Antoine, the masterpiece of its kind. Le Candidat (1874), a play of no merit, had little success; Trois Contes (1877) are admirable. Flaubert died at Rouen, 9th May 1880; after his death appeared a novel, Bouvard et Pécuchet, which had not received his final revision. There has been published (also posthumously) an interesting correspondence with George Sand; and other letters have followed. A splendid 'édition définitive' of his works was issued in 1885. See Du Camp's Literary Recollections (trans. 1893), and books by Tarver (1895) and Faguet (1899). [Flobyay'.]

Flavel, JOHN (c. 1630-91), Nonconformist divine, born at Bromsgrove, was educated at Oxford, took Presbyterian orders in 1650, and was ejected from his living at Dartmouth in 1662. He continued to preach privately there, and after the Declaration of Indulgence (1687) was minister of a Nonconformist church till his death. His best books are the Treatise on the Soul of Man, The Method of Grace, A Token for Mourners, and Husbandry Spiritualised.

Flaxman, JOHN, R.A., sculptor, was born at York, 6th July 1755. His father, a moulder of plaster figures, removed to London when his son was six months old; the delicate, slightly-deformed child soon developed a taste for drawing. In 1767 he exhibited models, and in 1769 he was admitted a student of the Royal Academy. Henceforward he was constantly engaged upon sculpture; but his chief source of income was the Wedgwood house, which he furnished with exquisite designs for their pottery. In 1782 he married a cultivated woman, who was his true helpmate for thirty-eight years. He was now employed upon monumental sculpture, such as his monument to Chatterton in St Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, to Collins in Chichester Cathedral, and to Mrs Morley in Gloucester Cathedral. From 1787 he studied at Rome for seven years, executed numerous classical groups, and began his designs to the Iliad and Odyssey (published 1793), to Æschylus (1795), and to Dante (1797), which were engraved in Rome by Piroli. His designs to Hesiod were engraved by Blake in 1817. In England again (1794), he produced his fine monument to Lord Mansfield in Westminster Abbey. In 1797 he was elected A.R.A., in 1800 R.A., and in 1810 he became professor of Sculpture to the Royal Academy. Among his later works are his monuments to Reynolds, Howe, and Nelson; 'Michael and Satan,' his most important example of ideal sculpture; and his drawings and model for his great 'Shield of Achilles' (1818). He died 7th December 1826. He was a man of extreme gentleness and modesty, abstemious and devout, a Swedenborgian; and he ranks at the head of English sculptors for inventive power and the purity and grace of his style. See Colvin, The Drawings of Flaxman (fol. 1876).

Flecknoe, RICHARD, Irish priest and playwright, who after travelling ten years in Europe, Asia, Africa, and Brazil (1640-50) came to London, mingled in the wars of the wits, wrote several plays, and died about 1678. He was the stalking-horse over whom Dryden applied the merciless lash of his satire to Shadwell, and had already been the victim of a good-humoured satire by Marvell.

Fleetwood, CHARLES (c. 1618-92), a Cromwellian soldier, of a good Northamptonshire stock.

Flegel, EDUARD ROBERT (1855-86), born of German parentage at Vilno in Russia, strove to acquire for Germany the commerce of the Niger. He thrice ascended it (1879-80-83), the third time discovering the sources of the Benue. Again in Africa in 1885, he designed to explore the country between the sources of the Benue and the Cameroons, but died suddenly near the mouth of the Niger, 11th September 1886. [Flay-gei.]

Fleischer, HEINRICH LEBERRECHT (1801-88), German orientalist, studied at Leipzig, and became professor of Oriental Languages there in 1836. He edited Abulfeda (1831-34), other Persian and Arabic works, &c. [Flis-her.]

Fleming, JOHN (1785-1857), naturalist, born near Bathgate, entered the ministry, and was professor of Natural Philosophy at Aberdeen 1832-43, and of Natural Science in the New College, Edinburgh, from 1845. His works include Philosophy of Zoology (1822), British Animals (1828), and Molluscous Animals (1837).

Fleming, MARGARET (1803-11), Sir Walter's 'Pet Marjorie,' and the theme of an exquisite essay by Dr John Brown, was born at Kirkcaldy.

Fleming, or FLEMING, PAUL (1609-40), ranks high among German lyric poets for Geistliche und weltliche Poemata (1642; ed. by Lappenberg, 1866).

Fletcher, ANDREW, of Salton, Scottish patriot, was born in 1655, the son of Sir Robert Fletcher, and was brought up under the care of the celebrated Gilbert Burnet. After some years of travel he sat in parliament in 1681, and offered so determined an opposition to the measures of the Duke of York that he had to flee to England, and thence to Holland. Here he formed fast friendship with the refugee English patriots, and on his return to England in 1683 shared the counsels of Russell, Sidney, and the rest. After the Rye-house Plot, Fletcher fled to Holland, returned as a volunteer with Monmouth, but having shot the mayor of Lyme in a quarrel, fled to Spain, was imprisoned, but delivered. He fought in Hungary against the Turks, and returned to Scotland at the revolution. He was the first patron of William Paterson, the projector of the Darien expedition, and it was the bitterness caused in Scotland by the treatment of the Darien colonists that gave Fletcher and the nationalist party their strength in the struggle against the inevitable union with England. His famous 'imitations' aimed at constructing a federative instead of an incorporating union. Fletcher's orations in the Scottish parliament still glow with eloquence, and carry the stamp of genuine sincerity. After the Union, Fletcher retired in disgust from public life, devoting himself to promoting agriculture; he introduced fanners and the mill for pot-barley. He died at London in Sept. 1716. His writings were reprinted at London in 1732. See Life by Omond (1897).

Fletcher, JOHN. See BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.

Fletcher, PHINEAS and GILES, poets, were cousins of Fletcher the dramatist, and sons of Giles Fletcher, LL.D. (1549-1611), Queen Elizabeth's minister in Germany and Russia.—PHINEAS (1582-1650) was educated at Eton and Cambridge, and in 1621 became rector of Hilgay in Norfolk. His Purple Island, or the Isle of Men (1633), contains an elaborate description of the human body viewed as an island, the bones being its foundations, and the veins its rivers; although formal and pedantic, it abounds in fine passages.—GILES (1588?-1623) was educated at Westminster and Cambridge, and became rector of Alderton in Suffolk. His chief work, Christ's Victory and Triumph (1610), full of splendid versification and imagery, has a quickening glow of genuine enthusiasm. It was modelled on Spenser, most of whose characteristics are overdone. The poems of both brothers are included in Grosart's 'Fuller Worthies Library' (1868).

Fleury, ANDRÉ HERCULE DE, CARDINAL (1653-1743), born at Lodève, became almoner to Louis XIV., in 1698 Bishop of Fréjus, and preceptor to Louis XV., who in 1726 made him prime-minister; in the same year he received the cardinal's hat. He was honest and well-meaning, but no statesman; the extortions of the farmers-general were not checked, though a rigid economy crippled the power of France. In foreign affairs he earnestly desired peace, but was dragged by court intrigues into the war of the Austrian Succession. See Verlaque's monograph (1879). [Fleh-rec.]

Flcury, CLAUDE (1640-1723), church historian, born at Paris, was tutor to various princes, prior of Argenteuil, and confessor to young Louis XV. Among his numerous works were Mœurs des Israélites (1681); Mœurs des Chrétiens (1662); Droit Ecclésiastique (1687); and the great Histoire Ecclésiastique (20 vols. 1691-1720)—really the first complete church history, on which he laboured thirty years. Fleury's own work only reached to 1414; it was continued to 1778 by others.

Fliedner, THEODOR (1800-64), born in Nassau, in 1822 became pastor of Kaiserswerth near Düsseldorf, where in 1836 he founded the first Protestant deaconesses' home. See Life by Georg Fliedner (3d ed. Kais. 1892). [Flied-ner.]

Flinck, GOVAERT (1615-60), a Dutch portrait and religious painter, born in Cleves.

Flinders, MATTHEW (1774-1819), born at Donington, Lincolnshire, entered the navy, and, having with Bass (q.v.) discovered Bass's Strait, was in 1801-3 commissioned to circumnavigate Australia. On his way home he was wrecked, detained a prisoner by the French governor of Mauritius, and not liberated until 1810. See his Voyage to Terra Australis (1814).

Flint, ROBERT, theologian, born at Dumfries, 14th March 1838, educated at the University of Glasgow, and ordained in 1859, was professor of Moral Philosophy at St Andrews (1864-76), and of Divinity at Edinburgh (1876-1903). His Philosophy of History (vol. i. 1874; rewritten as Historical Philosophy in France and Switzerland, 1894) established his reputation. Other works were the Baird Lectures, Theism and Anti-Theistic Theories (1876-77), Vico (1884), and Socialism (1895). He was a corresponding member of the French Institute. He died 25th November 1910.

Flood, HENRY, born in 1732, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and Oxford, became a leader in the popular party in the Irish parliament after his election in 1759. His oratory was vigorous and impressive, but was marked by the offensive personalities of his time. In 1769 he killed an electioneering opponent in a duel, and was tried and acquitted. In 1775 he took office as vice-treasurer of Ireland, but was removed in 1781 as a strong Nationalist. Disliking Grattan's Bill of Right as not going far enough, Flood strove without success to carry a more sweeping measure, and became involved in a bitter quarrel with his former friend. In 1783 he was returned for Winchester, and in 1785 for Seaford, but he failed to make a great mark at Westminster. He died at his seat near Kilkenny, December 2, 1791. See his Life and Correspondence (1838).

Floquet, CHARLES THOMAS (1828-96), French Radical politician, born at St Jean de Luz, in 1888 wounded Boulanger in a duel, and was twice president of the Chamber.

Florence of Worcester, a monk of Worcester, where he died in 1118, wrote a Chronicon which comes down to 1116, and which about 1030 becomes of some value as an independent authority. It was edited by Thorpe in 1848, and translated by Forester (1847) and Stevenson (1853).

Flores, JUAN JOSÉ (1801-64), born in Venezuela, fought with distinction in the war of independence, and became first president of the republic of Ecuador in 1830-35 and 1839-43. [Flo-ras-y.]

Florian, JEAN PIERRE DE (1755-94), French novelist and fabulist. He wrote two prose romances, and pastorals, plays, &c.

Florio, JOHN (c. 1553-1625), the translator of Montaigne, was born of Italian Protestant parent-age in London, about 1576 was a tutor in foreign languages at Oxford, and in 1578 published his First Fruits, accompanied by A Perfect Induction to the Italian and English Tongues. His next work was Second Fruits, with six thousand Italian Proverbs (1591). His Italian and English dictionary, entitled A World of Words, was published in 1598. In 1603 Florio was appointed reader in Italian to Queen Anne, in 1604 groom of the privy-chamber. A reprint of his famous translation of Montaigne (1603) was issued in the 'Tudor Translations' series (1892-93), with introduction by Prof. Saintsbury.

He twice overthrew the Swiss, at Como and Milan (1511); chased the papal troops from Bologna; seized Brescia from the Venetians; and defeated the Spaniards at Ravenna, where, however, he was killed. The estates and title went to the king of Navarre. Finally Henry IV. of Navarre attached the county of Foix to the French crown. [Franks.]

A member of the Institute from 1795, in 1802 he was made a member, and in 1804 president, of the legislative body. In 1810 he entered the senate, and was raised to the peerage by Louis XVIII. See Sainte-Beuve's edition of his works (1839). [Fons-tahn.]

Fontenelle, BERNARD LE BOUYER DE, born at Rouen, a nephew of Corneille, 11th February 1657, began his literary career in Paris. In the great quarrel of Moderns versus Ancients, he sided with the Moderns, assailing the Greeks and their French imitators, and receiving in return the satiric shafts of Boileau, Racine, J. B. Rousseau, and La Bruyère. After the failure on the stage of his Aspas, he produced an imitation of Lucian, Dialogues des Morts, and the 'precious' Lettres du Chevalier d'Her... In 1697 he was made secretary to the Académie des Sciences, of which he afterwards was president. He died in his hundredth year at Paris, 9th January 1757. He had attempted well-nigh every form of literature—idylls, satires, dialogues, critical essays, histories, tragedies, &c. His best works, Entretiens sur la Pluralité des Mondes, and Histoire des Oracles, are still worth reading. Mr Laing has discovered the germ of his explanation of myths in Fontenelle's dissertation on Fables. [Font-nel.]

Foote, ANDREW HULL (1806-63), American seaman, was born in New Haven, Conn., entered the navy in 1822, and was promoted captain in 1849. In 1856 he stormed four Chinese forts at Canton, which had fired on him. In the civil war he organised the western flotilla, and in February 1862 stormed Fort Henry. Shortly afterwards he was wounded and resigned as rear-admiral.

Foote, SAMUEL, actor and writer of comedy, was born at Truro, 27th January 1720. Educated at Worcester and Worcester College, Oxford, about 1740 he entered the Temple; after wasting his fortune in a career of pleasure he turned to the stage for a living, and in 1744 made an unsuccessful debut as 'a gentleman' in Othello. In 1747 he opened the Haymarket Theatre—where he was at once director, actor, and dramatic author—with Diversions of the Morning; in this and other pieces he introduced well-known living characters, and by his powers of mimicry drew large audiences. He achieved success, too, in Edinburgh and Dublin. In 1766 he lost his leg through a riding accident, thereafter composing parts adapted to his defect. He died at Dover, 21st October 1777. Of his plays the best are An Auction of Pictures, The Minor, The Liar, and The Mayor of Garratt. See Memoirs by Cooke (1805) and Forster's Quarterly Essay, 1854.

Forbes, ALEXANDER PENROSE, bishop, was born in Edinburgh, the second son of Lord Medwyn, a judge, 6th June 1817. Driven by ill-health from the East India Company's service, he graduated at Oxford in 1844, and in 1847 was consecrated Bishop of Brechin. His charge (1857) on the manner of the Eucharistic Presence led to his trial before the other Scottish bishops in 1860, and a censure and admonition. He died 8th October 1875. He edited, with his brother, the Arbuthnot Missal (1864), and published Kalendar of Scottish Saints (1872), &c. See Memoirs by Miss Skene (1876) and Canon Mackey (1888). [Forb.]

Forbes, ARCHIBALD, LL.D. (1838-1900), special correspondent of the Daily News, son of the minister of Boharm, Keith, was for some years in the Royal Dragoons, but in 1870-71 went through the Franco-German war as war-correspondent; and thenceforward, whether in Spain with the Carlists, in Cyprus, in the Russo-Turkish campaign, or in the Zulu war of 1879, he accustomed the British public to expect feats of unexampled audacity, swiftness, tact, and pluck in securing and transmitting his vivid notes of events at the front. He lectured in Great Britain, America, and Australia, and wrote a novel, Drawn from Life (1870), Glimpses through the Cannon Smoke (1880), Chinese Gordon (1884), Studies of War and Peace (1895), Napoleon III. (1897), &c.

Forbes, DUNCAN, of Culloden, was born either at Culloden or at Bunchrew near Inverness, 10th November 1685, and studied at Edinburgh and Leyden. Called to the bar, and appointed Sheriff of Midlothian, he rose rapidly into practice and political influence through the Duke of Argyll. In 1715 he was in the north actively opposing the rebels; afterwards he protested against trying the prisoners in England, and resisted the forfeitures—to the damage of his credit for loyalty. In 1725 he became Lord Advocate, in 1737 president of the Court of Session; in 1734 he succeeded his brother in the family estates; and for long he largely ruled the destinies of Scotland and contributed to her dawning prosperity by developing her internal resources, by gaining over the Jacobites, and by forming Highland regiments under loyal colonels. The '45 rather took him by surprise. But he hastened to the north, and did much to check the rebels, beating off the Frasers' attack on Culloden House. But he had to take refuge in Skye, and after his return was regarded with jealousy by the government. He died 10th December 1747. See Hill Burton's Lives of Lovat and Forbes (1847).

Forbes, EDWARD, naturalist, was born at Douglas, Isle of Man, 12th February 1815, studied medicine at Edinburgh, but from 1836 devoted himself to the natural sciences, and for a year worked at Paris. In 1841 he was naturalist on the Beacon during the survey of a part of Asia Minor. In 1843 he became professor of Botany in King's College, London; in 1844 palaeontologist to the Museum of Geology; in 1851 professor of Natural History in the School of Mines; in 1852 president of the Geological Society; and in 1853 professor of Natural History at Edinburgh. He died 18th November 1854. Forbes did much to advance and systematise special departments of natural history, especially the British star-fishes; his observations on the distribution of animal and vegetable life have opened many new fields of research. Of his works, papers, and monographs upwards of two hundred were published, many of them copiously illustrated by his own drawings. See the Memoir by G. Wilson and A. Geikie (1861).—His brother DAVID (1828-76), a geologist, lived much in Peru and Bolivia.

Forbes, EDWIN (1839-95), battle, landscape, and animal painter and etcher, was born at New York.

Forbes, JAMES DAVID, physicist, grandson of Sir William (q.v.), was born at Edinburgh, 20th April 1809, studied in the university there, and was called to the bar in 1830. From 1833 he held the Edinburgh chair of Natural Philosophy, exchanging it in 1859 for the principalship of the United College at St Andrews. Among his contributions to science are his investigations on heat, light, polarisation, underground temperature, the use of the thermometer for determining heights, &c.; but he is best known by his researches on the motion of glaciers, in connection with which subject he wrote Travels through the Alps (1843), Norway and its Glaciers (1853), Tour of Mont Blanc and Monte Rosa (1855), and Occasional Papers on the Theory of Glaciers (1859). He died at Clifton December 31, 1868. See his Life and Letters, edited by Shairp, Tait, and Adams Reilly (1873).

Forbes, STR JOHN (1787-1861), physician, born at Cattlebrae, Banffshire, studied at Aberdeen and Edinburgh; in 1807 became a naval surgeon; and after practising at Penzance and Chichester from 1840 made a large practice in London. He was knighted in 1853. Joint-editor of the Cyclopedia of Practical Medicine (1832-35), in 1836 he founded the British and Foreign Medical Review. He promoted the use of the stethoscope and greatly developed physical diagnosis.

Forbes, ROBERT (1708-75), born at Rayne, Aberdeenshire, from 1735 was Episcopal minister at Leith, and from 1769 also Bishop of Ross and Caithness. He compiled the Jacobite Lyon in Mourning (Scot. Hist. Soc. 1896-96).

Forbes, SIR WILLIAM (1739-1806), Bart., of Pitsligo, born in Edinburgh, after long service in the Edinburgh bank of Coutts & Co., was in 1761 admitted a partner; in 1763 a new company was formed, of which he became the head. In 1781 he purchased Pitsligo, forfeited by the Jacobite, Lord Forbes. He wrote a Life of Beattie (1805) and Memoirs of a Banking House (1803; ed. by Robert Chambers, 1860). His bank became in 1830 the Union Bank.—His second son, JOHN HAY (1776-1854), was the judge, Lord Medwyn.

Forbes-Mackenzie, WILLIAM (1801-62), M.P. for Peeblesshire 1837-52, introduced a liquor Act for Scotland, passed in 1853.

Forchhammer, JOHANN GEORG (1794-1865), geologist, was born at Husum, and died at Copenhagen.—His brother, PETER WILHELM (1801-94), classical antiquary, from 1836 was a professor at Kiel.—Their nephew, EMANUEL (1851-90), orientalist, in 1879 became professor of Pali at Rangoon. [Forkh'-ham-mer.]

Ford, EDWARD ONSLOW (1852-1901), sculptor, born in London, studied at Antwerp and Munich, and was successively A.R.A. (1888) and R.A. (1895).

Ford, JOHN, dramatist, was baptised at Ilsington, Devon, 17th April 1586, studied a twelvemonth at Exeter College, Oxford, and entered in 1602 the Middle Temple. His first work was an elegy on the Earl of Devonshire, entitled Fame's Memorial (1606); and in the same year he published Honour Triumphant. He was writing for the stage as early as 1613, when his An Ill Beginning has a Good End was acted at the Cockpit; but the first of his published plays is The Lover's Melancholy (1628), a comedy of no particular merit. His most powerful tragedy, 'Tis pity She's a Whore, was published in 1633, and to the same year belongs The Broken Heart. Love's Sacrifice (1633) is in parts excellent, but disappointing as a whole. Far more satisfactory is The Chronicle History of Perkin Warbeck (1634), and in 1638 came The Fancies Chaste and Noble and The Lady's Trial. The Sun's Darling (1623-24) was written in company with Dekker, who probably supplied the lyrical passages. Two other plays by Dekker and Ford were The Fairy Knight and The Bristowe (Bristol) Merchant (1624). The Witch of Edmonton (c. 1621) was written with Dekker and Rowley. On one occasion Ford collaborated with Webster; but the tragedy, A late Murder of the Son upon the Mother (1624), was not published. After the publication (1639) of The Lady's Trial Ford passes from notice. It is said that, having secured a competence, he ended his days in Devon. Ford had little comic talent, but his place among the tragic poets is unassailable. There is often a want of spontaneity in his writings; but his two great tragedies, Tis Pity and The Broken Heart, are not far inferior to Webster's masterpieces. See editions by Gifford (1827); revised by Dyce, 1869) and Hartley Coleridge (1840).

Ford, RICHARD (1796-1858), from Winchester passed to Trinity College, Oxford, and was called to the bar, but never practised. He spent 1830-34 in riding tours in Spain; and in 1845 appeared his delightful Handbook for Travellers in Spain. His Gatherings from Spain (1846) is mainly made up of matter crowded out of the 2d ed. of the Handbook. He died at Heavitree near Exeter.

Fordham, GEORGE (1837-87), jockey, was born at Cambridge, and died at Slough. He won the Derby on Sir Bevys (1879), the Oaks and Ascot Cup each five times, but never the St Leger.

Fordun, JOHN of, chronicler, perhaps a canon of Aberdeen, may have been born at Fordun in Kincardineshire. He lived to write only five books of the Scotichronicon, bringing it down to 1153, but he left collections extending to 1384, when he is supposed to have died. Walter Bower (q.v.) in 1441 resumed and enlarged the unfinished work; but many of his alterations corrupted Fordun's narrative. The work is the chief authority for the history of Scotland prior to the 15th century. Of the twenty MSS. the best is that in the Wolfenbüttel library. Four editions have been published; Skene's in 1871-72.

Forest, JOHN (c. 1474-1538), a friar barbarously burnt at Smithfield by Henry VIII. for upholding the papal supremacy.

Formes, KARL (1810-89), bass singer, born at Mülheim, made his début at Cologne in 1842, sang in Vienna (1845-48), and at Covent Garden (1852-57), then went to America, and died at San Francisco.—His brother, THEODOR (1826-74), was a great tenor. [For'-mayz.]

Forrest, EDWIN, actor, was born in Philadelphia, 9th March 1806, and made his début there in 1820 as Douglas in Home's tragedy. At twenty he appeared as Othello in New York with great success. He played in London with acceptance in 1836-37, but in 1845 his Macbeth was hissed by the audience; and a resentment that prompted him to hiss Macready in Edinburgh destroyed his reputation in England and Scotland. The hissing of Macready's Macbeth by Forrest's sympathisers at New York in 1849 led to a riot which cost twenty-two lives. These events and his wife's snit for divorce lessened his credit and embittered his temper. He retired from the stage between 1853 and 1860, when he returned to fill at New York his most successful engagement. He made his last appearance as Richelieu at Boston in 1871; and died at Philadelphia, 12th December 1872. See Lives by Alger (1877), Barrett (1881), Harrison (1889).

Forrest, SIR JOHN, Australian explorer, was born at Bunbury in Western Australia, 22d August 1847, and from 1864 was a colonial surveyor. In 1869 he penetrated inland from Perth to 123° E. long.; and next year reached South Australia from the west along the south coast. With his brother Alexander (born 1849) he made an eastward journey in 1874, and published Explorations in Australia (1875). Surveyor-general for the colony from 1883, he was first premier of Western Australia under responsible government (1890-1901), was Postmaster-general for Australia (1900-1), Minister for Defence (1901-3), for Home Affairs (1903-4), Treasurer (1905-7, 1909-10), and Acting Prime Minister (1907).

Förster, FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPH (1791-1868), poet and historian, born near Kaunburg in Saxe-Meiningen, joined the army on the outbreak of the war of liberation, and in 1829 was appointed a custodian of the Royal Art Museum at Berlin. Besides fiery war-songs, he wrote on the war of liberation, the history of Prussia, the courts of Europe in the 18th century, and Wallenstein.—His brother ERNST (1800-85), painter and art critic, wrote on German art (1851-60), the monuments of German architecture, sculpture, and painting (12 vols. 1853-69), &c. [Fers'-ter.]

Forster, JOHANN REINHOLD (1729-98), traveller and naturalist, born in Dirschau, came to England in 1766, taught at Warrington, and in 1772 was appointed to accompany Cook as naturalist on his second voyage. On his return he wrote Observations made during a Voyage round the World (1778). Two years afterwards he was made professor of Natural History at Halle. His chief works are Flora Americae Septentrionalis (1771), Zoologie Rarioris Speciegium (1781), South Sea Plants (1776), and a history of voyages in the far north (1784).—His eldest son, JOHANN GEORG ADAM (1754-94), accompanied his father in Cook's second voyage, and published an account of the expedition. After being professor of Natural History at Cassel and Vilno, he became librarian to the Elector of Mainz in 1788. His Ansichten vom Niederrhein (1791-94) and Beschreibung einer Reise um die Welt (1784) rank high amongst German works descriptive of nature. His Letters were published by his widow in 1829.

Forster, JOHN, political and historical writer, was born at Newcastle, 2d April 1812. He was educated for the bar, but in 1832 became the dramatic critic of the True Sun. His political articles in the Examiner attracted attention; and he edited successively the Foreign Quarterly Review, the Daily News, and (1847-56) the Examiner. He was the author of many admirable biographical and historical essays, as the two volumes of Edinburgh and Quarterly articles reprinted in 1858, and an admirable series dealing with the Commonwealth—Lives of the Statesmen of the Commonwealth (1836-39); Debates on the Grand Remonstrance (1800); Arrest of the Five Members (1800); and Sir John Eliot, a Biography (1864). His literary memoirs are Life and Times of Goldsmith (1848; 2d ed. 1854), Landor (1868), Life of Dickens (1871-74), and vol. i. of a Life of Swift (1875). He was appointed secretary to the Commissioners in Lunacy in 1855, and Commissioner in 1861. He died 1st February 1876.

Forster, THOMAS (c. 1675-1738), the Jacobite M.P. for Northumberland who in 1715 headed the Border rebels, surrendered at Preston, escaped from Newgate, and died at Boulogne.

Forster, WILLIAM EDWARD, statesman, was born of Quaker parentage at Bradpole, Dorsetshire, 11th July 1819. He abandoned the bar for a post in a worsted manufactory at Burley-in-Wharfedale near Bradford. During the Irish famine of 1845 he visited the distressed districts as almoner of a Quaker relief fund; in 1850 he married Jane, daughter of Dr Arnold of Rugby. Forster unsuccessfully contested Leeds as a Liberal in 1859, but in 1861 was returned for Bradford. Under-secretary for the Colonies (1865-66), he became in 1868 Vice-president of the Council on Education and a privy-councillor. In 1870 he accepted a seat in the cabinet, and carried the Elementary Education Bill; in 1872 he piloted the Ballot Bill through the Commons. In 1874 he visited the United States. On Mr Gladstone's retirement from the Liberal leadership in 1875, Forster and Lord Hartington were named for the post, but Forster declined it, on the ground that he could not hope to unite the various sections of the party. That year he was elected Lord Rector of Aberdeen University. Under the Gladstone administration of 1880 Forster was Chief-secretary for Ireland in troublous times. He was attacked unceasingly in Parliament by the Irish members, and his life was threatened by the 'Invincibles.' More than a thousand evictions having taken place in Ireland during the first half of 1880, Forster carried in the Commons the Compensation for Disturbance Bill, which was rejected by the Lords. A Land Act was passed in 1881, but a coercion Act seemed necessary; and when the Land League issued its 'No Rent' manifesto, Forster proclaimed the League illegal. Parnell and several of his party were arrested. When in April 1882 a majority of the cabinet determined to release the 'suspects,' Forster and Lord Cowper (the Lord-lieutenant) resigned. A strong opponent of Home Rule, he died in London, 5th April 1886. See Life by Wemyss Reid (1888).

Forsyth, ALEXANDER JOHN, LL.D. (1768-1843), minister from 1791 of Belhelvie, Aberdeenshire, in 1807 patented his application of the detonating principle in firearms, which was followed by the adoption of the percussion-cap.

Forsyth, SIR THOMAS DOUGLAS, was born at Birkenhead in 1827, from Rugby passed to Haileybury, entered the H.E.I.C. service in 1848, and was employed in the Punjab until 1870, being created C.B. for his services during the Mutiny. In 1870 he conducted a mission to Yarkand, and in 1874 concluded a commercial treaty with Kashgar. K.C.S.I. (1874) and a member of the Legislative Council of India, he in 1875 succeeded in averting war with Burma. He died at Eastbourne, 17th Dec. 1886. See Autobiography (1888).

Fortescue, SIR JOHN (c. 1394-1476), was born in Somerset, and educated at Exeter College, Oxford. Called to the bar, he was in 1441 made serjeant-at-law, and in 1442 Lord Chief-justice of the King's Bench. Adhering to the House of Lancaster, he was attainted under Edward IV. He accompanied Margaret of Anjou and her son into Scotland, and there was probably appointed Lord Chancellor by Henry VI.; in 1463 he embarked with them for Holland, and during his exile wrote his celebrated De Laudibus

Legum Angliæ for the instruction of Prince Edward. On the final defeat of the Lancastrians at Tewkesbury (1471) Fortescue submitted to Edward IV. The De Laudibus was not printed till 1537; another valuable work is The Governance of England (1714; new ed. by Plummer, 1885). His collected works were privately printed by Lord Clermont in 1869. [For-tes-kew.]

Fortiguerra, NICCOLO (1674-1735), Italian poet, was bishop and papal chamberlain to Clement XI., and is remembered by his satirical epic, Il Ricciardetto (1738). [For-tee-ger'-ra.]

Fortune, ROBERT, botanist and traveller, was born in Edrom parish, Berwickshire, 16th September 1813. Apprenticed first as a gardener, he was employed in the Botanic Garden at Edinburgh, and at Chiswick. In 1843 he visited China for the Botanical Society of London. His observations on the flora of the country, its tea and cotton culture, appeared in Three Years' Wanderings in Northern China (1847). Yedo and Peking (1863) was written after a fifth and last journey to the East. He died 16th April 1880.

Fortuny, MARIANO, Spanish painter, was born at Rens in Tarragona, 11th June 1839. When Spain declared war against Morocco, Fortuny followed the army, and filled his portfolios with studies of Eastern life. Celebrated pictures are 'The Spanish Marriage,' 'Book-lover in the Library of Richelieu,' and 'Academicians choosing a Model.' He died at Rome, 21st November 1874. See monographs by Davillier (illus. Paris, 1875) and Yriarte (Paris, 1885). [For-too'-nee.]

Foscarini, FRANCESCO (c. 1370-1457), was elected Doge of Venice in 1423, and by his great military ability carried a conflict with Milan to a triumphant issue in the Treaty of Ferrara (1433). His last years were embittered by the unjust torturing and banishment of his son Giacom. See Alethea Wiel's Two Doges of Venice (1891).

Foscolo, UGO, Italian author, was born in Zante, 26th January 1778, and educated at Spalato and Venice. His bitter disappointment when Venice was ceded to Austria found vent in the Lettere di Jacopo Ortis (1802). Believing that France was destined to liberate Italy, he served in the French armies; but, undeceived as to Napoleon's intentions, returned to Milan, and published in 1807 his best poem, I Sepolcri. He translated Sterne's Sentimental Journey, and wrote two tragedies, Ajace and Ricciarda. In 1809 he was for a few months professor of Eloquence in Pavia. After 1814, when the Austrians entered Milan, Foscolo finally sought refuge in London. There were published his Saggi sul Petrarca, Discorso sul testo del Decamerone, Discorso sul testo di Dante, and various papers in the Quarterly and Edinburgh Reviews. His last years were embittered by poverty and neglect. He died at Turnham Green, 10th October 1827; in 1871 his remains were translated from Chiswick to Florence. His works and letters were published by Le Monnier (1850-62). See Lives by Pecchio (1836), Carrer (1842), Artusi (1878), Antona Traversi (1884-89), De Winckels (1885-86), Chiarini (1891 and 1910), and Martinetti (1891-92).

Foster, BIRKET, artist, was born at North Shields, of Quaker parentage, 4th February 1825, but from his sixth year was brought up in London. He could draw before he could speak, and from 1841 to 1846 he produced a large number of subjects for wood-engravings, many of them for the Illustrated London News. With John Gilbert he illustrated Evangeline and many of the poets, his share being dainty poetic landscapes and rustic scenes, nowhere better exemplified than in his Pictures of English Landscape (1862). In 1859 Foster exhibited the first of many water-colours, and in 1860 was elected an associate, in 1861 a member, of the Water-colour Society. He died at Weybridge, 27th March 1899.

Foster, JOHN, 'the essayist,' was born in the parish of Halifax, Yorkshire, 17th September 1770. Elder son of a yeoman-weaver, he was trained for the ministry at Briery Hall and the Baptist College in Bristol, but, after preaching for twenty-five years with indifferent success to various small congregations, in 1817 he devoted himself to literature. His Essays, in a series of Letters (1805), were only four in number—the best-known that 'On Decision of Character.' In 1819 appeared his Essay on the Evils of Popular Ignorance, urging the necessity of national education. Between 1806 and 1839 he contributed 184 articles to the Eclectic Review. He died 15th October 1843, at Stapleton, Bristol, his home for twenty-two years. See his Life and Correspondence by J. E. Ryland (1846; new ed. 1852).

Foster, SIR MICHAEL, son of a Huntingdon doctor, was born in 1836, and trained at University College, London, where from 1867 he taught physiology till in 1870 he was called to Cambridge. LL.D. and F.R.S., he has written much on physiology and embryology, including the great Text-book of Physiology (1877; 6th ed. 1893-1900) and a History of Physiology (1901). He was made K.C.B. in 1899 and M.P. for London University in 1901; and he died 29th January 1907.

Foster, STEPHEN COLLINS (1826-64), American song-writer, was born in Pittsburgh and died in New York. Of his 125 compositions nearly a fourth are negro melodies. The best-known are 'The Old Folks at Home,' 'Nelly Bly,' 'Uncle Ned,' 'Old Dog Tray,' 'Gentle Annie,' 'Old Kentucky Home,' 'Willie, we have missed you,' and 'Come where my Love lies dreaming,' the airs and words alike his own composition.

Foucault, JEAN BERNARD LÉON (1819-68), physicist, was born and died in Paris. His earliest work was a series of investigations on light. In 1851 he proved the rotation of the earth by means of a freely suspended pendulum. Two years after his appointment (1855) as physical assistant in the Paris Observatory he invented his polariser; in 1859 he completed his reflector for the great Paris telescope. He edited the scientific part of the Journal des Débats from 1845, and was elected a foreign member of the Royal Society in 1864. See Life by Lissajous (1875) and a Recueil of his scientific works (1878). [Foo-ko'.]

Fouché, JOSEPH, Duke of Otranto, was born at Nantes, 29th May 1763. He hailed the Revolution with delight; and, elected to the National Convention in 1792, voted for the execution of Louis. Commissioned to castigate Lyons (1794), he rivalled his associates, Collot d'Herbois and Couthon, in bloodthirstiness. In 1794 he was expelled from the Convention as a Terrorist. Yet in September 1799 he was appointed minister of Police; and this post, though he was dismissed several times and sent to appointments at Rome and Naples, he held with interruptions till 1815, having made terms with the Bourbons when he foresaw Napoleon's downfall. But he had scarcely been appointed ambassador to Dresden when decree of banishment was pronounced against the regicides (1816), and he henceforward lived in exile. He died at Trieste, 25th December 1820. Unscrupulous, politic, and sagacious, he made an admirable head of police, and helped to save France from anarchy. The Mémoires de J. Fouché (1828-29; Eng. trans. 1892) were declared not genuine by his sons. [Foo-shay.]

Fouquet. See FOUQUET.

Fould, ACHILLE (1800-67), financier and politician, was born in Paris of Jewish parents, and trained in his father's bank. Elected in 1842 to the Chamber of Deputies, after the revolution of 1848 he rendered service to the provisional government, and during the presidency of Louis Napoleon was four times minister of Finance. When he resigned (1852) on the confiscation of the property of the Orleans family, he was created a senator, and was soon made minister of state and of the imperial household. In 1861-67 he was again finance minister. [Foo.]

Fouils, ROBERT AND ANDREW, Glasgow printers, were born the one in 1707, the other in 1712. In 1741 Robert set up as a Glasgow bookseller, in 1743 became university printer, and between 1742 and his death published 554 works, including the 'immaculate' Horace (with only six misprints, 1744) and the splendid folio Homer (4 vols. 1756-58). In 1753 Robert established an academy at Glasgow, which during its first ten years produced 1112 prints, besides statues, busts, oil-paintings, and crayons. But the printing business declined, and Andrew's death on 18th September 1775 proved the finishing blow. Next year Robert sold off his 'old masters' in London; and he died suddenly in Edinburgh, 2d June 1776. See Duncan's Literary History of Glasgow (1831; new ed. 1886). [Fouls or Fow-lis.]

Fountainhall, LORD, the 'paper' title of Sir John Lauder (1646-1722), who in 1685 became M.P. for Haddington, and in 1689 a lord of session and lord justiciary. See his Diaries (Bannatyne Club, 1840-48; Scottish History Society, 1900).

Fouqué, FRIEDRICH HEINRICH KARL, BARON DE LA MOTTE, German romanticist, was of Huguenot ancestry, grandson of a Prussian general (1698-1774) distinguished in the Seven Years' War. Born at Brandenburg, 12th Feb. 1777, he served as a Prussian cavalry officer in 1794 and 1813. The interval between these campaigns was devoted to literary pursuits, and the rest of his life was spent in Paris and on his estate at Nemhausen, and after 1830 at Halle. He died at Berlin, 23d Jan. 1843. His long series of romances, both prose and verse, include Sigurd (1808), The Magic Ring, Thiodulf the Iclander, Asluga's Knight, Sintram and his Companions, The Two Captains, and his masterpiece, Undine (1811).—His second wife, KAROLINE (1773-1831), wrote innumerable romances and stories. [Foo-kay.]

Fouquet, NICOLAS (1615-80), Vicomte de Melun et de Vaux and Marquis de Belle-Isle, was born in Paris. Mazarin made him procureur-général to the parliament of Paris (1650) and superintendent of finance (1653). He now became ambitious to succeed Mazarin, and to secure himself friends distributed money lavishly. But Louis XIV. himself took up the reins of power on Mazarin's death, and, instigated by Colbert, arrested Fouquet in September 1661. After a three years' trial he was sentenced to life-long imprisonment in the fortress of Pignerol, where he died. He has been falsely identified with the Man with the Iron Mask, who lived until 1703. See Lives by Chérnel (1865), Bonnaffe (1882), and Lair (1890).

Fouquier-Tinville, ANTOINE QUENTIN (1747-95), born at Hérouelles, dep. Aisne, was a dissolute attorney, who at the Revolution joined the most violent democrats. Appointed public prosecutor to the Revolutionary Tribunal in March 1793, he superintended all the political executions during the Reign of Terror until July 1794. He sent his friends, among them Robespierre, Danton, and Hébert, to execution as cheerfully as he sent their enemies; at last he himself was guillotined. See Life by Domenget (1878). [Foo-K'ay Tanv-vel.]

Fourier, François Marie Charles, socialist, was born at Besançon, 9th April 1772. From his father he inherited £3000, but, having started business at Lyons, he lost nearly all he had during the Terror (1793), and narrowly escaped the guillotine. After his release and two years' experience as a soldier he returned to commerce, set himself to discover an entirely new social theory, and in 1808 published Théorie des Quatres Mouvements, in 1822 Traité d'Association Domestique Agricole, in 1829 Nouveau Monde Industriel et Sociétaire—works which for many years found few readers and scarcely any disciples. A small group of enthusiasts by-and-by gathered round him, but failed in an attempt to establish a society on his principles (1832) near Versailles. He died at Paris, 8th October 1837. Personally a model of simplicity and integrity, he taught that mankind is oppressed by an endless variety of evils—which he sums up in one obnoxious word, civilisation—due to our having run counter to the Creator in pronouncing passions to be bad that are simply natural. To pass from social chaos to universal harmony there is but one way—to give a free and healthy development to the human passions. But for the realisation of the ideal new social arrangements are necessary. These are provided in the phalange. Each phalange was to consist of 1800 persons, a number sufficient to include the whole circle of human capacities, and secure a harmonious social life from the free play of the most varied likings and capacities. In the phalange labour is made attractive by constant regard to the likings and capacities of every one, and by continual change of occupation. Out of the common gain a comfortable minimum was apportioned to each member, and the remainder was divided into twelve shares, of which five went to labour, four to capital, and three to talent. The accepted marriage system was to be abandoned. Fourier's complete works were published at Paris (6 vols. 1840-46; new ed. 1870). See works by Victor Considérant (1845), Gatti de Gamond (5th ed. 1841), Pellarin (5th ed. 1871), and Alhaiza (1890-95), and in German by Becker (1875) and Bebel (1888). [Foor-yoy.]

Fourier, Jean Baptiste Joseph, Baron de (1760-1830), French mathematician, accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt in 1798, and contributed largely to the Description de l'Égypte. In 1802 he was made prefect of the department of Grenoble, and was created baron in 1808. His chief work is the Théorie Analytique de la Chaleur (1822).

Fowler, Sir Henry Hartley, Lord Wolverhampton (1830-1911), a Sunderland Wesleyan minister's son, mayor of Wolverhampton 1863, its M.P. 1880, was Under-secretary in the Home Office (1884), financial secretary to the Treasury (1886), President of the Local Government Board (1892), Secretary for India (1894), and Chancellor of the Duchy (1895), and Lord President (1908-10). He became Viscount Wolverhampton in 1908.

Fowler, John (1826-64), an inventor in 1850-60 of the steam-plough, was born at Melksham, and died at Ackworth near Pontefract, having in 1860 established large engineer works at Leeds.

Fowler, Sir John (1817-98), civil engineer, born at Wadsley Hall, Sheffield, was engineer of many railway lines, including the original 'underground' in London. River improvement and dock construction also occupied his attention. He was made a K.C.M.G. in 1885 for his services as consulting engineer in Egypt, and a baronet on the completion of the Forth Bridge (1882-90), designed by him and Sir Benjamin Baker.

Fowler, Thomas, D.D. (1832-1904), born at Burton-Stather in Lincolnshire, graduated with a double first from Merton College, Oxford, in 1854, and became tutor of Lincoln College, professor of Logic from 1873, and president of Corpus Christi from 1881. His works include Elements of Deductive Logic (1867), Elements of Inductive Logic (1870), Progressive Morality (1884), Principles of Morals (1887), History of Corpus (1893), and Logic, Deductive and Inductive (1895), besides monographs on Locke, Bacon, and Shaftesbury and Hutcheson.

Fox, Caroline (1819-71), the friend of John Sterling and J. S. Mill, was born and lived at Falmouth. See her Memories (1882).

Fox, Sir Charles (1810-74), civil engineer, was born at Derby, and was knighted in 1851 for building the Great Exhibition.

Fox, Charles James, third son of the first Lord Holland, was born in London, 24th January 1749, and educated at Eton and Hertford College, Oxford, spending his vacations in the gayest circles of the French capital. Even as a school-boy he led an irregular life, but was distinguished for ability; at nineteen his father had him brought into parliament as member for Midhurst. Soon after he attained his majority he came forward as a supporter of Lord North, and was made a lord of Admiralty. In 1772 he resigned, but next year was named a commissioner of the Treasury. Dismissed from that post in 1775 after another quarrel with Lord North, he passed over to the ranks of the opposition, and during the American war was the most formidable opponent of the coercive measures of government. After the downfall of North (1782), Fox was one of the secretaries of State till the death of the Marquis of Rockingham. In 1783 the North and Fox coalition was formed, and Fox resumed his former office; but the rejection of his India Bill by the House of Lords led to the resignation of his government. Now Pitt came into power, and the long contest between him and Fox began. The sudden illness of the king in 1788 and the need for a regency recalled Fox from a visit to Gibbon at Lausanne and to Italy. The regency, the trial of Warren Hastings, and the French Revolution gave ample scope to the talents and energies of Fox, who employed his influence to modify, if not to counteract, the policy of his great rival. He was a strenuous opponent of the war with France, and an advocate of non-intervention. After Pitt's death in January 1806, Fox, recalled to office, set on foot negotiations for a peace with France. He was on the point of introducing a bill for the abolition of the slave-trade, when he died at Chiswick, 13th September 1806. He was buried, near Pitt, in Westminster Abbey. Fox was a hard liver, addicted to gambling and drinking; his bearing towards his opponents was generous. Burke called him 'the greatest debater the world ever saw.' See, besides the Life and Times and the Memorials and Correspondence, by Earl Russell (1853-66), Dr Parr's Character of the Late C. J. Fox (1809); various works by Sir George Trevelyan (1880-1912); and the Life by H. O. Wakeman (1890).

Fox, George, the founder of the Society of Friends or Quakers, was born in July 1624 at Fenny Drayton, Leicestershire. Apprenticed to a Nottingham shoemaker, he felt at nineteen a divine call to leave his friends, and Bible in hand he wandered about the country, a small competency he had supplying his slender wants. He soon began to attend meetings, and often to interrupt services, especially when these were held in 'steeple-houses' and conducted by formalist 'professors' (not so much the Laudians as the Puritans, with their long abstruse sermons and extravagant doctrines of verbal inspiration). The 'inner light' was the central idea of his teaching. He inveighed against sacerdotalism and formalism, and was equally vehement against social conventionalism. Priests, lawyers, and soldiers were all obnoxious to him. The Lord forbade him to put off his hat to any, high or low, and he was required to thee and thou rich and poor. His famous 'leather suit' was probably ordinary leather-breeches. He denounced amusements, and came into collision with all sorts of people; his life is indeed little else than a record of insults, persecutions, and imprisonments. In 1656, the year after he and his followers refused to take the oath of abjuration, they had increased to such an extent that there were nearly one thousand of them in jail. He visited Wales and Scotland, and (after marrying a worthy widow) went to Barbadoes, Jamaica, America, Holland, and Germany. In these later wanderings he was accompanied by Penn, Barclay, Keith, and other Quaker leaders. He died in London, 15th November 1690. Guilty of many indiscretions, Fox was an amiable man, with a heart full of love for his fellows, and a mind capable of instituting systems of registration, poor relief, education, and self-help, which have made the sect he founded a social power. His preaching and writings were often turgid, incoherent, and mystical. As a writer he will be always remembered by his Journal (1911), full of heart and intellect. His writings were collected (3 vols. 1694-1706); the list of them in Joseph Smith's Catalogue of Friends' Books (1868) occupies fifty-three pages. See Lives by Marsh (1848), Janney (Phila. 1853), J. S. Watson (1860), Bickley (1884), Budge (1893), H. Deacon (1896), and especially Hodgkin (1896).

FOX, WILLIAM JOHNSON, orator and political writer, was born at Wrentham near Southwold, 1st March 1786. Trained for the Independent ministry, he seceded to Unitarianism, and delivered a series of rationalist prelections at his chapel in South Place, Finsbury. His bold and impassioned rhetoric greatly contributed to arouse public feeling in favour of the Anti-corn-law League; and his Letters of a Norwich Weaver Boy on the necessity of free-trade were largely quoted and read. From 1847 till 1863 he sat as an advanced Liberal for Oldham. His best parliamentary speeches were upon the education of the people. One of the earliest contributors to the Westminster Review, he edited for many years the Monthly Repository, and published many lectures, &c., collected in the Memorial Edition of his works (1865-68). He died 3d June 1864. See Life by R. and E. Garnett (1910).

FOXE, JOHN (1516-87), the martyrologist, born at Boston in Lincolnshire, at sixteen entered Brasenose College, Oxford, and was fellow of Magdalen 1538-45. When tutor with Lucy of Charlecote he married (1547), and afterwards was tutor to the son of the Earl of Surrey, executed in 1547. During the reign of Mary he retired to the Continent, where he met Knox, Grindal, and Whittingham. On Elizabeth's accession he was pensioned by his old pupil, now Duke of Norfolk, and received a prebend of Salisbury (1563). He lived chiefly in London, and often preached. For a year he held a stall at Durham, but was debarred from further preferment by objection to the surplice. Foxe published numerous controversial treatises and sermons, besides an apocalyptic Latin mystery play, called Christus Triumphans (1556). But the work that has immortalised his name is his History of the Acts and Monuments of the Church, popularly known as Foxe's Book of Martyrs, the first part of which was published in Latin at Strasburg in 1554 (reprinted at Basel in 1559). The first English edition appeared in 1563, in folio. Sanctioned by the bishops, it went through four editions in Foxe's lifetime. It is a noble monument of English; and Foxe's story is doubtless substantially true, although disfigured by credulity and bitter prejudice. The biography of Foxe, attributed to his son Samuel, and published in the 1641 edition of the Acts, is apocryphal. The best edition of Foxe is that in the 'Reformation' series, edited by Mendham and Pratt (8 vols. 1853 et seq.).

FOXE, RICHARD (c. 1448-1528), the founder of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, was born at Ropesley near Grantham, studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, at Cambridge, and in Paris, in 1485 became vicar of Stepney, and shortly after lord privy seal and Bishop of Exeter. Thence he was translated to Bath and Wells (1492), Durham (1494), and Winchester (1501). See Thomas Fowler's History of Corpus Christi (1893).

FOY, MAXIMILIEN SÉBASTIEN (1775-1825), French general, was born at Ham, entered the army in 1791, and by 1800 had risen to the rank of adjutant-general. He held commands in the Italian (1801) and the Austrian (1805) campaigns. In 1807 Napoleon sent him to Turkey to assist Sultan Selim against the Russians and British. From 1808 to 1812 he was brigade-general in Portugal and Spain, and was present at all the battles of the Pyrenees. In 1815 he was wounded (not for the first time) at Waterloo, where he commanded under Ney. In 1819 elected a deputy, he was the constant advocate of constitutional liberty. His Histoire de la Guerre de la Péninsule was published in 1827. See biography by Tissot, prefixed to Foy's Discours (1826). [Fisch.]

Fra Bartolommeo. See BARTOLOMEO.

Fracastoro, GIROLAMO (1483-1553), physician and poet, born at Verona, was professor of Logic at Padua, practised successfully as a physician, but ultimately abandoned medicine for letters. His best-known work is a Latin poem (!) on syphilis (1530; Lond. 1720); he also published a discourse on sympathy and antipathy.

Fra Diavolo, properly MICHELE PEZZA (1760-1806), Italian brigand, had entered the Neapolitan and papal service, and then turned monk, but, being expelled for misconduct, withdrew to the mountains of Calabria, where he headed a band of desperadoes. Pillage and atrocious cruelties signalled his career. For years he evaded justice by retiring to his mountain haunts, and defeating with inferior numbers all the forces despatched against him. On the advance of the French into the Neapolitan states, along with his band he espoused the royal cause; and not only were they pardoned, but made officers, Fra Diavolo himself becoming colonel. In 1806 he tried to raise Calabria against the French, but was taken prisoner and executed at Naples.

Auber's opera has nothing in common with Fra Diavolo but the name.

Fragonard, JEAN HONORÉ (1732-1806), painter, born at Grasse, gained the 'prix de Rome' in 1752. In 1765 he received 2400 francs from Louis XV. for his 'Callirhoé,' commissioned for reproduction in Gobelins tapestry. He painted, with a loose touch and luscious colouring, genre pictures of contemporary life, and is also known by his landscapes. He is represented in the Louvre by such works as 'Bacchante Endormie' and 'La Chemise Enlevée.' See illustrated Life by Portalis (Par. 1888). [Fra-go-nahr']

Fraikin, CHARLES AUGUSTE (1819-93), Belgian sculptor, born at Herenthals, died at Brussels.

Frampton, MARY (1773-1846), a maiden lady of Dorchester, whose interesting life-long Journal was printed in 1885.

Frampton, ROBERT (1622-1708), born at Pimperne near Blandford, from 1665 to 1670 was chaplain at Aleppo, in 1681 became Bishop of Gloucester, but was deprived in 1690 as a non-juror. He died at Standish.

Frampton, TREGONWELL (1641-1727), the 'father of the turf,' was born at Moreton near Dorchester, and from 1695 was royal trainer at Newmarket.

Français, FRANÇOIS LOUIS, a French landscape-painter, was born at Plombières, 17th November 1814, studied art under great difficulties, began to exhibit in 1837, and was elected to the Academy of Fine Arts in 1890. He died 28th May 1897.

Francatelli, CHARLES ELMÉ (1805-76), a London chef and writer on cookery.

France, JACQUES ANATOLE, poet and prose-writer, was born in Paris, 16th April 1844, began to publish in 1868, issued his first poems in 1873, and in 1896 was elected to the Academy.

Francesca da Rimini, daughter of Giovanni da Polenta, lord of Ravenna, was married to Giovanni the Lame, son of Malatesta, lord of Rimini. But she already loved Paolo, Giovanni's brother; and in 1285 Giovanni, surprising the lovers together, slew them both. The incident is woven into Dante's Inferno. See works by Tonini (2d ed. Rimini, 1870), Yriarte (Par. 1882), and Rondoni (Parma, 1890). [Fran-tches'ka da Rim'y-nee.]

Franceschi, PIERO DEGLI (c. 1420-92), a Florentine religious painter, was born and died at Borgo San Sepolcro. [Fran-tches'kee.]

Francesco di Paula, or ST FRANCIS OF PAOLA, founder of the Minims, was born in 1416 at Paola in Calabria. At thirteen he was a Franciscan; and at nineteen he retired to a cave and inflicted on himself every species of self-mortification. The fame of his piety having attracted emulators, he obtained permission to erect a convent, and the new order came to be known as Minim-Hermits of St Francis of Paola. Communities were established throughout Europe, but not in the British Islands. Louis XI. of France summoned Francesco to his death-bed; and Charles VIII. and Louis XII. built him convents at Plessis-les-Tours and Amboise. He died at Plessis on Good Friday 1507, and was canonised in 1519. [Fran-tches'ko dee Pow'la.]

Francheville, PIERRE (1548-1616), sculptor, was born at Cambrai, and died in Paris.

Francia, or FRANCESCO RAIBOLINI (1450-1517), goldsmith and painter, was born and died at Bologna. His sons, GIACOMO (c. 1486-1557) and GIULIO (1487-c. 1543), were also painters. See Julia Cartwright's Mantegna and Francia (1881).

Francia, JOSÉ GASPAR RODRIGUEZ (1756-1840), Dictator of Paraguay, was born near Asuncion, studied theology, took his degree as doctor, and was a professor of Divinity. Next he practised law for thirty years with a high reputation. He was past fifty when the revolution which shattered the Spanish yoke in South America broke out. Francia took a leading part in the movement in Paraguay, and on the declaration of independence in 1811 became secretary of the national junta, in 1813 one of the two consuls, and in 1814 dictator—first for three years, and then for life. Under his firm rule, which excluded all foreign intercourse, Paraguay rapidly improved. He was an unscrupulous despot, and yet he improved agriculture, promoted education, repressed superstition, and enforced strict justice in his law-courts, however little he regarded it for himself. See Francia's Reign of Terror (1839) by the brothers Robertson, Carlyle's Edinburgh essay (1843), and Life by Bazán (Madr. 1887). [Span. pron. Fran'thee-a.]

Franciabigio, or FRANCESCO DI CRISTOFANO BIOI (1482-1525), a Florentine painter.

Francillon, ROBERT EDWARD, born at Gloucester in 1841, in 1868 made his début as a novelist with Grace Owen's Engagement in Blackwood's Magazine. Since then he has written Olympia (1874), A Dog and his Shadow (1876), King or Knave (1888), Jack Doyle's Daughter (1894), &c.

Francis I., king of France, son of Charles, Comte d'Angoulême, was born at Cognac, 12th September 1494, and succeeded Louis XII., his uncle and father-in-law, 1st January 1515. His first act was to reconquer Milan (1515), winning the victory of Marignano. On the death of Maximilian of Germany in 1519 Francis became a candidate for the imperial crown; but Charles V. was elected, and Francis thereupon declared war against him. The French were driven out of Italy; Henry VIII. of England and the emperor invaded France on the north; the Constable Bourbon deserted to the enemy; and the principal Italian republics declared against Francis, who, after successfully confronting his many adversaries for some time, was defeated and taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia, 24th February 1525. Charles set him at liberty a year later, compelled him to renounce Flanders, Artois, Burgundy, and all his Italian possessions, to restore Bourbon to his former dignities, and to surrender his two sons as hostages. Pope Clement VII. absolved Francis from his oath; and England, Rome, Venice, Florence, and Genoa all siding with him in alarm at the power of Charles, the war in Italy recommenced. In May 1527 Bourbon stormed and sacked Rome, and captured the pope, while a French army was frittered away before Naples. At last peace was concluded at Cambrai (1529), by which Francis retained Burgundy, but lost the Milanese, Flanders, and Artois. Hostilities were renewed in 1534, but little was accomplished; and by the efforts of Pope Paul III. another treaty was concluded at Nice between Charles and Francis (1538). Charles's unfortunate expedition against Algiers once more induced Francis to renew the quarrel (1542); but, in spite of the victory of Cérisolles (1544), Francis was at length compelled to make peace at Crespy (September 1544), matters being left in statu quo. Francis died at Rambouillet, 31st March 1547. Brilliant, frivolous, changeable, licentious, he fostered learning and art, but cruelly persecuted the Protestants. 1887); Gaston Paris, François I. (1888); and Francis I. and his Times, by Coignet (trans. 1889).

Francis II. (1544-60) in 1558 married Mary Stuart, and in 1559 succeeded his father, Henry II.

Francis I. (1708-65), emperor of Germany from 1745, was the eldest son of Leopold, Duke of Lorraine and Grand-duke of Tuscany. In 1736 he married Maria Theresa (q.v.) of Austria.

Francis II. or I., born at Florence, 12th February 1768, in 1792 succeeded his father, Leopold II., as emperor of Germany. His reign was a series of wars with Napoleon. The first was terminated by the Peace of Campo Formio in 1797, when Austria lost the Netherlands and Lombardy, receiving in return Venice, Dalmatia, and Istria; the next by the Treaty of Lunéville in 1801, after the reverses of Marengo and Hohenlinden. Then followed the campaign of 1805, in which the French victories of Ulm and Austerlitz and the capture of Vienna compelled Austria to purchase peace at Pressburg by the cession of Venetia, Tyrol, and Vorarlberg. On the foundation of the Confederation of the Rhine (1806), Francis renounced the title of German-Roman emperor, and retained that of emperor of Austria (Francis I.), which he had assumed in 1804. In 1809 another attempt ended, by the Treaty of Vienna, in the loss of Salzburg, Carinthia, Trieste, part of Croatia, Dalmatia, and Galicia. After a short alliance with France the emperor, in conjunction with the Russians and Prussians, assailed Napoleon and won the battle of Leipzig (1813). By the Treaty of Vienna (1815) Francis recovered, thanks to Metternich (q.v.), Lombardy, Venetia, and Galicia. His policy was conservative and anti-liberal, but personally he was an urbane and popular ruler. He died 2d March 1835. See Meynert, Franz I. (1871-73).

Francis de Sales, Sr, born August 21, 1567, at the family castle of Sales near Annecy in Savoy, was intended by his father for a career of distinction, but after attending the Jesuit school at Paris, and studying civil law at Padua, took orders and became distinguished as a preacher. He was employed in a mission for the conversion of the Calvinistic population of Chablais, with unprecedented success; and in 1598 was appointed coadjutor to the Bishop of Geneva, with the title of Bishop of Nicolais. In 1602 at Paris he was invited to preach the Lent at the Louvre; and his lectures had so much influence in converting several Huguenot nobles, that the king offered him a French bishopric, which he declined. Soon afterwards, on the death of his colleague, he became sole Bishop of Geneva. His administration of his diocese was beyond all praise; and he again declined the offer of a French bishopric. About this time he published his Introduction to a Devout Life, to the present day one of the most popular manuals. He established a congregation of nuns of the order of the Visitation under the direction of Madame de Chantal, with whom he long maintained a correspondence, published in 1660. He died 28th December 1622. In 1665 he was canonised by Alexander VII. See the 20-vol. issue of his works, edited by Dom B. Mackey, which began to appear in 1891. See French Lives by Hamon (5th ed. 1867) and Perennes (3d ed. 1879); and in English by Ormsby (1857) and Mrs Lear (1877). [Sahl.]

Francis, FRANCIS (1822-86), angling editor of the Field and writer on angling, was born at Seaton, Axminster, and lived at Twickenham.

Francis, JOHN, born at Bermondsey, 18th July

1811, was publisher of the Athenæum from 1831 till his death, 6th April 1882. He did much for the repeal of advertisement duty on newspapers, as also the compulsory stamp and paper duty (1853-61). See Life by J. C. Francis (1888).

Francis Joseph, emperor of Austria, born 18th August 1830, son of the Archduke Francis (son of the Emperor Francis I.), succeeded his uncle Ferdinand I. (q.v.) in 1848. His first task was to subdue the Hungarian revolt and pacify Lombardy. This accomplished, an era of reaction began. The aspirations of the various nationalities of the empire were rigorously suppressed, and a determined effort made to fuse them into one state; the emperor reasserted his claim to rule as an absolute sovereign; the policy of bureaucratic centralisation was again reverted to; and a close alliance was entered into with the Church to combat liberal progress. In 1859 Lombardy was wrested from Austria by Sardinia; and by the war with Prussia in 1866 Austria was excluded from Germany, and compelled to cede Venetia to Sardinia, who had fought as Prussia's ally. From this time the emperor adopted a policy of conciliation towards the nationalities comprised in his dominions, and evinced an earnest desire to gratify, as far as possible, the aspirations of each. By the death of his son Rudolf (1858-89) the crown passes to Francis (b. Dec. 18, 1863), eldest son of the emperor's brother Charles Louis (1833-96); his empress since 1854, Elizabeth of Bavaria (1837-98), was stabbed at Geneva on Sept. 10, by an anarchist, Luccheni.

Francis of Assisi, Sr, founder of the Franciscan order, was born in 1182, of a family called Bernardone, at Assisi. His baptismal name was John; but from his familiarity in his youth with the language of the troubadours, he acquired the name of il Francesco ('the little Frenchman'). He was remarkable for his love of gaiety and ostentations prodigality, and engaged eagerly in exercises of chivalry. An illness turned his thoughts from earth; a second illness decided his career. He now devoted himself to poverty, and took a vow never to refuse alms to a beggar. He abandoned his inheritance, and thenceforth no humiliation was too great for him, now arrayed only in a single brown tunic of coarse woollen cloth, girt with a hempen cord. This was in 1208. His enthusiasm by degrees excited emulation, and in 1210 his brotherhood having increased to eleven in number, he drew up for it a rule, which was approved orally by Pope Innocent III. The two following years were spent by the brotherhood in preaching in various rural districts; and Francis, returning to Assisi in 1212, finally settled the constitution of his order. Like the older forms of monastic life, the Franciscan system is founded on the three vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience; but of these the second was, in the eyes of Francis, the first in importance and in spiritual efficacy. He repudiated all idea of property, alike for his order and for its members, even in those things which they retained for personal use. Numbers crowded round Francis. He told them off in parties to different provinces of Italy. Five repaired to Morocco, and fell martyrs to their holy daring. In 1216 the order was solemnly approved by Pope Innocent. From this date it increased with extraordinary rapidity. At the first general assembly (1219) 5000 members were present; 500 more were claimants for admission. Francis himself went to Egypt (1223) and preached in the presence of the sultan, securing a promise of more indulgent treatment for the Christian captives, and for the Franciscan order the privilege they have since enjoyed as guardians of the Holy Sepulchre. It is after his return to Italy that his biographers place the legend of his receiving upon his own person, while in an ecstasy of prayer, the marks (stigmata) of the wounds of the Redeemer (17th September 1224). He died 4th October 1226, and was canonised by Pope Gregory IX. in 1228. The works of St Francis (folio, 1739) consist of letters, sermons, ascetic treatises, proverbs, and hymns—the latter among the earliest metrical works in Italian, exceedingly simple, and full of the love of God. His prose is often more poetical than his poetry. Francis, Sir Philip (1740–1818), was born in Dublin. Leaving Ireland at twelve, he entered St Paul's School in London, and at sixteen became a junior clerk in the secretary of state's office. In 1758 he was a secretary in the expedition against Cherbourg; in 1760 he was secretary on a mission to Portugal; in 1761 he acted as amanuensis to the elder Pitt; and in 1762 he was made first-clerk in the War Office. In 1773 Lord North made him a member of the Council of Bengal; in 1780 he fought a duel with Warren Hastings (with whom he was always at enmity), and was seriously wounded. In 1781 he returned home with a fortune gained at whist. He entered parliament in 1784. He was energetic in the proceedings against Hastings, wrote many pamphlets, was eager to be governor-general of India, and was made a K. C. B. in 1806. He was devoted to the prince-regent and a warm supporter of the 'Friends of the People.' In 1816 Mr John Taylor pronounced Francis to be 'Junius,' but Francis never acknowledged the seventy Letters, printed in the Public Advertiser (1769–72), and reprinted in 1812 with 113 additional letters. His young second wife, whom he married when seventy-four, was convinced that he must be Junius. See his Memoirs by Parkes and Merivale (1867); books by Chabot and Twistleton (1871) and H. R. Franck, ADOLPHE (1809–93), writer on philosophy, born at Liocourt, Meurthe, died in Paris.

Franck, CÉSAR (1822–90), born at Liège of German family, was an influential teacher of music in Paris, where he became a French citizen, and gained tardy fame as a composer. See Vincent D'Indy's César Franck (Eng. trans. 1909).

Franck, RICHARD (c. 1624–1708), a Cromwellian captain and angler, born at Cambridge, who visited Scotland about 1656, and wrote the euphuistic Northern Memoirs (1694), &c.

Franck, SEBASTIAN (1499–1542), an early German writer, born at Donauwörth, became a priest, but was converted to Protestantism, and wrote a Treatise against the Horrible Vice of Drunkenness (1528). His insistence upon moral reform as more important than dogma caused him to drift away from Luther; and in 1531 he was banished from Strasburg, largely because of his advocacy of religious toleration in his Chronica, an attempt at a universal history in the German tongue. In 1532 he took up the calling of printer at Ulm, and the publication of his Paradoxa (1534) caused his expulsion in 1539. He died at Basel. Franck also published Weltbuch (1534), Chronica des ganzen teutschen Lands (1538), Die güldene Arche (1539), and one of the earliest collections of German proverbs (1541). See works by Bischof (1856), Hase (1869), Weinkanff (1877), Hagenmacher (1886), Hegler (1892), and Löwenberg (1893).

Francke, AUGUST HERMANN (1663–1727), born at Lübeck, in 1692 became professor of Oriental Languages at Halle, in 1698 of Theology. A conspicuous Pietist and pupil of Spener, he founded in 1695 at Halle a school for the poor, a pædagogium, a burgher school, a Latin school, a training seminary, and an orphanage, which last became the most important of them all. The six now have over 8000 pupils. See Lives by Kramer (2d ed. 1885) and Stein (2d ed. 1886). [Fran-keh.]

Frankl, LUDWIG, RITTER VON HOCHWART (1810–93), an Austrian poet of Jewish origin.

Frankland, SIR EDWARD, D. C. L., K. C. B. (1897), chemist, born at Churchtown near Lancaster, 18th January 1825, became professor of Chemistry in Owens College (1851), Bartholomew's Hospital (1857), the Royal Institution (1863), the Royal College of Chemistry (1865), and the Normal School of Science, South Kensington (1881; resigned 1885). He was elected F.R.S. in 1853, and a corresponding member of the French Academy in 1866. He published Experimental Researches in Chemistry (1878) and works on lighting, sanitation, &c., and with Lockyer studied the sun's atmosphere. He died 9th August 1899.

Franklin, BENJAMIN, youngest son and fifteenth child of a family of seventeen, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, 17th January 1706, and was apprenticed at twelve to his brother James, a printer, who about 1709 started a newspaper, the New England Courant. Benjamin had so repaired the deficiencies of his early education that he was able to contribute to it; and when James was imprisoned by the Speaker of the Assembly for his too free criticisms the management of the paper was confided to Benjamin, who presumed too much upon his success, and the brothers fell out. Benjamin drifted to Philadelphia, friendless and almost penniless, but was fortunate enough to find immediate employment as a printer. Accident secured him the acquaintance of Sir William Keith, the governor, who persuaded him to go to England to buy printer's stock for himself, promising to lend him money and to secure him the printing for the government. Franklin arrived in London in December 1724, but, instead of the letters of credit he expected to find awaiting him, he found that Keith had no credit to give. He soon found employment in a London printing-house, remained there for eighteen months, and then returned to Philadelphia, where, with the help of friends, he established a printing-house, and his skill, industry, and personal popularity ensured him signal success. In September 1729 he bought the Pennsylvania Gazette, and soon laid the foundations of a reputation as a journalist. In the following year Franklin married Deborah Read, by whom he had two children, a son who died in his youth, and a daughter, Sally, who became Mrs Bache. In 1732 he commenced the publication of Poor Richard's Almanac, which attained an unprecedented circulation. In 1736 Franklin was appointed clerk of the Assembly, in 1737 postmaster of Philadelphia, and in 1754 deputy postmaster-general for the colonies, being elected and re-elected a member of the Assembly almost uninterruptedly until his first mission to England. In 1746 he commenced his famous researches in electricity which made him an F.R.S. He brought out fully the distinction between positive and negative electricity; he proved that lightning and electricity are identical, and he suggested the protecting of buildings by lightning-conductors. Further, he discovered the course of storms over the North American continent; the course of the Gulf Stream, its high temperature, and the use of the thermometer in navigating it; and the various powers of different colours to absorb solar heat. In 1757 Franklin was sent to England to insist upon the right of the province to tax the proprietors of land held under the Penn charter for the cost of defending it from Frenchmen and Indians, succeeded in his mission, and during his five years' absence received honorary degrees from Oxford and Edinburgh. In 1764 he was again sent to England to contest the pretensions of parliament to tax the American colonies without representation. The differences, however, between the mother-government and the colonies became too grave to be reconciled by negotiation, and in 1775 Franklin returned to the United States, where he participated actively in the deliberations which resulted in the Declaration of Independence on the 4th July 1776. To secure foreign assistance in the war Franklin was sent to Paris in 1776. His skill as a negotiator and personal popularity, reinforced by the antipathy of French and English, favoured his mission; and on 6th February 1778 a treaty of alliance was signed, while munitions of war and money were sent from France. On 3d September 1783 his mission was crowned with success through England's recognition of the independence of the United States. Franklin was U.S. minister in Paris till 1785, when he returned to Philadelphia, and was elected president of the state of Pennsylvania, a post to which he was twice re-elected. He was also a delegate to the convention which framed the constitution of the United States. In 1788 he retired from public life, and he died in Philadelphia, 17th April 1790. He was the founder and first president of the Philosophical Society of Pennsylvania, and an honorary member of all the leading scientific societies of the Old World. His writings continue to this day to be republished in almost every written tongue, though he wrote little for the press after the termination of his editorial career. His complete works, edited by John Bigelow (10 vols. 1887-89), consist almost exclusively of private letters; even his scientific discoveries were communicated to the world in letters to personal friends. His very interesting autobiography was specially edited by Bigelow (1868). See also Lives by Parton (2 vols. 1864), Franklin and Headington (1880), Hale (1887), M'Master (1887), Morse (1889), and Bigelow (new ed. 1889), with Bibliography by P. L. Ford (1889).

Franklin, Sir John, Arctic explorer, was born at Spilsby, Lincolnshire, 16th April 1786, the youngest of a family of twelve. He was educated at St Ives and Louth for the church, but, bent upon going to sea, was in 1800 appointed to the Polyphemus, and next year served in the battle of Copenhagen. Under his cousin, Captain Flinders, commissioned to map the coasts of Australia, he acquired great skill in surveying, and, returning to England, acted as signal midshipman in the action (1804) in which Dance repulsed a French squadron, as also in the battle of Trafalgar (1805). He greatly distinguished himself in the attack on New Orleans (1815). When the project for the discovery of a north-west passage revived, Franklin commanded one of the ships in the expedition of 1818 sent by way of Spitzbergen. Though unsuccessful, this voyage served to bring out Franklin's eminent qualifications. He was accordingly in 1819 given the command of an Arctic expedition through Rupert's Land. Wintering the first year on the Saskatchewan, the expedition descended the Coppermine River and surveyed the coast to the eastward, returning amid unparalleled hardships in 1822 to York Factory, after having traversed 5550 miles by land and water. On his arrival in England, Franklin was made post-captain and elected F.R.S. In a second expedition (1825-27) he descended the Mackenzie River, and traced the coast to near the 150th meridian. Franklin in 1828 married his second wife, Jane Griffitts (1792-1875); in 1829 he was knighted, and awarded the gold medal of the Paris Geographical Society. As commander of the Rainbow in the Mediterranean (1830-33) Franklin rendered important service in the Greek 'war of liberation'; he received a Greek order, and was made K.C.H. As lieutenant-governor of Van Diemen's Land (1834-43) he laboured strenuously to promote the well-being of the colony. In 1845 he was appointed to the command of an expedition for the discovery of the North-west Passage. The Erebus and Terror, with 134 chosen officers and men, sailed 19th May 1845, and were last seen on 26th July by a whaler in Melville Bay. Franklin's instructions directed him, on reaching long. 98° W., to make southwards for the coast, along which he felt assured, from his previous surveys, a passage could be found from the Fish River to Behring Strait. No tidings of the expedition having reached England, fifteen expeditions were despatched between 1848 and 1854 by England and America, with the object of rescuing or finding traces of the missing explorers—a mission in which Lady Franklin bore a noble part. The first traces of the missing ships were discovered by Ommanney and Penny in August 1850 at Beechey Island, where it was ascertained Franklin had wintered in 1845-46. In 1854 Dr Rae, exploring from Repulse Bay, was told by Eskimos that in 1850 forty white men had been seen dragging a boat over the ice near the north shore of King William's Land, and that later their bodies were found a little to the north-west of Back's Fish River. The latter statement was afterwards disproved, but articles obtained by Dr Rae from the Eskimos proved that they had communicated with Franklin's party. So in 1855 two canoes were sent down the Fish River, and learned that a party from the Erebus and Terror, making for the Hudson Bay settlements, had been arrested at the mouth of the river. The Fox, fitted out by Lady Franklin, and under McClintock, sailed in July 1857. From the Eskimos in Boothia many relics were gathered, while articles belonging to Franklin's ships and skeletons found along the west and south coasts of King William's Land told a terrible tale of disaster. Above all, a record found in a cairn near Point Victory brought the story down to April 25, 1848. Franklin, on attempting to reach the coast of America, was arrested by heavy ice pressing down McClintock Channel (then unknown) upon King William's Land. An addendum by Captain Fitzjames stated that 'the Erebus and Terror were deserted 22d April 1848, 5 leagues NNW. of this, having been beset since 12th September 1846; officers and crews, 105 souls, under Captain Crozier, landed here in 69° 37' 42" N. lat., 98° 41' W. long. Sir J. Franklin died 11th June 1847.' The American Captain Hall's five years' sojourn among the Eskimos only confirmed McClintock's conclusions. In 1878-80 the expedition of Lieutenant Schwatka of the U.S. army found skeletons and relics of Franklin's men; the bones of Lieutenant Irving were brought to Edinburgh and buried. Franklin was the first to discover the North-west Passage. The point reached by his ships brought him to within a few miles of that attained from the westward by previous explorations. A monument was raised to him (1875) in Westminster Abbey. See Sir John's own Journey to the Polar Sea (1823) and Narrative of a Second Expedition (1828); the narratives of the expeditions above referred to, especially McClintock's Fate of Sir John Franklin (1860), Brown's North-west Passage (1858), and Lives by Beesly (1880), Markham (1891), and Traill (1896).

Franz, ROBERT (1815-92), composer, was born, lived, and died at Halle. He published over 250 songs, a Kyrie, chorales, and arrangements of the vocal masterpieces of Bach and Handel. Franz's best songs rank with those of Schubert and Schumann. See works by Liszt (1872), Saran (1875), and Osterwald (1886). [Franztz.]

Franzozs, KARL EMIL (1848-1904), novelist, was born in Russian Podolia of Jewish parentage, and passed his earliest years in the Polish-Jewish village of Czortekow in Galicia (the Barnow of his novels). Left an orphan at an early age, he was educated at the German gymnasium at Czernowitz. He studied jurisprudence, but afterwards settled as a journalist in Vienna. Among his principal works is Aus Halbastien (1876), being sketches of South Russia and Roumania; it is continued in two other books (1878 and 1883). His novels include Junge Liebe, two tales (1878); The Jews of Barnow (3d ed. enlarged, 1880; Eng. trans. 1882); Moschko von Parma (1880); For the Right (1881; Eng. trans. 1887); Der Präsident (1884); Die Reise nach dem Schicksal (1885); Tragische Novellen (1886); and Der Wahrheitsucher (1894). Franzos's tales draw their characters from his co-religionists, and are full of deep pathos. [Franztz-ooz'.]

Fraser, ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, born 3d September 1819 at Ardochattan Manse, Argyllshire, studied at Glasgow and Edinburgh, and in 1850-57 was editor of the North British Review. At first a Free Church minister, in 1856 he succeeded Sir William Hamilton in the chair of Logic at Edinburgh; he retired in 1891. His edition of Berkeley's works (4 vols. 1871) includes dissertations, annotations, and a life. Selections from Berkeley appeared in 1874; handbooks on Berkeley and on Locke in 1881 and 1889; in 1894 his great edition of Locke's Essay; in 1896 his Gifford Lectures on Theism; and in 1904 his Biographia Philosophica, an autobiography.

Fraser, SIR ALEXANDER (c. 1537-1623), the founder in 1576 of Fraserburgh on his Aberdeenshire estate of Philorth, was knighted in 1594.

Fraser, JAMES, D.D., Bishop of Manchester, was born at Prestbury near Cheltenham, 18th August 1818, from Shrewsbury passed to Balliol College, Oxford, took a first-class in classics in 1839, and in 1840 was elected to an Oriel fellowship. Ordained in 1846, he held the livings of Cholderton, Wiltshire, in 1847-60, and Ufton Nervet near Reading in 1860-70. He was twice a select preacher at Oxford, and published valuable reports on elementary education in England, the United States, and Canada, and on the employment of children. In 1870 he was made Bishop of Manchester. Here his energy, wide sympathy, and strong sense secured him a unique position, and caused his death (22d October 1885) to be deplored as sincerely by dissenters as by churchmen. See Lives by Hughes (1887) and Diggle (1889).

Fraser, SIR WILLIAM (1816-98), in 1852 was appointed assistant-keeper of the General Register of Sasines for Scotland; was deputy-keeper of Records 1880-92; and was made a C.B. in 1885, a K.C.B. in 1887. From 1858 he issued a series of Scottish family histories—on the Stirlings of Keir, Earls of Eglinton, Earls of Southesk, and Colquhouns, with the Books of Grandtully, Carverlock, Menteith, Lennox, Buccleuch, Douglas, Annandale, &c.

Fraunhofer, JOSEPH VON (1787-1826), optician, born at Straubing in Bavaria, in 1807 founded an optical institute at Munich. Frazer, JAMES GEORGE, folklorist, born in Glasgow in 1854, graduated at Cambridge in 1878, and became a fellow of Trinity. His Totemism and Exogamy (4 vols. 1910) developed out of Totemism (1 vol. 1887); and The Golden Bough (1890; 2d ed. 1900; 3d ed. 1907 et seq.) has absorbed many of his separately published studies of early superstition, religion, and society (Kingship: Adonis, Atis, and Osiris; Psyche's Task; Taboo; The Divine God). In 1898 he issued a masterly translation of Pausanias.

Fréchette, LOUIS HONORÉ, LL.D., D.C.L., C.M.G. (1839-1908), 'Canadian laureate,' was born at Lévis, Quebec, called to the bar, and elected to the Dominion parliament in 1874. He published prose works and plays, and his poems include Mes Loisirs, La Voix d'un Exilé, Pêle-mêle, Les Oubliés, and Les Feuilles Volantes.

Frédégond, first mistress, then wife, of Chilperic, king of Neustria, waged a relentless feud with Brunhilda, wife of Sigbert, king of Austrasia, and sister of Chilperic of Neustria's first wife; a feud intensified by the rivalry between the two kingdoms. She died in 597 or 598.

Frederic, HAROLD, novelist, born at Utica, N.Y., 19th August 1856, had had a hard fight with poverty when in 1878 he turned journalist, in 1884 being appointed European correspondent of the New York Times. He wrote Seth's Brother's Wife (1887), The Return of the O'Mahony (1892), Illumination (1896); in America, The Damnation of Theron Ware, March Hares (1896), Gloria Mundi (1898), &c.; and died, a victim to 'Christian Science,' at Kenley in Surrey, 19th Oct. 1898.

Frederick I., surnamed BARBAROSSA (Red-beard), Holy Roman emperor, of the Hohenstaufen family, was born about 1123. He succeeded his father, Duke Frederick of Swabia, in 1147, and his uncle, Conrad III., as emperor in 1152. His reign was one long struggle against refractory vassals at home and the turbulent civic republics of Lombardy and the pope in Italy. The capture in 1162 of Milan brought all the recalcitrant states of Italy to submission. Even the pope he seemed on the point of subduing five years later; he had taken Rome by storm, when his army was suddenly overwhelmed by a terrible plague. This was the signal for revolt in Lombardy; but it was not until 1174 that Frederick was able to undertake the reduction of his Italian subjects. He incurred a severe defeat at Legnano (1176), but this proved to be more valuable to him than his previous successes. It led him to change his previous policy to one of clemency and concession, whereby the Lombards were converted into contented subjects. In 1177 he acknowledged Alexander III. as pope, and thus paved the way for the final pacification of 1183. In Germany, Frederick conciliated his strongest vassals by giving them new fiefs or by raising their titular dignities, whilst the weaker he kept in check by conferring additional rights upon the municipal communities. Thus, he elevated Austria to the rank of a duchy, created Duke Ladislaus of Bohemia king, and granted Brunswick and Lüneburg to the Guelph princes. He also quelled the rebellious spirit of Henry the Lion of Bavaria, and asserted his feudal superiority over Poland, Hungary, Denmark, and Burgundy. When at the height of his power he took the cross to go and war against Saladin. He defeated the Moslems at Philomelium and Iconium, but died in Cilicia, 10th June 1190. Frederick's chief traits were a resolute will that at times degenerated into gross cruelty, administrative skill, martial ardour, a love of danger, and a magnanimous ambition. About his memory patriotic aspirations of the German people have continued to cling in legend and song down to the present day. One tradition (said originally to refer to Frederick II.) makes him still asleep in the Kyffhäuser in Thuringia, whence he will return to succour Germany in her hour of greatest need. See works by Prutz (1871-74), Ribbeck (1881), and Kallsen (1882).

Frederick II., of GERMANY, grandson of Frederick I., and son of the Emperor Henry VI. and of Constance, heiress of Sicily, was born at Jesi near Ancona, 26th December 1194. In his fourth year his father died, leaving him king of Sicily, and his mother secured the favour of Pope Innocent III. for her son by conceding to him important privileges. When eighteen Frederick wrested the imperial crown from Otto IV.; and, on his promising to undertake a crusade, the pope sanctioned his coronation in 1215. Frederick ardently desired the consolidation of the imperial power in Italy by reducing the pontificate to a mere archiepiscopal dignity. Crowned emperor at Rome in 1220, he devoted himself to organising his Italian territories. He founded the university of Naples, encouraged the medical school of Salerno, patronised art and literature, and commissioned his chancellor to draw up a code of laws to suit his German and Italian subjects. His schemes were frustrated by the Lombard cities, and by the popes Honorius III. and Gregory IX. His departure to the East was originally fixed for 1223, but difficulties in Italy led to a five years' delay. At last papal threats constrained him to embark. He secured from the sultan of Egypt possession of Jerusalem, together with a ten years' truce. After crowning himself king of Jerusalem (1229), he returned to Italy, where his Neapolitan dominions had been overrun by the papal allies. During the remainder of his reign Frederick was engaged in a harassing contest with the pope, whose hands were strengthened by the accession of the revolted Lombard cities and of several princes and towns of Germany, headed by his son Henry. Disaster and misfortune were gathering around him, when he died at Fiorentino, 13th December 1250. Intellectually, Frederick was perhaps the most enlightened man of his age, as in his tolerance of Jews and Mussulmans, in free-trade policy, in his recognition of popular representation by parliaments, and in his anticipation of the later humanistic movement; but at the same time he was a persecutor of heretics, an upholder of absolute sovereignty, and a supporter of the power of princes against the cities. He not only spoke the principal languages of his extensive empire, but was one of the first to write Italian poems, took a great interest in the arts, and was a diligent student of natural science. He neglected his possessions in Germany, and was far from being a model son of the church, though he was not, in all probability, the atheist his ecclesiastical enemies made him out to be. See works by Schirmacher (1859-65), Huillard Bréholles (1852-61), Winkelmann (1863-89), and Köhler (1888); and The Popes and the Hohenstaufens, by Ugo Balzani (1889).

Frederick III. or IV., emperor of Germany, and the fifth Duke of Austria of that name, was born at Innsbruck, 21st September 1415, the son of Duke Ernest, a Styrian Hapsburg. At twenty he assumed the government of Styria, Carniola, and Carinthia; in 1440 was elected king of the Germans; and in 1452 received the imperial crown at the hands of the pope. His reign was one of anarchy, wars raging on the frontiers of the empire, and disorders within. During its course Frederick lost his hold upon Switzerland; purchased peace from his brother Albert in Upper Austria; suffered Sforza to possess himself of Milan, George Podiebrad to seat himself on the throne of Bohemia, and Matthias Corvinus on that of Hungary; surrendered the empire to the pope by the Vienna Concordat of 1448; and remained apathetic under two Turkish invasions (1469 and 1475). Nevertheless, by the marriage of his son, Maximilian I., to Mary, daughter of Charles the Bold of Burgundy, he laid the foundation of the subsequent greatness of the Hapsburgs. Frederick died at Linz, 19th August 1493. Though he neglected the interests of the empire for alchemy, astrology, and botany, he lost no opportunity of aggrandising his own family. From his time the imperial dignity continued almost hereditary in the House of Austria. See Chmel's Friedrich IV. (1840-43).

Frederick I., king of Prussia, born at Königsberg, 11th July 1657, succeeded to the electorate of Brandenburg in 1688. He supported William of Orange in his attempt on England, and employed the treasure collected by his father in the purchase of minor principalities. The chief event of his reign was his elevation to the dignity of king in 1701, the title being taken from Prussia, the only independent portion of his dominions. He left the finances of his country in an embarrassed condition, founded the university of Halle, embellished Berlin, and founded there the Academies of Sciences and of Painting and Sculpture. He died 25th February 1713. See works by Hahn (3d ed. 1876) and Ledebur (1878).

Frederick II., of PRUSSIA, surnamed 'THE GREAT,' born at Berlin, 24th January 1712, was the son of Frederick-William I., and of Sophia-Dorothea, daughter of George I. of Great Britain. His early years were spent under the restraints of military training and a rigid system of education, against which he rebelled fiercely but vainly. At eighteen he made an attempt to escape to the court of Great Britain. His father saw in this an act both of political rebellion and of military insubordination, and would have punished it with death but for the intercession of the emperor. As it was, the prince was closely confined at Küstrin, while his confidant, Lieutenant Katte, was beheaded before his eyes. Frederick recognised that submission was inevitable, and threw himself with nervous alacrity into the military and civil duties with which he was after a time entrusted. He won his final restoration to favour when in 1733 he dutifully accepted as his bride the Princess Elizabeth of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel (1715-97). From 1734 Frederick resided at Rheinsberg, where he devoted his leisure to the study of music and French literature, for which he had a keen and lasting admiration. He corresponded with Voltaire (who in 1752 visited Berlin), and studied the 'philosophical' doctrines. On May 31, 1740, Frederick became king; and in October the accession of Maria Theresa separated the crown of Austria from the imperial diadem. Frederick, in possession of a fine army and a well-filled treasury, seized the opportunity. Reviving an antiquated claim to Silesia, he entered that province (December 1740), defeated the Austrians at Mollwitz (1741) and Chotusitz (1742), and, having concluded an alliance for fifteen years with France, forced Maria Theresa to yield him Upper and Lower Silesia by the Treaty of Breslau (1742). The second Silesian war (1744-45) left Frederick with still further augmented territories and the reputation of being one of the first military commanders of the day. The next eleven years were years of peace; but Frederick's energetic internal reforms were coloured by the expectation of renewed war. In 1756 the third Silesian war, the 'Seven Years' War,' began. Frederick anticipated attack by himself becoming the aggressor, and during all this momentous struggle displayed a courage, a military genius, and a resource in victory and defeat which entitle him to the name of 'the Great.' At the Peace of Hubertsburg (February 15, 1763), he had added a tenfold prestige to the Prussian arms. Jealousy of Austrian aggrandisement continued to influence his policy. In 1772 it induced him to share in the first partition of Poland, by which he acquired Polish Prussia and a portion of Great Poland. In 1778 it led him to take arms in a brief campaign, which ended in the acquisition of the Franconian duchies. One of his latest political actions was the formation of the 'Fürstenbund,' which was the first definite appearance of Prussia as a rival to Austria for the lead in Germany. He died at Potsdam, August 17, 1786. Frederick was an able administrator, and contrived to carry on his wars without incurring a penny of debt. He regarded himself as the first servant of the state; he was his own prime-minister in a very literal sense. His conviction of the immaturity of his country explains the discrepancy between his theoretical writings on government and the scant liberty he granted to his people; he justified his arbitrary actions by his good intentions and his keener insight. Prussia under him was governed as one huge camp. With a view to providing treasure for future wars he fostered woollen and other manufactures by a high protective tariff; but he made himself unpopular by the introduction of the French excise-system. During Frederick's reign, however, the country rapidly recovered from the ravages of war, while the army was raised to a strength of 200,000 men. At his death the area of Prussia was doubled, and, notwithstanding the temporary eclipse under Napoleon, the foundation of Prussia's greatness was laid. Frederick was essentially a just, if somewhat austere man, and the administration of justice under his rule was pure; the press enjoyed comparative freedom; and freedom of conscience was promoted. Frederick was a voluminous writer on political, historical, and military subjects. His works, written wholly in French, were published by the Berlin Academy (31 vols. 1846-57), which in 1878 published Political Correspondence. See his own Œuvres and Correspondance; Preuss's Friedrich der Grosse (1832-34); Carlyle's History of Frederick II. (1858-65); O. Frederick III., German emperor and eighth king of Prussia, was the only son of William I., and was born at Potsdam, October 18, 1831. In 1858 he married Victoria, Princess Royal of England (born 1840, died 1901). After becoming Crown-prince of Prussia (1861) he protested against Bismarck's reactionary policy in relation to constitutional questions and the press. He went through the Danish war (1864), and in the war with Austria (1866) commanded the second Prussian army. In the Franco-German war 'our Fritz' commanded the third army; he had his share in the glory of Wissenbourg, Wörth, and Sedan, and was made field-marshal (1870). In 1871 he became Crown-prince of the German Empire. In 1878, when the Emperor William was wounded by an assassin, the crown-prince was appointed provisional regent. In 1887 he began to suffer from an affection of the throat, which in a few months assumed a malignant form; on 9th February 1888 the operation of tracheotomy was performed. On 9th March the Emperor William died; and the crown-prince, returning from San Remo to Prussia, was proclaimed emperor as Frederick III., but he died at Potsdam, 15th June 1888. His son, William II., succeeded him. Frederick had a great horror of war, intensely disliked autocratic ideas, and sought to liberalise the institutions of the empire. See Lives by Rennell Rodd (1888) and Gustav Freytag (Eng. trans. 1890).

Frederick V., born 26th August 1596, succeeded his father, Frederick IV., as Elector Palatine in 1610. He married in 1613 Elizabeth (q.v.), daughter of James I. of England, but himself at the head of the Protestant union of Germany, and accepted the crown of Bohemia in 1619. His defeat at the battle of the Weisser-Berg, near Prague (1620), terminated his short-lived reign; and the 'Winter King,' taking refuge in Holland, was put under the ban of the empire (1621), lost his principality, and died at Mainz, 29th November 1632.

Frederick III., of Denmark (1609-70), succeeded to the throne in 1648. War with Sweden and the aggrandisement of the monarchy were the chief events of his reign.—FREDERICK V. (1723-60) ascended the throne in 1746, extended commerce and manufactures, and cherished science and art.—FREDERICK VI. (1768-1839) became regent during his father's insanity (from 1784), and in 1808 succeeded to the throne. In his reign feudal serfdom was abolished, the criminal code amended, and the slave-trade prohibited in the Danish colonies. His participation in the maritime confederation between Russia, Sweden, and Prussia in 1800 led to the despatch of a British fleet and the desperate battle of Copenhagen, in which the Danish fleet was destroyed. On his refusal to join Britain against Napoleon, Copenhagen was bombarded (1807) for three days, and the docks, arsenals, and shipping destroyed. Smarting under this treatment, he became the ally of Napoleon, and suffered proportionally after the overthrow of the empire. In 1814 Norway was taken from Denmark and given to Sweden. The state became bankrupt, and did not recover for many years. In 1831 he granted a liberal constitution to his subjects.—FREDERICK VII. (1808-63), who succeeded in 1848, was the last of the Oldenburg line, and had to quell the revolt of Holstein and Sleswick (1848-50).—FREDERICK VIII. (1843-1912), brother of Queen Alexandra of England, reigned from 1906.

Frederick, PRINCE OF WALES (1707-51), son of George II. and father of George III., quarrelled with his father, married (1736) the Princess Augusta of Saxe-Gotha, in 1737 joined the parliamentary opposition, and was banished from court.

Frederick-Charles, nicknamed the 'Red Prince' from his favourite hussar uniform, was born in Berlin, 20th March 1828, the eldest son of Prince Charles, brother of the Emperor William I. He served in the Sleswick-Holstein war (1848), commanded the right wing in the Danish war, and in 1866 helped to win the victory of Königgrätz. In the Franco-German war he commanded the second army, drove Bazaine upon Metz, which capitulated, and, made a field-marshal, captured Orleans, broke up the army of the Loire, and scattered Chanzy's portion of it at Le Mans. He died 15th June 1885. In 1879 his daughter married the Duke of Connaught.

Frederick-William, 'the Great Elector' of Brandenburg, was born 16th February 1620. On his accession in 1640 he found the state disorganised, exhausted, and devastated by the Thirty Years' War. He strenuously regulated the finances, made a treaty of neutrality with Sweden, reorganised his army, and strove to repeople his deserted towns and villages. By the Treaty of Westphalia (1648) he recovered eastern Pomerania, Halberstadt, and Minden, with the reversion of Magdeburg; and out of a quarrel between Sweden and Poland he contrived to secure the independence of the duchy of Prussia from Poland (1657). After other fifteen years of peace, alarmed at the aggressions of Louis XIV. on the Rhenish frontier, he induced the emperor, the king of Denmark, and the Elector of Hesse-Cassel to make a league against France. Incited by Louis, the Swedes invaded Brandenburg, but were defeated at Rathenow and at Fehrbellin (1675), and driven from the electorate; still, forsaken by the emperor and the other German princes, the Elector was obliged to agree to the Treaty of St Germain (1679), by which he restored all his conquests to the Swedes on the payment to him of 300,000 crowns. From this time he devoted himself to consolidating his dominions and developing their resources. He encouraged the immigration of exiled French Protestants (after 1685), Dutchmen, and other foreigners. He founded the royal library at Berlin, reorganised the universities, opened canals, established posts, and greatly enlarged Berlin. He left a well-filled exchequer and a highly-organised army. He made Brandenburg virtually an absolute monarchy only less powerful than Austria. He died at Potsdam, 9th May 1688; and his son became King Frederick I. of Prussia. See works by Förster (4th ed. 1855), Kaehler (1875), and Landwehr (1894).

Frederick-William I., king of Prussia, son of Frederick I., was born 15th August 1688, and on his accession (1713) became embroiled in the war waged by Sweden against Russia, Poland, and Denmark, at the end of which (1720) he acquired Hither Pomerania with Stettin. The remainder of his reign was devoted to improving the internal condition of Prussia. He was sternly practical, blunt and determined; he despised the arts and sciences, was rigidly economical, and strict in his ideas of justice. At his death, 31st May 1740, he left a treasure of £1,350,000 and an army of more than 80,000 men, the best-disciplined force in Europe, which made Prussia the fourth in military power. He fostered industry and agriculture, introduced the manufacture of woollen cloth, and settled in East Prussia 17,000 Protestant refugees from Salzburg. His rule laid the foundation upon which his son Frederick the Great built the subsequent greatness of Prussia. See works by Förster (1835), Paulig (2d ed. 1889), and Ranke (2d ed. 1879).

Frederick-William II., king of Prussia, nephew of Frederick the Great, was born 25th September 1744. The abolition of some of his predecessor's oppressive measures made him very popular at his accession in 1786. But he soon lost the regard of his subjects by his predilection for unworthy favourites, and by the abrogation of the freedom of the press and religion (1788). The seven and a half millions his uncle left in the treasury he dissipated in a useless war with Holland. His foreign policy was weak, whilst he oppressed his subjects with debt and increased taxation. He acquired large areas of Polish Prussia and Silesia by the partitions of Poland in 1793 and 1795, as also Ansbach and Bairuth. He died 16th November 1797. See works by Philippon (1880-82) and Stadelmann (1885).

Frederick-William III., king of Prussia, son of Frederick-William II., was born 3d August 1770, and ascended the throne in 1797. At first he was neutral towards Napoleon; but the truculent policy of the latter so exasperated the Prussians that, instigated by their idolised Queen Louisa (q.v.), they forced the king to declare war (1806). After the disastrous defeats of Jena and Auerstädt, Frederick-William fled into East Prussia, while Napoleon entered Berlin. By the Treaty of Tilsit (1807) Prussia was deprived of all her territories west of the Elbe, and all that she had acquired by the partition of Poland. Although divested of all but the semblance of royalty, for the next five years Frederick-William, by the administrative reforms of Stein, laboured to reorganise his eфеebled government. Napoleon's disastrous termination of the Russian campaign was the beginning of the war of liberation. Although the Prussians were defeated at Lützen and Bautzen, Prussia was finally delivered by the decisive victory of Leipzig (1813). By the Treaty of Vienna (1815) Prussia recovered her possessions west of the Elbe, and acquired Berg and Jülich, parts of Saxony and Westphalia, and the last bit of Pomerania; but she gave up her Polish acquisitions save Posen to Russia, Friesland to Holland, and Ansbach and Baireuth to Bavaria. The latter part of this reign was one of reaction. The democratic movements of 1819 and 1830 were rigorously suppressed, and the freedom of the press curtailed. Nevertheless, provincial diets were established (1823); the finances were put on a better footing; the system of taxation was greatly improved; education was encouraged; and the Zollverein or customs union was established. The king was a most excellent man, but his public conduct was marked by indecision and narrowness. He died 7th June 1840. See works by Eylert (1842-46), Hahn (3d ed. 1877), and Duncker (1877).

Frederick-William IV., king of Prussia, son of Frederick-William III., was born October 15, 1795. He began his reign (1840) by granting minor reforms and promising radical changes, but always evaded the fulfilment of these pledges. He was possessed by vague ideas of the divine right of kings, and by a mystic pietism. He refused the imperial crown offered him by the Liberal Frankfurt Diet in 1849, and opposed the popular movement of 1848; but when the people stormed the arsenal and seized the palace of the obnoxious Prince of Prussia (afterwards William I.), the king granted a representative parliament (1850). In 1857, afflicted with insanity, he resigned the administration to his brother, who from 1858 acted as regent till his accession, as William I., on the death of Frederick-William, 2d January 1861. See Life by Ranke (1878).

Frederick-William, Duke of Brunswick, was born 3d October 1771, and fought for Prussia against France in 1792 and 1806, when he was taken prisoner, and when, on the death of his father and eldest brother, Napoleon vetoed his accession to the duchy. He raised a free corps in Bohemia, and in 1809, with his 700 'black hussars' and 800 infantry, achieved a masterly retreat to Brunswick, Elsfleth, and England. He subsequently took part in the Peninsular war, and received from the British government £6000 a year, which he retained until his accession to his duchy in 1813. He joined the allied army after the return of Napoleon from Elba, and fell while leading his Black Brunswickers at Quatre Bras, 16th June 1815. See Life by Spehr (2d ed. 1861).

Freeman, Edward Augustus, historian, born at Mitchley Abbey near Birmingham, 2d August 1823, was elected a scholar of Trinity College, Oxford, a fellow in 1845. He was examiner in Law and Modern History in 1857 and 1863, and in Modern History in 1873; and was created D.C.L. of Oxford in 1870, and LL.D. of Cambridge in 1874. In 1868 he unsuccessfully contested Mid-Somerset as a Liberal; in 1884 he became regius professor of Modern History at Oxford. His History of the Norman Conquest (1867-76) is one of the greatest monuments of English historical learning. Other works are A History of Architecture (1849); History and Conquests of the Saracens (1856); History of Federal Government (vol. 1. 1863); Old English History (1869); Growth of the English Constitution (1872); Historical Essays (3 series, 1872-79); Comparative Politics (1873); Historical and Architectural Sketches, chiefly Italian (1876); The Ottoman Power in Europe (1877); Historical Geography of Europe (1881); The Reign of William Rufus (1882); English Towns and Districts (1883); Chief Periods of European History

Somerleaze near Wells his home from 1860, Freeman died of smallpox at Alicante in Spain, 17th March 1892. The leader of the 'Teutonic school', he placed too great reliance on the evidence offered by language and institutions, and overestimated the Teutonic element in the English people. As an historian he shows erudition and accuracy; but his insight and breadth of view are scarce proportional to his knowledge. See his Life and Letters, by Dean Stephens (2 vols. 1895).

Freiligrath, Ferdinand, poet, was born at Detmold, 17th June 1810, and was led by the success of a volume of poems (1838) to desert commerce for literature. In 1844 he attached himself to the democratic party, and for his radical Glaubensbekenntniss had to flee to Belgium, Switzerland, and London. In 1848 he celebrated the revolution in Die Revolution and Februar-klänge, and returned to Germany, where he became the leader of the democratic party. Impeached the same year for his poem, Die Todten an die Lebenden, he was acquitted; but a second prosecution in 1851 compelled him to flee once more to London. He returned in 1868, and died at Cannstatt, 18th March 1876. Chief amongst his political poems are Ca Ira! (1846) and Neuere politische und sociale Gedichte (1851). He translated Longfellow, Shakespeare, &c. His collected works appeared in 1870 (5th ed. 1886). See Lives by Schmidt-Weissenfels (1876), Buchner (1881), and Gisberte Freiligrath (1889). Frelinghuysen, Frederick (1753-1804), American statesman, raised a corps of artillery, and fought in the revolutionary war, and was a member of the Continental Congress in 1778 and 1782-83, and a U.S. senator in 1793-96.—His second son, Theodore (1787-1861), practised law in Newark, became state attorney-general, a U.S. senator (1829-35), and chancellor of New York University; in 1844 he was nominated for the vice-presidency. In 1850 he was chosen president of Rutgers College, New Brunswick.—His nephew, Frederick Theodore (1817-85), succeeded in 1839 to his uncle's practice. He was attorney-general of New Jersey in 1861-66, afterwards sat in the U.S. Senate, where he carried a bill against polygamy, and was secretary of state in Arthur's cabinet, 1881-85. [Frē-ling-hū'-zen.]

Frémont, the Hon. William Henry, was born 12th December 1831, the second son of Lord Cottesloe, from Eton passed to Balliol College, Oxford, and in 1882 became a canon of Canterbury, in 1895 Dean of Ripon. He was Bampton Lecturer in 1882.

Frémont, John Charles, explorer of the Rocky Mountains, was born at Savannah, Georgia, January 21, 1813, taught mathematics on a war-ship (1833-35), and in 1838 began surveying. In 1842 he crossed the Rocky Mountains (where a lofty peak is named after him), and demonstrated the feasibility of an overland route across the continent. In 1843 he explored the Great Salt Lake, advancing to the mouth of the Columbia River; and in 1845 examined the watershed between the Mississippi and Pacific. During the Mexican war he cleared northern California of Mexican troops, but, quarrelling with his superior officers, was court-martialed, and resigned his captaincy. In 1848 he started upon a fourth expedition along the upper Rio Grande, but was compelled to return to Santa Fé, after unspeakable sufferings. In 1849 he crossed over to California, where he settled, and next year became senator of the new state. In 1853 he conducted a fifth expedition. In 1856 he was the Republican and anti-slavery candidate for the presidency; nominated again in 1864, he withdrew in favour of Lincoln. In 1861-62 he served in the regular army as major-general, but resigned rather than serve under General Pope. In 1873 the French authorities sentenced him in absence to imprisonment for fraud in connection with his Southern Pacific railway scheme, although he was not responsible for the misstatements complained of. Frémont was governor of Arizona in 1878-82, and died in New York, 13th July 1890. He published, besides accounts of his explorations, Memoirs of my Life (1886). See also Life by Bigelow (1886), and his wife's Souvenirs of my Times (1887). [Frémont.]

French, THOMAS VALPY, D.D. (1825-91), was a fellow of University College, Oxford, in 1845-53, principal of the Church Missionary School at Lahore in 1850-74, and first Bishop of Lahore in 1877-87. See Life by Birks (1895).

Frend, WILLIAM (1757-1841), reformer, born at Canterbury, graduated at Cambridge as second wrangler, and got a clerical fellowship of Jesus, but turned Unitarian in 1787, and in 1793 was banished from the university for a pamphlet he had published. He settled in London, and became actuary to an assurance company. He wrote nearly a score of works on political economy, astronomy, &c., but is best remembered as the 'Dyer's Friend' of Lamb's verses.

Freneau, PHILIP (1752-1832), American sailor and poet, commanded a privateer in the War of Independence, and was captured by the English.

Frenssen, GUSTAV, son of a village carpenter at Bartl in Sleswick-Holstein, became pastor at Hemme in Holstein, and secured fame as author of Jörn Uhl (1902), Hilligenlei (1905)—both translated—and other novels. Of the former 125,000 copies were sold in twelve months. Next year Frenssen left the pastorate, bought an estate, and settled down to writing.

Frere, SIR HENRY BARTLE EDWARD, was born at Clydach in Brecknock, 29th March 1815, and studied at Haileybury. As Chief-commissioner of Sind he kept order during the Mutiny. In 1862-67 he was governor of Bombay. In 1872 he signed a treaty with the Sultan of Zanzibar abolishing the slave-trade. In 1877 he was appointed governor of the Cape and High Commissioner in South Africa. The proposed confederation of the South African colonies was frustrated by the action of the Boers and by the Kaffir (1877-78) and Zulu (1878-79) wars; and Sir Bartle Frere's treatment of the Zulus was keenly debated. Recalled in 1880, he devoted himself to his duties as president of various learned societies and to the promotion of missionary work. He published several works on Indian and African subjects. He died at Wimbledon, 29th May 1884. See Life by J. Martineau (1895). [Frer.]

Frere, JOHN HOOKHAM, the translator of Aristophanes, was born in London, 21st May 1769, and educated at Eton and Caius College, Cambridge. He entered the Foreign Office, in 1796 was returned for Looe, supported Pitt's government, and contributed to the Anti-Jacobin. His chief piece was The Loves of the Triangles, a parody on Darwin's Loves of the Plants, but he had a share with his schoolfellow Canning in The Needy Knife-grinder. Under-secretary for Foreign Affairs (1799), he was appointed envoy to Lisbon (1800), and twice minister to Spain (1802 and 1808). Recalled after the retreat to Corunna, he retired in 1821 to Malta, where he devoted himself to Greek, Hebrew, and Maltese, and died 7th January 1841. Frere's clever mock-heroic Specimen of an intended National Work by William and Robert Whistlecraft (1817) suggested its ottava rima to Byron for his Deppo; but his fame rests on his admirable translations of the Acharnians, Knights, Birds, and Frogs of Aristophanes. See Memoir prefixed to his Works (1871), and Gabrielle Festing's J. H. Frere and his Friends (1899).

Fréron, ÉLIE CATHERINE (1718-76), was a professor in the Collège Louis le Grand, and wrote in defence of church and king against Voltaire and the Encyclopédistes. [Fray-ronz.]

Fresnel, AUGUSTIN JEAN (1788-1827), French physicist, was head of the department of public works at Paris. His optical investigations contributed materially to the establishment of the undulatory theory of light, and he invented the well-known compound lighthouse lens. The French government published his collected works, with Life by Arago (1866-70). [Fray-nel.]

Freund, WILHELM (1806-94), born of Jewish parents at Kempen in Posen, taught at Breslau, Hirschberg, and Glewitz, and finally settled down at Breslau to a literary life. On his Wörterbuch der lateinischen Sprache (1834-45) most English Latin dictionaries are based. [Froind.]

Frøwen, ACCEPTED (1588-1664), born at Northiam Rectory, Sussex, was educated at Canterbury and Magdalen College, Oxford, and in 1625 became a canon of Canterbury, in 1626 president of Magdalen, in 1644 Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, and in 1660 Archbishop of York, having lived in exile for some time in France. He died at his palace of Bishopthorpe. The Whole Duty of Man has been falsely ascribed to him.

Froycinot, CHARLES LOUIS DE SAULCES DE, French statesman, born at Foix, 14th November 1828, was originally an engineer. In 1870 he was called by Gambetta to the war department; his conduct there he described in La Guerre en Province (1871). Elected to the Senate in 1876, he became minister of Public Works in 1877, premier in 1879, 1882, 1886, and 1890, and in 1892 remained War minister under his successor, M. Loubet. The Panama scandal drove him to resign until 1898-99. He wrote on engineering, sanitation, &c., and was admitted to the Academy of Sciences (1878) and the French Academy (1891). [Fray-see-nay.]

Freytag, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH (1788-1861), orientalist, was born at Lüneburg, and became professor of Oriental Languages at Bonn in 1819. His reputation rests on his Lexicon Arabico-Latinum (1830-37) and his works on Arabic literature and history. [Fri-tag.]

Freytag, GUSTAV, German novelist and playwright, was born 13th July 1816 at Kreuzburg in Silesia, and in 1839-47 was privat-docent of German in Breslau University. A deputy to the North German Diet, he attended the Prussian crown-prince in the Franco-German campaign (1870). His comedies and other plays—Die Valentine (1846), Die Journalisten (1853), &c.—proved brilliant successes; but his greatest achievement is Soll und Haben (1855; 40th ed. 1893), a realistic novel of German commercial life (Eng. trans. Debit and Credit, 1858). It was followed, but not equalled, by Die Verlorne Handschrift (1864; Eng. The Lost Manuscript, 1865), and the series (1872-81) called Die Ahnen, which includes Ingo und Ingraban, Das Nest der Zaunkönige, Die Brüder vom Deutschen Hause, Markus König, Die Geschwister, and Aus einer kleinen Stadt. These, with his poems, sketches of German life, &c., are comprised in the collected edition of his works, published at Leipzig in 1886-88. He died at Wiesbaden, 30th April 1895. See his Reminiscences (Eng. trans. 1890).

Frideswide, ST, the patroness of Oxford, was the daughter of Dida, an ealdorman there. She preferred the religious life to marriage with Algar, a Mercian noble, who, coming in search of her, was struck blind. She died 14th November 735 (?), was buried in St Mary's at Oxford, and was canonised in 1481. See F. Goldie, S.J., Story of St Frideswide (1881).

Friedland, VALENTIN (1490-1556), educationist, called Trotzendorf from his birthplace near Görlitz, studied at Leipzig, taught a school at Görlitz, and on the Reformation studied under Luther and Melancthon at Wittenberg. Settling at Goldberg in Silesia as rector of the gymnasium in 1531, he introduced an improved system of instruction, which soon made the institution famous. See Lives by Köhler (1848), Löschke (1856), and Sturm (1889). [Freed-land.]

Friedrich, JOHANN, a leader of the Old Catholics, born in Franconia in 1836. He became professor of Theology at Munich in 1865; assisted at the Vatican Council in 1870; was deprived of his office; and has written much in defence of the Old Catholic movement. [Freed-reekkh.]

Friend, SIR JOHN, a Jacobite London brewer, knighted by James II. in 1685, and executed for conspiring against William III., 3d April 1696.

Fries, ELIAS (1794-1878), Swedish botanist, was professor at Upsala, and keeper of the botanic garden there. He wrote on fungi, hymenomycetæ, lichens, and the flora of Scandinavia. [Frees.]

Fries, JAKOB FRIEDRICH (1773-1843), born at Barby in Prussian Saxony, lectured at Heidelberg, was deprived of his Jena professorship of Philosophy for participation in the democratic disturbances of 1819, but in 1824 was appointed to the chair of Physics and Mathematics there. He wrote a system of philosophy, a logic, a psychological anthropology, a history of philosophy, a work on love, faith, and hope, &c., taking the Kantian philosophy for his starting-point, and insisting in his own way that intuitive psychology must be the basis of all philosophising. See works by Henke (1867) and Grapengiesser (1882).

Fripp, ALFRED DOWNING (1822-95), water-colour painter, like his brother, GEORGE A. FRIPP (1814-96), was born at Bristol, and died at Hampstead.

Friswell, JAMES HAIN (1825-78), born at Newport, Salop, wrote The Gentle Life (1864) and thirty-five more works. See Memoir by daughter (1898).

Frith, JOHN (1503-33), reformer, born at Westerham, Kent, from Eton passed to King's College, Cambridge, whence in 1525 Wolsey summoned him to his new foundation at Oxford. A year later suspicion of heresy drove him to Marburg, where he saw much of Tyndale and Patrick Hamilton, and wrote several Protestant treatises. Venturing back in 1532, he was burned at Smithfield.

Frith, WILLIAM POWELL (1819-1909), born at Aldfield, Yorkshire, in 1840 exhibited 'Othello and Desdemona' in the British Institution. 'Coming of Age in the Olden Time' (1849) brought him celebrity, increased by 'Ramsgate Sands' (1854); 'The Derby Day' (1858); and 'The Railway Station' (1862), which sold for £5250, and in 1890 was resold for £315. His later works include 'Charles II.'s Last Sunday' (1867); 'Before Dinner at Boswell's Lodgings' (1868), which in 1875 sold for £4567; 'The Road to Ruin' (1878); and 'A Private View' (1883). He was elected A.R.A. in 1846, R.A. in 1852, and retired in 1890. See his Autobiography and Reminiscences (1887-88).

Frobel. See FROEBEL.

Frobenius, JOANNES (1460-1527), founded a printing-office at Basel (1491), and issued 300 works, including a Vulgate, Erasmus, Tertullian, Ambrose, and Greek New Testament (1496).

Frobisher, SIR MARTIN, Elizabethan seaman, was born at Altofts near Wakefield, Yorkshire, about 1535. Sent to sea as a boy, he traded to Guinea and elsewhere, and seems early to have become possessed by his dream of a north-west passage to Cathay. After long solicitations he set sail northwards, 7th June 1576, with the Gabriel and the Michael of 20 tons each and a pinnace of 10 tons, their total complement thirty-five men. The pinnace foundered, the Michael deserted, but Frobisher, almost lost off the coast of Greenland, reached Labrador on 28th July; on this and two subsequent expeditions (1577 and 1578) much (worthless) ore, supposed to be gold ore, was brought from the shores of Frobisher Bay. Frobisher in 1585 commanded a vessel in Drake's expedition to the West Indies, and was knighted for his services against the Armada. He married a daughter of Lord Wentworth, but was soon again scouring the seas for the treasuries of Spain; at the siege of Crozon near Brest in November 1594 he received a wound of which he died at Plymouth on the 22d. His Three Voyages were edited by Admiral Collinson (Hakluyt Soc. 1867). See Life by Rev. F. Jones (1878).

Froebel, FRIEDRICH WILHELM AUGUST, educationist, was born at Oberweissbach in Thuringia, 21st April 1782, and in 1805 began teaching at Frankfurt-on-Main. On the outbreak of the War of Liberation he joined Lützow's corps; but in 1816 he was enabled to put into practice his educational system, whose aim, to help the child's mind to grow naturally and spontaneously, he expounded in Die Menschenziehung (1826). Catholic opposition foiled his attempts to establish a school near Lucerne (1831). After starting an orphanage at Burgdorf in Bern, where he began to train teachers for educational work, he in 1836 opened his first Kindergarten school at Blankenburg. The rest of his life was spent in the organising of kindergarten schools. He died at Marienthal 21st June 1852. Froebel's works were published by Lange in 1802-63 (new ed. 1874) and Seidel in 1883. See his Autobiography (Lond. 1886); Letters (Eng. trans. 1890); and Lives by Emily Shirreff (Lond. 1887) and Pappenheim (Berl. 1893).—His nephew, JULIUS FROEBEL (1805-93), was a democratic politician and writer, who from 1849 lived in America, but died at Zurich. See his Autobiography (1890-91). [Freh-bel.]

Frohschammer, JAKOB (1821-93), a liberal Catholic theologian and philosopher, born near Ratisbon, was suspended in 1863. See his Autobiography (1888). [Froash-am'mer.]

Froissart, JEAN, was born at Valenciennes about 1337, was educated for the church, but at nineteen began to write the history of the wars of his time. In 1360 he set out on his travels in quest of adventure. In England he received a gracious welcome from Philippa of Hainault, wife of Edward III., who appointed him clerk of her chamber. In 1364 he travelled in Scotland, where he was the guest of

King David Bruce and of the Earl of Douglas. In 1366 he journeyed to Aquitaine with the Black Prince; in 1368 he was in Italy with Chaucer and Petrarch at the marriage of the Duke of Clarence. For a time he was curate at Lestines, in the diocese of Liège; and was afterwards at the courts of the Duke of Brabant, the Count of Blois, and the Count of Poix. About 1390 he settled in Flanders, and resumed work on his Chronicle. In 1395 he revisited England, and was cordially welcomed by Richard II. He then returned to Chimay, where he had obtained a canonry, and where he may have died in 1410. Froissart's famous book deals with the period 1326-1400. Mainly occupied with the affairs of France, England, Scotland, and Flanders, he likewise supplies much valuable information in regard to Germany, Italy, and Spain, and even touches occasionally on Hungary and the Balkan peninsula. Save for the first part (1326-56, finished in 1360), he gathered his materials in his courts and on highways, from the lords and knights, the squires and heralds, whom he encountered. The charm of his book is perennial. He is of all mediæval chroniclers the most vivid and entertaining, accurate withal and impartial in his statements. The main defects in his work are the frequent repetitions and the negligent arrangement. He likewise wrote a considerable number of verses—ballades, rondeaux, virelais, &c.; the Round Table metrical romance, Meliador, was discovered in 1894. There are editions of his Chronicle by Buchon (15 vols. 1824-26) and Siméon Luce (8 vols. 1869-88). The translation in 1523-25 by Lord Berners (q.v.) was revised by Utterson (1812), included in the 'Tudor Translations' (introd. by W. P. Ker, 6 vols. 1901-3), and modernised by J. G. Macaulay (1895); another translation by Col. Thomas Johnes (1803-5; new ed. 1884) is very prosaic. See Froissart, by Mary Darnesteter (trans. 1895), and Newbolt's Froissart in England (1900). [Fr. pron. Fruas-sahr'.]

Fromentin, EUGÈNE (1820-76), painter and author, born at La Rochelle, travelled in 1842-46 in Algeria, Egypt, and the East. An officer of the Legion of Honour, he wrote a successful romance, Dominique (1863), Les Maîtres d'Autrefois (1876; Eng. trans. 1883), &c. See Life by Gonse (1881; trans. 1883). [Fr. pron. tan'.]

Frontenac, LOUIS DE BUADE, COMTE DE (1620-98), served in the army, and in 1672 was appointed governor of the French possessions in North America. He was recalled after ten years of quarrelling with the Jesuits, but he had gained the confidence of the settlers and the respect of the Indians; and in 1689, when to constant attacks from the Iroquois a war with England was added, he was again sent out. He now let loose the Indians on New England villages, repulsed a British attack on Quebec, and completely broke the power of the Iroquois. He died at Quebec. See books by Parkman (1877) and Le Sueur (1906).

Frontinus, SEXTUS JULIUS (c. 40-103 A.D.), was appointed Roman governor of Britain in 75, was twice consul, and in 97 was made superintendent of the water-works at Rome. Of works ascribed to him (ed. by Dederich, 1855), the Strategematon, a treatise on war, and the De Aquis Urbis Romæ are certainly genuine.

Fronto, MARCUS CORNELIUS (c. 100-170 A.D.), rhetorician, born at Cirta in Numidia, was entrusted by Antoninus Pius with the education of Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus. In 143 he was consul. The two series of his letters to Marcus Aurelius, discovered by Mai in 1815, were edited by Niebuhr (1816) and Naber (1867).

Frost, JOHN (1750-1842), a Radical attorney, secretary of the Corresponding Society, who in 1793 suffered pillory and imprisonment.

Frost, JOHN, a tailor and draper of Newport, Monmouthshire, of which in 1836 he was mayor, for heading a Chartist riot (4th November 1839) there, that cost twenty lives, was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, but instead was transported for fourteen years to Tasmania. He died at Stapleton near Bristol, 29th July 1877.

Frost, THOMAS, Chartist, journalist, and author, was born at Croydon in 1821. See his Forty Years' Recollections (1880) and Reminiscences (1886).

Frost, WILLIAM EDWARD (1810-77), a mythological painter, after Etty, born at Wandsworth, was elected A.R.A. in 1846, R.A. in 1870.

Froude, JAMES ANTHONY, historian, was born at Dartington, Devon, 23d April 1818. The youngest son of the Archdeacon of Totnes, he was educated at Westminster and Oriel College, Oxford, took a second-class in classics in 1840, and in 1842 was elected a fellow of Exeter. He received deacon's orders in 1844, and was sometime under Newman's influence; but a change was revealed in Shadows of the Clouds, by 'Zeta,' a psychological novel (1847, suppressed), and still more in The Nemesis of Faith (1848), which cost Froude both fellowship and also an educational berth in Tasmania. For the next few years he wrote for Fraser's Magazine (which for a while he edited) and the Westminster Review, and in 1856 issued vols. i.-ii. of his History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Spanish Armada, completed in 12 vols. in 1869. In this work Froude shows supreme literary ability; but, like Macaulay, he is a man of letters first and an historian afterwards. His view of Henry VIII. as a hero is specially paradoxical. Short Studies on Great Subjects (1867-82) are a series of brilliant essays. His English in Ireland in the Eighteenth Century (1871-74) showed the same merits and defects as the greater work; so, too, his Cæsar (1879). Froude was rector of St Andrews in 1869, and was made LL.D. In 1874, and again in 1875, he visited the South African colonies on a mission from the home government, and published his impressions in Two Lectures on South Africa (1880). As Carlyle's literary executor he edited his Reminiscences (1881), Mrs Carlyle's Letters (1882), and Carlyle's own Life (1882-84). Later works are Oceana (1886), a delightful account of an Australasian voyage; The English in the West Indies (1888); The Two Chiefs of Dunboy (1889), an Irish historical romance; The Earl of Beaconsfield (1890); The Divorce of Catharine of Aragon (1891); The Spanish Story of the Armada (1892); Life and Letters of Erasmus (1894); and Lectures on the Council of Trent (1896). In 1892 he succeeded Freeman as professor of Modern History at Oxford. He died 20th October 1894 at Salcombe, Devon, and there is buried. See the Life by Herbert Paul (1905).

His eldest brother, RICHARD HURRELL FROUDE (1803-36), a leader in the Tractarian movement, became in 1827 fellow and tutor of Oriel. Tracts 9 and 63 were from his pen. His Remains were published in 1838-39 by Mozley and Newman. —Another brother, WILLIAM FROUDE (1810-79), engineer and mathematician, in 1837 became assistant to Brunel. Retiring from professional work in 1846, he devoted himself to investigating the conditions of naval construction. [Froohd.] poet, was born in Genoa, and died at Parma. He wrote odes, epistles, and satires.

Frugo'ni, CARLO INNOCENZO (1692-1768), Italian

Frumentius, St. apostle of Ethiopia, born in Phœnicia, was captured while on a voyage by Ethiopians, became the king's secretary, and gradually secured the introduction of Christianity. In 326 he was consecrated Bishop of Axum by Athanasius at Alexandria, and he died about 360.

Fruundsberg, GEORG VON (1473-1528), the great leader of German landsknechts during the Italian wars of Maximilian and Charles V. He fought in twenty pitched battles, and Pavia (1525) was largely won by him. See Lives by Barthold (1833) and Heilmann (1868). [Froondz-berg.]

Fry, ELIZABETH, born 21st May 1780, was the third daughter of John Gurney of Earham near Norwich, a rich Quaker banker. Coming at seventeen under decided religious impressions, henceforward she worked much among the poor, and began a school for poor children. In 1800 she married Joseph Fry, a London merchant. Eleven children were born of the marriage. In 1810 she became a preacher among the Friends. In February 1813 she visited Newgate, where were 300 women, tried and untried, with their numerous children, without employment, in an utterly filthy, neglected, and indescribable condition. Soon by her efforts a school and a manufactory were established in the prison, religious instruction was given to them, and the women willingly submitted to rules for their well-being. Mrs Fry devoted her life to prison reform at home and abroad; she also founded shelters for the homeless and charity organisation societies—and all this in spite of her husband's bankruptcy (1828) and fall from affluence to real poverty. Through her influence libraries were begun in the naval hospitals and the coastguard stations. She died at Ramsgate, October 12, 1845. See Lives by her daughters (1847; abridged 1856), Susanna Corder (1853), Mrs Pitman (1884), and J. M. Ashby (1892); also Hare's Gurneys of Earham (1895).

Fry, JOSEPH (1728-87), born at Sutton Benger in Wiltshire, settled at Bristol as a doctor, but ere long went into a pottery enterprise; founded the well-known chocolate business; and from 1764 onwards became eminent as a typefounder.

Fryxell, ANDERS (1795-1881), Swedish historian, was parish priest of Sunna in Vermland from 1835 till 1847, and thenceforward gave himself entirely to literary work at Stockholm. His reputation rests upon Berättelser ur Svenska Historien ('Narratives from Swedish History,' 46 vols. 1832-80; Eng. trans. edited by Mary Howitt, 1844). Other works are Conspiracies of the Swedish Aristocracy (1845-50) and a book on The Literature of Sweden (1860-62). [Frecz-ell.]

Fuad Pasha, MEHMED (1814-69), Turkish statesman and littérateur, was the son of the poet, Izzet-Mollah, became an Admiralty physician, but in 1835 took up history and politics, the study of diplomacy, history, modern languages, the rights of nations, and political economy. In 1840 he was attached to the embassy at London, and in 1843 at Madrid; was subsequently grand interpreter to the Porte, minister of foreign affairs (1852 and 1855), and Grand Vizier (1861-66). To him Turkey owes the hattî-sherif of 1856.

Fuchs, LEONHARD (1501-66), a Tübingen professor, a founder of German botany, after whom in 1703 the fuchsia was named by Plumier.

Fugger, a Swabian family through which commerce founded lines of counts and even princes. Johannes Fugger (1348-1409) was a master-weaver, who was born near Schwabmünchen, and settled at Augsburg in 1368. His second son, Jacob (d. 1469), carried on an extensive commerce. Three of his sons extended their business to an extraordinary degree, married into the noblest houses, and were ennobled by the Emperor Maximilian, who mortgaged to them for 10,000 gold gulden the county of Kirchberg and the lordship of Weissenhorn. The house attained its greatest splendour under Charles V., when its fortunes came to rest on the sons of George Fugger (d. 1506), founders of the two chief lines of the house of Fugger. The brothers were zealous Catholics, opponents of Luther. Charles V. made them counts, invested them with the still mortgaged properties of Kirchberg and Weissenhorn, and gave them the rights of princes. The Fuggers continued still to carry on their commerce, increased their immense wealth, and attained the highest posts in the empire. They possessed great libraries and art collections, maintained painters and musicians, and encouraged art and science. See Kleinschmidt, Augsburg, Nürnberg, und ihre Handelsfürsten (1881). [Foog-ger.]

Führich, JOSEPH VON (1800-76), a Viennese religious painter, born at Kratzau in Bohemia.

Fulentius (468-533), Bishop from 507 of Ruspe in Numidia, wrote Latin treatises against the Arians and semi-Pelagians (ed. by Hurter, Inns. 1884). See Life by Mallby (Vienna, 1884).

Fuller, ANDREW, born at Wicken, Cambridgeshire, February 6, 1754, at seventeen joined a Baptist church at Soham, and in 1775 became pastor there, in 1782 at Kettering. His treatise, The Gospel worthy of all Acceptation (1784), involved him in a controversy with the ultra-Calvinists. On the formation of the Baptist Missionary Society (1792) he was appointed its secretary. His Calvinistic and Socinian Systems Compared (1793) was followed up by Socinianism Indefensible (1797), The Gospel its own Witness (1797), &c. He died May 7, 1815. His complete works were edited in 1845 with a memoir by his son.

Fuller, GEORGE (1822-84), American artist, born at Deerfield, Mass., was distinguished but never popular. See Life (1887).

Fuller, SARAH MARGARET, MARCHIONESS OSSOLI, 'transcendentalist,' was born at Cambridgeport, Mass., May 23, 1810. At twenty-five she assisted her family by school and private teaching. In Boston she edited The Dial, translated from the German, and wrote Summer on the Lakes (1843). In 1844 she published Woman in the Nineteenth Century, and in the same year proceeded to New York, and contributed to the Tribune a series of miscellaneous articles, republished as Papers on Literature and Art (1846). In 1847 at Rome she met the Marquis Ossoli, and married him. In 1849, during the siege of Rome, she took charge of a hospital; and after the capture of the city by the French she and her husband sailed with their infant for America, May 17, 1850. On July 16 the vessel was wrecked on Fire Island near New York; the child's body was washed ashore, but nothing was ever seen of mother or father. Her Autobiography, with memoirs by Emerson, Clarke, and Channing, appeared in 1852 (new ed. 1884); there are also Lives by Julia Ward Howe (1883) and T. W. Higginson (1884).

Fuller, THOMAS, was born in June 1608 at Aldwinkle St Peter's rectory, Northamptonshire, and from Queens' College, Cambridge, graduated B.A. in 1625 and M.A. in 1628. In 1630 he received from Corpus Christi the curacy of St Benet's, where he preached the Lectures on Job

(published in 1654). Next year he received a prebend of Salisbury, and in 1634 became rector of Broadwindsor in Dorsetshire. His first work was an indifferent poem, entitled David's Heinous Sin, Hearty Repentance, and Heavy Punishment (1631). His first ambitious work was a History of the Holy War (1639), on the Crusades. The Holy and Prophane States (1642-48) is a collection of essays. In 1640 he sat as proctor for Bristol in Convocation. Soon after, he removed to London to lecture at the Chapel of St Mary Savoy. When the civil war broke out he adhered firmly to the royal cause, and shared in its reverses. He saw active service as chaplain to Hopton's men, and printed at Exeter in 1645 for their encouragement Good Thoughts in Bad Times, followed in 1647 by Good Thoughts in Worse Times, and by The Cause and Cure of a Wounded Conscience. In the same year he began again to preach, at St Clement's, Eastcheap, and was suspended; but the Earl of Carlisle presented him to the curacy of Waltham Abbey, which he managed to keep. In 1650 he published his Pisgah-sight of Palestine. Abel Redivivus (1651) was a collection of religious biographies. In 1655 he published his long-projected Church History of Britain, from the birth of Christ till 1648, divided into eleven books—a twelfth being a History of the University of Cambridge. The work was bitterly assailed by Heylin in his Examen Historicum (1659), as a rhapsody, full of 'impertinencies' and errors, and marred by partiality to Puritanism. Fuller replied in his witty Appeal of Injured Innocence. He had in 1658 received the rectory of Cranford in Middlesex, and at the Restoration he was reinstated in his former preferments. In 1660 he published his Mixt Contemplations in Better Times, was admitted D.D. at Cambridge, and appointed chaplain to the king. He died in London 16th August 1661. His great Worthies of England, left unfinished, was published by his son in 1662; its preparation took nearly twenty years. The Worthies is a magnificent miscellany about the counties of England and their illustrious natives, lightened up by unrivalled wit, originality, and felicity of illustration, and aglow with the pure fervour of patriotism. His style shows admirable narrative faculty, with a nervous brevity and point almost new to English, and a homely directness ever shrewd and never vulgar. See Lives of him by Russell (1844), Bailey (1874), and Morris Fuller (1886); his Collected Sermons, edited by Bailey (1891); and Selections by H. Rogers (1856) and Dr A. Jessopp (1892).

Fullerton, Lady Georgiana, daughter of the first Earl Granville, was born at Tixall Hall, Staffordshire, 23d September 1812, and in 1833 married Alexander Fullerton, an officer. Two years after publishing her first story, Ellen Middleton (1844), she became a convert to Catholicism. The rest of her life was devoted to charitable works and religious tales—Grantley Manor (1847), Constance Sherwood (1864), A Stormy Life (1864), Mrs Gerald's Niece (1871), &c. She died at Bourne-mouth, 19th January 1885. See her Life by Father Coleridge, from the French of Mrs Craven (1888).

Fulton, Robert, engineer, was born of Irish parents in 1765 in what is now Fulton township, Pennsylvania, and became a painter of miniature portraits and landscapes. In 1786 he went to London and studied under West, but by-and-by applied his energies wholly to mechanics. In 1794 he obtained from the British government a patent for a double-inclined plane to supersede locks, and invented a mill for sawing and polishing marble. He afterwards prepared plans for cast-iron bridges, and patented a machine for spinning flax, a dredging machine, and several boats. In 1797 he went to Paris, where he devoted himself to new projects and inventions, among them a submarine torpedo boat, but neither the French nor the British government would take it up. He next turned his attention to the application of steam to navigation, and in 1803 made two experiments on the Seine with small steamboats. In 1806 he returned to New York, invented torpedoes, and in 1807 launched a steam-vessel upon the Hudson, which accomplished the voyage (nearly 150 miles) to Albany in thirty-two hours. From this period steamers on his patent came into use on the rivers of the United States. Although Fulton was not the first to apply steam to navigation (see FIRCH, JOHN), he was the first to apply it successfully. He was employed by the U.S. government on canals and other works, and in constructing (1814) a steam war-ship, which, however, was never tested in warfare. He died in New York, 24th February 1815. See Life by Colden (1817), and Robert Fulton and Steam Navigation, by Thos. W. Knox (1886).

Furness, William Henry, D.D. (1802-96), born in Boston, U.S., from 1825 to 1875 was a Congregational Unitarian pastor at Philadelphia, and published much.—One of his sons, William Henry (1828-67), was a portrait-painter; and another, Horace Howard (b. 2d November 1833), is famous as a Shakespearian scholar.

Furniss, Harry, caricaturist, was born at Wexford of English parentage in March 1854, came to London in 1873, and in 1880-94 drew for Punch. He founded (the short-lived) Lika Joko (1894), has published The Humours of Parliament (1900), Confessions of a Caricaturist (1900), and other works, and has lectured.

Furnivall, Frederick James (1825-1910), born at Egham, graduated B.A. in 1846 from Trinity Hall, Cambridge. He associated himself with Frederick Maurice, and taught in the Working Men's College for ten years; then devoting himself to English philology, he founded, between 1864 and 1886, the Early English, Chaucer, Ballad, New Shakspeare, Wyclif, and Shelley Societies. He was honorary secretary of the Philological Society from 1854, and prepared materials for the Society's great English Dictionary. His most valuable work is his edition of Chaucer from the seven great MSS. (1868 et seq.); the seventh he afterwards printed by itself, besides all the MSS. of Chaucer's Minor Poems. For the New Shakspeare Society he was editor of Harrison's Description of England (1577-87), Stubbes's Anatomy of Abuses (1583), &c. Furnivall, who was Ph. D. of Berlin, was granted in 1884 a pension of £150. An English Miscellany, presented to him by friends on his 75th birthday, contains a bibliography of his 107 works.

Furse, Charles Wellington (1868-1905), painter, was a son of the Archdeacon of Westminster.

Fuseli, Henry (Johann Heinrich Füssli), painter and art-critic, was born at Zurich, 7th February 1742, and coming to England in 1763, was encouraged by Sir Joshua Reynolds to go to Italy (1770-78). Elected A.R.A. in 1788, and R.A. in 1790, he became professor of Painting in 1799, and died at Putney, 16th April 1825. His 200 paintings include 'The Nightmare' (1781) and two series to illustrate Shakespeare's and Milton's works. His literary works, with life, were published by Knowles (1831).

Fust, JOHANN, was a printer with Gutenberg (q.v.) and Schöffer at Mainz between 1450 and 1466. The half-mythical magician, Dr Faustus (fl. 1507-40), who was born at Knittlingen in Swabia, has been confounded with him. [Foost.]

Fustel de Coulanges, NUMA DENIS, born at

Paris, 18th March 1830, filled chairs at Amiens, Paris, Strasburg, and from 1875 the École Normale at Paris. A member of the Institute, he died Sept. 12, 1889. His Chio (1857) and Polybe (1858) had hardly prepared one for the educational brilliancy of La Cité antique (1864; 12th ed. 1889); his Histoire des Institutions politiques de l'ancienne France (1875-92) is profoundly learned. See Life by Guiraud (1896). [Fees-tel de Koo-lonzsh'.]

Fyffe, CHARLES ALAN (1845-92), author of A History of Modern Europe (3 vols. 1880-90), was born at Blackheath, in 1867 took a classical first from Balliol College, Oxford, and was elected a fellow of University College. [Fife.]

ABELENTZ, HANS CONON VON DER (1807-74), born at Altenburg, published from 1833 books and articles on Manchu, Gothic, Finnish, Swahili, Dyak, Samoeyde, Dakota, and other tongues, and a great work on the Melanesian languages (1860-73). He knew eighty languages.—His son, GEORG (1840-93), in 1878 became Oriental professor at Leipzig, in 1889 at Berlin. [Gah-bel-lentz.]

Gabelsberger, FRANZ XAVER (1789-1849), the inventor of the chief German system of shorthand, was born and died at Munich, having in 1809 entered the Bavarian civil service. See Life by Gerber (2d ed. 1886). [Gah-bels-ber-ger; g hard.]

Gaboriau, ÉMILE (1835-73), the great master of 'police novels,' was born at Saujon in Charente-Inférieure, and was only saved from mercantile life by a timely discovery that he could write. He had already contributed to some of the smaller Parisian papers, when he leapt into fame with L'Affaire Lerouge (1866), the feuilleton to Le Pays. It was followed by Le Dossier 113 (1867), Monieur Lecoq (1869), Les Esclaves de Paris (1869), La Corde au Cou (1873), &c. [Gah-bor-t-oh'.]

Gachard, LOUIS PROSPER (1800-85), Belgian historian, was born in Paris, but spent most of his life as keeper of the archives at Brussels. He edited the correspondence of William the Silent (1847-58), Philip II. (1848-59), Margaret of Austria (1867-81), and Alva (1850); and wrote Les Troubles de Gand sous Charles V. (1846), Retraite et Mort de Charles V. (1854-55), &c. [Ga-shahr'.]

Gadsden, CHRISTOPHER (1724-1805), American patriot, born in Charleston, was a member of the first Continental congress (1774), became brigadier-general during the revolution, and was lieutenant-governor of South Carolina.—His grandson, JAMES (1788-1858), served in the war of 1812 and against the Seminoles. In 1853 he was appointed minister to Mexico, and negotiated the purchase of part of Arizona and New Mexico.

Gage, THOMAS, after having been a Dominican from 1603 in Spain and from 1625 in Central America, came home in 1637 to England, and in 1641 turned Protestant. He died a naval chaplain in Jamaica (1656). His chief work is The English-American his Travail (1648).

Gage, THOMAS (1721-87), general, was the second son of the first Viscount Gage. He accompanied Braddock's ill-fated expedition (1755), and became in 1760 military governor of Montreal, in 1763 commander-in-chief of the British forces in America, and in 1774 governor of Massachusetts. On 18th April 1775 he sent a force to seize a quantity of arms at Concord; and next day the skirmish of Lexington took place which began the Revolution. The battle of Bunker Hill (17th June) was followed by Gage's resignation.

Gagern, HEINRICH WILHELM AUGUST, FREIHERR VON (1799-1880), German statesman, born at Baireuth, was a founder of the student movement (Burschenschaft) of 1815-19, held office in Hesse-Darmstadt, and was president of the Frankfort parliament (1848-49). From 1859 he again took part in grand-ducal politics, as a partisan of Austria against Prussia. [Gah-ger'n; g hard.] Gaidoz, HENRI, Celtic folklorist, born in Paris in 1843, received a chair there in 1876.

Gaillard, CLAUDE FERDINAND (1834-87), engraver and portrait-painter, was born and died in Paris. See monograph by Guillemin (Par. 1890).

Gainsborough, THOMAS, portrait and landscape painter, one of the greatest of English masters, was born at Sudbury in 1727. Never happy but when sketching the scenery around him, he was sent to London at fourteen to study art under Gravelot, the engraver and designer of book-illustrations, under Hayman, and in the St Martin's Lane Academy. In 1745 he married Margaret Burr, a lady with £200 a year, and settled as a portrait-painter at Ipswich. He was patronised by Sir Philip Thicknesse, governor of Landguard Fort, and by his advice removed in 1760 to Batli. Here he won the public with his portrait of Earl Nugent; numerous commissions followed, and in 1761 he began to exhibit with the Society of Artists of Great Britain until 1768. In that year he became a foundation member of the Royal Academy, from which he practically retired, discontented with the place assigned to 'The King's Daughters' in the exhibition of 1784. In 1774, after a deadly quarrel with Thicknesse, he removed to London, establishing his studio in Schonberg House, Pall Mall, and there prosecuted his art with splendid success. He died 2d August 1788, and was buried in Kew churchyard. Fond of company, and quick of temper but generous, Gainsborough loved to associate with players and musicians, and was himself a performer on various instruments. He is represented in the National Gallery by fourteen works, including 'Mrs Siddons,' 'The Market Cart,' and 'The Watering-place;' in the National Portrait Gallery by five; in the Dulwich Gallery by six; and in the National Gallery of Scotland by the 'Hon. Mrs Graham.' A famous portrait is that of Master Buttall, 'The Blue Boy,' in the collection of the Duke of Westminster; his 'Lady Mulgrave' in 1895 fetched 10,000 guineas. Over 200 of his works were exhibited in the Grosvenor in 1885. See Lives by Fulcher (1856), Mrs Arthur Bell (1897), and W. Armstrong (1899); Brock-Arnold's Gainsborough and Constable (1881), and Horne's Catalogue of Gainsborough and Romney (1891).

Gairdner, SIR WILLIAM TENNANT, K.C.B. (1898), was born at Edinburgh, 8th Nov. 1824, son of John Gairdner, M.D. (1790-1876), and nephew of William Gairdner (1793-1867), a London physician, author of a standard work on gout. He graduated M.D. at Edinburgh in 1845, and was appointed in 1862 to the chair of Practice of Medicine at Glasgow. He wrote on Bronchitis (1850), Pericarditis (1861), Clinical Medicine (1862), Insanity (1888), and died in June 1907.

His brother, JAMES GAIRDNER, historian, was born at Edinburgh, 22d March 1828, and at eighteen entered the Public Record Office in London, where he became assistant-keeper in 1859. He has shown a rare combination of erudition, accuracy, and judicial temper in editing a long series of historical documents, as also in his own works, which include The Houses of Lancaster and York (1874); Life of Richard III. (1878); Studies in English History (1881), written in conjunction with Spedding; and Henry VII. (1889).

Gaisford, THOMAS, D.D. (1780-1855), editor of the Greek classics, was born at Ilford, Wilts, and in 1811 became Greek professor at Oxford, in 1831 dean of Christ Church.

Gaius, a Roman jurist, who flourished between 130 and 180 A.D., and on whose Institutes were based Justinian's. His other works were largely used in the compilation of the Digest. The Institutes, lost until Niebuhr discovered a MS. at Verona in 1816, have been edited by Krüger and Studemund (3d ed. 1891); E. Porte, with an English translation (2d ed. 1875); Muirhead (1880); and Abdy and Walker (3d ed. 1885).

Galba, SERVIUS SULPICIUS (3 B.C.-69 A.D.), Roman emperor, became consul in 33 A.D., and administered Aquitania, Germany, Africa, and Hispania Tarraconensis with courage, skill, and justice. In 68 the Gallic legions rose against Nero, and in June proclaimed Galba emperor. But he soon made himself unpopular by favouritism, ill-timed severity, and avarice, and was assassinated by the praetorians in Rome.

Galdós, BENITO PEREZ, novelist and dramatist, was born in 1849 in the Canary Islands, but was brought up at Madrid. His Gloria, Doña Perfecta, Trufalgar, Leon Roch, Marianela, &c., have been translated into English.

Gale, THOMAS (c. 1635-1702), dean of York from 1697, was an antiquary, like his sons ROGER (1672-1744) and SAMUEL (1682-1754).

Galen, or CLAUDIUS GALENUS (c. 130-201 A.D.), Greek physician, was born at Pergamus in Mysia, and studied medicine there and at Smyrna, Corinth, and Alexandria. After 164 he spent four years in Rome, and in 170 was recalled thither by the Emperor M. Aurelius. He afterwards attended Commodus, Sextus, and Severus. He is supposed to have died in Sicily. Galen was a voluminous writer on medical and philosophical subjects. The works extant under his name consist of 83 genuine treatises; 19 doubtfully genuine; 45 undoubtedly spurious; 19 fragments; and 15 commentaries on Hippocrates. He was a careful dissector (of animals), a somewhat too theoretical physiologist, and so gathered up all the medical knowledge of his time as to become the authority from whom the subsequent Greek and Roman medical writers were mere compilers. He was the first to diagnose by the pulse. See edition by Kühn (20 vols. 1821-33), that of the smaller works by Marquardt (1884-94); the French translation by Daremberg (1857); and Cox's epitome (Phila. 1846).

Galerius. GALERIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS, Roman emperor, born near Sardica in Dacia, rose high in the army, was made Cæsar by Diocletian (292), and on Diocletian's abdication (305) became with Constantius Chlorus joint-ruler of the Roman empire, Galerius taking the eastern half. When Constantius died at York (306) the troops in Britain and Gaul transferred their allegiance to his son, Constantine; but Galerius retained the east till his death in 311.

Galgaucus, or CALGA'CUS, the name Tacitus gives to the Caledonian chief defeated by Agricola in the battle of the Grampians (86 A.D.).

Gallani, FERDINANDO (1728-87), economist, born at Chieti, lived in Paris (1760-69) as a Neapolitan secretary of legation on close terms with the Encyclopedists, and then was a minister of the king of Naples. He wrote against both extreme protection and complete free-trade. See his Correspondance (1818; new ed. 1881), and Life by Mattei (Nap. 1879). [Gal-li-ah'-nee.]

Galignani, JOHN ANTHONY and WILLIAM, Parisian publishers, were born in London, the former 15th October 1796, the latter 10th March 1798. They much improved Galignani's Messenger, started in Paris by their father in 1814, and made it a medium for advocating cordiality between England and France. The brothers founded at Corbeil a hospital for distressed Englishmen; and in 1889 the Galignani Home for decayed printers and booksellers was opened at Neuilly. The elder died 30th December 1873, and the younger 12th December 1882. [Gal-lin-yah'-nee.]

Galilei, GALILEO, was born at Pisa, 15th February 1564, and as a student of medicine came to disbelieve and despise the prevailing Aristotelian philosophy. Entering the university of Pisa in 1581, he inferred in 1583 from the oscillations of a suspended lamp in the cathedral (equal in time whatever their range) the value of a pendulum for the exact measurement of time. The study of mathematics led him to invent a hydrostatic balance and write a treatise on specific gravity; and, appointed professor of Mathematics in the university, he propounded and proved the novel theorem that all falling bodies, great or small, descend with equal velocity. The hostility of the Aristotelians led him to resign his chair (1591) and retire to Florence. When he became professor of Mathematics at Padua (1592-1610), his lectures attracted pupils from all parts of Europe. Among his discoveries were a species of thermometer and a proportional compass or sector; and he perfected the refracting telescope (in its rude form a Dutch invention of 1608). Rapidly improving the instrument, Galileo pursued a series of astronomical investigations, which convinced him of the correctness of the Copernican theory. He concluded that the moon owed her illumination to reflection, and that her surface was diversified by valleys and mountains. The Milky-way he pronounced a track of countless stars. Another series of observations led to the discovery of the four satellites of Jupiter (1610). He also noticed spots on the sun, from whose movement he inferred its rotation. In this year he was recalled to Florence by the Grand-duke of Tuscany. In 1611 he was received with great distinction at Rome. Yet the publication, two years later, of his dissertation on the solar spots, in which he boldly advocated the Copernican system, provoked the censure of the ecclesiastical authorities. He promised (1616) to abstain from all future advocacy of the condemned doctrines. But in 1632 he published the Dialogo sopra i due massimi Sistemi del Mondo, in favour of the Copernican system. Pope Urban VIII. was led to believe that Galileo had here satirised him as a timid and blind traditionalist; and Galileo, summoned before the Inquisition, after a wearisome trial and incarceration, was condemned to abjure his scientific creed. Since 1761 the legend has been current that after his recantation he exclaimed sotto voce, 'E pur si muove' (And yet it does move). Whether he was put to the torture or not has been keenly disputed. Galileo was further sentenced to indefinite imprisonment in the Inquisition—a sentence commuted by Pope Urban, at the request of the Duke of Tuscany, into permission to reside at Siena, and finally at Florence. At Arcetri, near Florence, he continued his researches, even after hearing and sight were much impaired. Other discoveries of his were the law of uniformly accelerated motion towards the earth, the parabolic path of projectiles, virtual velocities, and the law that all bodies have weight. Just before he became totally blind (1637) he made yet another discovery, that of the moon's monthly and annual librations. He loved art, and cultivated music and poetry. He died 8th January 1642, and was interred in the church of Santa Croce in Florence. See the edition of his works by Alberi (16 vols. Flor. 1842-56); Lives by Viviani (1654), Chasles (1862), and Henri Martin (1868); besides works about him and his trial by De l'Épinois (1867-77), Berti (1876), Favaro (1882), Gebler (1876), Wohlwill (1877), Wegg-Prosser (1889), and Fahie (1903). Galitzin, or GOLYZIN, a Russian family, prominent in war and diplomacy from the 16th century downwards.—VASILII, surnamed the Great (1643-1714), was the counsellor and favourite of Sophia, sister of Peter the Great, but was banished (1689).—DIMITRI (1735-1803), Russian ambassador to France and Holland, owes the preservation of his name mainly to his wife, AMALIE, PRINCESS GALITZIN (1746-1806), daughter of a Prussian general, who was remarkable for culture, grace, and ardent Catholic piety. Having separated from her husband at Münster, she gathered round her a circle of learned companions.—Her son, DIMITRI AUGUSTINE (1770-1841), in 1787 became a Roman Catholic, and in 1795 was ordained a priest in the United States. He betook himself to a bleak region among the Alleghanies, where he was known as 'Father Smith,' and founded a town, called Loretto. He was vicar-general of Philadelphia from 1821. He wrote Defence of Catholic Principles (1816), Letter to a Protestant Friend (1820), and Appeal to the Protestant Public (1834). See Lives by Heyden and Brownson.

Gall, Franz Joseph, the founder of phrenology, was born at Tiefenbronn near Pforzheim, 9th March 1758, and settled in Vienna in 1785 as a physician. In 1796 he began to lecture on Phrenology; but the course was prohibited in 1802 as subversive of religion. With Spurzheim he next lectured through Germany, Holland, Sweden, and Switzerland, and reached the height of his fame when in 1807 he settled as a physician in Paris. In 1808 he and Spurzheim presented to the French Institute a memoir of their discoveries, on which a committee reported unfavourably. Thereupon Gall and Spurzheim published their Introduction au Cours de Physiologie du Cerveau, followed by Recherches sur le Système Nerveux (1809), and by Anatomie et Physiologie du Système Nerveux (1810-19). Gall died at Montrouge near Paris, 22d August 1823. [Gall, as in Galloway.]

Gall, Sr (c. 550-645), an Irish follower of St Columban, fixed in 614 his cell at St Gall in Switzerland, round which grew up a great Benedictine abbey.

Gallait, LOUIS (1812-87), born at Tournay, became famous by pictures on subjects from the history of the Low Countries, such as 'The Abdication of Charles V.' (1841), 'Alva viewing the dead bodies of Egmont and Horn' (1851), and 'The Plague of Tournay' (1882). [Gall-lay.]

Galland, ANTOINE (1646-1715), orientalist, was born at Rollot in Picardy. Attached in 1670 to the French embassy at Constantinople, he travelled in Syria and the Levant (1673, 1676, 1679). In 1709 he became Arabic professor in the Collège de France. He wrote on archæology, Eastern proverbs, and Indian fables, but is known best by his translation of the Arabian Nights (1704-8), the first in any language of Christendom. See his Journal (ed. by Schefer, 1881). [Gal-lond.]

Gallatin, ALBERT (1761-1849), financier and statesman, born at Geneva, graduated there in 1779. He went in 1780 to the United States, taught French at Harvard, bought land in Virginia and Pennsylvania, and entered political life in 1789. In 1793 he was elected to the U.S. senate, in 1795 entered congress, and in 1801-13 was secretary of the Treasury. He took an important part in the peace negotiations with England in 1814, and signed the Treaty of Ghent. In 1815-23 he was minister at Paris, in 1826 at London. From 1827 he devoted his time to historical and ethnological researches, writing on finance, politics, and the Indian tribes. See Lives by Adams (1879) and Stevens (1883).

Gallenga, ANTONIO CARLO NAPOLEON (1810-95), author of many works in English on Italy, the papacy, &c., was born at Parma.

Gallienus, PUBLIUS LICINIUS, Roman emperor, was from 253 A.D. colleague and from 260 successor to his father, Valerian. But his authority was limited to Italy, for throughout the provinces the legions revolted, and proclaimed their commanders Cæsars. Hence the period is known as the Time of the Thirty Tyrants. In 268, while besieging one of his rivals in Milan, he was murdered by some of his officers.

Gallio, JUNIUS ANNÆUS, Roman pro-consul of Achaia under Claudius when St Paul was at Corinth, 53 A.D., was a brother of Seneca. He resigned his government owing to ill-health, and is said to have been put to death by Nero.

Galluppi, PASQUALE (1770-1846), a Kantian philosopher, born in Calabria, died in Naples.

Gallus, C. CORNELIUS (c. 70-26 B.C.), Roman poet, born at Forum Julii (mod. Fréjus) in Gaul, lived at Rome in intimate friendship with Virgil and Ovid; was appointed by Augustus prefect of Egypt; but, having fallen into disfavour and been banished, killed himself. Gallus was reckoned the founder of the Roman elegy, from his four books of elegies upon his mistress Lycoris, of which but a few fragments are extant.

Gallus, TREBONIANUS, Roman emperor (251-253 A.D.), is memorable for the dishonourable peace he purchased from the Goths. He was murdered by his own soldiers.

Galt, JOHN, Scotch novelist, was born at Irvine, May 2, 1779, and educated at Greenock. He was then placed in the Custom-house, but in 1804 proceeded to London with an epic poem on the battle of Largs in his portmanteau, a poem he printed but soon withdrew from circulation. After a few years his health failed, and he travelled for some time in the Levant, where he met Byron. On his return he published his Letters from the Levant, a Life of Wolsey, several plays, and much miscellaneous work; but he first displayed individual power in The Ayrshire Legatees, which appeared in Blackwood's Magazine in 1820. Its successor, The Annals of the Parish (1821), remains his masterpiece. He produced in quick succession Sir Andrew Wylie, The Entail, The Steamboat, and The Provost. The historical romances, Ringan Gilhaize (a tale of the Covenanters), The Spaewife, Rothelan, and The Omen, although full of striking scenes, were not so successful. Galt was now busily engaged in the formation of the Canada Company; but before he left England he published The Last of the Lairds. He departed for Canada in 1826, but three years later returned to England a ruined man, and produced a new novel, Lawrie Todd, followed by Southernman, a romance of the days of Queen Mary, and a Life of Lord Byron, which ran through several editions, but was roughly handled by the critics. In 1834 he issued his Literary Life and Miscellanies. He now returned to Scotland, utterly broken in health and spirits, and died at Greenock, 11th April 1839. In depicting life in small towns and villages where the successful shopkeeper may aspire to be the chief magistrate, and the minister is the most important personage, Galt is without a rival. He possesses rich humour, genuine pathos, and a rare mastery of the Scotch dialect. See Memoir prefixed to D. S. Meldrum's edition of his Works (Edin. 1895-96).

His son, Sir ALEXANDER TILLOCH GALT, G.C.M.G. (1869), born at Chelsea, 6th September 1817, entered the Canadian parliament in 1849, and was finance minister 1853-62 and 1864-66. In 1880-83 he was High Commissioner for Canada in Britain; and he served on the Washington Treaty and Halifax Fisheries Commissions. He died at Montreal, 19th September 1893.

Galton, SIR DOUGLAS (1822-99), born at Hadzor House, Worcestershire, was assistant under-secretary for War 1862-70, held other government posts, and wrote on hospitals and healthy dwellings. A D.C.L., LL.D., F.R.S., and K.C.B., in 1895 he was president of the British Association.

Galton, SIR FRANCIS, F.R.S. (1822-1911), grandson of Dr Erasmus Darwin, and cousin of Charles Darwin, was born at Birmingham, and educated at King Edward's School. He studied medicine at the Birmingham Hospital and King's College, London, and graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1844. Having in 1846 travelled in North Africa, he explored in 1850 lands hitherto unknown in South Africa, publishing Narrative of an Explorer in Tropical South Africa and Art of Travel (1855). His investigations in meteorology are recorded in Meteorographica (1863). Latterly he devoted himself to heredity, founding and endowing the study of eugenics, and publishing Hereditary Genius (1869); Experiments in Pangenesis (1871); English Men of Science: their Nature and Nurture (1874); Life-history Album (1884); Natural Inheritance (1889); Finger Prints (1892), &c.

Galuppi, BALDASSARO (1706-85), a Venetian operatic composer, resident in London 1741-44.

Galvani, LUIGI (1737-98), was born at Bologna, studied there, and in 1762 became professor of Anatomy. He owes his celebrity to his discoveries in animal electricity, expounded in De viribus Electricitatis in Motu Musculari Commentarius (1791). His works were published by the Academy of Sciences of Bologna (1841-42).

Gam, DAVID, a brave warrior of Brecknockshire, who fell at Agincourt, 25th October 1415.

Gama, VASCO DA, Portuguese navigator, was born about 1469 at Sines in Alemtejo. He early distinguished himself as an intrepid mariner, and was selected by King Emanuel to discover the route to India round the Cape. The expedition of three vessels with 168 men left Lisbon 8th July 1497, but was four months in reaching St Helena. After rounding the Cape, despite hurricanes and mutinies he made Melinda early in the following year. Here he found a skillful Indian pilot, crossed the Indian Ocean, and arrived at Calicut, 20th May 1498. The ruler of Calicut soon became actively hostile, and Da Gama had to fight his way out of the harbour. In September 1499 he arrived at Lisbon, and was ennobled. Emanuel immediately despatched a fresh squadron of thirteen ships under Cabral, who founded a factory at Calicut. But the forty Portuguese left there were murdered, and to avenge them the king fitted out a squadron of twenty ships under Da Gama (1502), which founded the colonies of Mozambique and Sofala, bombarded Calicut, and reached the Tagus with thirteen richly-laden vessels in December 1503. For twenty years Da Gama lived inactive at Evora, while the extended Portuguese conquests were presided over by five viceroys. The fifth was so unfortunate that John III. in 1524 despatched Da Gama to India, where he succeeded in making Portugal once more respected, but died at Cochin 24th Dec. 1525; his body was brought home to Portugal. See CAMOENS, the Three Voyages of Vasco da Gama, trans. by Lord Stanley of Alderley (Hakluyt Soc. 1869), the Journal of his first voyage, ed. by E. G. Ravenstein (Hakluyt Soc. 1898), and a German Life by Hünnerich (1898).

Gama'iel, St Paul's teacher, was a prominent Pharisee, and taught 'the law' early in the 1st century. He was the grandson of Hillel (q.v.). Tolerant and peaceful, he seems to have placed Christianity on a par with other sects; and he exhorts to long-suffering on all sides.

Gambetta, LEON MICHEL, born at Cahors, of Genoese-Jewish extraction, April 3, 1838, became a member of the Paris bar in 1859, attracted attention by his advanced liberal views, and in 1869 was elected deputy by the Irreconcilables for both Marseilles and Belleville. After the surrender of Napoleon III. at Sedan, Gambetta was one of the proclaimers of the Republic, September 4, 1870. On the 6th he became minister of the Interior in the Government of National Defence, and at once took measures for defending Paris. The capital, however, was invested, and in October, having escaped in a balloon to Tours, Gambetta assumed the general conduct of public affairs, and for five months was Dictator of France. In spite of the surrender of Metz he called up army after army, and sent them against the Germans; even when Paris capitulated, he demanded that the war should be carried on à outrance. His colleagues in Paris having repudiated his decree (from Bordeaux) disfranchising all members of royal dynasties, he resigned, and retired into Spain (1871). Elected again to the National Assembly by ten departments, he took no part in the suppression of the Commune. After its fall he became the chief of the advanced Republicans, and in September 1872 he formulated the Republican programme. When the Duc de Broglie took office (May 1877) in the hope of restoring the monarchy, a civil war seemed imminent, but was averted by Gambetta, and Marshal MacMahon refrained from pushing matters to an extremity. Gambetta was arraigned for having declared respecting MacMahon, 'Il faudra ou se soumettre, ou se démettre,' and was condemned to three months' imprisonment and a fine of 4000 francs. Two months later he was re-elected for Belleville. The contest between the deputy and the president ended in the triumph of Gambetta and the resignation of MacMahon. In 1878 he fought a duel with M. de Fourtou, an ex-minister, but the encounter was harmless; and soon after he accepted the presidency of the chamber. In November 1880, on the resignation of the Ferry ministry, Gambetta succeeded in forming a cabinet, but when he produced his scheme for the revision of the constitution in January 1882 the chamber rejected the scrutin de liste proposal, and Gambetta immediately resigned. He died 31st December 1882, from the effects of 'an accidental wound in the hand from a revolver.' See his Discours Politiques et Dépêches (1880-92), and Lives by Reinach (1884), Neucastel (1885), and Tournier (1893). Laur in The Heart of Gambetta (trans. 1908) says he died of appendicitis.

Gambier, JAMES, BARON (1756-1833), admiral, was born in the Bahamas, and off Ushant fought with distinction under Lord Howe in 1794. He commanded the British fleet at Copenhagen in 1807, and was rewarded with a peerage. At the battle of Aix Roads in 1809 he disregarded the signals of Dundonald (q.v.), but was 'most honourably acquitted' by court-martial.

Gambold, JOHN (1711-71), born at Puncteston, Pembrokeshire, in 1735 became vicar of Stanton Harcourt, in 1742 a Moravian Brother.

Gambri'nus, a mythical king of Flanders, to whom is ascribed the invention of beer.

Gandon, JAMES (1743-1823), architect, was born in London, and died near Dublin.

Garay, JÁNOS (1812-53), Hungarian poet.

Garborg, ARNE, author since 1881 of Norwegian stories, was born 25th January 1851.

Garcia, MANUEL (1775-1832), vocalist and composer, was born at Seville. After making a reputation as a tenor in Cadiz and Madrid, from 1808 onward he won great success at the Italian Opera in Paris, Italy, and London. In 1825, with an operatic company, he visited New York and Mexico, where he was robbed of all his money; and after his return to Paris was compelled to teach singing. Several of his compositions, such as Il Califò di Bagdad, were much admired. His eldest daughter Maria became Madame Malibran (q.v.).—PAULINE VIARDOT-GARCIA (1821-1910), his second daughter, a mezzo-soprano singer, composed operettas and songs.—His son, MANUEL (1805-1906), taught singing in Paris and London, wrote on the art, invented the laryngoscope, and celebrated his centenary in 1905.

Garcilaso (1540-1616) was born at Cuzco, the son of one of the conquerors of Peru by an Inca princess. At twenty he went to Spain, where he died. His account of the conquest of Florida by Fernando de Soto (1605) was followed in 1609-17 by his great Commentarios on the history of Peru, translated by Rycant (1688) and by Markham (Hakluyt Soc. 1869).

Garcilaso de la Vega (1503-36), Spanish poet, born at Toledo, fought bravely in the wars of Charles V., and died at Nice of a wound received near Fréjus. Little as he wrote, he revolutionised the national poetic taste by his sweet and melancholy poems. See edition of his poems by Azagra (1765) and translations by Wiffen (1823).

Garcin de Tassy, JOSEPH (1794-1878), orientalist, was born at Marseilles, and died in Paris.

Garden, GEORGE (1649-1733), an Episcopal and Jacobite minister of Aberdeen, who favoured Bourignianism.

Gardiner, ALLEN FRANCIS (1794-1851), a naval commander, born at Basildon, Berks, who in 1838 became a missionary to the Chilian Indians, and perished in Patagonia.

Gardiner, COLONEL JAMES, born at Carriden in Linlithgowshire, January 11, 1688, when fourteen obtained a commission in a Scots regiment in the Dutch service. In 1702 he passed into the English army, in 1706 was severely wounded at Ranillies, and fought in all Marlborough's other battles. In 1715 he was made captain of dragoons, and with eleven others (eight of whom were killed), fired the barricades of the Highlanders at Preston. He had been noted for his licentiousness; but in 1719 a vision of Christ on the cross converted him. In 1730 he became lieutenant-colonel of dragoons, and in 1743 colonel of the Enniskillens. Deserted by his men at Prestonpans, he put himself at the head of a handful of infantry, and was cut down, close to his own house, September 21, 1745. See Life by Dr Doddridge (1747).

Gardiner, SAMUEL RAWSON, D.C.L., LL.D. (1829-1902), was born at Ropley, Hants, and educated at Winchester and Christ Church, Oxford, taking a first-class in 1851. For some years he filled the chair of Modern History at King's College, London, but resigned it in 1885 to continue his History at Oxford on an All Souls' fellowship. In 1882 he was granted a pension of £150. The first instalment of his great History of England from the accession of James I. to the Restoration appeared in 1803; and at his death he had brought the work down to 1656. He had also published The Thirty Years' War (1874), The First Two Stuarts and the Puritan Revolution (1875), Introduction to the Study of English History (1881), written in conjunction with Mr Bass Mullinger, and The Student's History of England (1890-92).

Gardiner, STEPHEN, Bishop of Winchester, was born between 1483 and 1490 at Bury St Edmunds—a clothworker's son, say some; others, a natural son of Bishop Woodville of Salisbury. He studied at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1520-21 proceeding doctor of civil and of canon law; and soon after, through the Duke of Norfolk, he became Wolsey's secretary. In this capacity he won the confidence of Henry VIII., and was employed (1527-33) in promoting at Rome and elsewhere his divorce from Catharine of Aragon. At this time he was known as Dr Stephens. He had become master of his old college in 1525, Archdeacon of Norfolk in 1529, and two years later of Leicester, when in November 1531 he was consecrated Bishop of Winchester. Good Catholic though he was, he supported the royal supremacy, and wrote a treatise in defence of it, De verâ Obedientiâ (1535); but he opposed all measures tending to a doctrinal reformation, he had a principal hand in the downfall of Thomas Cromwell, and the 'Six Articles' were largely of his framing. On Edward VI.'s accession (1547), for refusing to comply with the new teaching he was imprisoned, but released soon afterwards, to be next year lodged in the Tower, and in 1552 deprived of his bishopric. When Mary ascended the throne (1553), he was released, restored to his see, and appointed Lord High Chancellor of England. He now took the lead in the persecution of the Protestants, and has been charged with the grossest cruelty. He died very wealthy at Whitehall, of the gout, 12th November 1555. On his deathbed he cried out in Latin, 'I have denied with Peter, I have gone out with Peter; but I have not wept with Peter'—referring doubtless to his temporary renunciation of the papal supremacy. We have a dozen Latin and English treatises from his pen; but the Necessary Doctrine and Erudition of a Christian Man (1543) was probably Henry's own, not a joint production of Gardiner and Cranmer.

Gardner, DANIEL (c. 1750-1805), portrait-painter, was born at Kendal, and died in London.

Gardner, WILLIAM (1844-87), inventor in 1876 of the Gardner machine-gun, was a native of Ohio, but lived and died in England.

Garfield, JAMES ABRAM, twentieth president of the United States, was born in Orange, Ohio, 19th November 1831. His father died soon after the boy's birth, leaving his wife to bring up unaided her four children. At ten young Garfield already added to his mother's income by farm work. In 1849 he entered Geauga Seminary, Chester, Ohio; and during summer he turned to all kinds of work to provide funds for the ensuing winter. He next entered the college at Hiram, Ohio, supporting himself meanwhile by tuition, and graduated at Williams College, Mass., in 1856. Returning to Hiram, he became its president in 1857, at the same time preaching and studying law. He was elected to the state senate in 1859, and on the outbreak of the war received the command of a regiment of volunteers. His brigade gained the battle of Middle Creek, 10th January 1862, and he was promoted brigadier-general. He had been made major-general for gallantry at Chickamanga (1863), when he resigned his command to enter congress, where he sat until 1880, acting latterly as leader of the Republican party. In 1880, now a U.S. senator, he was adopted as presidential candidate by the Republicans. After his election to the presidency (March 1881) he identified himself with the cause of civil service reform, thereby irritating a powerful section of his own party. On the morning of 2d July he was shot by a disappointed office-seeker, Charles Guiteau, and died 19th September 1881. His speeches were collected in 2 vols. (1882). See Life by J. R. Gilmore (1880).

Garibaldi, GIUSEPPE, was born a sailor's son at Nice, 4th July 1807, and himself went early to sea. In 1834 he became involved in the 'Young Italy' movement of Mazzini, and was condemned to death for taking part in an attempt to seize Genoa. He escaped ultimately to South America, where in the rebellion of Rio Grande against Brazil he distinguished himself as a guerilla warrior and privateer, was taken prisoner, and eloped with and married the beautiful creole Anita Riveira de Silva, the mother of his children Menotti, Ricciotti, and Teresa. After some experiences as drover, ship-broker, and teacher of mathematics, he in 1842 joined the Montevideans, then at war with Buenos Ayres, and gained renown as naval commander and as organiser of the Italian legion. In 1847 he offered his services to the reforming pope Pius IX., but received an ambiguous reply; and Charles Albert of Sardinia, besieging the Austrians in Mantua in 1848, coldly referred him to his ministers. But after the collapse of the Sardinian army, Garibaldi and his volunteers performed notable feats against the Austrians. In 1849 he joined the revolutionary government of Rome, voted for a republic, drove back the French force, and routed the Neapolitans. Mazzini had meanwhile been inveigled into an armistice; the French, reinforced, laid siege to Rome; and Garibaldi, recalled, made a brilliant defence, but was forced to retreat, pursued by the Austrians, to the Adriatic; in this flight Anita perished. Arrested by the Sardinian government and requested to leave Italy, he betook himself to New York, where he worked eighteen months as a candlemaker, and then became captain of a Pacific merchantman. He returned to Italy in 1854, and had settled down as a farmer on the island of Caprera, when in 1859 the war of Italian liberation enabled him to render valuable service to Victor Emmanuel and the French. After the peace of Villafranca he helped to annex various territories to Sardinia, but was not allowed to march on Rome. Meanwhile the Mazzinists had been conspiring against the Bourbon tyranny in the Two Sicilies, and Garibaldi, in spite of Cavour, came to their aid. 'The thousand heroes' landed at Marsala on May 11, 1860; within three months Sicily was free; and crossing the straits (August 29) Garibaldi entered Naples (Sept. 7) amid the cheers of King Francis' troops. When Victor Emmanuel, elected sovereign by a plebiscite, arrived at Naples, Garibaldi, refusing all reward, retired to Caprera. Rome was still the centre of his thoughts, and in 1862 he embarked on a rash expedition against the capital; but the Italian government sent troops against him, and he was taken prisoner at Aspromonte (August 28). He paid a visit to England to support the cause of Denmark, and was received by the public with wild enthusiasm, but requested to return home by the government. In the war of 1866 he once more commanded the 'Red Shirts' in the Tyrol. Venice was now ceded to Italy; and next year Garibaldi made his last attempt on the Holy City. Arrested by the Italian government, he escaped from Caprera, and with his volunteers defeated the papal troops at Monterotondo, but was a few days after (3d November) utterly routed at Mentana by the Zouaves and French. Once more he retired to Caprera, whence in 1870 he issued two (poor) novels, Cantoni il volontario and Clelia—the latter translated as 'The Rule of the Monk.' A third romance (1872) was based on the Sicilian expedition. In 1870 he came to the assistance of the French Republic, and was placed in command of the volunteers of the Vosges; but, crippled by rheumatism and hopelessly outnumbered, he had no considerable success, and, elected to the Bordeaux assembly, was so insulted as to resign at once. Henceforth he remained a helpless invalid at Caprera, except on occasions like that in 1874, when he took his seat in the Chamber of Deputies at Rome; and through the generosity of English friends he became proprietor of the island. An unlucky marriage of 1800 was annulled in 1879, and he married in 1880 the nurse of his grandchildren. On 2d June 1882 he died. As a soldier he was perhaps nothing more than a good commander of irregulars, and his ignorance of politics sometimes did harm to his cause, yet he remains the central figure in the story of Italian independence. See Garibaldi's autobiography (1887; Eng. trans. 1889); his letters (1885); his speeches (1882); J. T. Bent's Life of him (1881); and works on him by Mario, Balbiani, Bordone, Delvau, and G. M. Trevelyan (1907, 1909, 1911).

Garnet, HENRY, born in 1555 at Heanor, Derbyshire, was brought up a Protestant at Winchester. He early became a Roman Catholic, went abroad, entered the Society of Jesus in 1575, and from 1587 was provincial of the Jesuits in England. The indiscreet zeal with which he endeavoured to promote the order brought him into odium with the secular clergy; while his friendship with the Spanish faction exposed him to a suspicion of treason. In the spring of 1605 he wrote to a Jesuit in Flanders in commendation of Guy Fawkes; and on the discovery of the plot he was present at the appointed rendezvous, and shortly afterwards was apprehended. That he knew of the murderous design months before was proved and admitted; that this knowledge was derived from the confessional rests on his statement only. He was executed May 3, 1606. See works cited at FAWKES.

Garnett, RICHARD (1789-1850), philologist, was born at Otley, and in 1838 became assistant-keeper of printed books at the British Museum. One of the founders of the Philological Society, he contributed many papers (on Celtic subjects, largely) to its Proceedings and to the Quarterly Review. These were collected by his son in Philological Essays (1859).—RICHARD, that son (1835-1906), born at Lichfield, became in 1851 assistant in the British Museum printed book department, and in 1875 reading-room superintendent. This post he resigned in 1884 to devote himself to printing the Museum Catalogue. In 1890-99 he was keeper of printed books; in 1883 became an LL.D. of Edinburgh, in 1895 a C.B. His books include Relics of Shelley (1862), Selections of Shelley's Poems (1880) and Letters (1882); Life of Carlyle (1883); a volume of prose tales, The Twilight of the Gods (1888); Poems (1893); and The Age of Dryden (1895).

Garnier, FRANCIS (1839-73), was born at St Étienne, and entering the navy, fought in the Chinese war (1860-62). Appointed to a post in Cochinchina, he led an exploring expedition from Cambodia to Shanghai by Yunnan (1866-68). He aided in the defence of Paris (1870-71), and in the Tonkin war (1873) took Hanoi, but fell in a fight. See his Voyage d'Exploration (1873) and Petit's Francis Garnier (1885).

Garnier, ROBERT (1834-90), poet and playwright, the most distinguished of the predecessors of Corneille, was born in Maine, and died at Le Mans. The best edition of his eight tragedies is by Förster (4 vols. Heilbronn, 1883). See an Étude by Bernage (1880). [Garn-yay.]

Garnier-Pagès, ÉTIENNE JOSEPH LOUIS (1801-41), born at Marseilles, practised as an advocate, took part in the July Revolution, and in 1831 became a prominent member of the Chamber.—His half-brother, LOUIS ANTOINE (1803-78), succeeded Etienne in the Chamber, leading the extreme Left. Mayor of Paris (1848) and finance-minister of the provisional government, he was a member of the Corps Législatif in 1864, and of the provisional government of 1871. He wrote Histoire de la Révolution de 1848 (1861-62) and L'Opposition et l'Empire (1872).

Garofalo, originally BENVENUTO TISI (1481-1559), painter, was born and died at Ferrara, for the last nine years totally blind.

Garrett, EDWARD, the nom-de-guerre of the domestic novelist, Isabella Fyvie, who, born in London of Scotch descent in 1843, in 1870 married John Mayo, solicitor, but was widowed in 1877.

Garrett, ELIZABETH. See ANDERSON.

Garrick, DAVID, actor, manager, and dramatist, was born 20th February 1717, at Hereford, where his father, Captain Peter Garrick, was then stationed. Lichfield, however, was the home of the Garricks, and David got his education in its grammar-school. In 1736 he was sent to study Latin and Greek under Samuel Johnson at Edial, and in March 1737 master and pupil set out together to London—Garrick to study for the bar; Johnson to try his fortune with his pen. But circumstances brought Garrick's legal studies to nothing, and in 1738 he became a wine-merchant with his eldest brother—a partnership dissolved in 1740. Garrick, who before this had the stage fever, now devoted his mind to preparing himself for the stage, and in 1741 he came out at Ipswich with success as Aboan in Southerne's Oroonoko. On 19th October he appeared in London at Goodman's Fields; and his success as Richard III. was so great that within a few weeks the two patent theatres were deserted, and crowds flocked to the unfashionable East-end playhouse. But, as Goodman's Fields had no license, the managers of Drury Lane and Covent Garden had it closed. Garrick played at both the patent theatres, and ultimately settled at Drury Lane, of which he became joint-patentee in 1747. He retired from the stage and from management in 1776. During this period Garrick was himself the great attraction and played continually, his only long rest being a trip to the Continent in 1763-65, when he fancied that his popularity was in danger of diminishing. He died 20th January 1779, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. As an actor Garrick occupies the first rank. At his coming the stage was given over to formality and tradition, but these disappeared before the naturalness of the new actor, who was equally at home in tragedy, comedy, or farce. He has been charged with meanness, vanity, and petty jealousy; but envy exaggerated his faults, which were more than balanced by his many excellent qualities. Garrick's forty dramatic pieces are of minor importance, but some of his numerous prologues and epilogues are excellent. He married in 1749 Eva Marie Violetti (1724-1822), a Catholic Venetian dancer. See Lives by P. Fitzgerald (1868), Knight (1894), Mrs Parsons (1906), and Hedgcock (1912).

Garrison, WILLIAM LLOYD, journalist and abolitionist, was born at Newburyport, Mass., December 10, 1805. He was apprenticed to the printer of the Newburyport Herald, and at seventeen began to write for it. In 1824 he became editor of the Herald, and in 1829 joint-editor of the Genius of Universal Emancipation, published in Baltimore. The vigorous expression of his anti-slavery views led to his imprisonment for libel; but friends paid his fine. He delivered emancipation lectures in New York and other places, and returning to Boston, in 1831 started the Liberator, a paper which he carried on until slavery was abolished in the United States. For the first few years he was constantly threatened with assassination and prosecution, and was even subjected to personal violence, but he persevered. In 1833, 1846, and 1848 he visited Great Britain, and on his first return organised the Anti-slavery Society, of which he was president. In 1865, after the total abolition of slavery, Garrison's friends presented him with 30,000 dollars. He died at New York, 24th May 1879. He published Sonnets and other Poems (1847). See Lives by his children (4 vols. 1885-89; new ed. 1893), Johnson (1881), Grimke (1891), and Goldwin Smith (1892).

Garrod, SIR ALFRED BARING (1819-1907), a London physician, a high authority on gout, was born at Ipswich, and knighted in 1887. —His eldest son, Professor ALFRED HENRY GARROD (1846-79), was an eminent zoologist. See memoir by Forbes in his Collected Papers (1881).

Garth, SIR SAMUEL, physician and poet, was born at Bowland Forest, Yorkshire, in 1661, studied at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and Leyden, graduated M.D. in 1691, and next year settled in London. In 1700 he did himself everlasting honour by providing burial in Westminster Abbey for the neglected Dryden. By George I. he was knighted and appointed physician in ordinary, and physician-general to the army. He died January 18, 1719. The Dispensary (1699) is a satire on the apothecaries and physicians who opposed giving medicine gratuitously to the sick poor. Claremont (1715) is a topographical poem.

Gascoigne, GEORGE (c. 1525-77), a minor Elizabethan poet, dramatist, critic, and novelist, was born at Cardington, Beds, fought in the Low Countries, and died at Stamford. His works have been edited by W. C. Hazlitt (1868-69) and Cunliffe (1907-10). See Life by Schelling (1893).

Gascoigne, SIR WILLIAM, born at Gawthorpe, Yorkshire, about 1350, was appointed in 1400 Chief-justice of the King's Bench. He was evidently an independent judge, as he refused to obey the king's command to sentence to death Archbishop Scrope and Mowbray, the Earl Marshal, after the northern insurrection in 1405. Nine days after Henry IV.'s death a successor was appointed to his office, which disposes of the Shakespearian fiction that Henry V. continued him in it. Gascoigne died in 1419. See chap. iii. of the Rev. A. J. Church's Henry V. (1889).

Gaskell, Mrs. novelist, was born at Cheyne Row, Chelsea, 29th September 1810. Her maiden name was Elizabeth Cleghorn Stevenson, and her father was in succession teacher, preacher, farmer, boarding-house keeper, writer, and Keeper of the Records to the Treasury. She was brought up by an aunt at Knutsford—the Cranford of her stories—and grew up a girl of singular sweetness of disposition and of great beauty. She married in 1832 William Gaskell (1805-84), a Unitarian minister in Manchester; here she studied working men and women. In 1848 she published anonymously Mary Barton, followed by The Moorland Cottage (1850), Cranford (1853), Ruth (1853), North and South (1855), Round the Sofa (1859), Right at Last (1860), Sylvia's Lovers (1863), Cousin Phillis (1865), and Wives and Daughters (1865). She died suddenly at Holybourne, Alton, in Hampshire, 12th November 1865, and was fittingly buried at Knutsford. Besides her novels she wrote The Life of Charlotte Brontë (1857)—a masterpiece of English biography.

Gasparin, VALÉRIE BOISSIER, COMTESSE DE (1813-94), was born at Geneva, and married Count Agénor de Gasparin (1810-71), a zealous advocate of religious liberty, born at Orange. Her works

Gassendi, or GASSEND, PIERRE, philosopher and mathematician, was born at Chartansier in Provence, 22d January 1592, and studied and taught at Aix, but revolted from the scholastic philosophy, and applied himself to physics and astronomy. His examination of the Aristotelian system appeared in Exercitationes paradoxice adversus Aristoteles (1624). In that year he was appointed provost of Digne cathedral; and in 1645 professor of Mathematics in the Collège Royal at Paris, where he died, 14th October 1655. He controverted Fludd the mystic (1631) and Descartes' new philosophy (1642); wrote on Epicurus (1647-49); gave in his Institutio Astronomica (1647) a clear view of the science in his day; and published Lives of Tycho Brahe, Copernicus, and Regiomontanus (1654). Collected editions of his works were published in 1658 and 1728. See works in French by Martin (1853) and Thomas (1889), and in German by Kieff (1893).

Gassner, JOHANN JOSEPH (1727-79), exorcist, was born in the Vorarlberg, and in 1758 became Catholic priest at Klösterle in the diocese of Coire. Gataker, THOMAS (1574-1654), Puritan divine, was born in London, studied at St John's College, Cambridge, and in 1611 became rector of Rotherhithe. Gates, HORATIO, American general, was born at Maldon, Essex, in 1728. He entered the English army, served in America under Braddock, escaped with difficulty in the defeat in which that officer was slain, and on the peace of 1763 purchased an estate in Virginia. In the war of independence he sided with his adoptive country, and in 1775 was made adjutant-general, in 1776 commander of the army which had just retreated from Canada. In August 1777 he took command of the northern department; and compelled the surrender of the British army at Saratoga in October. This success gained him a great reputation, and he sought to supplant Washington in the chief command. In 1780 he commanded the army of the South, but was routed by Cornwallis near Camden, S.C. Superseded and not acquitted by court-martial until 1782, he retired to Virginia till 1790, when he emancipated his slaves, and settled in New York. He died there, 10th April 1806.

Gatling, RICHARD JORDAN (1818-1903), born in Hertford county, North Carolina, studied medicine but never practised, and is known for various inventions, especially the Gatling gun (1861-62), a revolving battery gun, with ten parallel barrels, firing 1200 shots a minute.

Gauntlett, HENRY JOHN (1805-76), London organist and composer of chants, hymn-tunes, &c., was born at Wellington, Shropshire.

Gauss, JOHANN KARL FRIEDRICH (1777-1855), mathematician, born at Brunswick, in 1801 published an important work on the theory of numbers. In astronomy he invented new methods for the calculation of the orbits of planets, &c.; and, appointed in 1807 professor of Mathematics and director of the observatory at Göttingen, he issued his Theoria Motus Corporum Caelestium (1809). In 1821 he was appointed to conduct the trigonometrical survey of Hanover, and to measure an arc of the meridian, and for his work invented a heliograph. In 1833 appeared his Intensitas Vis Magneticae Terrestris; and in conjunction with Weber he invented the declination needle and a magnetometer. In applied mathematics he investigated the passage of light through a system of lenses in Dioptrische Untersuchungen (1840). See works by Waltershausen (1850) and Schering (1887). [Gowss.]

Gausson, FRANÇOIS LOUIS (1790-1863), Reformed theologian, was born and died at Geneva, having been pastor at Satigny near that city until his dismissal in 1831 by the State Council for his share in the Société Évangélique, founded to revive Calvinism. From 1836 till his retirement in 1857 he taught in a newly-founded evangelical college. His defence of plenary inspiration, La Théopneustie (1840), became popular in England and America, as also a work on the canon of Scripture (1860). [Goas-son.]

Gautier, THÉOPHILE, poet and novelist, was born at Tarbes, August 31, 1811. From painting he turned to literature, and became a 'romanticist' of extreme type. In 1830 he published his first long poem, Albertus; in 1832 the striking Comédie de la Mort. But his poetry reached its highest point in Émaux et Camées (1856). In 1835 appeared his celebrated novel, Mademoiselle de Maupin, with its defiant preface. He wrote many other novels and shorter stories—Les Jeunes-France (1833), Fortunio (1838), Une Larme du Diable (1839), Militona (1847), La Peau de Tigre (1852), Jettatura (1857), Le Capitaine Fracasse (1863), La Belle Jenny (1865), Spirite (1866), &c. Mèrimée alone contests with him the palm as the prince of writers of short stories. The first half of Gautier's theatrical criticisms were collected as L'Histoire de l'Art Dramatique en France (1859); his articles on the Salon form perhaps the best history of the French art of his day. His leisure he devoted to travel, of which he published characteristic accounts in his delightful Caprices et Zigzags, Constantinople, Voyage en Russie, et Voyage en Espagne. Gautier died at Neuilly, October 23, 1872. Other works were an enlarged edition of his Émaux et Camées (1872); Les Grottesques (1844), on the writers of the 16th and 17th centuries; Honoré de Balzac (1858); Ménagerie Intime (1869), a kind of informal autobiography; Histoire du Romantisme (1872); and the posthumous works, Portraits et Souvenirs Littéraires (1875), and L'Orient (1877). See works by Feydeau (1874), Bergerat (1878), Henry James (1878), and Maxime du Camp (1890; Eng. trans. 1893). [Goat-yay.]

Gavarni, PAUL (1801-66), whose proper name was Sulpice Guillaume Chevalier, was born at Paris, and from an engineering draughtsman became a caricaturist for Les Gens du Monde and Le Charivari. At first he ridiculed the follies of the Parisians with good-humoured irony; but later a deep earnestness showed itself in his productions. After a visit to London in 1849, he reproduced in L'Illustration the scenes of degradation he had there witnessed. Gavarni illustrated several books, notably Sue's Juif Errant, Balzac's works, and the French translation of Hoffmann's tales. A collection of his drawings, Œuvres Choiesies, appeared in 1845-48, with text by Janin, Gautier, Balzac, and others. A second collection, Perles et Parures, appeared in 1850. See studies by Duplessis (1876), Goncourt (1879), and Fergues (1887). [Ga-vat-nee.]

Gavazzi, ALESSANDRO (1809-89), born at Bologna, became a monk of the Barnabite order, and was appointed professor of Rhetoric at Naples. On the accession of Pius IX. Gavazzi supported the liberal policy that inaugurated his reign; he laboured in Rome to spread political enlightenment, and was made chaplain to a body of papal troops. On the establishment of the republic at Rome, he was appointed almoner-in-chief to the national army; on the fall of Rome he escaped to England, where and in America he preached and lectured as a strenuous anti-papal advocate and in aid of the (Protestant) Italian Free Church. He was present with Garibaldi at Palermo in 1860, and from 1870 lived mostly in Italy, dying at Rome. [Ga-vat'-zee.]

Gaveston, PIERS DE. See EDWARD II.

Gay, JOHN, born at Barnstaple in 1685, was apprenticed to a London silk-mercator, but soon took to letters for a livelihood. In 1708 he published his first poem, Wine, and in 1711 a pamphlet on the Present State of Wit. Appointed secretary to the Duchess of Monmouth (1712), he in 1713 dedicated to Pope the georgic, Rural Sports. In 1714 he published The Fan and The Shepherd's Week, and accompanied Lord Clarendon, envoy to Hanover, as secretary. At Anne's death he wrote a poem on the newly-arrived Princess of Wales. What d'ye Call It? (1715) was called 'a tragi-comi-pastoral farce.' Trivia, a clever picture of town life, came next; and later he bore the blame of Three Hours after Marriage (1717), a play in which Pope and Arbuthnot had the larger part. In 1720 he published his poems by subscription, clearing £1000; but this and some South Sea stock vanished in the crash of 1720. In 1724 he produced The Captives, a tragedy, and in 1727 the first series of his popular Fables. But his greatest success was The Beggar's Opera (1728), the outcome of a suggestion made by Swift in 1716. Its popularity was extraordinary; it ran sixty-two nights, and by the thirty-sixth Gay had netted over £700; forthwith he set about a sequel, Polly, which was prohibited, but which in book form brought in £1200. After this he lived chiefly with the Duke and Duchess of Queensberry, the kindest of his many patrons. In 1732 he came from their house at Amesbury in Wiltshire to London, probably about his opera Achilles (produced posthumously in 1733), and here died suddenly, 4th December 1732. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Amiable, indolent, and luxurious, Gay was a charming song-writer, though his poetical reputation has not been maintained; 'Black-eyed Susan' was but one of his many productions. See John Underhill's edition of his Poetical Works (2 vols. 1893).

Gayangos, PASCUAL DE (1809-97), Arabic scholar and archivist, born at Seville, died in London.

Gay-Lussac, JOSEPH LOUIS, chemist and physicist, was born 6th December 1778 at St Leonard in Haute Vienne. From the Polytechnic School he passed in 1801 to the department of Ponts et Chaussées, and began a series of researches on vapour, temperature, and terrestrial magnetism. In 1808 he made the important discovery of the law of volumes; in 1809 became professor of Chemistry at the Polytechnic, and from 1832 in the Jardin des Plantes. He was the first to form synthetically the hydriodic and iodic acids; and in 1815 he succeeded in isolating cyanogen. His investigations on sulphuric acid, the manufacture of the bleaching chlorides, the centesimal alcoholometer, and the assaying of silver are also important. In 1818 he became superintendent of the government manufactory of gunpowder, and in 1829 chief assayer to the mint. In 1839 he was made a peer of France. He died 9th May 1850. His works include L'Analyse de l'Air Atmosphérique (1804), Cours de Physique (1827), and Leçons de Chimie (1828). [Gay-Lees-sak'.]

Gaza, THEODORUS (1398-1478), one of the earliest to revive Greek learning in the West, was born at Thessalonica, fled about 1444 before the Turks to Italy, and became teacher of Greek at Ferrara, next of philosophy at Rome. Cardinal Bessarion obtained for him a small benefice in Calabria. His principal work was a Greek grammar (1495). He translated into Latin portions of Aristotle, Theophrastus, St Chrysostom, Hippocrates, and other Greek writers.

Ged, WILLIAM (1690-1749), an Edinburgh goldsmith, the inventor, about 1725, of stereotyping. He entered into partnership with a London typefounder, and was commissioned by Cambridge University to stereotype prayer-books and bibles, but owing to unfair treatment by his partner and the jealousy of the workmen was compelled to abandon the enterprise and return to Edinburgh (1733). His most noteworthy production after his return was a stereotyped edition of Sallust (1739). See Memoir by Nichols (1781).

Geddes, ALEXANDER, LL.D. (1737-1802), was born in Rathven parish, Banffshire, of Roman Catholic parentage, and was educated for a priest at Paris (1758-64). In 1769 he took a cure of souls at Auchinhalrig in Banffshire, where his sympathy with the Protestants around him led to his dismissal (1780). He went to London, and, by Lord Petre's help, carried on a new translation of the Bible for the use of English Catholics (3 vols. 1792-1800)—a work that offended Catholics and Protestants alike by its thorough-going Rationalism. His poems, even Bardomachia, are clean forgotten. See Life by Dr Mason Good (1803).—His brother JOHN (1735-99), from 1779 was a bishop at Edinburgh. [Ged'-des; g hard.]

Geddes, ANDREW (1783-1844), painter, was born at Edinburgh, but studied and lived mostly in London. The 'Draught-players' (1810), the 'Discovery of the Scottish Regalia' (1821), and 'Christ and the Woman of Samaria' are esteemed his best pictures, though he also excelled in portraiture and etching. In 1831 he was elected A.R.A.

Geddes, JENNY, a vegetable-seller who is said to have hurled her folding-stool, with oburgations, at the head of Dean Hanna when he began the collect in St Giles's Kirk at Edinburgh on Sunday, 23d July 1637. For this famous exploit there is no evidence beyond an early and persistent tradition. Sydsfer in 1661 mentions 'the immortal Jenet Geddes' as having burned 'her leather chair of state' in a Restoration bonfire, and the story appears in full detail in Phillips' continuation of Baker's Chronicle (1660). Her name is also given as Mein and Hamilton. See Dr Lees' St Giles', Edinburgh (1889).

Geddes, PATRICK, biologist, was born at Perth, 2d Oct. 1854, and educated at the Normal School of Science, London, and at several foreign universities; in 1883 he became professor of Botany at Dundee. His aim is to moralise evolution and carry principles from biology into history and sociology. Besides important articles in the encyclopædias and journals, he has written Chapters in Modern Botany and (with J. A. Thomson) The Evolution of Sex; and he is identified with vast schemes of housebuilding in Edinburgh, and of social, academic, and economic reform.

He made many translations from the Greek poets, and in 1840 published his own Gedichte (120th ed. 1893). Other works were translations of Spanish songs and romances, the tragedies of Brunchild (1857) and Sophonisbe (1868), and another volume of poems (1864). See Lives by Gaedertz (1886) and Litzmann (1887).

Geiger, ABRAHAM (1810-74), Jewish scholar, was born at Frankfurt-on-Main, studied at Heidelberg and Bonn, and was rabbi successively at Wiesbaden, Breslau, Frankfurt, and Berlin. He wrote on biblical criticism (offending the most conservative Jews), and edited a theological magazine; but his principal work is Das Judenthum und seine Geschichte (1864-65). Gelasius I., an African by birth, became pope in 492, and was one of the earliest bishops of Rome to assert the supremacy of the papal chair. He repressed Pelagianism, renewed the ban against the oriental patriarch, drove out the Manicheans from Rome, wrote against the Eutychians and Nestorians, and died in 496.—GELASIUS II., formerly John of Gaeta, was cardinal and chancellor under Urban II. and Paschal II., and on the death of the latter in 1118 was chosen pope by the party hostile to the Emperor Henry V. Gelasius fled before the advancing imperialists to Gaeta, and excommunicated Henry and Gregory VIII., the antipope he had set up. Shortly after he was able to return to Rome, but in the same autumn had to flee to France, where he died at the monastery of Cluny, 29th January 1119.

He died at Naples.

Gellert, CHRISTIAN FÜRCHTGGOTT (1715-69), poet and moralist, born at Hainichen, Saxony, was educated at Leipzig, and in 1751 became a professor there. He revolted against current pedantry, and thus pioneered the way for Goethe and Schiller. His writings, fables, tales, hymns,

&c., were collected in 10 vols. (1774; new ed. 1867). See Life by Döring (1833). [Gellert; g hard.]

Gellius, AULUS, a 2d century Latin author, supposed to have been born at Rome, and to have practised law there, after studying philosophy at Athens. His Noctes Atticæ is a medley on language, antiquities, history, and literature, in 20 books, of which the 8th is wanting. It contains many extracts from lost Greek and Latin authors. The best edition is by Hertz (1883-85).

Geneviève, St (c. 424-512), the patroness of Paris, was born at Nanterre near Paris, and taking the veil, acquired an extraordinary reputation for sanctity, increased by her assurance that Attila and his Huns would not touch Paris, and by an expedition for the relief of the starving city during Childeric's Frankish invasion. In 460 she built a church over the tomb of St Denis, where she herself was buried. See Lives by Lefevue (2d ed. 1861) and Vidieu (1883). [Zhayn-v'yehv.]

Genga, GIROLAMO (c. 1476-1551), architect and religious painter, was born and died at Urbino.—His son, BARTOLOMEO (1518-58), born at Cesena, was a sculptor and engineer as well.

Genghis Khan, Mongol conqueror, was born in 1162, a little to the SE. of Lake Baikal, the son of a Mongol chief. Called at thirteen to succeed his father, he had to struggle hard for years against hostile tribes. His ambition awakening with his continued success, he spent six years in subjugating the Naimans, between Lake Balkhash and the Irish, and in conquering Tangut, south of the Desert of Gobi. From the Turkish Uigurs, who voluntarily submitted, the Mongols derived their civilisation, alphabet, and laws. In 1206 he dropped his name Temujin for that of Genghis (Jingis or Chingis) Khan, 'Very Mighty Ruler;' in 1211 overran the empire of North China; and in 1217 conquered and annexed the Kara-Chitai empire from Lake Balkhash to Tibet. In 1218 he attacked the powerful empire of Kharezm, bounded by the Jaxartes, Indus, Persian Gulf, and Caspian; took Bokhara, Samarkand, Kharezm (now Khiva), and other chief cities; and returned home in 1225. Two of Genghis' lieutenants penetrated northwards from the southern shore of the Caspian through Georgia into southern Russia and the Crimea, everywhere routing and slaying, and returned by way of the Volga. Meanwhile in the far east another of his generals had completed the conquest of all northern China (1217-23) except Honan. After a few months' rest Genghis set out to chastise the king of Tangut; and, after thoroughly subduing the country, died on 18th August 1227. Genghis was not only a warrior and conqueror, but a skillful administrator and ruler; he not only conquered empires stretching from the Black Sea to the Pacific, but organised them into states which outlasted the short span that usually measures the life of Asiatic sovereignties. See Howarth's History of the Mongols (1876) and R. K. Douglas's Life of Jenghiz Khan (1877).

Genlis, STÉPHANIE FÉLICITÉ DUCREST DE ST AUBIN, COMTESSE DE, was born at Champceri near Autun, 25th January 1746, at sixteen was married to the Comte de Genlis, and in 1770 was made lady-in-waiting to the Duchesse de Chartres, to whose husband, Orleans 'Égalité,' she became mistress, and to their children 'governor.' Madame de Genlis wrote many works for her pupils, including Théâtre d'Éducation (1779-80), a collection of short comedies; Annales de la Vertu (1781); Adèle et Théodore, ou Lettres sur l'Éducation (1782); and Les Veillées du Château (1784). At the Revolution she took the liberal side, but was ultimately compelled to seek refuge (1793) in Switzerland and Germany. When Bonaparte became consul she returned (1799) to Paris, and received a pension. She died 31st December 1830. Among her ninety volumes are the romance Mlle. de Clermont (1802), Mémoires Inédits sur le XVIII. Siècle et la Révolution Française (1825), and Diners du Baron d'Holbach. See books by Bonhomme (1885) and Harmand (1912), and Austin Dobson's Four Frenchwomen (1890). [Zhon^d-lees.]

Genserik, or GAISERIC, king of the Vandals, was an illegitimate son of Godigisel, who led the Vandals in their invasion of Gaul; in 427 he succeeded his half-brother Gunderic. Invited by Bonifacius, Count of Africa, Genserik crossed over from Spain to Numidia in 429, captured and sacked Hippo (430), seized Carthage (439), and made it the capital of his new dominions. He quickly built up a formidable maritime power, and his fleets carried the terror of his name as far as the Peloponnesus. A bigoted Arian, he persecuted orthodox Catholics with ferocious cruelty. Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian III., eager for revenge upon her husband's murderer Maximus, invited Genserik to Rome. The Vandal fleet sailed for the Tiber; the city was taken (455), and given up to a fourteen days' sack. On leaving Genserik carried off with him the empress and her two daughters, one of whom became the wife of his son Huneric. The empire in 457 and 468 sent out fleets against the Vandals to avenge the indignities it had suffered, both of which were defeated. Genserik died in 477, in the possession of all his conquests, the greatest of the Vandal kings.

Gentile da Fabriano. See FABRIANO.

Gentileschi, ORAZIO (1563-1647), painter, like his daughter ARTEMISIA (1590-c. 1642), was born at Pisa, and settled in England in 1626.

Gentili, ALBERICO (1552-1608), a voluminous writer on international law, politics, &c., was born at Sangenesio in the March of Ancona, and, exiled as a heretic, in 1580 settled in England.

Gentz, FRIEDRICH VON (1764-1832), born at Breslau, in 1786 entered the public service of Prussia, but in 1802 exchanged into that of Austria; he wrote bitterly against Napoleon. An adherent from 1810 of Metternich, at the Congress of Vienna in 1814 he was first secretary, as also in subsequent conferences. His writings are distinguished for elegance, but his pen was on sale to the highest bidder; and he drew the supplies for his lavish private expenditure from more than one foreign government. See Lives by Schmidt-Weissenfels (1859), Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (1867), and Fournier (1880). [g hard.] Gentz, WILHELM (1822-90), painter of Oriental subjects, born at Neuruppin, died at Berlin.

Geoffrey of Monmouth (c. 1100-54), chronicler, about 1140 became Archdeacon of Llandaff, and was consecrated Bishop of St Asaph in 1152. His Chronicon sive Historia Britonum, composed previous to 1147, possesses little value as history, but has profoundly influenced English literature. Its author professes to have merely translated from a Welsh History of the Kings of Britain, found in Brittany, but the Historia is really a masterpiece of the creative imagination working on materials found in Gildas, Nennius, and other chroniclers, as well as early legends. It was translated into Norman-French by Geoffrey Gaimar in 1154, and by Wace (Li Romans de Brut) with new matter about 1150. Layamon's Brut (c. 1205) was an English paraphrase of Wace, and Robert of Gloucester's Chronicle was a rhymed paraphrase of the same, which helped to make Geoffrey's legends widely known. The stories of King Lear and Cymbeline, the prophecies of Merlin, and the legend of Arthur in the form we know, owe their origin to Geoffrey of Monmouth, who still influences us in Malory, Drayton, Shakespeare, Spenser, Milton, Tennyson, Swinburne, and Morris. A Yorkshire monk, William of Newburgh, denounced Geoffrey in his own time as having 'lied saucily and shamelessly,' and Giraldus Cambrensis distinctly speaks of the book as fabulous. Geoffrey's Chronicle was first printed in 1508. An English translation by Aaron Thompson appeared in 1718 and in 1848, and one by Sebastian Evans in 1903.

Geoffrin, MARIE THÉRÈSE, née RODET (1699-1777), born in Paris, was married at fifteen to a rich citizen, who died soon after, leaving her an immense fortune. She had a genuine love of learning and art, and her salon became a rendezvous of the men of letters and artists of Paris, especially the philosophes. Towards the publication of the Encyclopédie she contributed over 100,000 francs. See book by J. Aldis (1906).

Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire, ÉTIENNE, born at Étampes, 15th April 1772, in 1793 became professor of Zoology in the Museum of Natural History at Paris, and began the great zoological collection at the Jardin des Plantes. In 1798 he formed one of the scientific commission that accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt; in 1807 was made a member of the Academy of Sciences; in 1809 was appointed professor of Zoology in the Faculty of Sciences. He died 19th June 1844. He endeavoured to establish the unity of plan in organic structure; and he raised teratology to a science, principally in his Philosophie Anatomique (1818-20). He also wrote L'Histoire Naturelle des Mammifères (1820-42) with F. Cuvier; Philosophie Zoologique (1830); and Études Progressives d'un Naturaliste (1835). See Life (1847) by his son Isidore; also De Quatrefages's Rambles of a Naturalist (1863), and Ducrotay de Blainville's Cuvier et Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire (1890).—His son ISIDORE, born in Paris, 16th December 1805, became assistant-naturalist at the zoological museum in 1824, and professor of Zoology in the Faculty of Sciences in 1850. He too made a special study of teratology, publishing in 1832-37 a work on monstrous forms. The results of his investigations on the domestication of foreign animals in France appeared in Domestication et Naturalisation des Animaux Utiles (1854). In 1852 he published the first volume of a Histoire Générale des Règnes Organiques, but died 10th November 1861, before completing the third volume. He was a strong advocate of the use of horse-flesh as human food.

George, Sr., according to the Acta Sanctorum, was nobly born in Cappadocia, became a distinguished soldier, and was tortured and put to death by Diocletian at Nicomedia, April 23, 303. By many writers, as by Gibbon, he has been confounded with the turbulent Arian, George of Cappadocia, who after a troubled life as army contractor and tax-gatherer became Archbishop of Alexandria, and five years later was torn in pieces by a furious mob. The St George of the Eastern Church was no doubt a real personage of an earlier date than George of Cappadocia, but beyond this nothing is known of him, and his name was early obscured by fable. The famous story of his fight with the dragon is first found in Voragine's Legenda Aurea. The Crusades gave a great impetus to his cultus; many chivalrous orders assumed him as their patron; and he was adopted as tutelary saint by England, Aragon, and Portugal. In 1348 Edward III. founded St George's Chapel, Windsor, and in 1344 the Order of the Garter was instituted.

George I. was born at Hanover, 28th March 1660. He was the eldest son of Ernest Augustus of Hanover, and of Sophia, fifth (but only Protestant) daughter of Elizabeth (q.v.) of Bohemia, so a great-grandson of James I. of England; and on Queen Anne's death, 1st August 1714, he was proclaimed, according to the Act of Settlement, King of Great Britain and Ireland. He had been Elector of Hanover since 1698, and had commanded the imperial forces in the Marlborough wars. In 1682 he married his cousin, the Princess Dorothea of Zell. Twelve years later he obtained a divorce on the ground of her intrigue with Count Königsmark (q.v.), and imprisoned her in the castle of Ahlden, where she died 2d November 1726. But while punishing his consort for her frailty, he himself lived openly with mistresses. George was supported by the Whigs, and openly partial to them, while he hated the Tories and Jacobites, who clung to the banished House of Stewart. Bolingbroke and the Duke of Ormond, flying to France, were impeached, with Oxford, who had stayed behind. In Scotland a Jacobite rising, headed by the Earl of Mar, took place in 1715; the battle of Sheriffmuir on 13th November, though indecisive, dispirited the rebels, who afterwards dispersed. Another body marched into England, but at Preston laid down their arms; of these Lords Derwentwater and Kenmore were executed. In 1716 parliament passed the Septennial Act, to postpone by four years the accession of the Tories to power. The failure of the South Sea Company in 1720 brought the nation to the verge of anarchy, from which it was saved by Walpole's genius. A quarrel with Spain in 1726 led to an unsuccessful expedition against her American possessions, and a fruitless attempt on Gibraltar by the Spaniards. George took little part in the government of the country, the actual ruler being Sir Robert Walpole. His affections remained with Hanover, and it was his delight to live there as much as possible. He died suddenly at Osnabrück, on his way thither, 10th June 1727. Lady Wortley Montagu styles George I. 'an honest blockhead'; Carlyle, on the other hand, thinks him, in spite of appearances, a man of more human faculty, 'chiefly of an inarticulate kind,' than he generally gets credit for. He was a useful figure-head in a constitutional government, and rendered greater service than he may have intended to the country which adopted him. See the Histories of England by Stanhope, Hallam, and Lecky; the Stuart Papers; Cox's Life of Walpole; Lord Morley's Walpole (1889); and Justin MacCarthy's History of the Four Georges (vol. i. 1884).

George II., born 10th November 1683, succeeded his father as Elector of Hanover and King of Great Britain and Ireland in 1727, having been declared Prince of Wales in 1714. In 1705 he had married Caroline of Anspach (1683-1737). Though George interfered more in the government of the country than his father had done, the policy pursued during the first half of the reign was that of Walpole. In 1737 a quarrel with Spain resulted in the capture of Portobelo by Admiral Vernon, and the loss of 20,000 men in an attempt on Cartagena. In 1742 Britain was drawn into the war of the Austrian succession, principally on account of the supposed danger to George's Hanoverian possessions. On 16th June 1743 the British and Hanoverians gained the battle of Dettingen, at which George was present, the last occasion on which a British sovereign commanded an army in the field. In May 1745 the Duke of Cumberland, the king's second son, was defeated at Fontenoy by the French under Marshal Saxe. After nine years of warfare, in which neither country gained any substantial advantage, peace was concluded at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. Meanwhile in 1745-46 Prince Charles Edward (see STEWART) had landed in Scotland, and after some transient successes been utterly defeated by Cumberland at Culloden. Although a nominal peace existed at home between France and Britain, in India Clive gained various victories over the French, culminating in that of Plassey in 1757, which laid the foundation of our Indian empire. In the same year Britain joined Prussia in the 'Seven Years' War,' in order to protect Hanover. She suffered reverses on the Continent; but the brilliant capture of Quebec by General Wolfe in September 1759 resulted in Canada becoming a British possession. George II. died suddenly at Kensington, 25th October 1760. He had no conspicuous virtues, and his worst vice was that common to his father, a propensity for mistresses. Britain advanced under his reign, the earlier years of it, according to Hallam, 'the most prosperous period that England had ever known.' See the Histories of England by Stanhope and Lecky; Memoirs of the Reign of George II., by Hervey; Dodington's Diary; Horace Walpole's Memoirs of the last Ten Years of George II.; and MacCarthy's History of the Four Georges (vols. i.-ii. 1884-90).

George III. was the eldest son of Frederick Lewis, Prince of Wales (1707-51), and was born in London, 4th June 1738. His father having predeceased him, he in 1760 succeeded his grandfather, George II., as King of Great Britain and Ireland and Elector of Hanover (King from 1815). He was the first of the House of Brunswick who commanded general respect on becoming sovereign, and at the outset he conciliated all classes of his subjects. On 8th September 1761 he married Charlotte Sophia (q.v.), Princess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. Four or five years before he is said to have had a daughter by Hannah Lightfoot, a Quakeress, and to have married her; it is less open to doubt that, after ascending the throne, he wished to marry Lady Sarah Lennox. Eager to govern as well as reign, George felt certain that his own way was the right one, and that were it followed all would go well; hence friction soon arose between him and his people. Pitt was the popular idol; but the king disliked Pitt and his policy, and the Earl of Bute became prime-minister in May 1762 in the place of the Duke of Newcastle. If Bute had been a strong man he might have justified his promotion, but, timid and incompetent, he succumbed in April 1763 to the clamour evoked by the unpopular treaty of peace with France and Spain. During the two years' administration of Grenville, his successor, the first attempt to tax the American colonies was made. The repeal of the obnoxious Stamp Act, but accompanied by a declaration of the right of Great Britain to tax the colonists, took place during the premiership of Rockingham, who held office for eleven months. The Earl of Chatham, who followed him, held office for fourteen months, and the Duke of Grafton for three years. In Lord North George III. found a minister after his own heart, and North remained at the head of the government from 1770 till 1782. During his administration the American colonies, exasperated at renewed attempts at taxation, proclaimed (4th July 1776) and achieved their independence, the treaty of peace with Great Britain being signed in February 1783. The determination of the king not to grant any concessions to those whom he deemed rebels caused the struggle to be much protracted. Lord North was succeeded by Rockingham, who died after three months in office. Among his colleagues were Fox, Burke, and Sheridan, whom George detested, and who, when Lord Shelburne took Rockingham's place, refused to serve with him; but he secured William Pitt as Chancellor of the Exchequer. The friends of Fox and the followers of Lord North overthrew Shelburne in ten months; and the Duke of Portland's coalition ministry lasted only eight months (1783). In the interval the king compelled his ministers to resign, called Pitt to office in December 1783, and dissolved parliament. Pitt remained in office for eighteen years. The complete victory of his party at the general election in 1784 was a triumph for the king as much as for Pitt; there was now an end to the supremacy of the old Whig families. The Tory party had been consolidated and was prepared to give effect to the policy of George III. The struggle had been long and severe. John Wilkes had taken part in it; and 'Junius' had denounced the ministers whom the king trusted. Popular feeling ran high against the sovereign for a time, yet he gradually regained the affections of his subjects. When the union between Ireland and Great Britain was proposed George III. wrote to Pitt characterising it as one of the most useful measures of his reign; but when the union was effected (1st January 1801), and Pitt proposed carrying out his pledges as to Catholic emancipation, the king refused his assent. Pitt resigned; the king rejected his advice to form a strong administration, including Fox, and entrusted Addington with the task of forming a ministry, which held office till war with France was renewed. Pitt then resumed office, but died in 1806. A ministry was formed in which Fox and Sidmouth held office, and of which Lord Grenville was the head; it was reconstituted after Fox's death, and was succeeded in 1807 by one under the Duke of Portland. In 1809 Perceval succeeded to the premiership. In 1810 the Princess Amelia, George's favourite child, fell dangerously ill; this preyed on the king's mind, and hastened an attack of mental derangement, not the first he had had. In 1810 the Prince of Wales was appointed regent; and till his death, on 29th January 1820, George was hopelessly insane; also he lost his sight. Though hardly a drop of English blood ran in his veins, yet George III. was a typical Englishman. He was well-meaning and intensely patriotic; he was truly pious and a pattern of the domestic virtues. During his reign were fought decisive battles in America, India, and Europe, and many grand conquests were achieved. Great statesmen, such as Chatham, Pitt, and Fox, adorned it; great captains, such as Nelson and Wellington; and the greatest names in modern English literature—Johnson, Gibbon, Burns, Cowper, Crabbe, Scott, Byron, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, Shelley, and Keats. When George III. ascended the throne the national debt was £138,000,000 sterling; before his death it was upwards of £800,000,000. On the other hand, trade and commerce made gigantic strides. At his accession the exports did not exceed £12,000,000, at his death they were upwards of £50,000,000; while the imports rose from £8,000,000 to £36,000,000. See the Histories of England by Stanhope, Massey, Martineau, and Lecky; the Memoirs and Letters of H. Walpole; the Grenville Papers; the Chatham, Rockingham, Bedford, Auckland, and Malmesbury Correspondence; the Letters to Lord North; Burke's Works; Junius; The Opposition under George III., by Fraser Rae; and works by Trevelyan (1880-1912).

George IV., the eldest son of George III., was born 12th August 1762. Owing to his father's derangement, he became Prince Regent in 1810, and he succeeded in 1820. Till nineteen the prince had been kept under strict discipline, against which he sometimes rebelled. At eighteen he had an intrigue with Mrs Robinson, an actress; and at twenty he went through the ceremony of marriage with Mrs Fitzherbert (q.v.), a Roman Catholic, thus forfeiting his title to the crown. Out of antagonism to his father he affected to be a Whig, and much of the king's aversion to Fox, Burke, and Sheridan was due to their associating with and advising the Prince of Wales. In 1795 he married Princess Caroline (q.v.) of Brunswick, parliament agreeing to pay his debts, £650,000. After becoming king he endeavoured to get a divorce from his wife, who was not more guilty than himself of conjugal crimes; but her death on 7th August 1821 terminated a struggle and scandal in which the people sympathised with the queen. In 1821 George IV. visited Ireland and Hanover; and in 1822 Scotland, where a magnificent reception was organised by Sir Walter Scott. Though a professed Whig when Prince of Wales, George IV. governed as his father had done by the aid of the Tories. Spencer Perceval, Lord Liverpool, Canning, Viscount Goderich, and the Duke of Wellington successively held office while he was regent and king. The movement for reform which began in the reign of George III. was opposed, with the king's concurrence, by the advisers of George IV. He followed his father in withstanding Catholic emancipation, but in 1829 withdrew his opposition, when Wellington declared that the measure was imperative. He had been an undutiful son, a bad husband, and a callous father; his failings and vices were not redeemed by his taste for music. When he died, on 5th June 1830, he was least regretted by those who knew him best. See Lives by Huish (1830) and Percy Fitzgerald (1881); and Justin M'Carthy's Four Georges (1901).

George V. (b. 3d June 1865) succeeded his father, Edward VII., in May 1910. He had married, in 1893, Princess Victoria-Mary of Teck (Queen Mary), had served in the navy, travelled in many parts of the Empire, and in 1901 had been created Prince of Wales. At his accession he had five sons and one daughter.

George V., King of Hanover, born at Berlin, 27th May 1819, succeeded his father, Ernest Augustus in 1851. Blind from 1833, he struggled for fifteen years against the people in defence of absolutism. In 1866 Hanover sided with Austria and was consequently annexed by Prussia. King George died an exile in Paris, 12th June 1878; and his son, ERNEST AUGUSTUS (born 21st September 1845), Duke of Cumberland, still maintains his claim to the Hanoverian throne. See German works by Klepp (1878), Theodor (1878), and Meding (1881-84).

George, HENRY, born in Philadelphia, Sept. 2, 1839, went to sea, and in 1858 arrived in California, where he became a printer and married. He conducted several papers, and took an active part in public questions. In 1870 he published Our Land and Land Policy, in 1879 Progress and Poverty, an inquiry into the cause of industrial depressions, and of the increase of want with increase of wealth. His fundamental remedy for poverty was the appropriation of economic rent to public uses by a tax levied on the value of land exclusive of improvements, and the abolition of all taxes which fall upon industry and thrift. Other works were The Irish Land Question (1881), Social Problems (1882), Protection and Free Trade (1886), The Condition of Labour (1891), and A Perplexed Philosopher (Herbert Spencer, 1893). He visited and lectured in Great Britain and Ireland 1881-89, and in 1887 started the New York weekly Standard. He died suddenly at New York, 29th Oct. 1897, whilst candidating for the mayoralty.

Gerard, ALEXANDER, D.D. (1728-95), an Aberdeen professor, born at Chapel of Garioch manse, who wrote on taste, and influenced Kant, Schiller, &c.—His son, GILBERT, D.D. (1700-1815), succeeded him in the chair of Divinity; and three of his sons were Himalayan explorers—CAPT. ALEXANDER (1792-1839), CAPT. PATRICK (1794-1848), and JAMES, M.D. (1795-1848).—His great-granddaughter, EMILY D. GERARD (1849-1905), born at Rochsoles, Airdrie, married the Hungarian Gen. de Laszowski. In 1879 she took to authorship with her sister DOROTHEA (b. 1855; married 1886 the Austrian Field-Marshal Longard de Longarde). Jointly or singly they wrote Keats, Beggar my Neighbour, Waters of Hercules, Miss Providence, Land beyond the Forest, Lady Baby, &c.

Gérard, ÉTIENNE MAURICE, COMTE (1773-1852), Marshal of France, born at Damvilliers, served on the Rhine, in Italy, La Vendée, Germany, and Spain. For his services at Austerlitz (1805) he was appointed general of brigade. He fought at Jena, Erfurt, and Wagram, in the Russian campaign, and at Ligny and Wavre, in 1817 returned to France after the second restoration, in 1831 drove the Dutch out of Flanders, and in 1832 compelled Antwerp to capitulate. Under Louis Philippe he became marshal, and was twice war-minister. [Zhay-rahr.]

Gérard, FRANÇOIS PASCAL (1770-1837), painter, was born at Roe, but brought up in Paris. In 1795 he exhibited 'Belisarius'; and, painting almost all the royal and other celebrities who were in Paris from 1799, became known as the 'painter of kings.' Famous portraits were those of Napoleon, Talleyrand, Talma, and Mme. Récamier; famous paintings, the 'Battle of Austerlitz'

(1810) and 'Entry of Henry IV. into Paris' (1814). Gérard was made court painter and baron by Louis XVIII. See books by Adam (1852-57) and H. Gérard (1867).

Gerard, JOHN (1545-1612), herbalist, was born at Nantwich. He kept Lord Burghley's gardens for over twenty years, practised as a barber-surgeon, and became master of the company in 1607. His Herball (1597) was mainly based upon Dodoens' Pemptades (1583).

Gerhardt, KARL FRIEDRICH (1816-56), chemist, born at Strasburg, studied chemistry at Leipzig and Giessen, and in 1838 settled in Paris. Between 1849 and 1855 he published his views of series and the theory of types with which his name is associated. In 1855 he became professor of Chemistry at Strasburg. All his ideas and his discoveries are embodied in his Traité de Chimie Organique (1853-56). [Ger-hart; g hard.]

Gerhardt, PAUL (1607-76), Lutheran hymn-writer, born at Gräfenhainichen in Saxony, became assistant pastor at St Nicholas in Berlin in 1657, but for opposing the elector's attempted union of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches was banished in 1666. From 1669 he was pastor of Lübben. He wrote 123 hymns. 'Commit thou all thy ways' is well known in England from Wesley's translation; and other exquisitely tender hymns are 'Nun ruhen alle Wälder' (Now all the woods are sleeping) and 'O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden' (O wounded head and bleeding).

Géricault, THÉODORE (1791-1824), military painter and lithographer, with Delacroix the first Romanticist in art, was born at Rouen, and died in Paris. See monograph by Clément (3d ed. 1879).

Germanicus Cæsar was the son of Nero Claudius Drusus, and of Antonia, daughter of Mark Antony and niece of Augustus. He was born 15 B.C., and accompanied Tiberius in the war against the Pannonians, Dalmatians, and Germans. In 12 A.D. he was consul, in 13 was appointed to the command of the eight legions on the Rhine, and in 14 quelled a great mutiny. Next year he marched to meet Arminius (q.v.), whom at length he overthrew in two desperate battles. Tiberius, jealous of his popularity, recalled him in 17, and sent him to the East, at the same time appointing as viceroy of Syria, in order secretly to counteract him, the envious Calpurnius Piso. Germanicus died at Epidaphne near Antioch, 9th October 19, probably of poison. His wife, Agrippina, and two of her sons were put to death; the third son, Caligula, was spared to be emperor. A daughter, Agrippina, became as remarkable for her vices as her mother had been for her virtues.

Germanus, ST, Bishop of Auxerre, was invited over to Britain to combat Pelagianism in 429. Under him the Christian Britons won the bloodless 'Alleluia Victory' over the Picts and Saxons at Maes Garmon (Germanus' field) in Flintshire.

Gérôme, LÉON (1824-1904), historical genre-painter, was born at Vesoul. He began to exhibit in 1847; and in 1863 he became professor of Painting in the School of Fine Arts. His first great picture was 'The Age of Augustus' (1855); and his 'Roman Gladiators in the Amphitheatre' (1859) and 'Phryne before her Judges' (1861) raised his reputation to the highest pitch. [Zhay-róm.]

Gerontius, (1) a Roman general of British birth who rebelled against the usurper Constantine and made Maximus emperor; but, worsted by Honorius, took his own life (413 A.D.); (2) a deacon at Milan under Ambrose, who had a wondrous—and singularly unedifying—dream, but instead of doing penance as commanded, went to Constantinople, won favour at court, and was made bishop of Nicomedia, but was deposed by Chrysostom (399 A.D.) spite of popular favour. Newman's Dream of Gerontius, musically wrought out by Elgar, refers to no historical person, but (with the etymological sense of Senex) to an aged Christian on the verge of death, enabled by vision to see beyond the veil.

Gerrald, JOSEPH (1763–96), born in St Christopher, in 1794 was tried at Edinburgh for sedition, and transported to Sydney, where he died.

Gerry, ELBRIDGE (1744–1814), vice-president of the U.S., born in Marblehead, Mass., was sent to the first National Congress. Elected governor of Massachusetts in 1810, Gerry rearranged the electoral districts so as to secure the advantage to the Republican party—whence (from a joke on salamander) the word gerrymander. See Life by Austin (1828–29).

Gerson, JEAN CHARLIER DE, scholar and divine, was born at the village of Gerson, in the diocese of Rheims, December 14, 1363. He was educated in Paris, and rose to the highest honours of the university, being known as Doctor Christianissimus. He was a clear and rational theologian, an enemy to scholastic subtleties, while his reason found rest in a devout Christian mysticism. Gerson zealously supported the proposal for putting an end to the Western Schism by the resignation of both the contending pontiffs. But, although this plan was carried out in the Council of Pisa, it failed to secure the desired union. In the council held at Constance in 1414 he again advocated the same expedient of resignation. But his own fortunes were marred by the animosity of the Duke of Burgundy, on account of the boldness with which he had denounced the murder of the Duke of Orleans. To escape his vengeance Gerson retired to Rattenburg in Tyrol, where he composed his De Consolatione Theologiae. It was only after several years that he was able to return to France and settle in a monastery at Lyons, where he devoted himself to works of piety, study, and the education of youth. He died 12th July 1429. His works fill five volumes folio (1706). The famous Imitation of Christ, doubtless by Thomas à Kempis, was often ascribed to him. See the study by Schwab (1858). Gerstäcker, FRIEDRICH, German novelist and traveller, was born at Hamburg, 10th May 1816. In 1837 he began a six years' tramp through the States, working at various trades, and leading an adventurous life in the forests—the results of which appeared in several works (1844–48). In 1849–52 he travelled round the world by way of America, Polynesia, and Australia. Most of the years 1860–61 were spent in South America; in 1862 he accompanied Duke Ernest of Gotha to Egypt and Abyssinia, in 1867–68 visited North America, Mexico, Ecuador, Venezuela, and the West Indies. His best books include Tahiti, Die Beiden Ströfänge, Unter dem Äquator, Gold, Inselwelt, and Um die Welt (1847–48). He died

31st May 1872 at Brunswick, where he had spent his last years. [Ger'-stak-ker; g hard.]

Gerster, ETELKA, singer, born at Kaschau in Hungary, 16th June 1857, studied at Vienna, and sang with success in Venice (1876), Berlin, Paris, London (1877), and New York (1882). In 1878 she married the impresario Gardini. [g hard.]

Gertrude, Sr, an ecstatic German nun, born at Eisleben, and Benedictine abbess from 1295 of Helfta, where she died in 1334. See her Life and Revelations (new ed. 1892).

Gervais, ALFRED ALBERT, French admiral, was born at Provins, 19th November 1837.

Gervase of CANTERBURY (fl. 1188), a monk who wrote a chronicle of the reigns of Stephen, Henry II., and Richard I., and a history of the archbishops of Canterbury, both edited by Bishop Stubbs for the Rolls series (1879–80).

Gervase of TILBURY (fl. 1212), born probably at Tilbury, lectured on canon law at Bologna, and was marshal of the kingdom of Arles, perhaps provost of the nunnery at Ebsdorf. Of his Otia Imperialia, composed about 1212 for the entertainment of the emperor Otho IV., the first two books consist of an abstract of geography and history, the third (ed. by Liebrecht, 1856) contains a collection of curious beliefs about the 'Veronica,' British sirens, the magnet, and the like. The whole was printed by Leibnitz in vol. i. of Scriptores Rerum Brunsvicensium (1707–10). Many other works have been attributed erroneously to Gervase, who, as he tells us, prepared a Liber Facietiarum for Henry II.

Gerwinus, GEORG GOTTFRIED (1805–71), critic and publicist, born at Darnstadt, became in 1836 professor of History at Göttingen. Already he had begun to publish his Geschichte der Deutschen Dichtung (1835–42; 5th ed. 1871–74). In 1837 he was one of the seven Göttingen professors who protested against the abolition of the Hanoverian constitution, and was ordered to leave the country. In 1844 he was appointed honorary professor in Heidelberg, and from this period wrote in behalf of constitutional liberty. In 1847 he helped to establish the Deutsche Zeitung; in 1848 was elected to the National Assembly. His great commentaries on Shakespeare (1849–52; 4th ed. 1872) were translated into English in 1862 (new ed. 1877); another work was Geschichte des 19ten Jahrhunderts (1856–66). See works by Lehmann (1871) and Gosche (1871), and his autobiography (1893). [Ger-vel'-nus; g hard.]

Gesenius, FRIEDRICH HEINRICH WILHELM (1786–1842), Hebraist, born at Nordhausen, became professor of Theology at Halle in 1811. His first great work was Hebräisches u. Chaldäisches Handwörterbuch (1810–12; 11th ed. 1890; Eng. trans. 1846–52). His Hebr. Elementarbuch, consisting of the Hebräisches Grammatik (1813; 25th ed. 1889) and the Hebräisches Lesebuch (1814; 11th ed. 1873), has contributed enormously to the knowledge of the Hebrew language. Later works are a critical history of the Hebrew language and writing (1815), a work on the Samaritan Pentateuch (1815), and a new translation of and commentary on Isaiah (1820–21). His greatest work is Thesaurus philologico-criticus Linguae Hebraeae et Chaldaeae (part i. 1829; completed by Prof. Röddiger, 1855; Eng. recast, Oxf. 1892 et. seq.). His theological standpoint was rationalist. See works by Haym (Berl. 1842) and H. Gesenius (Halle, 1886). [g hard.]

Gesner, KONRAD VON (1516–65), naturalist, born at Zurich, in 1537 became professor of Greek at Lausanne, in 1541 of Physics and Natural History at Zurich. He published seventy-two works, and left eighteen others in progress. His Bibliotheca Universalis (1545-49) contained the titles of all the books then known in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, with criticisms and summaries of each. In his Historia Animalium (1551-58) he aimed at bringing together all that was known in his time of every animal. But probably botany was his forte. He collected over five hundred plants undescribed by the ancients, and was preparing for a third magnum opus at his death. He was the first to classify by the fructification. He also wrote on medicine, mineralogy, and philology. See Hanhart's Gesner (1824).—JOHANN MATTHIAS GESNER (1691-1761), classical scholar and educationist, edited Quintilian, Pliny, Scriptores Rei Rusticæ, and chrestomathies. [g hard.]

Gessner, SALOMON (1730-88), a German pastoral poet, who also painted and engraved landscapes, was born and died at Zurich, where he was a bookseller. Daphnis (1754), a sentimental bucolic, was followed two years later by a volume of Idyls and by Inkel und Yariko. His Tod Abels (1758), a species of idyllic heroic prose poem, although the feeblest of his works, had the greatest success. Gessner's landscape-paintings are all in the conventional classic style, but his engravings are of real merit. In 1772 he published a second volume of Idyls and a series of letters on landscape-painting. See a work by Wölflin (1889).

Geulincx, or GEULINGX, ARNOLD (1625-69), born at Antwerp, from 1646 to 1658 lectured at Louvain, was deposed, and, after turning Protestant and living at Leyden in great distress, became in 1665 professor of Philosophy there. His ideas are expounded in Saturnalia, Logica, Ethica, published in his lifetime, and in Annotata præcurrentia ad Cartesii Principia (1690) and Metaphysica Vera (1691). He explained the relation of soul and body (as in perception) by 'Occasionalism' or constant divine intervention. See German works by Grimm (1875), Pfeleiderer (1882), and Samtleben (1886); Prof. Land in Mind for April 1891; and his edition of Geulincx's Opera Omnia (3 vols. Hague, 1892-93). Gevaert, FRANÇOIS AUGUSTE (1828-1908), composer and writer on music, was born, a baker's son, at Huyse, near Oudenarde.

Gfrörer, AUGUST FRIEDRICH (1803-61), church historian, born at Calw, in 1830 became librarian at Stuttgart, and published Philo (1831), Gustav Adolf (1835), Geschichte des Urchristenthums (1838), and Allgemeine Kirchengeschichte (1841-46), coming down to 1305. In 1846 he became professor of History at Freiburg, and in 1848 was sent to the Frankfort parliament, where he was a fanatical opponent of Prussia. He went over to Rome in 1853. He died at Carlsbad. Among his other works are Geschichte der Karolinger (1848) and Papst Gregorius VII. (1859-61). [G'freh-rer.]

Ghazali, ABU MOHAMMED AL-, OF ALGAZEL (1058-1111), a Moslem theologian-philosopher, who was born and died at Tus in Khorasan. He became tinged with Sufism, from 1091 to 1095 taught philosophy at Bagdad, next went to Mecca, then lectured ten years at Damascus, and taught also at Jerusalem and Alexandria. His chief works are Opinions of the Philosophers, Tendencies of the Philosophers, and Destruction of the Philosophers, in which last especially he challenges the methods of the current Arabian scholasticism. He also wrote a commentary on the ninety-nine names of God, ethical treatises, and works on religion and philosophy.

Gheeraerts, MARCUS (c. 1510-90), religious and animal painter, engraver, &c., was driven as a Protestant from Bruges to England about 1568.—His son, MARCUS (1561-1635), was court-painter to Elizabeth and James I.

Ghiberti, LORENZO (1378-1455), goldsmith, bronze-caster, and sculptor, was born and died at Florence. In 1400 he executed a noble fresco in the palace of Pandolfo Malatesta at Rimini. He was next chosen by the Florentine guild of merchants to execute a gate in bronze, to match an older one by Andrea Pisano. When Ghiberti had completed this work (1424) he was entrusted with the execution of another gate, finished in 1452 to emulate the two already adorning the baptistery. The mingled grace and grandeur of these compositions is beyond all praise; he spent fifty years on them of the most patient labour. Among his other works are monuments in Santa Maria Novella and in Santa Croce at Florence, executed about 1427; a bronze relief in the Duomo (1440); and bronze statues of SS. John the Baptist, Matthew, and Stephen for the Or San Michele (1414-22). See Perkins, Ghiberti et son École (new ed. 1897). [Gi-ber'tee; g hard.]

Ghika, HELENA, or 'DORA D'ISTRIA' (1829-88), a daughter of Prince Michael Ghika, was born at Bucharest. Profoundly instructed in the classics, she gained by travel an extensive knowledge of modern languages and literature. At fifteen she translated the Iliad into German, and not long after wrote several pieces for the theatre. On her unhappy marriage in 1849 with Prince Koltzoff-Massalsky she accompanied him to St Petersburg; but from 1855 she lived mainly at Florence. Her works include La Vie Monastique dans l'Église Orientale (1855); La Suisse Allemande (1856); Les Femmes en Orient (1860); Excursions en Roumélie (1863); Les Lacs Helvétiques (1864); Gli Albanesi in Rumania; and La Poésie des Ottomans (1873). She wrote much for the Revue des Deux Mondes. See Cecchetti's Dora d'Istria (1871) and Scribner's for Dec. 1878. [Gel-ka; g hard.]

Ghirlandajo, DOMENICO CURRADI (1449-94), called Ghirlandajo, 'garland-maker,' from his father's calling, was born at Florence, and was bred a goldsmith, becoming a painter when he was thirty-one. He painted principally frescoes, and in his native city. Among these are six subjects from the life of St Francis (1455) and an altar-piece, the 'Adoration of the Shepherds' (now in the Florentine Academy), in the church of S. Trinità; and in the choir of S. Maria Novella a series illustrating the lives of the Virgin and the Baptist (1490). Between 1482 and 1484 he painted for Pope Sixtus IV., in the Sistine Chapel, the fresco 'Christ calling Peter and Andrew.' Besides these he executed some easel pictures of great merit, as the 'Adoration of the Magi' (1488), in the church of the Innocents at Florence; and the 'Visitation of the Virgin' (1491), in the Louvre. He also executed mosaics, that of the 'Annunciation' in the cathedral of Florence being especially celebrated.—His brother, DAVIDE (1452-1525), and his son, RIDOLFO (1483-1561), were also painters. [Geer-tan-dal'yo; g hard.]

Gianibelli, FEDERIGO, military engineer, born at Mantua about 1530, entered the service of Queen Elizabeth, and during the siege of Antwerp (1585) destroyed with an explosive ship a Spanish bridge over the Scheldt. He rendered great service in the preparations for resisting the Armada of 1588, and died in London. [Jan-ee-bel'lee.]

Giannone, PIETRO (1676-1748), Italian anti-papal historian, was born at Ischitella in Naples, and practised as a barrister. His Storia Civile del Regno di Napoli (1723) led to his banishment from Naples; at Geneva he published Il Triregno, a bitter attack upon the papal pretensions. Deceived into Savoy in 1736, he was confined at Turin until his death. [Jan-no'-neh.]

Gibbon, EDWARD, the greatest of English historians, was born at Putney, 27th April (8th May N.S.) 1737, the son of a country gentleman. He suffered much in childhood from a strange nervous affection, which caused excruciating pain; his studies were desultory, and two miserable years at Westminster was all the regular schooling he received. He entered Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1752, where he spent fourteen idle and unprofitable months, and was converted to Catholicism. Accordingly he was sent to Lausanne to board for nearly five years with a Calvinist minister, M. Pavilliard, who by judiciously suggesting books and arguments reconverted him to Protestantism. He here began and carried out those studies in French literature and the Latin classics which, aided by his prodigious memory, made him a master of erudition without a superior, and with hardly an equal. Here also he fell in love with Suzanne Curchod, daughter of the minister of Crassy, who lived to become the wife of the great French minister, M. Necker, and mother of Madame de Staël. But his father would not hear of the 'strange alliance,' and Gibbon yielded to his fate. He returned to England in 1758, bringing with him the first pages of a little book which he published in 1761 in French, the Essai sur l'Étude de la Littérature. For two and a half years a captain in the Hampshire militia, he meantime revolved within his mind many projects for a historical work, and visited Paris, Lausanne, and Italy. 'It was at Rome,' he tells us, 'on the 15th of October 1764, as I sat musing amidst the ruins of the Capitol, while the barefooted friars were singing vespers in the temple of Jupiter, that the idea of writing the decline and fall of the city first started into my mind.' With his friend Deyverduin, he planned and printed Mémoires Littéraires de la Grande Bretagne (1767-68); another work was his anonymous Critical Observations on the Sixth Book of the Æneid. In 1770 his father died, and Gibbon settled in London; in 1774 he entered parliament as member for Liskeard. He sat afterwards also for Lynnington, altogether for eight sessions, without ever summoning courage to speak. His constant support of government was rewarded in 1779 by the post of a Lord Commissioner of Trade and Plantations—a post worth £700, but suppressed in 1782. After the labours of seven years he published the first volume of his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire in February 1776. Its success was immediate, but ere long the religious world awoke to the dangerous attack upon Christianity in the 15th and 16th chapters, which, while not formally denying the 'convincing evidence of the doctrine itself,' accounted for the rapid growth of the early Christian church by 'secondary' or merely human causes. Gibbon was assailed by a loud discharge of 'ecclesiastical ordnance,' but he only deigned to produce a Vindication when Henry E. Davies of Oxford impugned, 'not the faith, but the fidelity of the historian.' Two more volumes of his great work were ready in 1781. And now, having lost office, and finding it difficult to live in London upon his income, he accepted Deyverduin's invitation to settle down with him at Lausanne, and started in September 1788. He had nearly completed the fourth volume before leaving London, the fifth was finished in twenty-one months, the sixth in little more than a year, in June 1787. A month later he started for England to superintend the printing of the work, and the last two volumes were issued in May 1788. He returned immediately to Lausanne. His last years were not happy; good living and want of exercise had brought on burdensome corpulency, he began to be racked with gout, and the death of several friends left him sorrowing. On a visit to London, he was seized with dropsy, and two months later he died, 16th January 1794. Gibbon's monumental work is likely to remain our masterpiece in history. The magnitude of the subject is nobly sustained by the dignity of the treatment. The glowing imagination of the writer gives life and vigour to his rounded periods and to the stately and pompous march of his narrative. Perhaps his most unique merit is his supreme and almost epic power of moulding into a lucid unity a bewildering multitude of details, and giving life and sequence to the whole. Lord Sheffield collected his Miscellaneous Works (2 vols. 1796), in which Gibbon's admirable Autobiography first saw the light; an enlarged edition was issued in 1814. The Decline and Fall has been edited by Sir William Smith (8 vols. 1854-55) with Guizot's and Milman's notes, and by J. B. Bury (7 vols. 1896 et seq.). See monograph by Cotter Morison (1875), Frederic Harrison's address at the Gibbon commemoration (1894), and Mr Murray's and Lord Sheffield's authoritative edition of Gibbon's Autobiography and Private Letters (3 vols. 1897).

Gibbons, GRINLING, English sculptor and wood-carver, was born at Rotterdam, 4th April 1648. He had for some time practised his art in England, when, discovered by Evelyn carving a crucifix (1671), he was appointed by Charles II. to a place in the Board of Works, and employed in the chapel at Windsor; here and in St Paul's, London, his work displays great taste and delicacy of finish. At Chatsworth, Burghley, Southwick, and other mansions he executed an immense quantity of carved embellishment; the ceiling of a room at Petworth is his chef-d'œuvre. He produced several fine pieces in marble and bronze, including the statue of James II. at Whitehall. He died August 3, 1721.

Gibbons, JAMES, born at Baltimore, U.S., 23d July 1834, became archbishop of that city in 1877, and a cardinal in 1886. He has written The Faith of Our Fathers (1876) and Our Christian Heritage (1889).

Gibbons, ORLANDO, one of the greatest of English musicians, was born at Cambridge, 1583, and in 1604 was appointed organist of the Chapel Royal, London. In 1606 he took his Mus. Bac. at Cambridge, and in 1622 his Mus. Doc. at Oxford. In 1623 he became organist of Westminster Abbey. In May 1625 he went with the king and court to Canterbury, and died there on June 5. His compositions are not numerous, but some of them are masterpieces. The best known are his Morning and Evening Service in F; among his anthems, 'O Clap your Hands' and 'God is gone up,' 'Hosanna,' 'Lift up your Heads,' and 'Almighty and everlasting God;' and of his madrigals, 'The Silver Swan,' 'O that the learned Poets,' and 'Dainty, fine, sweet Bird.' Besides these he left hymns, fantasies for strings, and pieces for the virginal, which show him to have been not only learned, but animated by a grace, dignity, and sentiment possessed by none of his predecessors. Many of his sacred pieces retain their place in English choirs.

Gibbs, JAMES (1682-1754), architect of the Radcliffe Library, Oxford, and the Senate House, Cambridge, was a native of Aberdeen, a Roman Catholic, and lived from 1709 in London.

Gibbs, SIR VICARY (1751-1820), solicitor-general, attorney-general, lord chief-baron, and chief-justice of the common pleas, was born at Exeter.

Gibson, CHARLES DANA, born at Roxbury, Massachusetts, in 1867, began to make a name for himself in 1886 as a draughtsman for the New York journals, developed his art in Paris, London, and Munich, and on his return to New York in 1898 took his place definitely as a brilliant black-and-white artist, especially strong in society cartoons. He has published numerous volumes of cartoons and drawings.

Gibson, EDWARD. See ASHBOURNE.

Gibson, JOHN, sculptor, was born a market-gardener's son, at Gyffin near Conway, in 1790, found a patron in Roscoe, and, proceeding to Rome in 1817, studied under Canova and Thorvaldsen, and fixed his residence there. Amongst his finest works are 'Psyche borne by Zephyrs,' 'Hylas surprised by Nymphs,' and 'Venus with the Turtle.' The innovation of tinting his figures (e.g. his Venus) he defended by a reference to Grecian precedents. In 1833 he was elected an A.R.A., in 1836 an R.A. He died at Rome, 27th January 1866. See Life by Matthews (1911).

Gibson, RICHARD (1615-90), court dwarf and miniaturist, married Anne Shepherd (1620-1709), also 3 feet 10 inches high.

Gibson, THOMAS MILNER, was born in Trinidad, 3d September 1806, and graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1830. He entered parliament as a Conservative in 1837, but by 1839 had turned Liberal, and, returned for Manchester (1841), was a leading Anti-Corn-law orator. In 1846 he was made a privy-councillor and vice-president of the Board of Trade, but resigned in 1848; he opposed the Crimean war. Whilst sitting for Ashton-under-Lyne (1857-68) he was president of the Board of Trade (1859-60), and also ad-interim president of the Poor-law Commission. It was mainly owing to him that the advertisement duty was repealed (1853), the newspaper stamp duty (1855), and the paper duty (1861). From his defeat at Ashton in 1868 till his death at Algiers, 25th February 1884, he took no prominent part in public life.

Giddings, JOSHUA REED (1795-1864), born in Athens, Penn., removed with his parents to Ohio, was called to the bar in 1820, and elected to the Ohio legislature in 1826. He sat in congress 1838-59, and was an anti-slavery leader. In 1861 he was appointed consul-general in Canada. He published Speeches (1853), The Exiles of Florida (1858), and The Rebellion (1864).

Gideon ('hewer' or 'warrior'), greatest of the judges of Israel, was the son of Joash. He suppressed Baal-worship, and put an end to the seven-years' domination of the Midianites by routing them near Mount Gilboa.

Giers, NICHOLAS CARLOVICH DE (1820-95), a Russian statesman, from 1882 foreign minister.

Giesebrecht, WILHELM VON (1814-89), historian, was born in Berlin, and became professor of History at Königsberg in 1857, in 1862 at Munich. His chief works are a history of the Germanic Empire (1855-88), coming down to 1181; Jahrbücher des Deutschen Reichs (1840); a translation of Gregory of Tours (1851); and Arnold von Brescia (1873). [Ge'-zeh-breht; g hard.]

Gieseler, JOHANN KARL LUDWIG (1793-1854), born at Petershagen near Minden, served in the war of liberation, and taught at Minden and Cleves. A work published in 1818 demolished the theory of a primitive written gospel, and procured him a theological chair at Bonn (1819); hence he was called to Göttingen in 1831. His great work is the Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte (1824-57, with Life). [Ge'-seh-ler; g hard.]

Giffen, SIR ROBERT, statistician, born at Strathaven in 1837, took to journalism at Stirling in 1860, and, removing 1862 to London, was connected with the Globe (until 1866), Fortnightly, Examiner (1868-76), and Daily News (1873-76). He retired in 1897 from the post of comptroller-general of the commercial, labour, and statistical department of the Board of Trade. His works include Stock Exchange Securities (1878), Essays in Finance (1879-86), The Growth of Capital (1890), and Case against Bimetallism (1892). He was created a K.C.B. in 1895. He died 12th April 1910.

Gifford, ADAM (1820-87), born in Edinburgh, was called to the Scotch bar in 1849, and was raised to the bench as Lord Gifford in 1870. By his will he left £25,000 to Edinburgh University, £20,000 each to Glasgow and Aberdeen, and £15,000 to St Andrews, to endow undogmatic lectureships in natural theology. [g hard.]

Gifford, ROBERT SWAIN (1840-1905), painter of scenes in Algeria, Italy, North America, &c., was born at Naushon, Mass.

Gifford, WILLIAM, man of letters, was born at Ashburton in April 1757. Left an orphan at twelve, he was first a cabin-boy, then for four years a shoemaker's apprentice, till in 1776 his attempts at versifying attracted notice, and he was enabled to proceed to Exeter College, Oxford, and after graduating in 1782, travelled on the Continent with Lord Grosvenor's son. His first production, the David (1794), was a satire on the Della Cruscan; in the Maviad (1796) on the same along with the corrupters of the drama, and An Epistle to Peter Pindar attacked Dr Wolcot. Gifford's editorship of the Anti-Jacobin (1797-98) procuring him favour with the Tory magnates, he was appointed to offices that brought him £900 a year. In 1802 appeared his translation of Juvenal, with his autobiography. He edited Massinger, Ford, Shirley, and Ben Jonson, and was the first editor of the Quarterly (1809-24). He died 31st December 1826. Gifford possessed much satirical acerbity; as a critic he was utterly one-sided.

Gilbert of Moray, St (d. 1245), the last Scot canonised, was Bishop of Caithness from 1223.

Gilbert of Sempringham, St (c. 1083-1189), in 1148 founded at his birthplace, Sempringham, Lincolnshire, the order of Gilbertines for both monks and nuns. See work by Rose Graham (1901).

Gilbert, ALFRED, sculptor, born in London in 1854, studied there, in Paris, and in Rome, and was elected A.R.A. in 1887, R.A. in 1892.

Gilbert, ANNE. See TAYLOR.

Gilbert, till 1817 GIDDY, DAVIES (1767-1839), a Cornish scientist, M.P., and topographer, was born at St Erth, and in 1827 became president of the Royal Society.

Gilbert, SIR HUMPHREY, English navigator, was born at Dartmouth, Devonshire, in 1539. Abandoning law for a career of arms, he did such good service against the Irish rebels as earned him knighthood and the government of Munster (1570), after which he saw five years' campaigning in the Netherlands. In 1576 his Discourse on a North-west Passage to India was published by George Gascoigne, without his knowledge; two years later he obtained a royal patent to discover and occupy remote heathen lands, but his expedition (1578-79), which had cost all his own and his wife's estates, was frustrated by internal dissensions, tempests, and a smart brush with the Spaniards. Nothing daunted, he sailed again from Plymouth in June 1583, and in August landed in Newfoundland, of which he took possession for Queen Elizabeth. But off Cape Breton he lost the largest of the three vessels left out of five, so was forced to steer homewards with the Golden Hind and the Squirrel, the latter, in which was Gilbert, only ten tons burden. On 9th September the Squirrel went down with all on board.

Gilbert, Sir John, painter, born in 1817 at Blackheath, was placed at a mercantile house in the City, but after two weary years was pronounced to be wholly unfit for business, and allowed to follow his true vocation—art. Save for some lessons from Lance, the fruit-painter, he taught himself; his masters, the old masters—Rubens, Rembrandt, Velasquez. In 1836 he began to exhibit both in oil and water-colours; he was successively associate (1852), member (1853), and president (1871) of the Painters in Water-colours. A knight, an A.R.A. (1872), an R.A. (1876), and a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, 'the Scott of painting' died at Blackheath, 5th Oct. 1897, leaving nearly £250,000. His style is familiar through wood-engravings in the Illustrated London News, and in editions of Shakespeare, Scott, Don Quixote, &c.

Gilbert, Sir (Joseph) Henry (1817-1901), F.R.S., F.C.S., &c., agricultural chemist, was educated at Glasgow and London, and from 1843 was associated with Sir John Bennet Lawes in the Rothamsted Agricultural Laboratory.

Gilbert, William (1540-1603), born at Colchester, in 1561 was elected fellow of St John's, Cambridge, and in 1573 settled in London, becoming physician to Elizabeth, and president of the College of Physicians. In his De Magnete (1600) he established the magnetic nature of the earth; and he conjectured that terrestrial magnetism and electricity were two allied emanations of a single force. He was the first to use the terms 'electricity,' 'electric force,' and 'electric attraction,' and to point out that amber is not the only substance which when rubbed attracts light objects; and he describes how to measure the excited electricity by means of an iron needle moving freely on a point. See the monumental edition and translation for the Gilbert Club by Prof. S. P. Thompson (1902), Mottelay's translation (1893), and a book by Benham (1902). Gilbert's Philosophia Nova was published in 1651.

Gilbert, William (1804-89), began life as a midshipman in the service of the East India Company, and then qualified for a surgeon, but was enabled by a legacy to devote himself to literature at Salisbury. His thirty works, published from 1858 onwards, include the delightful King George's Middy, a Life of Lucrezia Borgia, and several Defoe-like novels—Dives and Lazarus, Shirley Hall Asylum, De Profundis.—His son, Sir William Schwesck Gilbert, knighted 1907, was born in London in 1836, took the degree of B.A. at London University, was a clerk in the Privy-council Office from 1857 to 1862, and in 1864 was called to the bar. He wrote much for the magazines, and was for many years on the staff of Fun, in whose columns his Bob Ballads first appeared. His stage-work began with a Christmas burlesque, Dulcamara (1866), which was followed by a succession of burlesques, dramas, comedies, fairy comedies, and operas. The fairy comedies include The Palace of Truth (1870), Pygmalion and Galatea (1871), The Wicked World (1873), and Broken Hearts (1876); among the comedies are Sweethearts (1874) and Engaged (1877); and other plays by him are Charity (1874), Gretchen (1879), Comedy and Tragedy (1884), and Brantingham Hall (1888). In conjunction with Sir Arthur Sullivan (q.v.), besides Thespis and Trial by Jury, he produced The Sorcerer (1877), H.M.S. Pinafore (1878), The Pirates of Penzance (1880), Patience (1881), Iolanthe (1882), Princess Ida (1883), The Mikado (1885), Ruddigore (1887), The Yeoman of the Guard (1888), The Gondoliers (1889), Utopia Limited (1893), and The Grand Duke (1896). He died 29th May 1911.

Gilbey, Sir Walter, founder of the well-known wine company, horse-breeder, and agriculturist, was born at Bishop Stortford, 2d May 1831, and created a baronet in 1893.

Gilchrist, Alexander (1828-61), Blake's biographer, was born at Newington Green, and educated at University College, London. He entered the Middle Temple in 1846, and was called to the bar in 1849, but never practised, maintaining himself chiefly by art-criticism. The Life of Elty appeared in 1855. At Chelsea, next door to the Carlyles, he was working at his Life of Blake when he died.—His wife, Anne Gilchrist (1828-85), née Burrows, was born in London, and married in 1851. In 1855 she began to write for All the Year Round, in 1861 for Macmillan's. She completed the Life of Blake (1863); 2d ed. with memoir of her husband, 1880. She wrote on Whitman, and after three years (1876-79) in America, on New England village life. In 1883 appeared her Life of Mary Lamb. See Life by her son (1887).

Gilchrist, John Borthwick (1759-1841), an East India Company surgeon, an early student and teacher of Hindustani, was born at Edinburgh; lived at Calcutta 1783-1804; and died in Paris.

Gildas (c. 493-570), the earliest native British historian, wrote in Armorica (c. 550-560) his famous treatise De Excidio Britannie, first printed at London in 1525, again in Gale's Scriptores XV. (1691). He is a weak and wordy writer, but the value of his work, dealing with the period from the invasion of the Romans to his own time, assailed by many, is defended by Dr Guest. Gildas was edited by Moimmsen (1894) and Williams (1899-1901), and translated by Giles in 1841.

Gilder, Richard Watson, LL.D. (1844-1909), American poet and editor from 1881 of the Century Magazine, was born at Bordentown, N.J.

Giles, St (Lat. Ægidius), was an Athenian of royal descent, devoted from his cradle to good works. After giving away his patrimony, he lived two years with St Casarius at Arles, and then retired to a neighbouring desert, where he lived upon herbs and the milk of a hind. The Frankish king, hunting the hind, discovered Ægidius, and made him abbot of a monastery built upon the spot. Here he died about 700. He is the patron of lepers, beggars, and cripples. See a monograph by Rembray (Bruges, 1884), and Dr Lees' St Giles', Edinburgh (1889).

Giles, John Allen (1808-84), translator, editor, historian, &c., was born at Mark near Axbridge, became a fellow of Corpus, Oxford, took orders, and in 1855 suffered three months' imprisonment for solemnising an irregular marriage.

Gilfillan, GEORGE, critic and essayist, was born at Coumrie, son of the Secession minister, 30th January 1813. He studied at Glasgow, in 1836 was ordained to a United Presbyterian church in Dundee, and died at Brechin, 13th August 1878. He attained some reputation as a lecturer and pulpit orator, and was incessantly industrious with his pen. His works display a lavish fancy and wide literary sympathies. See Memoir by Watson (1892). [g hard.]

Gill, JOHN, D.D. (1697-1741), Baptist divine, born at Kettering, devoted himself much to the rabbinical writers. He became in 1719 pastor of a Baptist church in Southwark, and in 1757 near London Bridge. He wrote expositions of the Song of Solomon (1728), New Testament (1746-48), and Old Testament (1766; new ed. with memoir, 1810), &c. [g hard.]

Gill, WILLIAM JOHN (1843-82), a captain in the Engineers, who travelled much in the East, and perished with Professor E. H. Palmer (q.v.).

Gillespie, GEORGE (1613-48), who was born and died at Kirkcaldy, studied at St Andrews, and in 1638 was ordained minister of Wemyss. He showed characteristic fearlessness at the Glasgow Assembly that same year, was translated to Edinburgh in 1642, and in 1643 was sent up to the Westminster Assembly, where he took a great part in the debates on discipline and dogma. His Aaron's Rod Blossoming (1646) is a masterly statement of the high Presbyterian claim for spiritual independence. In 1648 he was moderator of the General Assembly. [Gill-less'py; g hard.]

Gillespie, JAMES (1726-97), an Edinburgh snuff manufacturer who founded a hospital and school.

Gillespie, THOMAS (1708-74), the founder in 1752 of the Relief Church, was born at Duddingston, and from 1741 had been minister of Carnock near Dunfermline.

Gillies, JOHN (1747-1836), historian, born at Brechin, studied at Glasgow, and was tutor to the sons of the Earl of Hopetoun. In 1778 he published a translation of Isocrates and Lysias, in 1786 his History of Ancient Greece, in 1789 Frederick II. of Prussia, and in 1807-10 History of the World from Alexander to Augustus. In 1793 he was appointed historiographer for Scotland.

Gillott, JOSEPH, born at Sheffield, 11th October 1799, shares with Sir Josiah Mason the credit of having perfected the manufacture of steel-pens. He died at Edgbaston, 5th January 1873, when his pictures brought £250,000. [Jil'lot.]

Gillray, JAMES, caricaturist, was born, a Lanark trooper's son, at Chelsea in 1757. He first became known as a successful engraver about 1784, and between 1779 and 1811 issued 1500 caricatures. They are full of broad humour and keen satire aimed against the French, Napoleon, George III., the leading politicians and the social follies of his day. For four years insane, he died 1st June 1815. See illustrated Life by T. Wright (1851; new ed. 1873). [g hard.]

Gilpin, BERNARD, the 'Apostle of the North,' was born at Kentmere Hall, Westmorland, in 1517, and studied at Queen's College, Oxford. In 1552 he became vicar of Norton near Stockton-on-Tees, but soon resigned to pursue his studies at Louvain and Paris. In 1566 he was appointed by his great-uncle, Bishop Tunstall, archdeacon of Durham and rector of Easington. His fearless honesty against pluralities and the viciousness of the clergy made him many enemies, but Tunstall set aside their charges of heresy and appointed him rector of Houghton-le-Spring. On the way to London, whither he had been summoned by Bonner, he broke his leg, and before he had recovered, Elizabeth had succeeded Mary and he was safe. The see of Carlisle and the provostship of Queen's College were in turn offered him, but he preferred to spend his life at Houghton. His wide parish was sunk in ignorance, but he continually exhorted in the pulpit and from house to house, settled the quarrels of his turbulent parishioners, set up a grammar-school, and practised unbounded hospitality to strangers, travellers, and the poor, besides making regular preaching excursions into the wildest parts of Cumberland, Westmorland, and Northumberland. He died 4th March 1583. See Latin Life by Bishop Carleton (1628; Eng. trans. in vol. iii. of Wordsworth's Ecclesiastical Biography); Life by W. Gilpin (1753); and Collingwood's Memoirs of Bernard Gilpin (1884).

Gilpin, WILLIAM (1724-1804), author of works on the scenery of Britain, illustrated by his own aquatint engravings, was born at Scaley, Carlisle; entered Queen's College, Oxford; kept a school at Cleam; and in 1777 became vicar of Boldre in Hampshire.

Gil Polo, GASPAR (c. 1535-91), a Spanish poet, was born at Valencia, and died at Barcelona. He continued Montemayor's Diana in his Diana enamorata (1564; new ed. Barc. 1886). [Heel.]

Gil Vicente (c. 1475-1536), the father of the Portuguese drama, was probably born at Lisbon. He produced in all 42 religious dramas, comedies, and farces. See Lives by Braga (1870) and Ouguella (1890). [Zheel.]

Gil y Zárate, DON ANTONIO (1793-1861), playwright, born in the Escorial, died at Madrid.

Gimignano, VINCENZO DA SAN, properly TAMARONI (c. 1490-1530), religious painter, was a native of San Gimignano. [Jim-in-yah'no.]

Ginckell, or GINKEL, GODERT DE (1630-1703), a Dutch general, who was born and died at Utrecht, and accompanied William III. to England in 1688. He commanded a body of horse at the battle of the Boyne (1690), and on the king's return to England was left as commander-in-chief in Ireland. He reduced Ballymore and Athlone, defeated St Ruth at Aghrim, and finally captured Limerick. In 1692 he was created Earl of Athlone. He afterwards commanded the Dutch troops under Marlborough. [g hard.]

Gindely, ANTON (1829-92), Bohemian historian, was born and died in Prague.

Ginsburg, CHRISTIAN DAVID, LL.D., Rabbinical scholar, was born at Warsaw in 1831, and came early to England. [g hard.]

Gioberti, VINCENZO (1801-52), born at Turin, in 1831 became chaplain to Charles Albert of Sardinia. But, his liberal views being obnoxious to the clerical party, he was banished in 1833. He settled at Brussels as a private tutor, and published an Introduzione allo Studio della Filosofia (1839), Del Bello (1841), and Del Buono (1842). His conception of the papacy as the divinely appointed agency for the elevation of Italy among the nations he expounded in Del Primato Civile e Morale degli Italiani (1843). It was hailed with enthusiasm, and his fame was enhanced by Il Gesuita Moderno (1846-47) against the Jesuits. Returning to Italy in 1848, he was for ten weeks prime-minister, then settled in Paris, where he died. See works by Massari (1848), Spaventa (1864), and Berti (1881). [Jo-ber'tee.]

Giordani, GIUSEPPE (1753-94), composer of the lovely song 'Caro mio ben,' the opera Il Baccio, &c., came from Naples to London in 1772, his father, brother, and three sisters having preceded him by ten years. He returned to Italy in 1782, and died at Lisbon.

Giordani, PIETRO (1774-1848), Italian prose-writer, was born at Piacenza, and died at Parma. See Life by Romani (Mantua, 1868). [Jor-dah'nee.]

Giordano, LUCA (1632-1705), painter, was born and died at Naples. He acquired the power of working with extreme rapidity (whence his nickname Fa Presto, 'Make haste'), and of imitating the great masters. In 1692 he proceeded to Madrid, at the request of Charles II. of Spain, to embellish the Escorial. [Jor-dah'no.]

Giorgione, or GIORGIO BARBARELLI (c. 1478-1511), painter, born near Castelfranco, was not, as once thought, a son of one of the Barbarelli. He studied at Venice under Giovanni Bellini, and soon developed a freer and larger manner, characterised by intense poetic feeling and by great beauty and richness of colouring. Several early portraits by him have disappeared, but an 'Enthroned Madonna' is an altarpiece at Castelfranco. In Venice Giorgione was extensively employed in fresco-painting, but some fragments in the Fondaco de' Tedeschi are all that now remain of this work. The best authorities reject by far the greater number of the easel-pictures ascribed to him. 'The Family of Giorgione' at Venice, 'The Three Philosophers' at Vienna, and the 'Sleeping Venus' in the Dresden Gallery are admittedly genuine. Giorgione ranks with the very greatest of Venetian painters, and powerfully influenced his contemporaries, even Titian. See Conti's Giorgione (Milan, 1894). [Jor-jo'neh.]

Giotto (GIOTTO DI BONDONE), painter and architect, was born, probably in 1266, at Vespignano near Florence. At ten, it is said, he was found by Cimabue tending sheep and drawing a lamb on a flat stone, and was by him taken to Florence and instructed in art. The master had infused new life into the current Byzantine forms, and his changes were perfected by his pupil, who introduced a close imitation of nature, more varied composition, and greater lightness of colouring. Giotto's works are numerous. Among them are twenty-eight frescoes from the life of St Francis, in the Upper Church at Assisi; another series of frescoes, with portraits of Charles of Valois, his friend Dante, &c., in the Bargello at Florence; another at Padua, comprising subjects from the lives of the Virgin and Christ, a 'Christ in Glory,' and a 'Last Judgment;' the Peruzzi frescoes at Florence, scenes from the lives of St John the Baptist and St John the Evangelist, which mark the culminating point of the painter's genius; and the noble 'Coronation of the Virgin,' in tempera upon panel, in the Baroncelli Chapel of Santa Croce. From 1330 to 1333 Giotto was employed by King Robert in Naples, where he exercised a powerful influence upon artistic production. In 1334 he was appointed master of works of the cathedral and city of Florence. Aided by Andrea Pisano he decorated the façade of the cathedral with statues and designed the campanile. He died in 1337. See works by Quilter (1880), Perkins (1902), Janitschek (Leip. 1892). [Jot'to.]

Gipps, SIR GEORGE (1791-1847), born at Ringwood, Deal, served in the Peninsular war, and was governor of New South Wales 1838-46.

Giraldi, GIOVAMBATTISTA, or GERALDUS CINTHIUS (1504-73), a poet and story-teller who furnished themes to Shakespeare and Beaumont and Fletcher, was born and died at Ferrara.

Giraldus Cambrensis, the literary name of the historian and ecclesiastic, Girald de Barri, born about 1147 at Manorbier Castle, Pembrokeshire. He was brought up by his uncle, the Bishop of St Davids, took holy orders in 1172, and was appointed archdeacon of St Davids. On the death of his uncle (1176), the chapter of St Davids elected him bishop, but Henry II. refused to confirm the selection, and another bishop was appointed. Girald withdrew to Paris, and on his return (1180) was required by the Archbishop of Canterbury to administer the diocese of St Davids, mismanaged by the new bishop. Being appointed a royal chaplain, and afterwards preceptor to Prince John, he accompanied that prince in 1185 to Ireland. His well-known Topographia Hibernica is an account of the natural history, marvels, and inhabitants of that country. His Eypugatio Hibernica is an account of the conquest of Ireland under Henry II. In 1188 he attended the Archbishop of Canterbury in his progress through Wales to preach a crusade, and worked up his observations into the Itinerarium Cambrie. On the see of St Davids again becoming vacant, he was again elected by the chapter; but the Archbishop of Canterbury interposed. He devoted the remainder of his life to study, and died at St Davids about 1223. His works, although disfigured by credulity and vanity, are of great value as materials for the history and social condition of his age. A translation of the Itinerarium Cambrie was published in 1806; the complete works have been edited by Brewer, Dimock, and Warner (8 vols. Rolls series, 1861-91). See Owen's Gerald the Welshman (1889).

Girard, STEPHEN (1750-1831), miser and philanthropist, was born near Bordeaux, and was successively cabin-boy, mate, captain, and part owner of an American coasting-vessel. In 1769 he settled as a trader in Philadelphia, where he established a bank which became the mainstay of the U.S. government during the war of 1812-14. Girard was in religion a sceptic, and in personal habits a miser. Yet in public matters his generosity was remarkable. Among other bequests he left $2,000,000 for founding a college in Philadelphia for male white orphans; no minister of any sect was to be on its board or visit it. See Life by Ingram (3d ed. Phil. 1886).

Girardin, ÉMILE DE (1806-81), journalist, was born in Switzerland, the illegitimate son of General Alexandre de Girardin. After the July revolution (1830) he started the Journal des Connaissances Utiles, and in 1836 the halfpenny Orleanist Presse; a charge that this was subsidised by government led to a fatal duel with Armand Carrel (q.v.). From this time Girardin gradually became a decided republican. He promoted Louis Napoleon's election to the presidency, but was exiled for disapproving the coup d'état. He next threw himself into the arms of the Socialists, and during the Commune proposed a scheme for splitting France into fifteen federal states. In 1874, however, he founded La France, in which he supported the republic. He wrote a few pieces for the stage.—His first wife, Delphine Gay (1805-55), wrote novels and plays. See Imbert de Saint-Amand, Madame de Girardin (1874). [Zhel-rar-dan'.]

ture at the Sorbonne, as a leader-writer for the Journal des Débats combated the democratic opposition, and was elected to the Academy in 1844, to the National Assembly in 1871. He published several large works, among them Cours de Littérature dramatique (1843) and Souvenirs et Réflexions (1859). See a study by Tamisier (1876).

Girardon, François (1630-1715), sculptor, was born at Troyes, and died in Paris.

Girdlestone, Charles (1797-1881), Evangelical Bible-commentator, was a fellow of Balliol, and then vicar of Sedgley and rector of Kingswinford, both in Staffordshire. — His brother, Edward (1805-84), a canon of Bristol, was known as 'the Agricultural Labourers' Friend.'

Girling, Mary Anne, née Clouting (1827-86), the founder of a community of 'Shakers' or 'Children of God,' was born at Little Glemham, Suffolk, and died at Hordle, Hants.

Girtin, Thomas, one of the greatest of the earlier landscape-painters in water-colours, was born in London, 18th February 1775, and died there 9th November 1802. He was a close friend and fellow-student of Turner. See L. Binyon's Thomas Girtin, his Life and Works (1900).

Gissing, George Robert (1857-1903), born at Wakefield, and educated at Owens College, Manchester, published, besides other works, upwards of a dozen novels, strong sombre studies mostly of suburban life.

Giulio Romano (Giulio Pippi de' Giannuzzi), painter and architect, born at Rome about 1492, assisted Raphael in the execution of several of his finest works, and at his death completed the 'Apparition of the Cross' in the Vatican. In 1524 he went to Mantua on the invitation of the Duke. The drainage of the marshes and the protection of the city from the inundations of the Po and Mincio attest his skill as an engineer; while his genius as an architect found scope in the restoration and adornment of the Palazzo del Te, the cathedral, and a ducal palace. In Bologna he designed the façade of the church of S. Petronio. Among his oil-pictures are the 'Martyrdom of St Stephen' (at Genoa), 'A Holy Family' (Dresden), 'Mary and Jesus' (Louvre), and the 'Madonna della Gatta' (Naples). Giulio died at Mantua, 1st November 1546. See D'Arco's Giulio Romano (1842). [Ju'-li-o Ro-mah'no.]

Giusti, Giuseppe (1809-50), born near Pistoia, satirist, mercilessly denounced in a brilliant series of poems the enemies of Italy and the vices of the age. He was elected to the Tuscan chamber of deputies in 1848. See monographs by Fioletto (1877) and Leonardis (1887). [Joo's'-tee.]

Gladstone, William Ewart, statesman, orator, and author, was born at Liverpool, 29th December 1809, the fourth son of Sir John Gladstone (1764-1851), a well-known Liverpool merchant and M.P., who was the son of a Leith corn-merchant. He was educated at Eton (1821-27) and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated as a double first in 1831. He had distinguished himself greatly in the Union Debating Society, and in 1832 was returned by Newark as a Conservative to the first parliament elected under the Reform Bill. His maiden speech (1833) on the movement for the emancipation of the slaves in the West Indies was mainly a defence of the management of his father's estates there; he made a decided impression on the House of Commons, and was described by Macaulay in 1839 as 'the rising hope' of the 'stern and unbending Tories.' In December 1834 Peel appointed him a Junior Lord of the Treasury, and next year Under-secretary for the Colonies. Gladstone looked up to Peel with intense admiration; they were alike earnest and conscientious in every movement of their political and private lives. Soon after Lord John Russell brought forward his motions on the Irish Church; Peel was defeated and resigned, and Gladstone went with him. In 1839 he married Catherine Glynn, elder sister of Sir Stephen Richard Glynn (1807-74) of Hawarden Castle, Flintshire.

Peel returning to office in 1841, Mr Gladstone became Vice-president of the Board of Trade and Master of the Mint, and in 1843 President of the Board of Trade. In February 1845 he resigned because he could not approve of the Maynooth grant; but in December, in thorough sympathy with Peel, who had adopted free-trade principles, he re-joined the government as Colonial Secretary. No longer, however, in political sympathy with the Duke of Newcastle, whose influence had obtained for him the representation of Newark, he gave up his seat, and did not re-enter parliament until the corn-law struggle was over; then, at the general election of 1847 he, still as a Tory, was elected by the University of Oxford. Hitherto he had been a Tory of an old-fashioned school; but the corn-law agitation set him thinking over the defects of our social system, and there was always something impetuous in the rush of his sympathy. He startled Europe by the terrible description which he gave in 1851 of the condition of the prisons of Naples under King 'Bomba,' and the cruelties inflicted on political prisoners. Again and again in Gladstone's public life we see him carried away by the same generous and passionate emotion on behalf of the victims of despotic cruelty. By the death of Peel in 1850 Mr Gladstone was brought more directly to the front; and now he compelled the House of Commons and the country to recognise in him a supreme master of parliamentary debate. His first really great speech in parliament was made in the debate on Disraeli's budget in 1852—from that hour he was recognised as one of the great historic orators of the English parliament. On the fall of the short-lived Tory administration Lord Aberdeen formed the famous Coalition Ministry, with Palmerston for Home Secretary, Lord John Russell for Foreign Secretary, and Mr Gladstone for Chancellor of the Exchequer. His speech on the introduction of his first budget distanced all expectation; and it may be questioned whether even the younger Pitt could lend such charm to each successive budget. The Crimean war broke up the Coalition Ministry; Palmerston became prime-minister, and Gladstone retained his office for a short time; but when Palmerston gave way to the demand for the appointment of the Sebastopol committee, Gladstone felt bound to retire. He gave Palmerston a general support, until, after Orsini's attempt on the life of Napoleon III. in 1858, Palmerston introduced his Conspiracy to Murder Bill. Gladstone strongly opposed it; Lord Palmerston resigned; and Lord Derby was called on to form a ministry. The short stay of the Conservative party in office gave Gladstone an opportunity of accepting the mission to the Ionian Islands in 1858. In 1859 Palmerston was again in office and Gladstone Chancellor of the Exchequer. The budget of 1860 contained provisions for the reduction of the wine-duties and the simplified taxation adapted to Cobden's commercial treaty with France. Gladstone also provided for the abolition of the duty on paper. The House of Lords struck out this clause; a popular agitation followed; and in the next session the Lords passed the measure without opposition. In 1865 Oxford rejected and South Lancashire returned Mr Gladstone, who, on Palmerston's death and Lord Russell's accession to the premiership, became leader of the House of Commons. It was assumed that, Russell and Gladstone being now at the head of affairs, a reform bill would be sure to come. It did come; a very moderate bill, enlarging the franchise in boroughs and counties. The Conservative party opposed it, and were supported by a considerable section of the Liberals. The bill was defeated; the Liberals went out of office (1866), and Disraeli introduced a Reform Bill of his own, which was enlarged until it became practically a measure of household suffrage for boroughs. About this time, the distressed and distracted state of Ireland, the unceasing popular agitation and discontent, and the Fenian insurrection led Gladstone to the conviction that the Protestant state church in Ireland must be disestablished and disendowed, that the Irish land tenure system must be reformed, and that better provision must be made for the higher education of the Catholics of Ireland. He defeated the government on a series of resolutions foreshadowing his policy; the government appealed to the country; the Liberals returned to power, and Gladstone became prime-minister (1868). In his first session of government he disestablished and disendowed the Irish church; and in the next session he passed a measure recognising the right of the Irish tenant to compensation for improvements. For the first time in English history a system of national education was established. The Ballot Act was passed for the protection of voters. The system of purchase in the army was abolished by a kind of coup d'état. Then Gladstone introduced a measure to improve university education in Ireland. This bill was intended for the benefit of Irish Catholics; but it did not satisfy Catholic demands, Catholic members voted against it, and with that help the Conservatives threw out the bill (1873). Gladstone tendered his resignation, but Disraeli declined to undertake any responsibility, and Gladstone had to remain at the head of affairs. But the by-elections began to tell against the Liberals, and Mr Gladstone suddenly dissolved. A Conservative majority was returned, and Disraeli came back to power (1874).

For a while Mr Gladstone occupied himself in literary and historical studies, and published essays and pamphlets. But the Bulgarian atrocities (1876) aroused his generous anger, and he flung down his books to preach a crusade against the Ottoman power in Europe. The waters rose and lifted him, whether he would or no, into power. Parliament was dissolved in 1880, the Liberals came in with an overwhelming majority, and Gladstone (now member for Midlothian) became prime-minister once more, and in an unpropitious hour. There were troubles in Egypt; there was impending war in the Soudan and in South Africa. There was something very like an agrarian revolution going on in Ireland; and the Home Rule party in the House of Commons was under the uncompromising leadership of Parnell. Gladstone succeeded nevertheless in carrying a scheme of parliamentary reform, which established something very near to universal suffrage. But he found himself drawn into a series of wars in North and South Africa; and he whose generous sympathy had of late been so much given to Ireland, and who had introduced and carried another land bill for Ireland, found that, in endeavouring to pass measures of coercion, he had to encounter the fiercest opposition from the Irish members and the vast bulk of the Irish population. Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr Burke were assassinated in Dublin; General Gordon perished at Khartoum. In the end the Irish members coalesced with the Conservatives in a vote on a clause in the budget, and Gladstone's government was defeated (June 1885). Lord Salisbury came back into office for a few months; then the general elections came on. These elections were to give the first opportunity to the newly-made voters under Gladstone's latest reform act; and they sent him back into office (1886). At the same time the Irish Nationalist party came back 87 members out of 103, and Gladstone made up his mind that the Irish people were in favour of Home Rule, so brought in a measure to give a statutory parliament to Ireland. A sudden and serious split took place in his party; some of his most influential colleagues declared against him; the bill was rejected on the second reading, and Gladstone appealed to the country, only to be defeated. The Conservatives, with the help of the 'dissentient Liberals,' came back into power with a strong majority (August 1886). But at the general election of 1892 his party, including both sections of Irish Nationalists, secured a majority of above forty over the combined Conservatives and Liberal Unionists. In 1893 his Home Rule Bill was carried in the Commons, but was thrown out by the Lords. Owing to the increasing infirmities of age, especially impaired eyesight, the veteran statesman resigned 3d March 1894, and was succeeded by the Earl of Rosebery; in 1896 his perfunctory championship of the Armenians led to the latter's retirement from the Liberal Leadership. Gladstone died at Hawarden, 19th May 1898, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. He will find his fame as a statesman and an orator. For another man his Homeric studies, his various essays in political and literary, in ecclesiastical and theological criticism, would have made a not inconsiderable reputation; but to the world they are interesting chiefly as illustrating a marvellous and unresting mental activity. Probably no other English minister has left behind him so long and so successful a record of practical legislation. As a parliamentary debater he never had a superior—possibly never an equal. Among Gladstone's works are The State in its Relations with the Church (1838); A Manual of Prayers from the Liturgy (1845); Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age (1858); A Chapter of Autobiography (1868); Juventus Mundi (1869); The Vatican Decrees (1874); Vaticanism (1875); Homeric Synchronism (1876); Gleanings of Past Years (8 vols. 1879-97); The Irish Question (1886); Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture (1890); Odes of Horace translated (1894); Psalter, with Concordance (1895); and the great edition of Bishop Butler's works (2 vols. with a vol. of Studies Subsidiary to them, 1896). His Speeches and Public Addresses were edited by Hutton and Cohen (10 vols. 1894 et seq.). See Gladstone bibliography in Notes and Queries, 1892-93, and Lives by M'Gilchrist (1868), Barnett Smith (2 vols. 1879; new ed. 1898), Archer (4 vols. 1883), Russell (1891), Robbins (1894), Justin M'Carthy (1898), and Lord Morley (3 vols. 1903).

Glaiser, James, born in London, 7th April 1809, began to make meteorological observations as an officer of the Irish Ordnance Survey. In 1833-36 he was employed in the observatory at Cambridge, and then removed to Greenwich, where from 1840 to 1874 he was superintendent of the magnetical and meteorological department. From 1841 he prepared the meteorological reports. In 1862-66 he made twenty-eight scientific balloon ascents, once reaching a height of over seven miles. Founder of the Meteorological Society and F.R.S., he wrote on astronomy, meteorology, and ballooning, and died 7th February 1903.

Glamis, JANET DOUGLAS, LADY, was burnt at Edinburgh, 17th July 1537, on an unsubstantiated charge of plotting James V.'s death. [Glamis.]

Glanvill, JOSEPH (1636-80), born at Plymouth, studied at Exeter and Lincoln Colleges, Oxford, 1652-58. The dominant Aristotelianism of Oxford weighed on him almost as heavily as the Puritan dogmatism outside; and after the Restoration he became a Latitudinarian, withal vicar of Frome (1662), rector of the Abbey Church in Bath (1666), and prebendary of Worcester (1678). His famous work, The Vanity of Dogmatising, or Confidence in Opinions (1661), was a noble appeal for freedom of thought and experimental science. In its second issue (1665; new ed. 1885) as Scepstis Scientifica it was prefaced by a warm panegyric on the newly-founded Royal Society, of which he had become a fellow. Oddly enough his Philosophical Considerations touching Witchcraft (1666) shows strange credulity; so also the posthumous Sadducismus Triumphatus (1681).

Glanvill, RANULF DE, chief-justiciary of England in 1180-89, and author of the earliest treatise on the laws of England, the Tractatus de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ (c. 1181; printed 1554; best ed. by Twiss, 1892). Glanvill was born at Stratford St Andrew near Saxmundham; in 1175 raised a body of knights to fight against William the Lion of Scotland; took the cross, and died at the siege of Acre (1190).

Glanville, BARTHOLOMEW DE, the name given by Leland and Bale to a Minorite friar, Bartholomæus Anglicus, who went to Saxony in 1230. His encyclopædic De Proprietatibus Rerum was Englished by John de Trevisa in 1398, and forms the basis of Steele's Mediæval Lore (1893).

Glaphorne, HENRY, minor dramatist, between 1639 and 1643 wrote a few fair poems and five plays—Albertus Wallenstein; Argalus and Parthenia, a poetical dramatisation of part of the Arædia; two comedies, The Hollander and Wit in a Constable; and The Ladies Priviledge. Mr Bullen attributes to him also The Lady Mother. His works were reprinted in 2 vols. in 1874.

Glas, JOHN (1695-1773), the founder about 1730 of the small religious sect of Glassites or Sandemanians, was born at Auchtermuchty, and from 1719 was minister of Tealing near Dundee. The name Sandemanians was from his son-in-law, Robert Sandeman (1718-71).—His son, GEORGE GLAS (1725-65), surgeon, mariner, and settler (1764) near Cape Verle, was murdered by mutineers off the Irish coast.

Glasse, HANNAH, a London habit-maker, the author of The Art of Cookery (1747). She seems to have been a Roman Catholic, to have gone bankrupt in 1754, and to have died before 1770.

Glauber, JOHANN RUDOLPH (c. 1603-68), alchemist and physician, born at Karlstadt in Franconia, died at Amsterdam. In 1648 he discovered hydrochloric acid; he was probably the first to procure nitric acid; and his name lives in Glauber's Salt. His treatises were translated by Christopher Packe (1689).

Glazunov, ALEXANDER CONSTANTINOVICH, born 10th August 1865 at St Petersburg, became director of the Conservatorium there in 1908. A leader of the Russian national school, he composed songs, chamber music, symphonies, &c.

Gleig, GEORGE ROBERT (1796-1888), born at Stirling, was the son of George Gleig, Bishop of Brechin (1753-1840). He entered the army, and served in Spain (1813) and in America (1814). He took orders (1820), and became chaplain-general of the army (1844) and inspector-general of military schools (1846). He wrote The Subaltern (1825) and other novels, and books on military history and biography. [Glegg.]

Gleim, JOHANN WILHELM LUDWIG (1719-1803), poet, was born at Ermsleben near Halberstadt, and died at Halberstadt. His Lieder eines Preussischen Grenadiers are vigorous. See Life by Körte (1811). [Glüme.]

Glen, WILLIAM (1789-1826), an unbusiness-like business man, author of 'Wae's me for Prince Charlie' and other lyrics, was born and died in Glasgow. See memoir prefixed to Poems (1874).

Glendower, or GLYNDWR, OWEN, Welsh chief, claimed descent from Llewelyn, the last Prince of Wales, and was born in Montgomeryshire about 1359. He studied law at Westminster, and became esquire to the Earl of Arundel, but in 1401 fell into dispute with Lord Grey over some lands, and, unable to obtain redress from Henry IV., carried on a guerilla warfare against the English marchers. In 1402 he captured Lord Grey and Sir Edmund Mortimer, both of whom married daughters of the Welsh chieftain (now proclaimed Prince of Wales), and joined him in the coalition with Harry Percy (Hotspur). That coalition ended in the battle of Shrewsbury (1403), won by King Henry. In 1404 Glendower entered into a treaty with Charles VI. of France, who in 1405 sent a force to Wales; and the Welsh prince, though often defeated, kept up a desultory warfare till his death about 1416. The popular idea of him as a wizard is presented in Shakespeare's King Henry IV. See Wylie's Henry IV. (4 vols. 1884-98), and A. G. Bradley's Owen Glyndwr (1904).

Glenelg, CHARLES GRANT, BARON, politician, was born at Calcutta, 26th October 1778, and graduated as fourth wrangler from Magdalene College, Cambridge, in 1801. Entering parliament in 1807, he was Chief-secretary for Ireland (1819-22), Vice-president (1823-27), President of the Board of Trade under Canning (1827-28), President of the Board of Control under Earl Grey (1830-34), and Colonial Secretary under Melbourne (1834-39). Having approved of Lord Durham's 'ordinance' as to the Canadian rebels of 1838, he was compelled to resign in 1839, and retired from public life. Elevated to the peerage in 1835, he died at Cannes, 23d April 1866.

Gleyre, CHARLES (1806-74), idealist painter, was born at Chevilly in the Swiss canton Vaud, and died in Paris. See Life by Clément (1885).

Gliddon, GEORGE ROBINS (1809-57), Egyptologist, was born in Devonshire, and lived over twenty years at Alexandria, where he became United States vice-consul. He died at Pauana.

Gloucester, EARLS AND DUKES OF, ROBERT, Earl of Gloucester (died 1147), a natural son of Henry I., was the principal supporter of his sister Matilda against Stephen.—GILBERT DE

CLARE, Earl (1243-95), sided with Simon de Montfort, and helped him to gain the battle of Lewes (1264); but, quarrelling with Simon, he made common cause with Prince Edward and won the battle of Evesham (1265).—THOMAS of WOODSTOCK, Duke (1355-97), youngest son of Edward III., was from 1386 to 1389 the virtual ruler of the country, and was put to death by Richard II. at Calais.—HUMPHREY, Duke (1391-1447), fourth son of Henry IV., was protector during Henry VI.'s minority (1422-45), was arrested for high-treason at Bury St Edmunds, and five days later was found dead in bed.—RICHARD, Duke, became King Richard III.—HENRY, Duke (1639-60), was third son of Charles I.—WILLIAM, Duke (1689-1700), was eldest son of Queen Anne.—WILLIAM HENRY (1743-1805), George III.'s brother, was created Duke of Gloucester and Edinburgh in 1764.—His son, WILLIAM FREDERICK (1776-1834), died without issue.

Glover, JOHN (1767-1849), landscape-painter in water-colours and oils, born at Houghton-on-the-Hill, Leicester, emigrated to the Swan River in 1831, and died at Launceston, Tasmania.

Glover, JULIA, née BETTERTON (1779-1850), a leading comic actress, unhappy in her father and her husband.—Her second son, WILLIAM HOWARD GLOVER (1819-75), composer and conductor, was born in London, and died in New York.

Glover, RICHARD (1712-85), poet, born in London, was a prosperous City merchant, and for six years member for Weymouth. Leonidas (1737-70) and The Atheniad (1788) are now almost as well forgotten as his tragedies, Boadicea (1753) and Medea (1761). His ballad, Admiral Hostier's Ghost, long enjoyed a factitious reputation. See his political Memoirs (1813).

Glover, STEPHEN (1812-70), song-composer, like his brother, CHARLES WILLIAM (1806-63).

Gluck, CHRISTOPH WILIBALD, was born 2d July 1714 at Weidenwang near Berching, in Bavaria. After teaching music at Prague, in 1736 he went to Vienna, and thence in 1738 to Milan, where he studied for four years under San-Martini. In 1741 he wrote his first opera, Artaserse, and seven others followed in the next four years. Having achieved some reputation, he was invited in 1745 to London, where a new opera, La Caduta de' Giganti, was performed; Gluck's London visit and his study of Handel was the turning-point in his career. In 1746 he returned to Vienna, and his next opera shows signs of the new tendency, while some of the music in Telemacco (produced in Rome, 1750) and La Clemenza di Tito (Naples, 1751) he afterwards considered good enough to be incorporated in Armide and Iphigénie. But he did not rise to his highest style until he found at Florence in Calzabigi a librettist worthy of his music. In 1762 he produced Orfeo, which struck the keynote of the modern music drama. Alceste followed (1766), and Paride ed Elena (1769), the last work written for Vienna before he went to Paris. There his Iphigénie en Aulide (1774) proved an enormous success, and Orphée, an adaptation of his earlier Orfeo, stirred the utmost enthusiasm. Gluck was at the summit of his success when the famous Gluck and Piccini war divided Paris into Gluckists and Piccinists. Gluck finally conquered with his Iphigénie en Tauride (1779), and retired from Paris full of honour and comparatively wealthy. He died at Vienna, 15th Nov. 1787. See works in French by Desnoiresterres (1872); in German, by Schmid

(1854), Marx (1862), and Reissmann (1882); also E. Newman's Gluck and the Opera (1896). [Glook.]

Glyn, ISABELLA (1823-89), actress and Shakespearean reciter, was born in Edinburgh, and was twice married; her second husband, the journalist Eneas Sweetland Dallas (1828-79), she divorced in 1874 after twenty years of married life.

Gmelin, JOHANN GEORG (1709-55), professor of Chemistry and Botany at St Petersburg and Tübingen, in 1733-43 travelled in Siberia, and wrote Flora Sibirica (1748-49) and Reisen durch Sibirien (1751-52).—His nephew, SAMUEL GOTTLIEB (1744-74), became professor of Botany at St Petersburg (1767), and wrote Historia Fucorum (1768).—Another nephew, JOHANN FRIEDRICH (1748-1804), wrote Onomatologia Botanica (1771-77).—His son, LEOPOLD (1788-1853), born at Göttingen, from 1817 to 1850 was professor of Medicine and Chemistry at Heidelberg. His greatest work is his Handbuch der Chemie (1817-19; Eng. trans. by Watts, enlarged 1848-49). [G'may'leen.]

Gneisenau, AUGUST WILHELM ANTON, GRAF NEITHARDT VON (1760-1831), Prussian general, was born at Schildau in Prussian Saxony. In 1782 he accompanied the German auxiliaries of England to America, in 1786 joined the Prussian army, and in 1806 fought at Saalfeld and Jena. His gallant defence of Colberg (1807) led to his appointment on the commission for the reorganisation of the Prussian army. In the war of liberation he rendered distinguished service at Leipzig (1813); in the Waterloo campaign as chief of Blücher's staff he directed the strategy of the Prussian army. In 1831, on the outbreak of the Polish rebellion, he had been made field-marshal and commander of the Prussian army on the Polish frontier, when he died of cholera at Posen. See Lives by Pertz (1864-80), Delbrück (1882), and Neff (1889). [G'nē-zen-ow.]

Gneist, HEINRICH RUDOLF HERMANN ERICH VON, jurist, was born in Berlin, 13th August 1816. He was successively assistant-judge of the Superior Court and of the Supreme Tribunal, until in 1850 he resigned, having since 1844 held the chair of Jurisprudence at Berlin. He was a member of the Prussian lower house and also of the imperial diet. Ennobled in 1888, he died 21st July 1895. Gobat, SAMUEL, D.D. (1799-1879), a Swiss Lutheran, whose nomination to the Jerusalem bishopric in 1846 by the King of Prussia had much to do with Newman's conversion to Catholicism. See German Life (Basel, 1883).

Goddard, ARABELLA, pianist, was born at St Servans near St Malo, 12th January 1836. She made her début at the Grand National Concerts in London in 1850, and in 1854-56 performed in France, Germany, and Italy. In 1859 she married James William Davison (1813-85), the Times musical critic. She took her farewell of the British public in 1873, visited Australia and America, and returned to England in 1876.

and was till 1887 a professor of the Free Church of Neuchâtel. He died 29th October 1900. He published commentaries on St John (1863-65; Eng. trans. 1877), Luke (trans. 1875), Romans (trans. 1881), and St Paul's Epistles (trans. 1894), besides Conférences Apologétiques, Etudes Bibliques (trans. as Old and New Testament Studies, 1875-76), and Introduction au Nouveau Testament (1893). Godfrey of Bouillon was born about 1061 at Baisy in Belgian Brabant, the eldest son of Count Eustace II. of Boulogne, and Ida, sister to Godfrey, Duke of Lower Lorraine and Bouillon. He served with great gallantry under the Emperor Henry IV., both against Rudolph of Swabia and in 1084 in the expedition against Rome. Godfrey joined the first crusade, was elected one of the principal commanders, and in time became its chief leader. Eight days after the capture of Jerusalem he was proclaimed king; but his humility forbade him to wear a crown of gold where his Saviour had worn one of thorns, so he contented himself with the title of Defender of the Holy Sepulchre. On 12th August 1099, on the plain of Ascalon, he defeated the sultan of Egypt; this victory put him in possession of all Palestine, except a few fortified towns. After a year spent in organising his new state, he died 18th July 1100. See works by De Hody (2d ed. 1859) and Froboese (Berl. 1879).

Godfrey, SIR EDMUND BERRY (1622-78), a London wood-monger and J.P., knighted in 1666, whose murder was made by Titus Oates (q.v.) the coping-stone of his 'Popish Plot.'

Godiva, LADY, a great religious foundress who, when her husband, Leofric, Earl of Chester, imposed a grievous tax on the townfolk of Coventry (1040), obtained its remission by riding naked through the market-place. The story occurs in Roger of Wendover (1235), but 'Peeping Tom' is no older than the 18th century. See Sidney Hartland in Folklore Journal (1890).

Godolphin, SIDNEY GODOLPHIN, EARL OF, was born at Godolphin Hall near Helston, Cornwall, in June 1645. He became a royal page in 1662, entered parliament in 1668, visited Holland in 1678, and in 1684 was made head of the Treasury and Baron Godolphin. On William of Orange's landing in 1688 Godolphin stood by James, and was sent with Halifax and Nottingham to treat with William; when James's flight was known he voted for a regency. Yet in February 1689 William reinstated him as First Commissioner of the Treasury. Godolphin was a Tory; and, when William began to replace his Tory ministers by Whigs, Godolphin's turn came to go in 1696. In 1700, however, he returned to his old place, but only for six months. Anne on her accession made him her sole Lord High Treasurer (1702); in 1706 he was created earl. His able management of the finances furnished Marlborough the supplies needed for his campaigns without increasing the public debt by more than one million annually. To prevent his own overthrow, he constrained Anne to dismiss Harley (1708); but the influence of Harley's friend and relative, Mrs Masham, continuing to increase, and the power of Harley to grow, Godolphin in 1710 was himself dismissed. He died at Holywell House, Marlborough's seat, near St Albans, 15th September 1712. See the Life of him by the Hon. Hugh Eliot (1888).

Godwin, Earl of the West Saxons, was probably son of the South-Saxon Wulfnoth; but late stories make his father a churl. He ingratiated himself with Earl Ulf, Canute's brother-in-law; by 1018 he was an earl, and about 1019 became Earl of the West Saxons. In 1042 he helped to raise Edward the Confessor to the throne, and married him to his daughter Edith. He led the struggle against the king's foreign favourites, and Edward revenged himself by heaping insults upon Queen Edith, confining her in the monastery of Wherwell, and banishing Godwin and his sons. But in 1052 they landed in the south of England; the royal troops, the navy, and vast numbers of burghers and peasants went over to Godwin; and the king was forced to grant his demands, and reinstate his family. Godwin died at Winchester, 15th April 1053. His son Harold was for a few months Edward's successor. See Freeman's Norman Conquest.

Godwin, FRANCIS (1562-1633), was born at Hannington, Northants, the son of Thomas Godwin (1517-90), from 1584 Bishop of Bath and Wells. He graduated at Oxford in 1580, and became rector of Sampford and vicar of Weston-Zoyland, both in Somerset, sub-dean of Exeter (1587), Bishop of Llandaff (1601) and of Hereford (1617). His eight works include A Catalogue of the Bishops of England (1601), Rerum Anglicarum Annales (1616), Nuncius Inanimatus (1629), and Man in the Moon, or a Voyage thither, by Domingo Gonsales (1638). The last was translated into French and imitated by Cyrano de Bergerac, who undoubtedly influenced Swift's Gulliver.

Godwin, MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT, the protagonist of the Rights of Women, was born at Hoxton, 27th April 1759. Her father, Edward John Wollstonecraft, was a drunken ne'er-do-weel, who squandered £10,000. At nineteen Mary went out to earn her own livelihood, and was in turn a companion, a schoolmistress, and governess in Lord Kingsborough's family. In 1788, about which time she gave up church-going, she turned translator and literary adviser to Johnson the publisher, who the year before had paid her ten guineas for her Thoughts on the Education of Daughters. In this capacity she became acquainted with the literati and reformers of the day. In 1791 she produced her Answer to Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution, and in 1792 her Vindication of the Rights of Woman, a book which made her both famous and infamous. Her friendship for the painter Fuseli ripened into love, and 'to snap the chain of this association' (for Fuseli was married) she started alone for Paris in the winter of 1792. There, as a witness of the 'Terror,' she collected materials for her View of the French Revolution (vol. i. 1794); and there in 1793 she met Captain Gilbert Imlay, an American timber-merchant, the author of The Western Territory of North America (1792). In April 1794 she bore him a daughter, Fanny; in November 1795, after a four months' visit to Scandinavia as his 'wife' and accredited agent, she tried to drown herself from Putney Bridge: Inlay had deserted her. Nine months afterwards she was living with Godwin in Somers-town; they had first met in 1791. On 30th August 1797, five months after their marriage, she gave birth to a daughter, Mary; on 10th September she died. Her remains and Godwin's were in 1851 removed to Bournemouth. Among her other writings were Original Stories for Children (1791), Letters written from Sweden, Norway, and Denmark (1796), and Posthumous Works (1798), these last comprising the passionate Letters to Inlay (new ed. with memoir, 1879). See, too, the Memoirs by Godwin (1798), Mrs Pennell (1885), and Stirling Taylor (1911).

Godwin, WILLIAM, was born 3d March 1756 at Wisbeach, but passed his boyhood at Guestwick in Norfolk. After three years at Hindolveston day-school, three more with a tutor at Norwich, and one as usher in his former school, Godwin in 1773 entered Hoxton Presbyterian College; in 1778 quitted it as pure a Sandemanian and Tory as he had gone in. But during a five years' ministry at Ware, Stowmarket, and Beaconsfield, he turned Socinian and republican, and by 1787 was a 'complete unbeliever.' Meanwhile he had taken to literature, in 1783-84 writing three novels for £42, a Life of Chatham, &c. The French Revolution gave him an opening, and his Enquiry concerning Political Justice (1793) brought him fame and a thousand guineas. It was calmly subversive of everything (law and 'marriage, the worst of all laws'), but it preached down violence, and was deemed caviare for the multitude, so its author escaped prosecution. The Adventures of Caleb Williams (1794) was designed to give 'a general review of the modes of domestic and unrecorded despotism;' unlike most novels with a purpose, it is really a strong book, one that will not be forgotten. Holcroft, Horne Tooke, and ten others were charged at this time with high-treason; Godwin's powerful defence of them in the Morning Chronicle did much to break down the charge. Through Johnson the publisher it was that Godwin met Mary Wollstonecraft, and it was for fear Johnson might stop her supplies that their marriage was at first kept secret. For Godwin was hard up, and hard up he continued almost to the last. In 1801 he married Mrs Clements or Clairmont, who had two children already, and a third was born of the marriage. So there were poor Fanny Inlay (1794-1816), who died by her own hand; Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin (1797-1851), who in 1816 married Shelley; Charles Clairmont; 'Claire' Clairmont (1797-1879), the mother by Byron of Allegra; and William Godwin (1803-32), to whose posthumous novel, Transfusion, a memoir was prefixed by his father. A bookselling business, undertaken by Godwin in 1805, involved him for years in difficulties, and in 1833 he was glad to accept the sinecure post of yeoman-usher of the Exchequer. His tragedy, Antonio (1800), was hopelessly damned; nor were any of his later prose works equal to his earlier. The best are St Leon (1799) and an Essay on Sepulchres (1809). A Life of Chaucer (1803), an Answer to Malthus (1820), Lives of the Necromancers (1834), and the novels Fleetwood (1805), Mandeville (1817), and Cloudestley (1830) may be named; but Godwin's chief interest nowadays is the influence that he exercised over Shelley and Wordsworth. He died 7th April 1836. See the Life by Kegan Paul (2 vols. 1876).

Godwin - Austin, ROBERT ALFRED CLOYNE

(1808-84), geologist, was born and died at Shalford House near Guildford, having in 1830 been elected a fellow of Oriol. The Himalayan 'K2,' the second highest mountain in the world, was in 1888 named Godwin-Austen, after his son, Lieut.-Col. HENRY HAVERSHAM GODWIN-AUSTEN, F.R.S., of the Trigonometrical Survey of India, a well-known geologist and zoologist.

Goethe, JOHANN WOLFGANG, was born in Frankfurt-on-the-Main, August 28, 1749. He was quick to learn, and was carefully instructed by his father (a lawyer) and by tutors. In 1759 French troops entered Frankfurt. The French theatre opened in the city attracted the boy, who thus became familiar with Racine and more recent dramatists, while also he was receiving literary influences from the lyrical poets of Germany. He had his moods of religious feeling, and the pastoral scenes of the Old Testament had a peculiar charm for him. In 1765 he went to the university of Leipzig. He cared not at all for law, and little for literature as taught there; the awakening of his critical powers for a time damped his ardour for composition; and he fell into a melancholy mood. Companionship roused him to activity; and love counted for much in his life. His Frankfort fancy for Charitas Meixner faded before the stronger attraction of Kätchen Schönkopf. He began for her (1767) the little pastoral drama, Die Laune des Verliebten, followed by a second play, Die Mitschuldigen (1768); a group of songs set to music by Breitkopf belong also to the Leipzig period. In September 1768 Goethe was again in Frankfurt, seriously ill; he remained an invalid for the greater part of the following year. In 1770 he went to Strasburg to complete his studies, and earnestly devoted himself to chemistry, anatomy, literature, and antiquities, and, as far as was necessary, to law. He fell under Herder's influence, and through him came to feel the attraction of old ballad poetry, of Ossian, of Homer, and of Shakespeare. Goldsmith's Vicar especially delighted him. Friederike, daughter of Pastor Brion at Sesenheim, filled his heart with a new love, and was the inspiration of some of his loveliest lyrics. Having obtained his doctor's degree, he returned (1771) to Frankfurt, but, admitted an advocate, had no heart in his profession. His creative genius was fully roused, and he completed his play of Goetz von Berlichingen in 1771. Next year he was engaged in critical work for the Frankfurter gelehrte Anzeigen; and to this period belong the strikingly-contrasted poems Der Wanderer and Wanderers Sturmlied. To gain further knowledge of law Goethe settled for the summer of 1772 in Wetzlar, the seat of the imperial courts of justice. The months are memorable chiefly for his love for Lotte Buff, daughter of a land-steward; but she was the betrothed of another, and Goethe 'saved himself by flight.' Early in 1773 he set himself to recast the Goetz. A fervour of creation now possessed him. To 1773 belong his majestic Prometheus, an important group of satirical farces, the comedy of Erwin und Elmire (founded on Goldsmith's Edwin and Angelina), and the beginnings of Faust. His wonderful Leiden des jungen Werthers (1774) gives as in an essence all the spirit of the 18th-century sentimental movement. His tragedy of Clavigo (1774; Eng. trans. 1898) was in part founded on Beaumarchais' Memoires. Some of Goethe's most exquisite lyrics belong to 1775, and are connected with his love for Lili Schöne-mann. In the summer he visited Switzerland with the two Counts Stolberg; in the autumn the young Duke of Weimar, Karl August, invited him to Weimar; he accepted the invitation, and in November established himself there—for life, as it ultimately appeared. A new period of activity now began. Made a privy-councillor (1776), Goethe set himself strenuously to serve the state. By degrees much public work fell into his hands and he acquitted himself of every duty with masterly intelligence and a rare thoroughness. In 1782 he received a patent of nobility. He helped to form the immature character of the duke. The dowager-duchess from the first had confidence in him, and by degrees he won the esteem of the young wife of Karl August. His dearest friend was Charlotte von Stein (q.v.), who for ten years was his confidante, his directress, the object of his homage. Now Goethe became interested in the natural sciences. His 'vertebral theory' of the skull (1784), and his later theory that all the parts of a plant are variations of a type most clearly seen in the leaf, show how his observing powers were aided by his imagination. Some longer lyrics attest the growth of his powers; but the poem Die Geheimnisse, meant to embody his thoughts on the religions of the world, is a fragment. His noble dramatic poem, Iphigenie, was written in full (1779), but as yet only in prose; in 1777 he began his novel of Wilhelm Meister. He had long desired to visit Italy, and from the autumn of 1786 to June 1788 he was in the south. It was a most fruitful period. Egmont was carried to completion (1787); Iphigenie was recast in verse (1786); the scene of the Witches' Kitchen was added to Faust; and he sketched a tragedy, Nausikaa.

On his return to Weimar he was relieved from the most irksome of his public duties; and now he took to his home a beautiful girl of humble rank, Christiane Vulpius, whom from the first he regarded as his wife, though the marriage ceremony was not celebrated until October 1806. In December 1789 his son August was born. Memories of Italy mingle with his love of Christiane in the Roman Elegies. In 1789 he put the last touches to the play of Tasso. Next year in the seventh volume of his Works appeared a great portion of the first part of Faust as 'a Fragment.' That first part, completed in 1806, did not appear until 1808. His studies in optics were directed to disproving Newton's theory of light. In 1791 he was entrusted with the control of the court theatre at Weimar, and was himself roused to dramatic composition. In 1792 he accompanied the duke on the disastrous campaign against the French; next year he was present at the siege of Mainz. His friendship with Schiller and its fruits fill the memorable years from 1794 to 1805. Together they worked in the Horen, a review designed to elevate the literary standard in Germany. Together in the Xenien (1796) they discharged epigrams against the literary Philistines. Schiller's sympathy encouraged Goethe to set to work once more on Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre, which more than any other work of Goethe exhibits his criticism on life. The charming epic-idyl, Hermann und Dorothea, belongs to 1796-97. Then he wrote several of his finest ballads; he also translated the autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini. His third and last visit to Switzerland (1797) interrupted the flow of his creative activity, and the works undertaken after his return were of less happy conception. The epic Achilleis (1799) did not advance beyond one canto. His drama, Die natü- liche Tochter, was designed as part of a trilogy. In 1801 he was seriously ill, and painful attacks recurred from time to time. In 1808, at the Congress of Erfurt, Goethe and Napoleon met. In 1808-9 was written the novel, Die Wahlverwandtschaften (Elective Affinities). His two volumes on light and colour, Zur Farbenlehre, were speedily followed by the first part of his autobiography—Dichtung und Wahrheit (1811). It is a work of the deepest interest, but the fancy often overrides the truth. A deep grief came to Goethe in 1816 in the death of his wife. The Goethe house would have been desolate but that in 1817 his son August brought a bright and sweet-tempered wife to dwell there, and Goethe ere long found much joy in his three grandchildren. In 1821 Goethe published Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre, a continuation of the Lehrjahre. The book was recast, and finished February 1829. From time to time he had worked at the second part of Faust; by August 1831 it was at length complete. Goethe's interest in science and art was undiminished by age; he is best seen during his later years in his Conversations with Eckermann. Sorrows came fast towards the end; his older friends disappeared one by one. In 1828 died the grand-duke; next year, the Duchess Luise; his son in October 1830. Tended by his loving daughter-in-law, honoured and revered by those around him, Goethe died peacefully in his arm-chair, 22d March 1832. His body lies near that of Schiller in the ducal vault at Weimar. Goethe was a man of noble bodily presence both in youth and age. His teaching has been styled the creed of culture; it is rather the creed of self-development with a view to usefulness—usefulness to be effected by activity within wise limits. There are innumerable translations of Faust, including those by Bayard Taylor and Anna Swanwick; of other translations from Goethe, Carlyle's of Wilhelm Meister is the best known. [Geh.-th.]

Goetz von Berlichingen. See Görz.

Goffe, WILLIAM (c. 1605-79), regicide, born at Stanmer rectory, Sussex, became major-general in the Parliamentary army, sat in the House of Commons, and signed Charles I.'s death-warrant. In 1660 he fled to America, and lived for many years in seclusion at Hadley, Mass. There in 1675, according to tradition, when the townsmen were called from the meeting-house to repel an Indian attack, he put himself at their head and drove off the red-skins, then disappeared as suddenly as he had come.

Gogol, NICOLAI VASILIEVITCH, born at Sorochintsi in Poltava, 31st March 1809, in 1829 settled in St Petersburg, and became famous through two series of stories of Little Russia (1831-34). One of the best of Russian comedies is The Inspector-General (1836; Eng. trans. 1892), exposing the corruption, ignorance, and vanity of the provincial officials. His masterpiece, Dead Souls, or better Dead Serfs (1837; Eng. trans. 1887), is a story reflecting the more sordid aspects of provincial life. After unsatisfactory trials of official life, and of public teaching, including university history lectures at St Petersburg in 1834, Gogol left Russia in 1836 to live abroad, mostly in Rome, until 1846, when he returned to Russia. He died at Moscow, 3d March 1852.

Golding, RICHARD (1785-1865), a London engraver after West, Lawrence, &c.

Goldoni, CARLO, dramatist, was born at Venice, 25th February 1707. He studied for the law, but his heart was set upon play-writing. A tragedy, Belisario (1732), proved a hit; but he soon discovered that his forte was comedy, and set himself to effect a revolution in the Italian comic stage. He spent several years in wandering over North Italy, until in 1740 he settled in his birth-place, where for twenty years he poured forth comedy after comedy. In 1761 he undertook to write for the Italian theatre in Paris, and was attached to the French court until the Revolution. He died 6th February 1793. See his own Mémoires (1787), Lives by Molmenti (1879) and Galanti (2d ed. 1883), and Vernon Lee's Eighteenth Century Italian Studies (1880). [Gol-dò'nee.]

Goldschmidt, MADAME (JENNY LIND), a soprano singer, born of humble parentage at Stockholm, October 6, 1820, was admitted at nine to the school of singing attached to the court theatre, at eighteen appeared as Agatha in Der Freischütz, Alice in Robert le Diable, &c. In 1841 she went to Paris to receive lessons from Garcia. In 1844 she visited Berlin, in 1846 Vienna, and in 1847 London, where she gained an extraordinary popularity. Her return visit to London in 1848 was an immense triumph; after 1849 she left the stage and sang only at concerts. Her share, £35,000, of the profits of a concert tour in America (1849-52) was more than spent in founding and endowing musical scholarships and charities in Sweden. In 1851 she married Otto Goldschmidt, a native of Hamburg, her pianist. Returning to Europe, she continued to sing at concerts and in oratorios, for the last time at Düsseldorf (1870). Her English charities included a hospital at Liverpool and the wing of a hospital in London; and she founded the Mendelssohn scholarship. In 1888-86 she was professor of singing at the Royal College of Music. Of profoundly religious character and much beloved, she died near Malvern, November 2, 1887. See Memoir by Canon Scott Holland and W. S. Rockstro (1891). [Golld'-shmit.]

Goldschmidt, MEIER AARON (1819-87), Danish novelist, was born at Vordingborg of Jewish parentage, lived often in Paris, and died at Copenhagen. See his Autobiography (1877).

Goldsmith, OLIVER, was born at Pallas in Longford, 10th November 1728, his father being at that time curate to the rector of Kilkenny West. After attending various local schools he entered Trinity College, Dublin, as a 'sizar' in June 1744, but showed no exceptional ability. In 1747 he was involved in a college riot, and finally ran away; but, matters being patched up by his elder brother, returned, and took his B.A. in February 1749. His uncle (the father was dead) wished him to qualify for orders, but he was rejected by the Bishop of Elphin; thereupon he started for America, but got no farther than Cork. He was next equipped with £50 to study law in London; this disappeared at a Dublin gaming-table. In 1752 he went to Edinburgh to study physic, and stayed there nearly two years, but was more noted for his social gifts than his professional acquirements. He here visited Leyden, again lost at play what money he had, and finally set out to make the 'grand tour' on foot. After wandering through Flanders, France, Germany, and Italy, and obtaining, either at Louvain or Padua, a dubious degree as M.B., he returned to England in 1756, with a few halfpence in his pockets, and became an apothecary's assistant. For a time he practised as a poor physician in Southwark, then was proof-reader to Richardson, and next usher in Dr Milner's 'classical academy' at Peckham. Griffiths of the Monthly Review retained him (for a few months) as author-of-all-work; and in February 1758 appeared his first definite work, a translation of the Memoirs of Jean Marteilhe, a persecuted French Protestant. Dr Milner had promised to obtain for him a berth as factory surgeon on the Coromandel coast; to get funds for his outfit he set about an Enquiry into the State of Polite Learning in Europe. But the nomination fell through, and in December he endeavoured unsuccessfully to pass at Surgeons' Hall for the humbler post of hospital mate. After he had pawned his clothes and been threatened with a debtor's prison, the Enquiry (1759) attracted some notice, and better days dawned on Goldsmith. He started The Bee (1759), and contributed to The Busy Body and The Lady's Magazine. Then came overtures from Smollett and Newbery the bookseller. For the British Magazine of the former he wrote some of his best essays; for the Public Ledger of the latter the Chinese Letters (1760-61; republished as The Citizen of the World). In May 1761 he moved to 6 Wine Office Court, Fleet Street, where, in the same month, he was visited by Johnson. In 1762 he published a Life of Beau Nash. In 1764 the 'Literary Club' was founded, and he was one of its nine original members. His anonymous History of England was followed in December 1764 by The Traveller, a poem which gave him a foremost place among the minstrels of the day. The Vicar of Wakefield (1766) secured his reputation as a novelist. The Good Natur'd Man, a comedy (1768), was a moderate success. But he again escaped from enforced compilation (Histories of Rome, &c., History of Animated Nature) with his best poetical effort, The Deserted Village (1770); and three years afterwards achieved the highest dramatic honours by She Stoops to Conquer. A year later (April 4, 1774) he died in his chambers at 2 Brick Court, Middle Temple, of a fever. He was buried in the burial-ground of the Temple Church, and the club erected a monument to him in Westminster Abbey. In the year of his death were published the unfinished rhymed sketches called Retaliation, and in 1776 The Haunch of Venison. Goldsmith died £2000 in debt. As a man, despite many obvious faults, he was warm-hearted and generous, and full of unfeigned love and pity for humanity. As a writer, in addition to the most fortunate mingling of humour and tenderness, he possessed that native charm of style which neither learning nor labour can acquire. See Lives by James Prior (1837), John Forster (1848; 6th ed. 1877), Washington Irving (1849), W. Black (1879), Austin Dobson (with bibliography, 1888), Ashe King (1898, 1910), Moore (1910); and the works (ed. Gibbs 1884-86).

Goldstücker, THEODORE (1821-72), born of Jewish parents at Königsberg, studied there, at Bonn, and at Paris, and in 1852 was appointed professor of Sanskrit in University College, London. His Literary Remains (2 vols. 1879) comprise 67 articles contributed to the 1st edition of Chambers's Encyclopædia.

Goldwell, THOMAS (c. 1508–85), from 1555 Bishop of St Asaph, and from 1559 a Catholic refugee, was born at Goldwell, Kent, attended the Council of Trent (1562), and died at Rome.

Gomarus, or GOMAR, FRANCIS (1563–1641), theologian, was born at Bruges, and studied at Strasburg, Heidelberg, Oxford, and Cambridge, where he took his B.D. in 1584. In 1594 he became Divinity professor at Leyden, and signalled himself by his hostility to his colleague, Arminius. At the synod of Dort (1618) he secured the Arminians' expulsion from the Reformed Church. He died a professor at Groningen.

Gomes de Amorim, FRANCISCO (1827–92), Portuguese poet, spent his youth in Brazil.

Gomme, SIR GEORGE LAURENCE (cr. 1911), born in London in 1853, has written on folklore, folkmoths, village communities, &c.

Gomme, SIR WILLIAM MAYNARD, K.C.B. (1784–1875), in 1868 created a field-marshal, was born in Barbadoes, served in the Peninsular war, the Walcheren Expedition, and at Quatre Bras and Waterloo, and was commander-in-chief in India 1850–55. See his Letters and Journals (1881).

Goncourt, EDMOND and JULES DE, French novelists, born, the former at Nancy 26th May 1822, the latter at Paris 17th December 1830. Artists primarily, in 1849 they set out to traverse France for water-colour sketches. Their notebooks made them writers as well as artists, and already in 1852 they had commenced their literary partnership. Their earliest serious works were a group of historical studies (1854–75) upon the second half of the 18th century. Of much more real value is Gavarni (1873), L'Art au XVIII^e Siècle (1874), and books on Watteau (1876) and Prud'hon (1877). But the important work of the De Goncourt brothers commenced when they took to novel-writing. Their task was to unite by means of a plot a multitude of observed facts, and to cast around these an atmosphere which should illumine them. Their subject is not so much the passions as the manners of the 19th century, and their sense of the enormous influence of environment and habit upon man necessitated a close study of contemporary life. The first of these novels, Les Hommes de Lettres (1860; new ed. as Charles Demailly), was followed by Sœur Philomène (1861), Renée Maupérin (1864), Germinie Lacerteux (1865), Manette Salomon (1867), and Madame Gervaisais (1869). The last is their greatest novel; its sharp and painful analysis was too close a reflex of themselves. After Jules's death on 20th June 1870, Edmond, who lived till 16th July 1896, issued the extraordinarily popular La Fille Elisa (1878), La Faustine (1882), and Chérie (1885). The interesting Idees et Sensations (1866) had already revealed their morbid hyper-acuteness of sensation, and La Maison d'un Artiste (1881) had shown their patient love for bric-à-brac; the Lettres de Jules Goncourt (1885), and still more the Journal des Goncourt (9 vols. 1888–96), disclosed their formal conception of fiction and their method of work. See Paul Bourget's Nouveaux Essais de Psychologie (1885), Delzant's Les Goncourt (1889), and Belloc and Sheddock's Letters and Journals of E. and J. Goncourt (2 vols. 1894). [Gons-koor.]

Gondinet, EDMOND (1828–88), dramatist, was born at Laurière in Haute-Vienne, and died in Paris. See Life by Besson (2d ed. 1890).

Gon'domar, DIEGO SARMIENTO DE ACUÑA, MARQUIS DE, as Spanish ambassador in England

1613–21 laboured to arrange the marriage of Prince Charles with the Infanta.

Gongora. LUIS DE GÓNGORA Y ARGOTE, Spanish lyric poet, was born at Cordova, 11th June 1561, studied law, but in 1606 took orders and became a prebendary of Cordova, and eventually chaplain to Philip III. He died 23d May 1627. Gongora's earlier writings—sonnets, lyrics, odes, ballads, and songs—are inspired with much true poetic feeling. His later works, consisting for the most part of longer poems, such as Solidades, Polifemo, Piramo y Tisbe, are executed in an entirely novel style, which his followers designated the stilto culto. It is florid, pedantic, and obscure. See Churton's Gongora (2 vols. Lond. 1862).

Gonsalvo di Cordova (Gonzalo Hernandez y Aguilar), 'the Great Captain,' was born at Montilla near Cordova, 16th March 1453. He served with distinction against the Moors of Granada, and afterwards in Portugal. Sent to assist Ferdinand II. of Naples against the French (1495), he conquered the greater part of the kingdom of Naples, and expelled the French. When the partition of Naples was determined upon in 1500, Gonsalvo again set out for Italy, but first took Zante and Cephalonia from the Turks, and restored them to the Venetians. He then landed in Sicily, occupied Naples and Calabria, and demanded from the French that they should keep the compact. This demand being rejected, war was waged with varied success; but ultimately Gonsalvo won a great battle (1503), and secured Naples to Spain. Recalled in 1506, and treated by the king with neglect, Gonsalvo withdrew to his estates in Granada, and died 2d December 1515.

Gonville, EDMUND. See CAIUS.

Gonza'ga, a princely family named from a small town in the province of Mantua, who ruled Mantua for three centuries, and from 1432 were marquises, from 1530 dukes of Mantua. They were the champions of the imperial interests, and were always at war with the Visconti Dukes of Milan. The tenth and last Duke of Mantua, who had sided with the French, was deprived by the Emperor Joseph I. of his states, and died in exile in 1708. The Dukes of Montferat were a branch of the Gonzagas.

Gonzaga, LUIGI, known as St ALOYSIUS, was born in the castle of Castiglione near Brescia, 9th March 1568. Renouncing his marquise, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1585. In a plague at Rome he devoted himself to the care of the sick; and, stricken by the malady, died 21st June 1591. He was canonised in 1726. See the Italian Life by Ceparì (Eng. trans. by Father Goldie, 1891), that by E. H. Thompson (new ed. 1893), and Aubrey de Vere's Essays (1888).

Good, JOHN MASON (1764–1827), born at Epping, studied medicine in London, and from 1793 combined the practice of medicine with the most miscellaneous literary activity. His writings embrace poems, translations of Job, the Song of Songs, and Lucretius, essays on prisons, and a history of medicine. He helped Dr Olinthus Gregory to produce an encyclopædia (1813).

Goodwin, CHARLES WYCLIFFE (1817-78), Egyptologist, was born at Lynn, and from 1865 was a judge at Shanghai and Yokohama.—His brother, HARVEY GOODWIN (1818-91), graduated as second wrangler at Cambridge in 1840, and in 1858 became dean of Ely, in 1869 bishop of Carlisle. See Life by Rawnsley (1896).

Goodyear, CHARLES (1800-60), born at New Haven, Conn., failed as an iron-manufacturer, and in 1834 took to india-rubber. Amid poverty and ridicule he pursued the experiments which ended, in 1844, in the invention of vulcanised rubber. See Pierce's Trials of an Inventor (1866).

Googe, BARNABE (1540-94), poet, was born at Alvingham in Lincolnshire, studied both at Cambridge and Oxford, travelled on the Continent, and became one of the gentlemen-pensioners of Queen Elizabeth. His best works are a series of eight eclogues and his Cupido Conquered. C. Hope in 1880.

Gordianus, MARCUS ANTONIUS, descended from the Gracchi, was twice consul, and next proconsul of Africa. The tyranny of the Emperor Maximinus excited a rebellion in Africa, and Gordianus, then in his eightieth year, was proclaimed emperor (238), his son being conjoined with him. But when, a month later, the younger Gordianus was defeated and slain, the elder committed suicide.—His grandson, MARCUS ANTONIUS GORDIANUS (225-44), was elevated by the Pretorians to the rank of Augustus in 238. He marched in 242 against the Persians and relieved Antioch, but was assassinated.

Gordon, THE FAMILY OF, takes its origin and name from the lands of Gordon in Berwickshire, became lords of Strathbogie in 1357, and increased their domains and dignities, till in 1445 the head of the house became Earl of Huntly. His son was chancellor in 1498-1501, and his son commanded the left wing at Flodden.—GEORGE, fourth Earl (1514-62), was lieutenant of the north and chancellor of the realm, but, when stripped by the Crown of his new earldom of Moray, rushed into revolt and fell at Corrichie.—GEORGE, sixth Earl (1562-1636), was head of the Roman Catholics in Scotland, defeated at Glenlivet a royal force under the Earl of Argyll in 1594, but, submitting to the king, was pardoned and made Marquis of Huntly in 1599.—His son GEORGE, the second Marquis, espoused the royal cause in the civil war, and was beheaded at Edinburgh in 1649.—His son LEWIS was restored by Charles II. in 1651.—GEORGE, fourth Marquis (1643-1716), was created Duke of Gordon in 1684, and held Edinburgh Castle for James VII. at the Revolution.—ALEXANDER, second Duke (c. 1678-1728), was also a Jacobite, and his third son, LORD LEWIS GORDON, died an exile at Montreuil in 1754.—COSMO GEORGE, the third Duke, died in 1752, leaving three sons. The youngest was LORD GEORGE GORDON (q.v.); the eldest, ALEXANDER, fourth Duke (c. 1745-1827), was the author of the well-known song, 'Cauld Kail in Aberdeen.'—His wife, the sprightly JANE MAXWELL (c. 1749-1812), was known as the 'beautiful Duchess of Gordon.' GEORGE, fifth Duke (1770-1836), died without issue, when the title of Duke of Gordon became extinct, and that of Marquis of Huntly was adjudged to the Earl of Aboyne. The estates went to the Duke's nephew, Charles, fifth Duke of Richmond and Lennox, grandson of the fourth Duke of Gordon; and his son, the sixth Duke of Richmond, was in 1876 created also Duke of Gordon. ELIZABETH, Duchess of Gordon (1774-1864), widow of the fifth Duke, was a woman of eminent piety (see her Life and Letters, 1866).

LORD JOHN GORDON, second son of the first Marquis of Huntly, was made Viscount Melgum and Lord Aboyne in 1627; on 18th October 1630 he was burned to death in the Crichtons' tower of Frendraught. Viscount Aboyne was the style after 1632, Earl of Aboyne after 1660, and Marquis of Huntly after 1836. See the eleventh Marquis's Records of Aboyne (New Spalding Club, 1894).—About 1512 the second son of the second Earl of Huntly married the Countess of Sutherland, and was progenitor of the Gordon Earls of Sutherland. See the History of the Earldom (1813), written in 1630 by Sir Robert Gordon of Gordonstown (1550-1656), the twelfth Earl's fourth son.—WILLIAM OF GORDON (1306-29), second son of Sir Adam of Gordon, was the progenitor of Sir John Gordon of Lochinvar (1509-1634), created in 1633 Viscount Kemmure. William, sixth Viscount, was beheaded in 1716 for his share in the rebellion. The peerage, then forfeited, was restored in 1824, but died out with Adam, the ninth Viscount, in 1847.—The Gordons of Earlston, famous in Covenanted annals, were a cadet branch of the Lochinvar line.—According to tradition the Earls of Aberdeen (q.v.) are descended from an illegitimate brother of Sir Adam of Gordon, killed at Homildon in 1402.—Among other members of the House of Gordon were Colonel John Gordon, one of the assassins of Wallenstein; Gordon Pasha; and, through his mother, Lord Byron.

Gordon, ADAM LINDSAY, Australian poet, was born at Fayal in the Azores in 1833, the son of a retired army-captain. At twenty he sailed to Adelaide, and was successively police-trooper, horse-breaker, and livery-stable keeper, withal the best gentleman steeplechase-rider in the colony. His broken circumstances deepened his natural gloom, and he blew out his brains at Brighton, a marine suburb of Melbourne, 24th June 1870. He had published Sea-spray and Smoke-drift (1867), Ashtaroath (1867), and Bush Ballads and Galloping Rhymes (1870). Its opening poem, 'The Sick Stock-rider,' is a marvellously vivid transcript from the bush-life he knew; and 'How we beat the Favourite' is the best ballad of the turf in English. See Marcus Clarke's introduction to Gordon's collected poems (1880), and memoir by J. Howlett Ross (1888).

Gordon, CHARLES GEORGE ('Gordon Pasha'), was born at Woolwich, 28th January 1833, fourth son of General Gordon, R.A., and descended from a cadet branch of the House of Huntly. He entered Woolwich Academy in 1847, and the Royal Engineers in 1852; served before Sebastopol from January 1855 to the end of the siege; and in 1856-57 was engaged in surveying the new frontiers between Turkey and Russia. In 1860 he went to China and took part in the capture of Peking and the destruction of the Summer Palace. In 1863-64, in command of a Chinese force, he fought thirty-three actions against the Taipings and took numerous walled towns, effectually crushing the formidable rebellion—a feat that placed 'Chinese Gordon' in the foremost rank of the soldiers of his day. In 1865-71 he was for six years engaged in the ordinary engineer duties at Gravesend, devoting his spare moments to relieving the want and misery of the poor, visiting the sick, teaching, feeding, and clothing the waifs and strays. In 1871-72 he was on the Danube Navigation Commission; in 1873 he accepted employment under Ismail, Khedive of Egypt, and took up Sir Samuel Baker's work of opening up the vast regions of the equatorial Nile. A chain of posts was established along the Nile, steamers were placed about the last rapid, and the navigation of Lake Albert Nyanza was successfully accomplished; but realising that his efforts to suppress the slave-trade must remain unsuccessful unless his power extended to the vast plain countries lying west of the Nile basin, Gordon returned to England in 1876. Going out again in 1877, he was appointed governor of the entire Soudan, from the Second Cataract of the Nile to the Great Lakes, and from the Red Sea to the head-waters of the streams that fall into Lake Chad. During the next three years he traversed in all directions this vast territory. Neither the numbers of his enemies nor the fiercest sun could check his energy. His presence awed the wild tribes into obedience, and for the first time the Soudan saw law and justice united with government. Early in 1880 all this ceased—Gordon resigned his command, feeling that under the new system established in Cairo there was no place for his work. He made a short visit to India and China; but the close of 1880 found him in Ireland propounding a scheme of land-law improvement. For a year he volunteered to take another officer's duty in the Mauritius, and from Mauritius proceeded to the Cape in colonial employment, returning finally to England in the close of 1882. Almost the whole of 1883 was spent in Palestine in quiet and reflection. Early in 1884 he was asked by the British government to proceed once more to the Soudan to extricate the Egyptian garrisons from amongst the revolted natives, and to proclaim the separation of the country from Egyptian rule. A month after he reached Khartoum it was invested by the troops of the Mahdi. The siege had lasted five months when a relief expedition was organised in England. In September the advance up the Nile began, and early in November the troops entered the Soudan at the Second Cataract. After two months' arduous labour the advance arrived on 28th January 1885 in the neighbourhood of Khartoum. It was too late. The place had been taken two days earlier, and Gordon had fallen. See Andrew Wilson's Ever-Victorious Army (1868); Birkbeck Hill's Gordon in Central Africa (1881); Gordon's own Reflections in Palestine (1884), Last Journals (1885), and Letters to his Sister (1888); the Lives of him by Hake (1884-85), Arch. Forbes (1884), his brother, Sir Henry Gordon (1886), Sir W. F. Butler (1889), and D. Boulger (2 vols. 1896); and for Gordon's impracticability as an official, Lord Cromer's Modern Egypt (1908).

Gordon, LORD GEORGE, was born in London, 26th December 1751, the third son of the third Duke of Gordon. From Eton he entered the navy; retired as a lieutenant in 1772; and elected in 1774 M.P. for Ludgershall, Wiltshire, rendered himself conspicuous by the freedom and ability with which he attacked both sides. A bill having in 1778 passed for the relief of Roman Catholics from certain disabilities, Lord George, as president of a Protestant association, headed (2d June 1780) a mob of 50,000 persons, who marched in procession to the House of Commons to present a petition for its repeal. Dreadful five days' riots ensued, during which many Catholic chapels and private houses, Newgate, and the house of the chief justice, Lord Mansfield, were destroyed. On the 7th the troops were called out, and 210 of the rioters were killed, 248 wounded, and 135 arrested, of whom 21 were executed. Property to the amount of £180,000 was destroyed in the riots. Lord George was tried for high-treason; but Erskine's defence got him off. In 1787 he was convicted for a libel on Marie Antoinette. He withdrew to Holland, but, being sent back, was committed to Newgate, where he died 1st November 1793, having become a proselyte to Judaism. See Life by Dr Robert Watson (1795) and Dickens's Barnaby Rudge.

Gordon, JAMES. See GORDON, ROBERT.

Gordon, SIR JOHN WATSON (1788-1864), born at Edinburgh, on Raeburn's death in 1823 succeeded him as the first portrait-painter of Scotland. In 1850 he was elected P.R.S.A. and knighted, and in 1851 he became an R.A. Nearly every man of note in Scotland sat to him, among them Dr Chalmers and Lord Dalhousie.

Gordon, LORD LEWIS. See GORDON (Family of).

Gordon, LUCIE, LADY DUFF, only child of John Anstin (q.v.), was born in London, 24th June 1821, and in 1840 married Sir Alexander Duff-Gordon (1811-72). She translated from the German Niebuhr's Gods and Heroes of Greece (1842), Meinhold's Amber Witch (1844), French in Algiers (1845), Feuerbach's Criminal Trials (1846), Ranke's House of Brandenburg and Ferdinand and Maximilian (with her husband's help, 1849 and 1853). In 1861-62 she visited the Cape of Good Hope for her health, and thence penned her vivacious Letters from the Cape. After her return she went to Egypt, whither she had to retreat in 1863 again. She died at Cairo 14th July 1869. Her Letters from Egypt (1863) and Last Letters from Egypt (1875) form her best contribution to literature. See Janet Ross, Three Generations of Englishwomen (1888).

Gordon, PATRICK, soldier of fortune, was born at Easter Auchleuchries, Aberdeenshire, 31st March 1635. Brought up a Catholic, at sixteen he sailed for Danzig, and entered the Jesuit college of Braunsberg; but, unable to bear its austerity, he escaped in 1653 and led an unsettled life, until in 1655 he entered the service of Sweden, then at war with Poland. During the next six years he was repeatedly made prisoner, and as often took service with his captors, until again retaken. In 1661 he joined the Muscovite standard; and here his services in disciplining the Russian soldiers gained him rapid promotion—he was made colonel in 1665. The czar sent him on a mission to England in 1666; and though on his return he fell into disgrace, during 1670-76 he was subduing the Cossacks in the Ukraine, in 1677 defending Russia against Turks and Tartars. In 1685, now lieutenant-general, he visited England and Scotland. James II. wished him to enter the English service, but he was not allowed to quit Russia. In 1688 he was made general, and next year Czar Peter owed to Gordon his signal triumph over the conspirators. In 1698 he crushed the revolt of the Strelitzes. He died 29th November 1699. See Dr Robertson's edition of parts of his Diary (Spalding Club, 1859).

Gordon, ROBERT (1580-1661), of Straloch, along with his son, JAMES (c. 1615-86), who was minister of Rothiemay, Banffshire, completed Pont's Scotch maps for Blaeu's Atlas. The son also wrote Scots Affairs 1624-51 (Spalding Club, 1841).—A grandson, ROBERT GORDON (1665-1732), founded a boys' school at Aberdeen.

Gordon, SIR ROBERT (1647-1704), of Gordons-town, Elginshire, a mechanic and reputed warlock. See also GORDON (Family of).

Gore, MRS CATHERINE GRACE, novelist, daughter of Mr Moody, wine merchant, was born at East Retford in 1799. In 1823 she was married to Captain Charles Arthur Gore, with whom she resided for many years on the Continent, supporting her family by her voluminous literary labours, mainly novels of fashionable life. Latterly blind, she died January 29, 1861.

Gore, CHARLES, bishop of Worcester (1901), Birmingham (1904), and Oxford (1911), born in 1853 nephew of the fourth Earl of Arran, was 1875-95 a fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, and in 1894 became a canon of Westminster. He edited the Broad-High church Lux Mundi (1889), and has published Incarnation of the Son of God (1891), Dissertations on the Incarnation (1895), &c.

Görgei, ARTHUR, born at Toporz in North Hungary 5th February 1818, during the revolt of 1848 compelled Jellachich and his 10,000 Croats to capitulate at Ozora (7th October), but was driven back by Windschgrätz. As Hungarian commander-in-chief he relieved Komorn by inflicting a series of severe defeats on the Austrians, practically driving them out of the country. Though almost constantly at feud with Kossuth and a provisional government, he in 1849 accepted the ministry of war. By unintelligible delays and jealousies he allowed the enemy to gain numerous advantages, and was himself repeatedly defeated. On 11th August he was nominated dictator, and two days later surrendered with his army of 24,000 men to the Russian commander, Rüdiger, at Világos near Arad. Görgei was imprisoned at Klagenfurt, but eventually set at liberty. Kossuth accused him of treachery, a charge to which he replied in Mein Leben und Wirken in 1848-49 (1852). He returned to Hungary in 1868, and in 1885 a large number of his old comrades formally declared him free of all suspicion of disloyalty to the national cause.

Gorges, SIR FERDINANDO (c. 1566-1647), 'the father of colonisation in America,' was born at Ashton in Somerset. He founded two Plymouth companies (1606-19 and 1620-35) for planting lands in New England, in 1639 received a charter constituting him proprietor of Maine, and died at Bristol. His grandson sold his rights to Massachusetts in 1677 for £1250.

Gorgias, Greek sophist, was born at Leontini in Sicily about 500 B.C., and came to Athens as ambassador in 427. He settled in Greece, became famous as a teacher of eloquence, and travelled from place to place, acquiring both wealth and fame. He died about 380, more than a hundred years old. He seems to have drawn the extremest consequences of the sophistic scepticism. Plato's dialogue Gorgias is written against him. Of two works doubtfully attributed the best edition is by Blass (2d ed. Leip. 1881).

Gorham, GEORGE CORNELIUS (1787-1857), born at St Neots, and for seventeen years a fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, was in 1847 presented by the Lord-Chancellor to the vicarage of Bramford Speke in North Devon; but Dr Phillpotts, Bishop of Exeter, refused to institute him on the ground of unsoundness as to the efficacy of baptism. The Arches Court of Canterbury decided (1849) that baptismal regeneration is the doctrine of the Church of England; and Gorham next appealed to the judicial committee of the Privy-council, who found that differences of opinion on various points left open were always thought consistent with subscription to the Articles. So in 1851 Gorham was instituted.

Gorky, MAXIME, is the pen name of Maxime Alexei Maximovitch Peshkov, born at Nizhni Novgorod 14th March 1868, and successively pedlar, scullery-boy, gardener, dock-hand, tramp, and great Russian novelist. An uncompromising realist, he deals largely with the seamy side of character. See the Life by Dr E. J. Dillon (1902).

Görres, JAKOB JOSEPH VON (1776-1848), born at Coblenz, became a lecturer on physics in his native town. In 1807 he published part of his German Volksbücher, and in 1810 his work on Asiatic mythology. In 1812 he became the literary centre of the national movement. After the re-establishment of German independence he denounced absolutism with such energy as to incur the displeasure of the Prussian government, and he had to flee the country (1820). In 1827 he was made professor of Literature at Munich. His later years were devoted to literature and controversial theology, and he founded a Catholic journal. His chief work was his Christliche Mystik (1842; new ed. 1879). See Lives by Sepp (1876) and Galland (1876). [Gehr-rez.]

Gorton, SAMUEL, founder of the obscure and extinct sect of 'Gortonites,' was born at Gorton, Lancashire, and emigrated in 1636 to New England, where he died at Warwick in 1677.

Gortschakoff, PRINCE ALEXANDER MICHAELOVITCH, was born at St Petersburg, 16th July 1798. As ambassador at Vienna (1854-56) he displayed great ability during the Crimean war; he then succeeded Nesselrode as foreign minister. As chancellor of the empire (1863) he was, till Bismarck's rise, the most powerful minister in Europe. His influence largely secured the neutrality of Austria in the Franco-German war of 1870, and he it was who in 1871 freed Russia from the treaty of Paris (1856). After the conclusion of the Russo-Turkish war, the repudiation of the treaty of San Stefano, and the signing of the treaty of Berlin his influence began to wane, and he retired in 1882. He died at Baden-Baden, 1st March 1883. See Klaczko's Two Chancellors (Eng. trans. 1876).—His cousin, PRINCE MICHAEL GORTSCHAKOFF (1795–1861), served against the French in 1812–14 and the Turks in 1828–29. He distinguished himself during the Polish revolution of 1831, and in Hungary in 1849. On the outbreak of the Crimean war he commanded in the Danubian Principalities, and, now commander-in-chief in the Crimea (1855), was defeated on the Tchernaya, but recovered his laurels by his gallant defence of Sebastopol.

Goschen, GEORGE JOACHIM, since 1901 Viscount Goschen of Hawkhurst, was the son of a German merchant in London, and was born 10th August 1831. In 1863 he published The Theory of Foreign Exchanges (16th ed. 1894), and became Liberal M.P. for the City of London, holding office as Vice-president of the Board of Trade (1865), Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1866), President of the Poor-law Board (1868), and head of the Admiralty (1871–74). His next work was in regulating Egyptian finances (1876), and as ambassador extraordinary to the Porte (1880) he induced Turkey to fulfil her treaty obligations to Greece. A strenuous opponent of Home Rule, in 1887–92 he was Unionist Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in 1888 converted part of the National Debt; in 1895–99 he was First Lord of the Admiralty. He died 6th February 1907. His grandfather, Georg Joachim Goschen (1752–1828), was a famous Leipzig bookseller. [G'oschen.]

Goss, SIR JOHN (1800–80), composer of anthems, glees, &c., was born at Fareham, Hants, and was organist of St Paul's from 1838 to 1872, when he was knighted.

Gosse, PHILIP HENRY, F.R.S., naturalist, was born at Worcester, 10th April 1810, but brought up at Poole. In 1827 he went to Newfoundland as a clerk, and was afterwards farmer in Canada, schoolmaster in Alabama, and naturalist in Jamaica. Returning to England, he published in 1840 the Canadian Naturalist, and after another stay in the West Indies settled in England to a literary life, publishing The Birds of Jamaica (1851), A Naturalist's Sojourn in Jamaica (1851), A Naturalist's Ramble on the Devonshire Coast (1853), Aquarium (1854), Manual of Marine Zoology (1855–56), and The Romance of Natural History (his best-known work, 1860–62). More severely scientific works were his Actinologia Britannica (1860) and the Prehistoric Armature of the Pappilionidæ (1885). He died at St Marychurch near Torquay, 23d August 1888. See Life by his son (1890).—That son, EDMUND WILLIAM GOSSE, was born in London, September 21, 1849, and became at eighteen an assistant-librarian at the British Museum, in 1875 translator to the Board of Trade. From 1884 to 1889 he was Clark lecturer in English literature at Cambridge; and in the year 1904 he was appointed Librarian to the House of Lords. Among his writings in verse are Madrigals, Songs, and Sonnets (1870); On Viol and Flute (1873); King Erik, a tragedy (1876); The Unknown Lover, a drama (1878); New Poems (1879); Firdausi in Exile (1886); and In Russet and Silver (1894). His prose writings include Northern Studies (1879), Gray (1882), Seventeenth-century Studies (3 vols. 1883–97), From Shakespeare to Pope (1885), Life of Congreve (1888), History of Eighteenth-century Literature (1889), Jacobean Poets (1894), Critical Kit-Kats (1896), Modern English Literature (1898), a four-volume English Literature (with Dr Garnett, 1903), and books on Donne (1899), Jeremy Taylor (1904), Sir Thomas Browne (1905), and Ibsen (1906).

Got, FRANÇOIS JULES EDMOND (1822–1901), actor, was born at Lignerolles (Orne), and in 1844 made his début. From 1850 to 1866 he was a member of the Comédie Française, and he repeatedly played in London. In 1881 he received the cross of the Legion of Honour, and in 1895 took his farewell of the stage. [Goh.]

Gottfried von Strassburg (died before 1220) wrote the (unfinished) Arthurian poem, Tristan und Isolde (whence Wagner's opera), in 19,552 short rhymed lines. The best edition is by Bechstein (3d ed. 1890–1). Modern German translations are by Kurtz (1844), Simrock (1855), and Hertz (1877).

Gothard, or GODEHARD, ST (c. 961–1038), born in Bavaria, in 1022 became Bishop of Hildesheim.

Gothelf, JEREMIAS. See BITZUIS.

Gottschalk. See HINCMAR.

Gottschall, RUDOLF VON, born at Breslau, 30th September 1823, in 1842–43 produced two volumes of political poems, and in 1848–52 several plays, of which the most successful was Pitt und Fox. In two epic poems, Die Göttin (1858) and Carlo Zeno (1854), he emancipated himself largely from the exaggerated style of his earlier pieces. In his history of German National Literature in the 19th century (1885; 6th ed. 1892) and a work on poetry (1858; 6th ed. 1893), he advocates the cause of 'modern ideas' in literature. After writing other plays, the best the tragedy Maseppa (1859), he became in 1864 editor of two Leipzig journals. From 1871 he published romances and collections of essays. He died in March 1909. [Gott-shall.]

Gottsched, JOHANN CHRISTOPH (1700–66), born at Judithenkirch near Königsberg, in 1730 became professor of Philosophy and Poetry at Leipzig, and in 1734 of Logic and Metaphysics. Gottsched laboured to improve his mother-tongue as a literary vehicle, and to reform the German drama by banishing buffoonery and raising the style and tone. But he became pedantic and vain, and manifested a petty jealousy of all literary authority save his own, opposing Bodmer and pool-pooing Lessing. His drama, The Dying Cato (1732), notwithstanding its immense success, is sadly barren. See German works by Danzel (1845), Breitmair (1879), Bernays (1880), Reicke (1892), and Krause (1894). [Gott-shed.]

Götz von Berlichingen (1480–1562), 'of the Iron Hand', born at Jaxthausen in Würtemberg, from 1497 onwards was involved in continual feuds, in which he displayed both lawless daring and chivalrous magnanimity. At the siege of Landshut (1505) he lost his right hand, which was replaced by one of steel, invented by himself. Twice he was put under the ban of the empire—in 1512 for plundering a band of Nuremberg merchants, and in 1516 for carrying off Philip of Waldeck and holding him to ransom. He fought for Duke Ulrich of Würtemberg (1519) against the Swabian league, and after his heroic defence of Mäckmühl was taken prisoner. In the Peasants' War of 1525 he led a section of the insurgents, was captured by the Swabian league, kept a prisoner at Augsburg for two years, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. He was only freed on the dissolution of the league in 1540. In 1542 he was fighting in Hungary against the Turks, and in 1544 in France. He died in his castle of Hornberg. He wrote an autobiography, published by Pistorius (1731), on which Goethe grounded the drama translated by Scott. [Getz von Ber-li-hing-en.]

Goudimel, CLAUDE (1507-72), composer of masses, motets, chansons, and psalm-tunes, was born at Besançon, taught music at Rome, and perished at Lyons as a Huguenot just after the massacre of St Bartholomew.

Gough, HUGH GOUGH, VISCOUNT, conqueror of the Sikhs, was born at Woodstown, County Limerick, 3d November 1779. He served at the Cape, in the West Indies, through the Peninsular war, and in India; and in 1838 was made commander-in-chief of the forces sent against China. After storming Canton and forcing the Yang-tsze-Kiang, he compelled the Chinese to sign the treaty of Nanking (1842). In 1843 he defeated the Maharrattas. In the Sikh war in 1845 he worsted the enemy in the battles of Mudki, Firozshah, and Sobraon, for which he was given a peerage. In 1848 the Sikhs renewed the war, but were again defeated by Gough at Ramnagar, Chillianwalla, and Gujerat, victories which resulted in the annexation of the Punjab. Created a baronet in 1842, Baron Gough in 1846, Viscount Gough in 1849, and a field-marshal in 1862, he died near Dublin, 2d March 1869. See the Life of him by Rait (1903) and Sir C. Gough's Sikh Wars (1897).

Gough, JOHN (1757-1825), the blind botanist and mathematician, lost his sight through small-pox at three, and was born and died at Kendal.

Gough, JOHN BARTHOLOMEW (1817-86), temperance lecturer, was born at Sandgate, Kent. Sent at twelve to America, in 1831 he found employment in New York, but lost it by dissipation, and was reduced to singing comic songs at grog-shops. In 1842 he was induced to take the pledge; and, devoting the rest of his life to the cause of temperance, he became a singularly effective lecturer, making several visits to England. He published an Autobiography (1846), Orations (1854), and Sunlight and Shadow (1880), &c. See Life by G. Martyn (New York, 1893).

Gough, RICHARD (1735-1809), antiquary, born in London, published an English version of Camden's Britannia (1789), Sepulchral Monuments of Great Britain (1786-99), and more than a score of other works.

Goujon, JEAN, a French sculptor, born before 1510. His finest productions are a figure of 'Diana reclining by a Stag,' in the Louvre; the reliefs for the Fountain of the Innocents, also in the Louvre; the monument to the Duke of Brezé in Rouen Cathedral; and several reliefs in the Louvre, where he worked 1555-62. He was a Huguenot, but seems to have died before the Bartholomew massacre in 1572. [Goo-zhon.]

Goulburn, EDWARD MEYBRICK, D.D., born 11th Feb. 1818, was educated at Eton and Balliol College, Oxford, and in 1841 was elected a fellow of Merton. After holding the Oxford incumbency of Holywell, he became headmaster of Rugby (1850-55), a prebendary of St Paul's (1858), chaplain to the Queen and vicar of St John's, Paddington (1859), and Dean of Norwich (1866-89). Gow, NIEL (1727-1807), violin-player, born near Dunkeld, composed nearly a hundred tunes; and from his singular skill with the bow his name is still a household word in Scotland.—His youngest son, NATHANIEL (1766-1831), trained as a violin-player, in 1782 became one of the king's trumpeters for Scotland, and later leader of a fashionable band, teacher, and music-seller. At one time worth over £20,000, he went bankrupt in 1827. He published collections of Scotch airs and songs, and his own compositions number over two hundred—among them 'Caller Herring.'

Gower, JOHN, poet, was born about 1325 of good family, became blind about 1400, and died in 1408. His tomb is still to be seen in St Saviour's, Southwark. He was a personal friend of Chaucer, who addresses him as 'moral Gower,' and wrote three large works in as many languages: the Speculum Meditantis, in French verse, long lost and discovered at Cambridge only in 1898; the Vox Clamantis, in Latin elegiacs, written 1382-84, describing the rising under Wat Tyler (edited by Coxe, Roxburghe Club, 1850); and the long poem entitled Confessio Amantis, written in English, perhaps in 1388. There are extant also fifty French ballads, written by Gower in his youth (Roxburghe Club, 1818). The Confessio Amantis consists of a prologue and eight books, written in 30,000 rhyming octo-syllabic verses, and largely consists of over a hundred stories strung together out of Ovid's Metamorphoses, the Gesta Romanorum, the mediæval histories of Troy, &c. The best editions are by Pauli (1857) and G. C. Macanlay (1899-1902).

Gowrie, EARL OF. See RUTHVEN.

Goya y Lucientes, FRANCISCO (1746-1828), Spanish painter, was born at Fuente de Todos in Aragon. His scenes from the common life of the Spanish people excited special admiration; for his portrait of Charles IV. he was made court-painter. He went in 1824 to Paris for his health, and died at Bordeaux. See Calvert's monograph (1908), and Lives by Yriarte (1867), Lefort (1877), De la Viñaza (1887), and Rothenstein (1900).

See his Memoirs (1797; trans. by J. A. Symonds, 1889).—His brother, COUNT GASPARO (1718-96), edited two journals in Venice, and was press censor there. Among his works are Il Mondo Morale (1760) and Lettere Famigliari (1755). See Life by Magrini (1883). [Got-zee.]

At Montefalco (1450-52) he painted a virgin (now in the Lateran) and a series of frescoes for the monastery of S. Francesco. At Florence (1456-64) he adorned the Palazzo Riccardi with scriptural subjects, and painted similar frescoes at San Gimignano (1464-67), and in the Campo Santo at Pisa (1468-84). See Stillman in the Century for Nov. 1889. [Got'-zo-lee.]

Graaf, REGNIER DE (1641-73), Dutch physician and anatomist was born at Schoonhoven, and practised at Deft. In 1663 he wrote a famous treatise on the pancreatic juice, in 1672 discovered the Graafian vesicles of the female ovary.

Grabbe, CHRISTIAN DIETRICH (1801-36), a ne'er-do-weel dramatic poet, was born and died at Detmold. See Life by Ziegler (1855).

Gracchus, a famous Roman family to which belonged Tiberius Sempronius (slain 212 B.C.), a distinguished opponent of Hannibal in the second Punic war; and another Tiberius Sempronius (born about 210), who conquered the Celtiberians and pacified Spain. His wife, Cornelia, daughter of Scipio Africanus, bore him the two famous Gracchi.—TIBERIUS SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS (c. 168-133 B.C.), in 137 served as quaestor in Spain, where the kindly remembrance of his father enabled him to gain better terms from the Numantines for 20,000 conquered Roman soldiers. The hopeless poverty of thousands of the Roman citizens weighed on the mind of Gracchus, and he began an agitation for reform. Elected tribune in 133, he reimposed the agrarian law of Licinius Stolo, after violent opposition by the aristocratic party; and when Attalus, king of Pergamus, died and bequeathed his wealth to the Roman people, Gracchus proposed that it should be divided among the poor, to enable them to stock their newly-acquired farms. But he was accused of having violated the sacred character of the tribuneship by the deposition of his colleague Cæcina; thousands of the fickle mob deserted him; and during the next election for the tribuneship he, with three hundred of his friends, was murdered.—CAIUS SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS (c. 159-121 B.C.) at the time of his brother's death was serving in Spain under Scipio Africanus. He was elected to the tribuneship in 123 and 122. His first measure was to renew his brother's agrarian law; and to relieve the immediate misery of the poor, he employed them upon new roads throughout Italy. But by a senatorial intrigue his colleague Livius Drusus was bribed to undermine his influence by surpassing him in the liberality of his measures, Caius was rejected from a third tribuneship, and the senate began to repeal his enactments. Caius appearing in the Forum to make opposition, a fearful riot ensued, in which 3000 of his partisans were slain; he himself held aloof from the fight, but was compelled to flee with a single slave, who first slew his master and then himself. The commons saw too late their folly, and endeavoured to atone for their crime by erecting statues to the brothers. Their mother survived them long, and on her tomb the Roman people inscribed 'Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi.' [Grak'kus.]

Grace, DR WILLIAM GILBERT, cricketer, was born at Downdend near Bristol, 18th July 1848, began to play in first-class matches in 1864, and had scored a century a hundred times in 1895, when a testimonial of over £5000 was raised for him by the Daily Telegraph. He took his medical degree in 1879. See Life by Brownlee (1895).

Graf, ARTURO, Italian poet of German extraction, was born in 1848 at Athens, studied at Naples, lectured at Rome 1874-82, and became professor of Italian Literature at Turin.

Graf, KARL HEINRICH, a Leipzig professor, whose name is attached to Reuss's theory (1833) of the Pentateuch. In his Geschichtliche Bücher des Alten Testaments (1866) Graf maintained that as to their ritual legislation the middle books of the Pentateuch 'bore the clearest traces of their post-exilic authorship.' He died 16th July 1869.

Gräfe, ALBRECHT VON (1828-70), oculist, was born and died in Berlin. [Gray'feh.]

Grafton, AUGUSTUS HENRY FITZROY, DUKE OF, statesman, a descendant of Charles II., was born 1st Oct. 1735, and in 1757 succeeded as third duke. He came into notice in 1763 in the opposition to Bute, and in 1765-66 was Secretary of State under Rockingham. In July 1766 Pitt became premier and Earl of Chatham, making Grafton First Lord of the Treasury; but owing to Chatham's illness Grafton had to undertake the duties of premier from Sept. 1767. He resigned in 1770, but was Lord Privy Seal under North (1771-75) and in the new Rockingham ministry (1782-83). He died at Euston, 14th March 1811. Indolent, vacillating, obstinate, and immoral, Grafton called forth some of Junius's sharpest invectives. See his Autobiography and Correspondence (ed. by Sir W. R. Anson, 1898).

Grafton, RICHARD, a London grocer who turned chronicler, and printed the 'Great Bible'

(1589), the Prayer-book (1549), &c. He was M.P. for London and Coventry, and died about 1572.

Graham, CLEMENTINA STIRLING (1782-1877), of Duntrune, near Dundee, was the shrewd, witty, kindly author of Mystifications (1859; ed. by Dr John Brown, 1865).

Graham, DOUGAL (c. 1724-79), was born at Raploch near Stirling. A hunchback and packman, he followed Prince Charlie's army to Derby and Culloden; five months later he had his metrical narrative ready, which, pitiful doggerel as it is, has its value as by an honest eyewitness. He was appointed bellman of Glasgow about 1770. Of his rambling ballads the best known are John Hielandman's Remarks on Glasgow and Turnnispikie. His numerous prose chapbooks are humorous but coarse. See the complete edition by George MacGregor (1883).

Graham, SIR GERALD (1831-99), born at Eden Brows, Cumberland, entered Woolwich in 1847, and the Engineers in 1850, in the Crimea won the Victoria Cross (1855), next served through the China war (1860), and commanded in the Egyptian and Soudan campaigns (1882-84). He was made a K.C.B. in 1882, a G.C.M.G. in 1885.

Graham, JAMES (1745-94), quack-doctor, enthusiast, and lunatic, of earth-baths, Temple of Health, and celestial bed fame, was born and died in Edinburgh.

Graham, SIR JAMES ROBERT GEORGE, statesman, was born at Netherby in Cumberland, June 1, 1792, and educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford. In 1813 he became private secretary to the British minister in Sicily; and, returned by Carlisle as a Whig in 1826, he supported Catholic emancipation and the Reform Bill. Earl Grey made him (1830) First Lord of the Admiralty; but in 1834 he resigned over the Irish Church question, and in 1841 became Home Secretary under Peel. In 1844 he issued a warrant for opening the letters of Mazzini, and communicated the information thus obtained to the Austrian minister. His high-handed dealing with the Scottish Church increased the troubles which ended in the Disruption of 1843. He gave Peel warm support in carrying the Corn Law Repeal Bill, and resigned (1846) as soon as it was carried. On Peel's death in 1850 he became leader of the Peelites, and in 1852-55 was First Lord of the Admiralty in the Coalition Ministry. He retired in 1857, and died 26th October 1861. See Lives by Torrens (1863), Lonsdale (1868), and C. S. Parker (1907).

Graham, JOHN, VISCOUNT DUNDEE, the elder son of Sir William Graham of Claverhouse in Forfarshire, was born probably in 1649. After three years at St Andrews, then four perhaps soldiering under Turenne, in 1672 he entered the Prince of Orange's horse-guards as cornet. In 1674 at the battle of Seneff he saved (according to the Grameid) William's life; in 1677 he returned to Scotland, and became lieutenant in a troop of horse commanded by his cousin, the Marquis of Montrose. At this time the government of Charles II. was forcing Episcopacy upon Scotland and persecuting the Covenanters with the utmost rigour. In this service Claverhouse, now sheriff-depute of Duffrieshire, was employed. At Drumclog, on Sunday, 1st June 1679, he was routed by an armed body of Covenanters, some forty of his troopers being slain and himself forced to flee. Three weeks later he commanded the cavalry at Bothwell Brig, where the Covenanters were defeated, about 400 being killed, chiefly by Claverhouse's dragoons.

In detecting and hunting down the Covenanters he evinced the utmost activity; still, he had nothing to do with the Wigtown martyrdoms, and if he caused shoot John Brown, the 'Christian Carrier,' it was after finding of arms and refusal to take the oath of abjuration. He became colonel, in 1682 sheriff of Wigtownshire, in 1683 a privy-councillor, in 1684 was gifted the estate of Dudgehope, and made constable of Dundee. In 1688, on his march up to London to stem the Revolution, Claverhouse was made Viscount Dundee; next, being joined by the Jacobite clans and three hundred Irish, he raised the standard for James against William and Mary. After various movements in the north he seized Blair Castle, and General Mackay marched against him. On the evening of 27th July 1689 the two armies met at the head of the Pass of Killiecrankie. Mackay's force was between 3000 and 4000, Dundee's only 2000. Two minutes decided the contest; before the wild rush of the clansmen the redcoats were scattered. Their loss was 2000, the victors' 900. Dundee fell by a musket-ball while waving on his men; he was borne to Blair Castle, where he expired, and was buried in the church of Old Blair. 'Bloody Claverse,' 'Bonnie Dundee'—the two names illustrate the opposite feelings borne towards one whom the malice of foes and the favour of friends have invested with a factitious interest. He was neither a devil incarnate nor a 17th-century Havelock. In Claverhouse's own words (1679): 'In any service I have been in I never inquired farther in the laws than the orders of my superior officers'—an admission that accuses whilst excusing. Bonnie at least he was in outward form, with the 'long dark curled locks' and the 'melancholy haughty countenance' which we know by his portraits and by Scott's matchless description. The Grameid is a long but unfinished Latin epic by James Philip of Almerieclose (c. 1656-1713), one of Dundee's followers. Written in 1691, it was first edited by Canon Murdoch (Scottish Hist. Soc. 1888). Mark Napier's Memorials and Letters of Dundee (1859-62) is violently partisan and not accurate, still well worth sifting. See also Aytoun's Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers (1849); Paget's Paradoxes and Puzzles (1874); and lives of him by M. Morris (1887), 'A Southern' (1889), L. Barbé (1908), and S. Terry (1905).

Graham, THOMAS (1805-69), chemist and physicist, born in Glasgow, became in 1830 professor of Chemistry at Glasgow, and in 1837 at University College, London. In 1855 he was appointed Master of the Mint. His researches on the molecular diffusion of gases led him to formulate the law 'that the diffusion rate of gases is inversely as the square root of their density.' His valuable memoirs on the subject were collected in 1876; his Elements of Chemistry appeared in 1837. See Life by Dr Angus Smith (1884).

Graham, THOMAS. See LYNEDOCH (LORD).

Grahame, JAMES, author of The Sabbath, was born at Glasgow, April 22, 1765. He studied law in Edinburgh, and was admitted an advocate in 1795; but at forty-four he took orders, and was successively curate of Shipton, Gloucestershire, and of Sedgfield, Durham. Ill-health compelled him to return to Scotland, and he died at Glasgow, September 14, 1811. Grahame wrote Mary Queen of Scots, a dramatic poem (1801); The Sabbath (1804); British Georgics (1804); The Birds of Scotland (1806); and Poems on the Abolition of the Slave-trade (1810). In its tender devotional feeling and felicity in describing quiet Scottish scenery The Sabbath is not unworthy of Cowper.

Grain, CORNEY (1844-95), London entertainer, born at Faversham, Cambridgeshire, was called to the bar, but joined the German Reed company, and became its head. His forte was musical mimicry. See Corney Grain by himself (1888).

Grainger, JAMES (c. 1721-66), physician and poetaster, was born at Duns, and in 1759 married and settled in St Kitts, West Indies.

Gramont, or GRAMMONT, PHILIBERT, COMTE DE (1621-1707), while still young served under Condé and Turenne, and became a favourite at the court of Louis XIV., but his gallantries brought him exile from France in 1662. He found congenial society among the merry profligates of the court of Charles II. of England. Here, after many adventures, he married, but not without compulsion, Elizabeth Hamilton (1641-1708), with whom he afterwards returned to France. At eighty he inspired his Mémoires of the 'amorous intrigues' at Charles's court, or revised them when written by his brother-in-law, Count Anthony Hamilton (q.v.). The book is a singular revelation of a world of villainy, written with equal grace and vigour. It was first printed anonymously in 1713; an English translation by Boyer was published in 1714. The best English editions are Edwards's (1793), Scott's (1811), Bohn's (1846), and that published by John C. Nimmo in 1889.

Granby, JOHN MANNERS, MARQUIS OF (1721-70), eldest son of the Duke of Rutland, in 1759 became British commander-in-chief in Germany during the Seven Years' War. He was ultimately master-general of the ordnance, and in 1766 commander-in-chief of the forces. He was the subject of some of Junius's most terrible invectives. See Life by Walter Evelyn Manners (1898).

Grand, SARAH (née Francis Elizabeth Clarke), author of The Heavenly Twins (1893), The Beth Book (1897), &c., was born of English parentage at Donaghadee, and brought up in Yorkshire, at Twickenham, and at Kensington. At sixteen she married an army doctor, D. C. McFall, and went with him to the East; afterwards they separated.

Grandville, the pseudonym of JEAN IGNACE ISIDORE GÉRARD (1803-47), caricaturist and book-illustrator, who was born at Nancy, and died in a lunatic asylum near Paris.

Grange, RACHEL CHIESLEY, LADY, the drunken, half-imbecile wife of the hypocritical Scottish judge, James Erskine, Lord Grange (1679-1754), who in 1732 secretly transported her to the Hebrides, and kept her for seven years a captive in St Kilda. At last she escaped to Sutherland and Skye, where she died in May 1745.

Granger, JAMES (1723-76), was born at Shaftesbury, and died vicar of Shiplake, Oxfordshire. He published a Biographical History of England (1769; 5th ed. 1824), and insisted much 'on the utility of a collection of engraved portraits.' His advice led to extraordinary zeal in collecting portraits, and 'grangerised copies' were embellished with engravings gathered from all quarters.

Grant, SIR FRANCIS, P.R.A., fourth son of Francis Grant of Kilgraston, Perthshire, was born in Edinburgh, 18th January 1803. He was educated at Harrow and the University of Edinburgh for the Scottish bar, but in 1834 was exhibiting in the Academy. His most famous works combine portraits with scenes of English sport—such as the 'Meet of H.M. Stag-hounds,' the 'Melton Hunt,' and the 'Cottesmore.' Among his other paintings are the portraits (equestrian) of the Queen and Prince Consort for Christ's Hospital, the Marchioness of Waterford, Palmerston, Russell, Gough, Macaulay, Hardinge, &c. Home again in 1839, he next year became an ensign in the 62d Foot, but in 1843 resigned, and soon turned to literature. Having contributed copiously to the United Service Magazine and the Dublin University Magazine, he in 1846 published his Romance of War, the first of a long series of novels and histories, illustrative mainly of the achievements of Scottish arms abroad. Among his works are Adventures of an Aide-de-Camp; Frank Hilton, or the Queen's Own; Bothwell; The Yellow Frigate; Harry Ogilvie; and Old and New Edinburgh. From his journals appeared Incidents in the Sepoy War of 1857-58 (1883) and Incidents in the China War of 1860 (1875), both edited by Col. H. Knollys, who also edited his Life (2 vols. 1894).

When the war began in 1861 Grant was appointed colonel of the 21st Regiment of Illinois Infantry. In November, now brigadier-general, he fought the battle of Belmont. In February 1862 he captured Fort Henry, and soon after Fort Donelson. In April he fought a two days' battle at Shiloh. After various unsuccessful movements against Vicksburg, Grant crossed the Mississippi, April 1863, twice defeated the enemy, and drove them into Vicksburg, which he besieged. After many assaults the stronghold surrendered conditionally on July 4, 1863, with 31,600 prisoners. In October he fought at Chattanooga, and drove the enemy out of Tennessee. In March 1864 Grant, now a major-general in the regular army, was promoted lieutenant-general, and given the command of all the armies of the United States. His plan of campaign was to concentrate all the national forces into several distinct armies, which should operate simultaneously against the enemy, Sherman moving toward Atlanta, while Grant himself accompanied the army of the Potomac against Richmond. On May 4 he crossed the Rapidan, encountered General R. E. Lee in the Wilderness, and fought a desperate three days' battle. He moved forward on the 7th, and fought again at Spottsylvania Courthouse on the 10th, and still again on the 12th, capturing an entire Confederate division. Thus, ever pursuing the offensive, he drove the enemy within the lines of Richmond. On March 29, 1865, began a week's hard fighting, after which Lee surrendered his entire army, April 9. The fall of Richmond substantially ended the war. In July 1866 Grant was appointed full general; in 1868 and 1872 he was elected president by the Republicans. Among the events of his administration were the guaranteeing of the right of suffrage without regard to race, colour, or previous servitude, and the peaceful settlement of the 'Alabama Claims.' The proposal of a third term of presidency not having been approved, Grant became a sleeping partner in a banking-house. In May 1884 the house suspended, and it was discovered that two of the partners had robbed the general of all he possessed. In the hope of providing for his family, he had begun his autobiography, when in 1884 a sore throat proved to be cancer at the root of the tongue. The sympathies of the nation were aroused, and in March 1885 congress restored him to his rank of general, which he had lost on accepting the presidency. He died at Mount McGregor near Saratoga, 23d July 1885. See his Personal Memoirs (1885-86), which brought his widow $415,000; and a work by Lieut.-Col. Church (1897).

Grant, Sir William (1752-1832), born at Elchies in Eglingshire, spent some years in Canada, was a M.P. 1790-1812, and Master of the Rolls 1801-17, was knighted in 1799, and died at Dawlish.

Granville, Antoine Perrenot de, Cardinal (1517-86), was born at Besançon, a son of the jurist and diplomatist Nicolas Perrenot de Granville (1484-1550), and in 1540 was appointed Bishop of Arras. His father now chancellor of the empire under Charles V., he discharged many diplomatic missions with marked ability. Succeeding to the chancellorship (1550), he accompanied Charles V. in the flight from Innsbruck, and framed the treaty of Passau, 1552. On the abdication of Charles (1555) he transferred his services to Philip II. In 1559 he became prime-minister to Margaret of Parma in the Netherlands, in 1560 Archbishop of Malines, and next year cardinal. His policy of repression provoked such hostility in the Low Countries, however, that at the king's advice he retired in 1564 to Franche Comté. In 1570 he represented Spain at Rome in drawing up a treaty of alliance with Venice and the papal see against the Turks. In 1570-75 he was viceroy of Naples. He died at Madrid. His letters, &c., were edited by Weiss (9 vols. Par. 1842-61) and Pouillet (9 vols. Brus. 1878-92). See Phillippon's Granvella am Spanischen Hofe (1896).

Granville, George Leveson-Gower, second Earl, statesman, was born May 11, 1815. He was educated at Eton and Oxford, in 1836 became M.P. for Morpeth, in 1840 for Lichfield, and was for a brief period Under-secretary for Foreign Affairs. He was a consistent Liberal and a free-trader. He succeeded to the peerage in 1846, and became Foreign Secretary in 1851, President of the Council in 1853, and leader of the House of Lords in 1855. Having failed to form a ministry in 1859, he joined Lord Palmerston's second administration. He retired with Earl Russell in 1866, having been made Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports in 1865. In December 1868 he became Colonial Secretary in Mr Gladstone's first ministry, and in 1870 Foreign Secretary, as again in 1880-85, when he had to face the troubles in Egypt and the Sudan, differences with Germany and France, and the threatened rupture with Russia over the Afghan boundary question. He returned once more for a few months to office as Colonial Secretary in 1886, supported Gladstone's Home-rule policy, and died in 1891. See Life by Lord E. Fitzmaurice (1905).

Gratian, a Benedictine monk of Bologna, who between 1139 and 1142 compiled the collection of canon law known as the Decretum Gratiani.

Gratianus, Augustus (359-383 A.D.), Roman emperor from 375, in 367 by his father Valentinian was made Augustus in Gaul. On Valentinian's death he was elevated to the throne, with his half-brother Valentinian II. as colleague. Gaul, Spain, and Britain fell to Gratian's share, but as his brother was only four years old he virtually ruled the whole western empire; and in 378, on the death of his uncle Valens, he suddenly became sovereign also of the eastern empire. Thereupon he recalled Theodosius from Spain, and appointed him his colleague in 379. Gratian was pious, temperate, and eloquent; but his fondness for frivolous amusements and his persecution of pagans and heretics alienated his subjects; so that when Maximus was proclaimed emperor crowds flocked to his standard. Gratian was defeated by him near Paris, and fled to Lyons, where he was put to death.

Grattan, Henry, born in Dublin, July 3, 1746, at seventeen entered Trinity College, and soon embraced the reforming principles of Henry Flood with such ardour that his father, the recorder of Dublin, disinherited him. At twenty-one he proceeded to the Middle Temple, London, but neglected law for the debates in the House of Commons. In 1772 he was called to the Irish bar, and in 1775 entered the Irish parliament as member for Charlemont. Flood had lost his popularity by accepting office under government, and Grattan leapt at one bound into his place, and strove to secure the removal of the restrictions upon Irish trade. In the dread of French invasion, Lord North repealed them in 1779; thereupon Grattan plunged into a struggle for legislative independence. The popular demands were asserted by him at the Convention of Duncannon (February 1782). A month later the Rockingham ministry surrendered, and the Irish parliament in gratitude voted Grattan £50,000. The history of 'Grattan's parliament' did not correspond to the patriotic dreams of its great founder. It was impossible for a parliament so little representative and so much subject to corruption to rise to real statesmanship. The urgent need of parliamentary reform and the remedy of domestic abuses soon occupied the minds of all Irish patriots. Once more at Duncannon, in September 1783, were formulated demands for parliamentary reform, which were presented to the House by Flood and rejected. Grattan devoted himself to advocating the reform of special abuses, but his bills proved abortive. Meantime continued commercial depression had produced a strong feeling in Ireland for protection, which was yet unable to arrest Secretary Orde's measure for absolute free trade. This measure, however, Pitt could not carry at Westminster, except subject to a number of stipulations, one of which was that all English navigation laws were to be adopted by the Irish parliament; and to this Grattan would not accede. Pitt's mortification confirmed his determination that union was the only effective means of pacification. Grattan was returned for Dublin in 1790, and, himself a Protestant, had taken up the cause of Catholic emancipation; but the corruption of the Castle government and of a parliament venal beyond all precedent, the persistent repression of the agitation for Catholic relief, and the spirit of discontent generated by the French Revolution had fomented the movement of the United Irishmen. Hopeless of his country and broken by ill-health, Grattan retired on the eve of the rebellion, but returned to take his seat for Wicklow, and bravely to combat the bill for the Union. In 1805 he was elected to Westminster as member for Malton in Yorkshire, and for Dublin the following year. The remaining energies of his life were devoted to the cause of Catholic emancipation. In December 1819 his health began to give way; in the following May he crossed from Dublin, a dying man, to speak once more for the cause; and he died five days after his arrival, June 4, 1820. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. The best collection of his Speeches is by his son, Henry Grattan, M.P. (1822), who also edited his Miscellaneous Works (1822), and wrote the standard Life (1839-46). See too Lecky's Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland (2d ed. 1872), and the excellent study by Robert Dunlop ('Statesmen' series, 1889).

Grätz, Heinrich. See GRAETZ.

Graun, Karl Heinrich (1701-59), composer of thirty-four operas, a 'Passion piece,' &c., was born near Torgau, and died in Berlin, whither he had followed Frederick the Great in 1740.

Graves, Richard (1715-1804), born at Mickleton, Gloucestershire, from 1748 was rector of Claverton near Bath. Of over twenty works by him in prose and verse, the title at least of his Spiritual Quixote (1772) is still remembered.

Graves, Robert, A.R.A. (1798-1873), a London engraver after Landseer, Wilkie, &c.

Graves, Robert James (1796-1853), physician, took his M.B. at Dublin in 1818, and after three years of study and travel at Edinburgh and on the Continent settled (1821) in Dublin, and in 1827 became professor in the College of Physicians, of which he was president in 1843-44. He was elected F.R.S. in 1849. He published A System of Clinical Medicine (1843) and Clinical Lectures (1848). See Life by Stokes, prefixed to Studies in Physiology and Medicine (1863).

Gray, Asa, born at Paris, New York, November 18, 1810, took his M.D. in 1831, but relinquished medicine for botany, and in 1842-73 was professor of Natural History at Harvard, becoming meanwhile a strong Darwinian. In 1838-42 he published, with Dr Torrey, the Flora of North America; in 1848-50 Genera Flora America Boreali-Orientalis Illustrata; other works being A Free Examination of Darwin's Treatise (1861), Darwinia (1876), and Natural Science and Religion (1880). He died at New Cambridge, 30th January 1888. His Scientific Papers were edited in 1889, and his Letters in 1893.

Gray, David, minor poet, was born 29th January 1838, a weaver's son, at Merkland, on the Luggie, near Kirkintilloch. He was bred for the ministry, but began early to write verses, and in 1860 came up to London with Robert Buchanan (q.v.). Monckton Milnes (Lord Houghton) found him some employment, but consumption seized him, and a stay in Torquay proving useless, he went home to die, 3d December 1861. Just before his death he saw a specimen page of his Luggie and other Poems, which appeared in 1862 with an introduction by Milnes and a memoir by Heddewick. Glassford Bell prepared an enlarged edition (1874). See also R. Buchanan's David Gray, and other Essays (1868).

Gray, Flissha, American inventor, was born at Barnesville, Ohio, 2d August 1835, and engaged in the manufacture of telegraphic apparatus. His sixty patents included several for the telephone, of which he claimed the invention, and others for a multiplex telegraph. He died 21st January 1901.

Gray, JOHN EDWARD (1800-75), naturalist, born at Walsall, and educated for a doctor, in 1824 became Natural History assistant at the British Museum, and in 1840-74 was keeper of the zoological collections, which he made the completest in the world. Of his 500 books and papers the chief are his British Museum catalogues, Illustrations of Indian Zoology (1830-35), and The Knowsley Menagerie and Aviary (1846-60).—His wife, MARIA EMMA SMITH (1787-1876), wrote Figures of Molluscan Animals (1842-57).—His brother, GEORGE ROBERT GRAY (1808-72), from 1831 in the zoological department of the British Museum, wrote Genera of Birds (1849), &c.

Gray, MAXWELL. See TUTTIETT.

Gray, ROBERT (1809-72), Bishop of Cape Town from 1847, was the son of Robert Gray (1762-1834), who was Bishop of Bristol from 1827. In 1865 he pronounced the deposition of Bishop Colenso. See his Life (2 vols. 1876).

Gray, SIR THOMAS, a Northumbrian knight who died about 1369, and wrote the Scala-chronica (ed. Stevenson, 1836, and Sir Herbert Maxwell, 1907).

Gray, THOMAS, one of the greatest of English poets, was born in London, 26th December 1716. His father, Philip Gray, a money-scrivener, was of so violent and jealous a temper that his wife (Dorothy Antrobus) was obliged to separate from him; it was mainly through her exertions that the boy was placed at Eton (1727), and afterwards at Peterhouse, Cambridge (1734). At Eton he made the acquaintance of Horace Walpole, whom in 1739 he accompanied on the grand tour. They spent two and a half years in France and Italy, but quarrelled at Reggio and parted. Walpole afterwards took the blame on himself, and by his efforts the breach was healed within three years. Gray reached England in September 1741; in 1742 he wrote his Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College, and had begun at Stoke Poges the Elegy. In the winter he went back to Cambridge, took his bachelorship in civil law, and became a resident there. This was perhaps the happiest period of his life; he found his relaxation and his keenest pleasure in the company of his friends, and in writing letters such as only at that time men could write. The Ode on Eton College was printed in 1747, and next year reprinted with two other pieces in Dodsley's Miscellany. The Elegy was printed in February 1751; and in March 1753 appeared in a thin folio the editio princeps of Gray's collected poems. His mother died 11th March 1753, and was buried at Stoke Poges, with an affecting epitaph from her son's pen on her tombstone. During 1750-55 Gray commenced his most ambitious poems, the Pindaric Odes. The splendidly resonant Progress of Poesy, perhaps his really greatest work, was finished in 1754; The Bard, begun at the same time, in 1757. Gray had a nervous horror of fire, and kept a rope-ladder ready at his window in Peterhouse. One night in February 1756 he was roused from sleep by a pretended alarm, and descended into a tub of water put under his window by some frolicsome undergraduates. Hereupon he migrated to Pembroke Hall, where he spent the remainder of his life. His two odes were printed in 1757, and put their author at one bound at the head of living English poets. The laureateship was offered him in 1757 on Colley Cibber's death, but declined. During 1760-61 he devoted himself to early English poetry; later he made studies in Icelandic and Celtic verse, which bore fruit in his Eddaic poems, The Fatal Sisters and The Descent of Odin—genuine precursors of romanticism. In 1765 he visited Glamis Castle, in 1769 the English Lakes; in 1768 he collected his poems in the first general edition, and accepted the professorship of History and Modern Languages at Cambridge. He was now comparatively rich, and enjoyed a reputation dear to a scholar's heart; his life glided quietly on, troubled only by fits of dejection and by attacks of hereditary gout. He died 30th July 1771, and was buried beside his mother. Gray said of his own poetry that the 'style he aimed at was extreme conciseness of expression, yet pure, perspicuous, and musical.' The excellence he aimed at he attained, and in his lyrical work he reached in a high degree the Greek quality of structure, especially in his Pindaric Odes. All his work bears the stamp of dignity and distinction; though little in quantity, it has been sufficient to give Gray his rank among the divi majores of English poetry. The earlier Lives and editions of Gray by Mason and Mitford were superseded by Mr Gosse's study (1882) in the 'Men of Letters' series, and by his edition of the works in prose and verse (4 vols. 1884); as also by Mr Tovey's edition of the poems (1898), and the letters (vol. i. 1900; vol. ii. 1904).

Greathed, HENRY (1757-1816), a South Shields boat-builder, born at Richmond in Yorkshire, who about 1789 invented a lifeboat.

Greatrakes, or GREATOREX, VALENTINE (1629-83), the 'touch doctor,' was born and died at Affane, County Waterford. In 1641 his mother fled from the Irish rebels to Devonshire; in 1649-56 he was an officer in the Parliamentary army, and from 1656 till the Restoration acted as magistrate at Affane. In 1662 he began 'touching' for the king's evil, and ere long touched or 'stroked' for ague and for all manner of diseases. He was summoned to Whitehall (1666); multitudes flocked to him, and his gratuitous cures were attested by Robert Boyle, Ralph Cudworth, and Henry More. His claims provoked much controversy, and he published in defence his Brief Account (1666).

Greco, EL, the Spanish nickname of the Greek religious painter, sculptor, and architect, Domenico Theotocopuli (c. 1545-1625), who came before 1577 from Venice to Toledo, where he died. See books by Cossio (1908) and Calvert (1909).

Greeley, HORACE, American journalist, was born a small farmer's son at Amherst, N.H., February 3, 1811. He entered a printing-office as apprentice (1826) at East Poultney, Vermont, rose to assist in editorial work, and by-and-by worked as a journeyman printer. In 1834 he started the weekly New Yorker, for which he wrote essays, poetry, and other articles. His Log Cabin, a Whig campaign paper, contributed largely to the election of General Harrison as president in 1840. In April 1841 he commenced the New York Tribune, of which he was the leading editor till his death. The Tribune was at first Whig, then anti-slavery Whig, and finally extreme Republican; it advocated to some extent the social theories of Fourier. In 1848 Greeley was elected to congress by a New York district, but lost popularity by agitating for a reform in the mileage payments to members. In 1851 he visited Europe, and was chairman of one of the committees of the Great Exhibition. Greeley at first upheld the constitutional right of the southern states to secede; but when the war began he became one of its most zealous advocates. He published in the Tribune the impressive 'Prayer of Twenty Millions,' and within a month the emancipation proclamation was issued. After Lee's surrender he warmly advocated a universal amnesty; and his going to Richmond and signing the bail-bond of Jefferson Davis awakened a storm of public indignation. In religious faith he was a Universalist. An unsuccessful candidate in 1872 for the presidency, he died in New York, 29th November of the same year. Greeley's works include The American Conflict (1864-66), Recollections of a Busy Life (1868), Essays on Political Economy (1870), and What I know of Farming (1871). See Lives by Parton (new ed. 1882), Ingersoll (1873), Cornell (1882), and Sotheman (1892).

Greely, ADOLPHUS WASHINGTON, Arctic explorer, was born at Newburyport, Mass., 27th March 1844. He was a volunteer in the war of 1861-65, after its conclusion entered the regular army as lieutenant, and in 1865 was placed on the signal service. Selected in 1881 to conduct the American expedition to Smith Sound, he was rescued in June 1883 with the survivors of his party, when some of them had been reduced to eating the bodies of the dead. Lieut. Lockwood of this expedition travelled to within 396 miles of the pole, the farthest point reached till then. In 1887 Greely became chief of the signal service. Major-general in 1906, he retired in 1908. He has published Three Years of Arctic Service (1885), American Explorers (1893), &c.

Green, ANNA K. See ROHLFS.

Green, CHARLES (1785-1870), aéronaut, was born and died in London, and during 1821-52 made 527 ascents—one, in 1838, to 27,146 feet.

Green, GEORGE (1793-1841), mathematician, was born and died at Sneinton near Nottingham, in 1839 was elected a fellow of Caius College, Cambridge, and is associated with the Potential. His Mathematical Papers were edited by Ferrers (1871).

Green, JOHN RICHARD, historian, was born at Oxford in December 1837, and was educated there at Magdalen School and Jesus College. He took orders, and was in succession curate and vicar of two East-end London parishes, yet snatched time to contribute historical articles to the Saturday Review. In 1868 he became librarian at Lambeth, but next year was attacked by consumption, a disease which made all active work impossible. His Short History of the English People (1874), the first complete history of England from the social side, attained an unparalleled success, 150,000 copies selling within fifteen years. He issued also a larger edition of the work as A History of the English People (1877-80); Stray Studies from England and Italy (1876), the fruit of his winters in Capri; and a Short Geography of the British Islands (1879). In 1879 he was made LL.D. by Edinburgh University. He continued to the last his struggle against hopeless disease, publishing in 1882 his Making of England, and leaving The Conquest of England to be edited by his widow. He died at Mentone, 7th March 1883. See the memoir prefixed to the 1888 edition of the Short History, by his wife, ALICE STOFFORD (born 1849; married 1877), who with Miss Norgate issued a richly-illustrated edition of the Short History (1892-93). Mrs Green is the author of Henry II. ('English Statesmen,' 1888) and of Town Life in the Fifteenth Century (1894).

Green, MARY ANNE EVERETT, née Wood, was born in 1818 at Sheffield. She received an excellent education, and her culture was promoted by James Montgomery, the 'Bard of Sheffield.' In 1841 she removed with her parents to London, where in 1845 she married Mr G. P. Green, artist. Having free access to libraries and MS. collections, she edited Letters of Royal and Illustrious Ladies (1846), The Diary of John Rous (1856), and Letters of Queen Henrietta Maria (1857). By appointment of the Master of the Rolls she calendared the papers of the reigns of James I. (1857-59) and Charles II. (1860-68). She next completed the calendar of the state papers of Queen Elizabeth, with addenda from Edward VI. to James I. (1869-74), and edited the papers of the Commonwealth (1875-88). She died 1st November 1895.

Green, THOMAS HILL, philosopher, was born at Birkin Rectory, W.R. Yorkshire, April 7, 1836. Educated at Rugby and Balliol College, Oxford, in 1859 he took a first in classics, later a third in law and modern history, and in 1860 was elected to a Balliol fellowship, and re-elected in 1872, becoming also its first lay tutor in 1866. He married a sister of J. A. Symonds in 1871, became in 1877 Whyte's professor of Moral Philosophy, and died March 26, 1882. Green's noble character, contagious enthusiasm, philosophical profundity, and strong interest in social questions drew around him many of the best men at Oxford. Popular education and temperance lay near his heart, and he gave himself with earnestness to the business of the Schools Enquiry Commission of 1864-66 and of the Oxford School-board (1874), and helped to force on the Bribery Commission at Oxford. In 1874 he contributed his masterly introduction to the Clarendon Press edition of Hume's Treatise on Human Nature, subjecting Hume's philosophy in detail to searching and hostile analysis from an idealist point of view. His Prolegomena to Ethics, left incomplete at his death, was edited by A. C. Bradley (1883), and two 'lay-sermons' by Arnold Toynbee in the same year. His scattered essays in Mind and elsewhere were edited as The Works of T. H. Green by R. L. Nettleship (1885-88), the third volume containing a memoir. See B. Bosanquet's preface to Green's Principles of Political Obligation (1895) and Fairbrother's Philosophy of T. H. Green (1896).

Green, VALENTINE (1739-1813), mezzotinter, was born at Salford near Chipping Norton.

Greenacre, JAMES (1785-1837), a religious and radical orator, born in Norfolk, and by calling a London grocer, who married four wives, and was hanged for the murder of a fifth woman.

Greenaway, KATE (1846-1901), charming portrayer of child-life in coloured-book illustrations, was the daughter of a London wood-engraver, and became well known in 1879. See Life by Spielmann and Layard (1905).

Greene, NATHANAEL, was born, a Quaker's son, at Warwick, Rhode Island, 6th June 1742. Elected in 1770 to the Rhode Island Assembly, he in 1775 took command of the Rhode Island contingent to the national army. He distinguished himself at Trenton and Princeton; at the Brandywine he commanded a division and saved the American army from destruction; and at Germantown he commanded the left wing, skilfully covering the retreat. In 1780 he foiled Clinton, and in December succeeded to the command of the army of the south, which had just been defeated by Cornwallis, and was without discipline, clothing, arms, or spirit. By great activity he got his army into better condition, and though on 15th March 1781 Cornwallis defeated him at Guilford Court-house, the victory was so costly that Greene passed unmolested into South Carolina. That state and Georgia were rapidly reconquered, until at Eutaw Springs the war in the south was ended in what was virtually an American victory. A general second perhaps only to Washington, he died at Mulberry Grove, Ga., 19th June 1786. See Lives by G. W. Greene (1867-71; new ed. 1890) and F. B. Greene (1893).

Greene, ROBERT, dramatist, born at Norwich about 1560, at Cambridge took his B.A. in 1578 and M.A. in 1583. On leaving Cambridge he wrote plays and romances with ceaseless activity, though he led a very irregular life, marrying about 1585, but soon deserting his wife. His romances are frequently tedious and insipid; but they abound in beautiful poetry. One of them, Pandosto, supplied Shakespeare with hints for the plot of The Winter's Tale. The most popular of his plays was Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay. As Greene helped to lay the foundations of the English drama, even his worst plays are valuable in the eyes of students; but his literary fame rests on the poetry which he scattered through his romances—some of his pastoral songs being unsurpassed for tenderness and natural grace. He died 3d September 1592. After his death appeared the pamphlet entitled The Repentance of Robert Greene, Master of Arts, in which he lays bare the wickedness of his former life. His Groat's Worth of Wit bought with a Million of Repentance contains one of the few authentic contemporary allusions to Shakespeare. Greene's plays and poems were edited by Dyce (1831) and J. Churton Collins (Clar. Press, 1902); his complete works, with a biography by Storozhenko, are included in the Huth Library (15 vols. 1881-86) of Dr Grosart, who also edited a selection, Green Pastures (1894).

Greenhill, W. A. (1814-94), an Oxford and Hastings practitioner, born in London, and educated at Rugby and Balliol. The friend of Arnold, Newman, Pusey, &c., he edited Theophilus' Physiology, Sydenham, and Sir Thomas Browne.

Greenough, HORATIO, sculptor, born in Boston, U.S., 6th September 1805, studied two years at Harvard, and from 1825 to 1851 lived chiefly in Italy. His principal work is the colossal statue of Washington in front of the Capitol. Others are 'Medora,' 'Venus Victrix,' and a group of four figures, 'The Rescue.' He died at Somerville, Mass., 18th December 1852.

Greenwell, DORA, religious poet, was born 6th December 1821 at Greenwell Ford, in the county, and after 1848 lived in the city, of Durham. She died 29th March 1882. Amongst her works are two volumes of poems (1848-61); several short prose works, including The Patience of Hope, Two Friends, and Colloquia Crucis; a Life of Lacordaire (1868); and Carmina Crucis (1869). See Memoirs by William Dorling (1885).

Greenwell, WILLIAM, D.C.L., antiquary, a high authority on prehistoric barrows, was born at Greenwell Ford, co. Durham, 23d March 1820, and became a minor canon of Durham in 1854, and rector of a church there in 1855.

Greg, WILLIAM RATHBONE (1809-81), born at Manchester, from manager of mills at Bury became a Commissioner of Customs in 1856, and was Comptroller of H.M. Stationery Office in 1864-77. In his Rocks Ahead (1874) he took a highly pessimistic view of the future of England, foreboding the political supremacy of the lower classes, industrial decline, and the divorce of intelligence from religion. His other works include The Creed of Christendom (1851), Essays on Political and Social Science (1854), Literary and Social Judgments (1869), Political Problems (1870), Enigmas of Life (1872; 18th ed. 1891, with memoir by widow), Mistaken Aims (1876), and Miscellaneous Essays (1884).

Grégoire, HENRI, born near Lunéville, December 4, 1750, took orders, and lectured at the Jesuit College of Pont-à-Mousson. His Essai sur la Régénération des Juifs (1778) became widely popular. Curé of Emberménil in Lorraine, and an ardent democrat, he was sent to the States-general of 1789 as a deputy of the clergy, attached himself to the Tiers-état party, and acted a prominent part throughout the Revolution. He was the first of his order to take the oaths, and was elected 'constitutional bishop' of Loir-et-Cher. He exercised a stern democracy which he identified with the Christian brotherhood of the gospel. At the blasphemous Feast of Reason he refused, in the face of the infuriated rabble, to renounce Christianity. After the 18th Brumaire he became a member of the Corps Législatif; the Concordat forced him to resign his bishopric. He died in Paris, unreconciled with the church, 28th May 1831. Among his works are Histoire des Sectes Religieuses (1814) and L'Eglise Gallicane (1818). See his Mémoires, with Life by H. Carnot (1831), and German studies by Krüger (1838) and Böhringer (1878).

Gregorovius, FERDINAND (1821-91), born at Neidenburg in East Prussia, studied theology, but devoted himself to poetry and literature, in 1852 settled in Rome, and died at Munich. His great work—the standard work on the subject—is the History of Rome in the Middle Ages (1859-72; Eng. trans. 1895-1902). He wrote also on Italian geography and history, on Corsica (1854), Capri (1868; trans. 1896), the graves of the popes (1857), Lucrezia Borgia (1874), Urban VIII. (1879), Athens (1881), Corfu (1882), and the Byzantine empress Athenais (1882); also a tragedy on the death of Tiberius, and an epic, Euphorion.

Gregory, the name of sixteen popes.—GREGORY I., THE GREAT (c. 540-604), a father of the Church and saint, born in Rome, was appointed by Justin II. praetor of Rome, but about 575 relinquished this office, distributed his wealth among the poor, and withdrew into a monastery at Rome, one of seven he had founded. It was while here that he saw one day some Anglo-Saxon youths in the slave-market, and was seized with a longing to convert their country to Christianity. He set forth on his journey, but the clamour of the Romans at his loss led the pope Benedict to compel his return. Pelagius II. sent Gregory as nuncio to Constantinople for aid against the Lombards. He resided there three years, writing his Moralia, an exposition of Job. On the death of Pelagius Gregory was unanimously called by the clergy, senate, and people to succeed him. He used every means to evade the dignity, but was forced to yield, and was consecrated September 3, 590. Hardly one pontiff has surpassed Gregory I. as an administrator. To him the Roman Church is indebted for the complete organisation of her public services and ritual, for the systematisation of her sacred chants. The mission to England he entrusted to Augustine (q.v.); and the Gothic kingdom of Spain, long Arian, was reconciled with the church. Nor was his zeal for the reformation of the church inferior to his ardour for its growth. Towards heathens and Jews he was most gentle, and he used all his efforts to repress slave-dealing and to mitigate slavery. When Rome was threatened by the Lombards he showed himself virtually a temporal sovereign; he reprobated the assumption by John, patriarch of Constantinople, of the title of Ecumenical or Universal Bishop. In his writings the whole dogmatical system of the modern church is fully developed. He left homilies on Ezekiel and on the Gospels, the Regula (or Cura Pastoralis), and the Sacramentarium and Antiphonarium. In exegesis he is a fearless allegorist; his Letters and Dialogues abound with miraculous and legendary narratives. The best editions of his works are the Benedictine (1705) and that in Migne's Patrologia (vols. lxxv.-lxxx.). See works by Lau (1845), Pfahler (1852), the Rev. J. Barmby (1879), Kellett (1889), and Abbot Snow (1892).—GREGORY II., by birth a Roman, was elected pope in 715. The authority of the eastern emperors had sunk in the West into little more than a name; and the tyrannical measures of the Emperor Leo the Isaurian against image-worship weakened still more the tie. Gregory protested strongly against the imperial policy. The result of the contest was a notable aggrandisement of the political authority and influence of the popes in Italy. Under Gregory's auspices Boniface entered on his missionary work in Germany. He died in 731.—GREGORY III., a native of Syria, succeeded Gregory II. in 731, and excommunicated the Iconoclasts. The encroachments of the Lombards became so formidable that, the eastern emperors being powerless to help, the Romans charged Gregory to send a deputation to Charles Martel, soliciting his aid, and offering to make him consul of Rome. This offer is of great historical importance, though it failed to enlist the aid of Charles; but it was a step towards the independence of the West. Gregory III. died in 741.—GREGORY IV., pope from 827 till his death in 844, was largely occupied in defending Italy against the Saracens.—GREGORY V. (c. 970-999), son of a German duke, was made pope by his cousin, the Emperor Otho III., in 996, expelled by the Romans, but restored by the emperor in 998.—GREGORY VI. bore the papal dignity in 1045, but was expelled next year.—GREGORY VII., the great representative of the temporal claims of the mediæval papacy, was born about 1020 at Soana in Tuscany, his original name being Hildebrand. His youth was passed at Rome, in the monastery of St Maria. On the death of Gregory VI., whose chaplain he was, he is reported (doubtfully) to have spent some time at Clugny, whence he was only recalled by the new and zealous pope Leo IX., whom he accompanied to Rome in 1049, and who made him a cardinal. During the four following pontificates Hildebrand continued to exercise great influence; and he was himself elected pope three days after the death of Alexander II., and crowned July 10, 1073. He addressed himself to amend the secularised condition of the church. The feudal standing of the higher clergy, the claims of sovereigns upon temporalities, and the consequent temptation to simony were, he held, the cause of all the evils under which Europe was groaning. While he laboured to enforce the observance of all the details of discipline, it was against investiture that his main efforts were directed. In 1074 he prohibited this practice, under pain of excommunication, and in 1075 he actually issued that sentence against several bishops and councillors of the empire. The Emperor Henry IV. disregarding these menaces, Gregory cited him to Rome to answer for his conduct. Henry's sole reply was defiance; and in a diet at Worms in 1076 he declared Gregory deposed. The pontiff retaliated by excommunication, which, unless removed by absolution in twelve months, involved (according also to imperial law) the forfeiture of all civil rights and deposition from every civil and political office. Henry's Saxon subjects appealing to this law against him, he was compelled to yield, and by a humiliating penance at Canossa in January 1077 obtained absolution from the pope in person. But in 1080 Henry resumed hostilities, again declared Gregory deposed, and appointed an antipope as Clement III. After a siege of three years, Henry, in 1084, took possession of Rome. Just, however, as Gregory was on the point of falling into his hands, Robert Guiscard, the Norman Duke of Apulia, entered the city, set Gregory free, and compelled Henry to return to Germany. But the wretched condition to which Rome was reduced obliged Gregory to withdraw ultimately to Salerno, where he died, May 25, 1085. In Gregory's conception of the constitution of Christian society the spiritual power was the first and highest element. It was to direct, to command the temporal, and, in a certain sense, to compel its obedience; but the arms which it was authorised to use for the purpose of coercion were the arms of the spirit only. And he devoted his unbending efforts to suppress the vices which deformed society, and to restrain the tyranny which oppressed the subject as much as it enslaved the church. See W. R. W. Stephens, Hildebrand and his Times (1888); Dr Vincent's Age of Hildebrand (1897); German works by Voigt, Söttl, Helfenstein, and Gröner; and French by Villemain, Langeron, and Delarc (1889-91).—GREGORY VIII. was pope from 1178 to 1187. (An antipope assumed the style of Gregory VIII. in 1118, but was expelled and humiliated in 1123).—GREGORY IX. was during his whole pontificate (1227-41) at feud with the Emperor Frederick II., and asserted the highest view of papal power.—GREGORY X. strove in his pontificate (1271-76) to be a peacemaker between warring princes and states.—GREGORY XI. was pope in 1370-78; and GREGORY XII. in 1406-17.—GREGORY XIII., Ugo Buoncompagni (1502-85), was born at Bologna, where he was professor of Law for several years. He settled at Rome in 1539, was one of the theologians of the Council of Trent, became cardinal in 1565, and was sent as legate to Spain. On the death of Pius V., Gregory was elected pope in 1572. He displayed extraordinary zeal for the promotion of education; many of the colleges in Rome were wholly or in part endowed by him; and his expenditure for educational purposes is said to have exceeded 2,000,000 Roman crowns. The most interesting event of his pontificate was the correction of the Calendar and the introduction of the Gregorian Computation in 1582. A grievous imputation rests on Gregory's memory from his having ordered a Te Deum in Rome on occasion of the massacre of St Bartholomew—on the report of the French ambassador, who represented that infamous episode as the suppression of a Huguenot conspiracy. Gregory published a valuable edition of the Decretum Gratiani.—GREGORY XIV. held the chair only from 1590 to 1591.—GREGORY XV. (1554-1623), pope from 1621, dealt with the Immaculate Conception and regulated ritual.—GREGORY XVI. (1765-1846), pope from 1831, represented reaction and ultramontanism in a revolutionary period, favoured the Jesuits, and increased the papal debt by spending on buildings and museums.

Gregory, Sr., 'the Illuminator,' the apostle of Armenia, was said to have been of the royal Persian race of the Arsacidae, brought up a Christian in Cappadocia, kept fourteen years a prisoner by Tiridates III. for declining idolatrous compliance, and, after converting the king (301 A.D.), to have been made patriarch of Armenia.

Gregory Nazianzen (c. 328-390), born in Cappadocia, was educated at Caesarea, Alexandria, and Athens, became a close friend of Basil the Great, was made Bishop of Sasima, but withdrew to a life of religious study at Nazianzus near his birthplace. The Emperor Theodosius made him patriarch of Constantinople (380), but this dignity also he resigned next year. His theological labours were devoted to the defence of Athanasian orthodoxy; his work includes discourses, letters, and hymns. The principal edition is the Benedictine. See monographs by Ullmann (Eng. trans. 1851) and Benoit (Paris, 2d ed. 1875).

Gregory of Nyssa (c. 331-395) was by his brother Basil the Great consecrated Bishop of Nyssa in Cappadocia about 371. During the persecution of the adherents of the Nicene Creed in the reign of Valens, Gregory was deposed, but on the death of Valens was joyfully welcomed back (378). He was present at the Council of Constantinople in 381, and was appointed to share in the oversight of the diocese of Pontus. He travelled to Arabia and Jerusalem to set in order the churches there, and was again at a synod in Constantinople in 394. His chief works are his Twelve Books against Eunomius, a treatise on the Trinity, several ascetic treatises, many sermons, twenty-three epistles, and his great Catechetical Oration (1903). See his whole works in Migne's Patrologia and Life by Rupp (1834).

Gregory of Tours (c. 540-594) was born at Arverna (now Clermont), and belonged to a distinguished Roman family of Gaul. His recovery from sickness, through a pilgrimage to the grave of St Martin of Tours, led Gregory to devote himself to the church, and he became Bishop of Tours in 573. As a supporter of Sigbert of Austrasia and his wife Brunhilda against Chilperic and his wife Fredegond, he had to suffer many persecutions. His Historia sive Annales Francorum is the chief authority for the history of Gaul in the 6th century. His Miraculorum libri vii. is a hagiographical compilation. See monographs by Löbell (2d ed. 1869) and Monod (Paris 1872), and vol. i. of Mark Pattison's Essays (1889).

Gregory Thaumaturgus, 'wonder-worker' (c. 210-270), the apostle of Pontus, was born at Neocæsarea in Pontus, became a disciple of Origen, and was consecrated Bishop of Neocæsarea. His Ekthesis, or Confession of Faith, is a summary of Origen's theology. The genuineness of two other treatises is doubtful. His Panegyricus (which contains an autobiography) is printed among the works of Origen. See monograph by Ryssel (1880).

Gregory, a Scottish family of scientists.—JAMES GREGORY (1638-75), born at Drumclog manse, Aberdeen, in 1661 invented his reflecting telescope, in 1664-67 studied mathematics at Padua, where he printed several works on geometry. He became (1669) professor of Mathematics at St Andrews, and in 1674 at Edinburgh.—His nephew, DAVID (1661-1708), born at Kinairdy, Banffshire, became in 1683 professor of Mathematics at Edinburgh, in 1691 Savilian professor of Astronomy at Oxford. Among his works are De Dimensione Figurarum (1684); Catoptrice et Dioptrice Sphæricæ Elementa (1695); Astronomiæ Elementa (1702), a defence of Newton's system; an edition of Euclid (1703); and a Practical Geometry (1745).—JOHN GREGORY (1724-73), grandson of James, born at Aberdeen, became professor of Medicine at Aberdeen in 1755, and in 1766 at Edinburgh. Among his works are a Practice of Physic (1772) and comparison of man with the animals (1766)—His son, JAMES (1753-1821), the compounder of 'Gregory's Mixture,' born at Aberdeen, became in 1776 professor of Medicine at Edinburgh, and a leading doctor. He was the author of Conspectus Medicinæ Theoreticæ et Philosophicæ and Literary Essays (1792).—His son, WILLIAM (1803-58), professor of Chemistry at Glasgow (1837), in King's College, Aberdeen (1839), and at Edinburgh (1844), wrote Outlines of Chemistry (1845).

Gregory, OLINTHUS (1774-1841), mathematician and miscellaneous writer, born at Yaxley, Huntingdon, became a newspaper editor, and then a teacher of mathematics at Cambridge and at Woolwich. He wrote works on mathematics, Lives of Robert Hall and Mason Good, &c.

Gregory, ROBERT, D.D., born at Nottingham, 9th February 1819, graduated from Corpus Christi College, Oxford (1843), and became a canon of St Paul's in 1868, and dean in 1891.

Greig, SIR SAMUEL (1735-88), born at Inverkeithing, from the British passed in 1763 into the Russian navy, where he rose to be a distinguished admiral.—His son, ALEXIS SAMUILOVICH GREIG (1775-1845), was also a Russian admiral.

Grenville, BEVIL. See GRENVILLE, RICHARD.

Grenville, GEORGE, statesman, was born 14th October 1712, brother to Richard Grenville, Earl Temple. He entered parliament in 1741, in 1762 became Secretary of State and First Lord of the Admiralty, and in 1763 succeeded Lord Bute as prime-minister. In his administration befell the prosecution of Wilkes and the passing of the American Stamp Act, which excited the American colonies to resistance. He resigned in 1765, and died 13th November 1770. See Grenville Papers, edited by W. J. Smith (1852-53).

Grenville, SIR RICHARD, sprung from an ancient Cornish family, was born about 1541, and early distinguished himself by his courage on land and sea. He was knighted about 1577, in 1585 commanded the seven ships which carried Raleigh's first colony to Virginia, fought and spoiled the Spaniards like others of his time, and while preparing a second fleet for Virginia had his share in the Armada fight. In August 1591 he commanded the Revenge in Lord Thomas Howard's squadron of six vessels, when they fell in with a Spanish fleet of fifty-three sail off Flores, in the Azores. While the admiral made good his escape, Grenville refused to follow him; and the great San Philip, of 1500 tons, engaged the little Revenge, which soon found herself in the midst of a ring of enemies. From three in the afternoon till next morning the battle raged. Fifteen Spanish ships were beaten off in turns; two were sunk, two disabled, and 2000 men slain or drowned. But the Revenge was by this time a helpless wreck, her powder spent, forty of her 100 sound men slain, and most of the rest hurt, the vice-admiral himself sore wounded. Sir Richard would have had the master-gunner blow up the ship, but was overborne by the survivors, and carried on board a Spanish ship, where he died of his wounds the second or third day after. This exploit was told in Raleigh's Report (1591), in verse by Gervase Markham (1595), by Linschoten (1596; Eng. 1598), the three reprinted together by Arber (1871); by Froude in his Short Studies, and by Tennyson in a noble ballad.—His grandson, the cavalier SIR BEVIL GRENVILLE, the hero of Hawker's spirited ballad, was born at Brinn in Cornwall, 23d March 1596; studied at Exeter College, Oxford; entered parliament in 1621, and sided for some years with the popular party; but from 1639 warmly espoused the king's cause, and fell in the royalist victory of Landsdowne near Bath, 5th July 1643. See Roger Granville's History of the Granvilles (Exeter, 1895).

Grenville, WILLIAM WYNDHAM, LORD GRENVILLE, third son of George Grenville, was born 25th October 1759. After studying at Eton and Oxford, he became in 1782 a member of parliament, in 1783 Paymaster-general, in 1789 Speaker; and while Home Secretary (1790) was created Baron Grenville. He became Foreign Secretary in 1791, and resigned, along with Pitt, in 1801 on the refusal of George III. to assent to Catholic Emancipation, of which Grenville was a chief supporter. In 1806 he formed the government of 'All the Talents,' which, before its dissolution in 1807, abolished the slave-trade. From 1809 to 1815 he acted along with Earl Grey, and generally supported Canning. He died at Dropmore, Bucks, 12th January 1834.

Grenville-Murray. See MURRAY.

Gresham, SIR THOMAS, founder of the Royal Exchange, was born in 1519, the only son of Sir Richard Gresham (c. 1485–1549), an opulent merchant of Norfolk ancestry, who in 1537 was elected Lord Mayor of London. From Cambridge in 1543 he passed into the Mercers' Company, and in 1551 was employed as 'king's merchant' at Antwerp. In two years he paid off a heavy loan and restored the king's credit. As a Protestant he was dismissed by Queen Mary, but soon reinstated. By Queen Elizabeth he was knighted (1559) and made for a time ambassador at Brussels. The troubles in the Netherlands compelled him in 1567 to withdraw from Antwerp, to which city he had made more than forty journeys on state service; in one in 1560 he was thrown from his horse and lamed for life. In 1569, by his advice, the state borrowed money from London merchants instead of from foreigners. Having in 1564 lost his only son, Richard, in 1566–71 he devoted a portion of his great wealth to building an Exchange, in imitation of that of Antwerp; he made provision for founding Gresham College; and he left money for eight almshouses. He died 21st November 1579. See Life by Dean Burgon (1839).

Greswell, EDWARD (1797–1869), chronologist, from 1823 was a fellow of Corpus, Oxford.

Grétry, ANDRÉ ERNEST MODESTE (1741–1813), born at Liège, settled in Paris, and composed over forty comic operas, of which Le Huron (1768) and Lucile (1769) were the earliest, and Raoul and Richard Cœur-de-Lion among the best known. He became inspector of the Conservatoire and a member of the Institute. See his Mémoires (1796), and Lives by Gregoir (1883) and Brenet (1884).

Greuze, JEAN-BAPTISTE, genre- and portrait-painter, was born at Tournay near Mâcon, 21st August 1725. His first notable works were historical; after a visit to Italy (1755) he painted Italian subjects; but he is seen at his best in such studies of girls as 'The Broken Pitcher,' the 'Girl with Doves,' and 'Girl with Dead Canary.' He died in poverty, 21st March 1805. His art, full of delicacy and grace, is marred by its triviality and pursuit of mere prettiness. See monograph by Normand (1892).

Greville, CHARLES CAVENDISH FULKE (1794–1865), educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, became private secretary to Earl Bathurst, and was Clerk of the Council 1821–59; his position gave him peculiar facilities for studying court life—advantages which he turned to the best account by penning his Memoirs (1875–87).

Greville, SIR FULKE, poet, born at Beauchamp Court, Warwickshire, in 1554, was educated at Shrewsbury and Jesus College, Cambridge, travelled abroad, was knighted in 1597 and created Lord Brooke in 1620, and was murdered by an old servant, 30th September 1628. Several didactic poems, more than a hundred sonnets, and two tragedies were printed in 1633; his life of Sir Philip Sidney in 1652. Dr Grosart collected his works (4 vols. 1870) and published a selection entitled The Friend of Sir Philip Sidney (1895).

Greville, HENRY, the pseudonym of Madame Alice Durand (née Fleury; 1842–1902), who was born at Paris, accompanied her father to St Petersburg in 1857, and married Émile Durand, a French professor, with whom she returned to France in 1872. She issued a series of novels, often bright, vigorous, and original in their pictures of Russian society, but unequal, and sometimes even dull. Between Dosia (1876) and Fidelka (1894) some twenty appeared.

Grévy, FRANÇOIS PAUL JULES, French statesman, born at Mont-sous-Vaudrey, Jura, August 15, 1807, as an advocate acquired distinction in the defence of republican political prisoners. After 1848 he was commissary of the provisional government in Jura, and was returned to the Constituent Assembly; made its Vice-president, he took a leading part in the debates. He opposed Louis Napoleon, and after the coup d'état retired from politics; but in 1869 he was again returned for Jura. In February 1871 he became President of the National Assembly, being re-elected in 1876, 1877, and 1879. The monarchist schemes were attacked by Grévy (1873–76); in 1879 he was elected President of the Republic for seven years. During his presidency the republic was consolidated at home, but its foreign policy was inglorious, especially in Tonkin. In 1885 he was elected for other seven years, but, hampered by ministerial difficulties, resigned in December 1887. He died at Mont-sous-Vaudrey, 9th Sept. 1891. See Life by Barbon (1879).

Grey, NEHEMIAH, M.D. (1628–1711), author of the Anatomy of Plants, was born at Atherstone, son of the Puritan, Obadiah Grey, D.D. (1607–89), and practised at Coventry and in London.

Grey, CHARLES, EARL, statesman, was born at Falloden, Northumberland, 15th March 1764, and educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. Whig M.P. for Northumberland (1786), he was one of the managers of the impeachment of Warren Hastings, and in 1792 helped to found the Society of the Friends of the People. He introduced the motion for the impeachment of Pitt, and took a prominent part in the temporary 'secession' of the Whigs from parliament; he also denounced the union between England and Ireland. In 1806 Grey, now Lord Howick, became First Lord of the Admiralty, and on the death of Fox Foreign Secretary and leader of the House of Commons. He carried through the act abolishing the African slave-trade. In 1807 he succeeded his father as second Earl Grey. He opposed the renewal of the war in 1815, denounced the coercive measures of the government, condemned the bill against Queen Caroline, defended the right of public meeting, and supported the enlightened commercial policy of Huskisson. In 1830 he formed a government whose policy, he said, would be one of peace, retrenchment, and reform. The first Reform Bill was produced in March 1831; its defeat led to a dissolution and the return of a parliament still more devoted to reform. A second bill was carried, which the Lords threw out in October, and riots ensued. Early in 1832 a third bill was carried in the Commons, and it weathered the second reading in the Upper House; but when a motion to postpone the disfranchising clauses was adopted, ministers resigned. The Duke of Wellington failed to form an administration, and Grey returned to office with power to create a sufficient number of peers to carry the measure. Wellington now withdrew his opposition, and in June the Reform Bill passed the House of Lords. Grey was the chief of a powerful party in the first reformed parliament. He carried the act for the abolition of slavery in the colonies, as well as a number of minor reforms; but dissensions sprang up, and in consequence of his Irish difficulties he resigned in July 1834. He died at Howick House, Alnwick, 17th July 1845. See Life by George Grey (1861).—His son, HENRY GREY, third Earl, was born at Howick House, 28th December 1802, and in 1826, as Lord Howick, entered parliament. He became Under-secretary for the Colonies in his father's ministry, but retired in 1833 because the cabinet would not support the immediate emancipation of the slaves. He was subsequently Under-secretary in the Home Department, and in 1835 Secretary for War. In 1841 he opposed Peel's policy, in 1845 succeeded to the peerage, in 1846 became Colonial Secretary, and in 1852 published his Defence of Lord John Russell's Colonial Policy. He opposed the Crimean war, and condemned Lord Beaconsfield's Eastern policy; he also frequently adopted a hostile attitude towards Mr Gladstone. He died at Howick, 9th October 1894. In 1858 he issued his Essay on Parliamentary Government as to Reform, and in 1867 published his father's Correspondence with William IV.

Grey, Sir George, statesman, born at Gibraltar, May 11, 1799, took a first-class from Oriel College, Oxford in 1821, and was called to the bar in 1826, but relinquished the law after succeeding his father in the baronetcy in 1828. M.P. for Devonport (1832-47), Under-secretary for the Colonies (1834-35), he ably defended against Roebuck Lord John Russell's bill for the temporary suspension of the Lower Canadian constitution. In 1839 Grey became Judge-advocate, in 1841 Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and in 1846 Home Secretary. During the Chartist disturbances he discharged his duties with vigour and discrimination. He carried the Crown and Government Security Bill, the Alien Bill, and a measure for the further suspension in Ireland of the Habeas Corpus Act (1849). In 1854 he became Colonial Secretary, and in 1855, under Palmerston, took his old post of Home Secretary. He carried a measure remodelled the ticket-of-leave system. From 1859 he was Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and from 1861 Home Secretary again. On the defeat of the Russell-Gladstone ministry in 1866, Grey's official career closed; but he sat in parliament until 1874. He died at his seat of Falloden near Alnwick, September 9, 1882. See the Memoir by Bishop Creighton, privately printed in 1883 and published only in 1901.—His grandson, Sir EDWARD GREY, K.G. (1911), born 25th April 1862, was educated at Winchester and Balliol College, Oxford, in 1885 became M.P. for Berwick-on-Tweed, in 1892-95 was (Liberal) Under-secretary, and from 1905 Secretary, for Foreign Affairs.

Grey, Sir George, K.C.B., born at Lisbon (son of an officer killed at Badajoz) 14th April 1812, and educated at Sandhurst, in 1838 explored the Swan River district in Australia, and published his Journals of Two Expeditions in Australia in 1840. In 1841 he was made governor of South Australia, in 1846 of New Zealand, and in 1854 (a K.C.B. since 1848) of Cape Colony, where he allayed the irritation left by the Kaffir war; in 1858 he resigned, but was requested to resume his governorship. In 1861-67 he was again governor of New Zealand, and brought the Maori war to a close. He became Superintendent of Auckland 1875; and in 1877-84 was premier of New Zealand, where he had unbounded influence with the Maoris. He died in London, 19th Sept. 1898. He wrote an important work on Polynesian Mythology (1856) and published a collection of Polynesian proverbs (1858). See his Life by W. L. and L. Rees (3d ed. 1893), and The Romance of a Proconsul (1899) by James Milne.

Grey, Lady Jane, born at Broadgate, Leicestershire, in October 1537, was the eldest daughter of Henry Grey, Marquis of Dorset, afterwards Duke of Suffolk, and of Lady Frances Brandon. The latter was the daughter of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, by Mary, younger sister of Henry VIII., and widow of Louis XII. of France. Lady Jane was brought up rigorously by her parents, but under her tutor Aylmer, afterwards Bishop of London, made extraordinary progress, especially in languages. In 1553 the Duke of Northumberland, foreseeing the speedy death of Edward VI., determined to secure the succession to his own family. Lady Jane, not sixteen years old, was therefore married, against her wish, to Lord Guildford Dudley, Northumberland's fourth son, on 21st May 1553; and on 9th July, three days after Edward's death, the council informed her that he had named her as his successor. On the 19th, the brief usurpation over, she was a prisoner in the Tower; and four months later, pleading guilty of high-treason, she was sentenced to death. She spurned the idea of forsaking Protestantism and bitterly condemned Northumberland's recantation. Queen Mary might have been merciful; but Suffolk's participation in Wyatt's rebellion sealed the doom of his daughter, who on 12th February 1554, along with her husband, was beheaded on Tower Hill. They are buried in the Tower church of St Peter ad Vincula. See The Chronicle of Queen Jane, edited by Nichols (Camden Soc. 1850).

Grey, John (1785-1868), of Dilston near Hexham, a great Northumbrian agriculturist and estate-agent (1833-63). See Life by his daughter, Josephine Butler (1874).

Grey, Richard, D.D. (1694-1771), author of the Memoria Technica (1730), was born at Newcastle, studied at Oxford, and from 1720 was rector of Hinton, Northamptonshire.

Grey, Sir William (1818-78), son of a Bishop of Hereford, was lieutenant-governor of Bengal 1867-71, and governor of Jamaica 1874-77.

Grieg, Edvard, Norwegian composer, born at Bergen, 15th June 1843, of Scotch descent, his ancestors, Greigs, having emigrated during the Jacobite troubles. At fifteen he was sent to the Conservatorium at Leipzig; thence in 1863 he went to Copenhagen, and in 1867 to Christiania, where he taught for about eight years. He visited Liszt in Rome in 1865 and 1870, and ultimately settled near Bergen on a pension given him by the Norwegian parliament. His works are mainly for the pianoforte, and in small forms, but embrace a sonata and a concerto for pianoforte, three violin and pianoforte sonatas, numerous songs, a few orchestral suites (such as Peer Gynt), and some small choral pieces. His music is characterised by the strongest national peculiarities. He visited England in 1888, 1889, and 1897. He died 4th September 1907. See book by Finck (1906). [Green.]

Grierson, SIR ROBERT, of Lag, born about 1655, succeeded his cousin in the Dumfriesshire estates in 1669. He was for some years steward of Kirkcudbright, and so harried the Covenanters as to leave his name a byword for cruelty; he was one of the judges of the Wigtown martyrs. He received a Nova Scotia baronetcy in 1685, with a pension of £200. After the Revolution he was fined and imprisoned as a Jacobite, and in 1696 was arraigned on a false charge of coining. He died 31st December 1733. See Colonel Ferguson's Laird of Lag (1886).

Griesbach, JOHANN JAKOB (1745-1812), born at Butzbach in Hesse-Darmstadt, studied theology at Tübingen, Halle, and Leipzig, lectured in Halle, and in 1776 became a professor at Jena. Amongst his more notable works are Synopsis Evangeliorum (1774-75), his edition of the New Testament (1775), Populäre Dogmatik (1779), Commentarius Criticus in Textum Novi Testamenti (1798-1811), and Opuscula Academica (1825). See the Lives of him by Köthe (1812), Augusti (1812), and Eichstädt (1815). [Green-bakh.]

Griffin, GERALD, novelist, born at Limerick, 12th December 1803, early began to write for the papers and magazines. He went to London in 1823, and failed as a dramatist, but was more successful with novels—Holland Tide (1827), Tales of the Munster Festivals (1827), and The Collegians (1829), on which the drama of the Colleen Bawn is founded. These were followed by other novels and minor tales. Griffin joined the Society of Christian Brothers, and died at Cork, 12th June 1840. See Life by his brother (1843) and memoir prefixed to new edition of The Collegians (1896).

Griffith, SIR RICHARD JOHN (1784-1878), an Irish geologist and civil engineer, who was commissioner of valuation from 1827 to 1868, and in 1858 was created a baronet.

Grillo. See RISTORI, ADELAIDE.

Grillparzer, FRANS (1791-1872), dramatic poet, was born at Vienna, and laboured in the imperial civil service from 1813 to 1856. He first attracted notice in 1816 by a tragedy, Die Ahnfrau, followed by Sappho (1819), Das goldene Vlies (1821), Des Meeres und der Liebe Wellen (1840), Der Traum ein Leben (1840), &c. He produced in lyric poetry much meritorious work; and one good prose novel, Der Spielmann. Collected editions of his works, including an autobiography, were published in 1872 and 1889. See German works by Faulhammer (1883), Laube (1884), Lange (1894), and Farinelli (1895). A Grillparzer Society was founded at Vienna in 1890. [Gril-part'ser.]

Grimald, NICHOLAS (1519-62), poet and playwright, was born of Genoese ancestry in Huntingdonshire, studied at both Cambridge and Oxford, and became Ridley's chaplain, but recanted under Queen Mary.

Grimaldi, a noble Genoese house, from 968 lords of the principality of Monaco.

Grimaldi, JOSEPH, the typical representative of the clown of the English pantomime, was born in London 18th December 1779. He first appeared at Drury Lane when two years old, and in his third year he had his first engagement at Sadler's Wells Theatre, where he regularly performed (except for one season), until his retirement from the stage, prematurely worn out by hard work, in 1828. He died 31st May 1837. See Memoirs of Joseph Grimaldi, edited by Charles Dickens (1838).

Grimbald, Sr (c. 820-903), was prior of a Flemish monastery near St Omer, when about 893 Alfred the Great invited him to England. He died abbot of the New Minster at Winchester.

Grimm, FRIEDRICH MELCHIOR, BARON, born at Ratisbon, 25th December 1723, after studying at Leipzig, and failing with a tragedy, accompanied a nobleman to Paris, and became reader to the Crown-prince of Saxe-Gotha. He got acquainted with Rousseau in 1749, and through him with Diderot, Holbach, and Madame d'Épinay. His connection with the Encyclopédistes, added to his own acquirements, opened up a brilliant career. He became secretary to the Duke of Orleans, and began to write for several German princes those famous literary bulletins which for nearly forty years gave the most trenchant criticism of all important French books. In 1776 he was made a baron by the Duke of Gotha, and appointed minister-plenipotentiary at the French court. At the Revolution he withdrew to Gotha, and afterwards to the court of Catharine II., whence he was sent in 1795 as Russian minister to Hamburg. He died at Gotha, 19th December 1807. His Correspondance, first published in 1812-14, has since been edited by Taschereau (1829-31) and Tourneux (1878-82). His correspondence with Diderot was printed in 1829. See Sainte-Benue's Études sur Grimm (1854) and Scherer's Melchior Grimm (Paris, 1887).

Grimm, JAKOB LUDWIG KARL, born January 4, 1785, at Hanau in Hesse-Cassel, studied at Marburg, and spent most of the year 1805 in Paris. On his return he became a clerk in the war-office, and in 1808 librarian to Jerome Bonaparte, king of Westphalia. A work on the Meistersingers (1811) was followed in 1812 by the first volume of the famous Kinder- und Hausmärchen, collected by him and his brother Wilhelm (also now at Cassel)—a work which formed a foundation for the science of comparative folklore. The second volume followed in 1814; the third in 1822. In 1813-15 Grimm was secretary to the minister of the Elector of Hesse at Paris and at the Congress of Vienna. In 1828 the two brothers removed to Göttingen, where Jakob became professor and librarian, and Wilhelm under-librarian. He was one of the seven professors dismissed (as was Wilhelm) for protesting in 1837 against the abolition of the constitution by the king of Hanover. In 1840 the brothers received professorships in Berlin, and were elected members of the Academy of Sciences. Jakob died 20th September 1863. His Deutsche Grammatik (1819; 2d ed. entirely recast, 1822-40) is perhaps the greatest philological work of the age. His Deutsche Rechts-Altcrthümer (1828; 2d ed. 1854) and Deutsche Mythologie (1835; 4th ed. by Meyer, 1875-78; Eng. trans. 1879-88) deal with German usages in the middle ages and the old Teutonic superstitions. Only less important is his Geschichte der Deutschen Sprache (1848; 3d ed. 1868) and his Reinhard Fuchs (1834). With his brother Wilhelm he edited many old German classics, and commenced the great Deutsches Wörterbuch (vol. i. 1854; approaching completion by 1912). The first volume of Grimm's minor works (8 vols. 1867-86) contains an autobiography. Many collections of his letters have been printed. See the studies by Scherer (2d ed. 1884) and Berndt (1884), and those on the two brothers by Duncker (1884) and Schönbach (1885).

His brother, WILHELM KARL, born at Hanau, February 24, 1786, in 1830 became under-librarian and supernumerary professor of Philosophy at Göttingen. At Berlin he and Jakob, the 'Brothers Grimm,' laboured together. Wilhelm died 16th December 1859. He edited many old German texts and collaborated with his brother. His own most important work is Die deutsche Heldensage (1829; 2d ed. 1867). His minor works (4 vols. 1881-86) contain an autobiography.

Grimmelshausen. HANS JACOB CHRISTOFFEL VON (c. 1625-76), novelist, born at Gehlhansen in Hesse-Cassel, served on the imperial side in the Thirty Years' War, led a wandering life, but ultimately settled down at Renchen near Kehl, where he died Antinann of the town. In the leisure of his later life he produced a series of remarkable novels. His best works are on the model of the Spanish picaresque romances; the rich humour, dramatic power, and local colour are all his own. The sufferings of the German peasantry at the hands of the lawless troopers who overran the country have never been more powerfully pictured than in Simplicissimus (1669). It was followed by Trutz Simplex (1669), Springinsfeld (1670), Das wunderbarliche Vogelneest (1672), &c.

Grimston. HON. ROBERT (1816-84), athlete and sportsman, was born in London, the first Earl of Verulam's fourth son, and died at Gorhambury. See Life by Gale (1885).

Grimthorpe. EDMUND BECKETT, LORD, K. C., an authority on architecture and horology, and till 1881 a leader of the parliamentary bar, was born at Carlton Hall near Newark, 12th May 1816, and was educated at Doncaster, Eton, and Trinity College, Cambridge. He succeeded his father as fifth baronet in 1874, in 1886 was raised to the peerage, and died in April 1905. Till 1872 he bore the name Beckett Denison.

Grimwood. FRANK ST CLAIR (c. 1852-91), educated at Winchester and Merton College, Oxford, entered the Bengal civil service in 1874, and had been three years political agent at Manipur, N. E. India, when on 24th March 1891, with the chief commissioner of Assam, James Wallace Quinton (1834-91), and three others, he was treacherously murdered. His wife made a plucky escape. See her My Three Years in Manipur (1891).

Grindal. EDMUND (1519-83), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at St Bees and educated at Cambridge, where he was in turn scholar, fellow, and master of Pembroke Hall. A prebendary of Westminster under Edward VI., he lived abroad during Mary's reign, and there imbibed the doctrines of Geneva, returning to England on the accession of Elizabeth. In 1559 he became Bishop of London, in 1570 Archbishop of York, and in 1575 Archbishop of Canterbury. His Puritan sympathies soon estranged him from the court, and his refusal to put down 'prophecies' or private meetings of the clergy for the study of Scripture led to his five years' sequestration in 1577. His few writings, with a Life, were printed by the Parker Society in 1853.

Gringore. or GRINGOIRE, PIERRE (c. 1475-1538), poet, born at Caen, while taking the chief rôles in a theatrical society was active in the production of pantomimic farces, and is one of the creators of the French political comedy. He abused the enemies of Louis XII., and thus found cover for his freedoms against the vices of the nobility, the clergy, and even the pope himself. In later life he was a herald to the Duke of Lorraine, and confined his muse to religious poetry. His principal pieces are Le Jeu du Prince des Sots (1511), Les folles Enterprisces, Les Enterpris de Venise, La Chasse du Cerf des Cerfs, and the famous Mystère de Monseigneur Saint Loys (c. 1524). His works have been edited by Héricault and Montaiglon (1858-77). Gringore figures in Victor Hugo's Notre Dame and in a play by Banville (adapted by Pollock and Besant). See French monographs by Picot (1878) and Badel (1893).

Grinnell. HENRY (1799-1874), a New York merchant who largely defrayed the cost of Kane's Polar expedition of 1853-55.

Grisi. GIULIA, singer, born at Milan, 28th July 1811, made her début in 1828 at Bologna, and in 1832 appeared in Paris, where the purity, melodiousness, and volume of her voice, as well as her beauty, won general admiration. Bellini's Puritani and other operas were written for her, but Norma was her greatest part. London was the scene of her most successful performances. She married in 1836 the Marquis de Melcy, and in 1856 the tenor Mario, with whom she sang in America. She died at Berlin, 28th November 1869.—Her sister GIUDITTA (1805-40) was also an operatic singer; she retired in 1833, and married Count Barini.

Griswold. RUFUS WILMOT (1815-57), born at Benson, Vermont, became Baptist preacher, then journalist and compiler of books in Philadelphia, Boston, and New York. He was one of Poe's executors, and the Life he wrote for the edition of his works (1850) occasioned much hostile criticism. See his Letters (1898).

Grocyn. WILLIAM (c. 1446-1519), the first who publicly taught Greek at Oxford, was born at Colerne, Wiltshire, and from Winchester passed in 1465 to New College, Oxford. He studied in Italy (1488-91), acquiring a knowledge of Greek from the Greek exile Chalcondylas; and then settled again at Oxford, where Sir Thomas More was his pupil. Erasmus lived at Oxford in Grocyn's house, and speaks of him as his 'patronus et præceptor.' In 1506 he became master of All-hallows' College near Maidstone.

Grolier. JEAN (1479-1565), bibliophile, born at Lyons, was attached to the court of Francis I., went to Italy as intendant-general of the army, was long employed in diplomacy at Milan and Rome, and then became treasurer. It is his library, dispersed in 1675, that has made Grolier famous. He acquired choice copies of the best works, and had them magnificently bound, with the inscription, Io. Grolierii et Amicorum. Of his 3000 books, about 350 have come to light. See the study by Le Roux de Lincy (1866). [Grol-yay.]

Gronovius. the Latinised form of Gronov, a family of scholars of German extraction, settled in Holland, whose principal members were: JOHANNES FREDERICUS GRONOVIVS (1611-71), born at Hamburg, became in 1643 professor at Deventer, and in 1658 at Leyden; he edited Livy, Statius, Tacitus, Phædrus, Seneca, Sallust, Pliny, and Plautus, and published many learned works, among them De Sestertiis.—His son, JACOBUS (1645-1716), was professor at Pisa, and appointed in 1679 to his father's chair; his works were Thesaurus Antiquitatum Græcorum (1697-1702), and editions of Polybius, Herodotus, Cicero, and Ammianus Marcellinus.—His son, ABRAHAM (1694-1775), became librarian at Ley-

Having come to Edinburgh in 1876, he wrote for the Encyclopædia Britannica, the Dictionary of National Biography, the Athenæum, Blackwood's Magazine, &c., and was sub-editor of Chambers's Encyclopædia (1887-92). He published In Gypsy Tents (1880), A Short Border History (1887), Two Suffolk Friends (on his father and Edward FitzGerald, 1895), Kriegsspiel (a novel, 1896), Gypsy Folk Tales (1899), and an edition of Lavengro (1900). An accurate historical student and a widely-read scholar, he was a supreme authority on gypsy language and folklore.

Groot, GEERT (1340-84), the founder at Deventer about 1376 of the 'Brethren of the Common Life.'

Gros, ANTOINE JEAN, BARON, historical painter, was born at Paris, 16th March 1771, and acquired celebrity by his great pictures of Napoleon's battles (1797-1811); 'Charles V. and Francis I.' (1812); 'Departure of Louis XVIII. for Ghent' (1815); and 'Embarkation of the Duchess of Angoulême' (1815). Out of chagrin at having out-lived his fame he drowned himself in the Seine, 25th June 1835. See Lives by Delestre (1867), Tripièrle Franc (1880), and Dargenty (1887). [Groh.]

Grose, FRANCIS, antiquary, was born at Greenford, Middlesex, in 1731, son of a rich Swiss jeweller settled at Richmond. In the Herald's College 1755-63, he next became adjutant of the Hampshire and Surrey militia, and, when his easy habits had cost him his fortune, put to profit the favourite studies of his youth and his excellent draughtsmanship. His Antiquities of England and Wales (1773-87) proved a success, and in 1789 he set out on an antiquarian tour through Scotland. His splendid social qualities, his rich humour and good nature, made him friends everywhere—Burns one of them. He went to Ireland on a like errand, but died suddenly at Dublin, May 12, 1791. Grose's work on the antiquities of Scotland appeared 1789-91; that on Ireland in 1791. Other works were A Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue (1785; new ed. with Memoir by Pierce Egani, 1823), A Provincial Glossary (1787), Treatise on Ancient Armour and Weapons (1785-89), Military Antiquities (1786-88), The Grumbler (1791), and The Otto (1793).

Gross, SAMUEL DAVID, D.C.L. (1805-84), surgeon, born near Easton, Penn., in 1835 became professor of Pathology at Cincinnati, afterwards professor of Surgery at Louisville and New York, and in 1856-82 in Jefferson College. He published A System of Surgery (1859; 6th ed. 1882), &c.

Grosse, THEODOR (1829-91), historical painter, was born and died at Dresden.

Grosseteste, ROBERT, Bishop of Lincoln, was born about 1175 at Stradbroke in Suffolk, of peasant parentage—Grosseteste (French for 'great-head') being a mere 'to-name.' Educated at Lincoln, Oxford, and Paris, he had for some years been the first teacher of theology in the Franciscan school at Oxford, and had held many preferments, when in 1235 he became Bishop of Lincoln. He forthwith undertook the reformation of abuses, embroiling himself with his own chapter and with Pope Innocent IV. The pope granted English benefices to 'rascal Romans,' who drew the revenues of their office, but seldom appeared in the country. Grosseteste set himself strongly against this, thereby incurring a temporary suspension from his bishopric and a continual menace of excommunication. In the last year of the bishop's life he refused the pope's request to promote his nephew, an Italian, to a canonry; and the pope is said—falsely, it seems—to have excommunicated him. Anyhow his clergy went on obeying him till his death at Buckden near Huntingdon, 9th Oct. 1253. Pegge's catalogue of his works fills 25 closely-printed quarto pages, and exhibits 'treatises on sound, motion, heat, colour, form, angles, atmospheric pressure, poison, the rainbow, comets, light, the astrolabe, necromancy, and witchcraft.' See Brewer's Monumenta Franciscana (1858), Luard's edition of Grosseteste's Latin letters (1862), Perry's Life of Grosseteste (1871), and Stevenson's (1899).

Grossmith, GEORGE (1847-1912), from 1877 took leading parts in nine of Gilbert and Sullivan's operas, and in 1889 started on a seventeen years' tour as a single-handed entertainer.

Grote, GEORGE, born at Clay Hill, Beckenham, Kent, November 17, 1794, was educated at the Charterhouse, and in 1810 became a clerk in the bank founded in 1766 by his grandfather (a native of Bremen) in Threadneedle Street. He remained there thirty-two years, devoting all his leisure to literature and political studies; a 'philosophical Radical,' he threw himself ardently into the cause of progress and political freedom. In 1820 he married the high-spirited Harriet Lewin, of Bexley; in 1822 conceived the idea of his History of Greece; and in 1826 mercilessly dissected Mitford's history in the Westminster Review. Grote became head of the bank in 1830, and in 1832 was returned for the City of London. During his first session he brought forward a motion for the adoption of the ballot; it was lost, but Grote continued to advocate the measure until he retired from parliamentary life in 1841. In 1843 he also retired from the banking-house, and devoted himself exclusively to literature, mainly to the great History of Greece (12 vols. 1846-56). Grote was elected vice-chancellor of London University (1862), foreign associate of the French Academy (1864), and president of University College (1868). In 1865 he concluded an elaborate work on Plato and the other Companions of Socrates, which, with his (unfinished) Aristotle, was supplementary to the History. Grote died June 18, 1871, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His minor works were published by Professor Bain in 1873; and Fragments on Ethical Subjects in 1876.—Mrs Grote (1792-1878) wrote a Memoir of Ary Scheffer (1860), Collected Papers in Prose and Verse (1862), and The Personal Life of George Grote (1873). See Life of her by Lady Eastlake (1880).

Grotefend, GEORG FRIEDRICH (1775-1853), was born at Münden in Hanover, and filled scholastic appointments at Göttingen, Frankfurt, and Hanover. He wrote on Latin, Umbrian, and Oscan philology, &c., but made himself famous by deciphering the cuneiform alphabet in 1802.—His son, KARL LUDWIG (1809-74), born at Frankfurt, filled from 1853 a post in the Archives at Hanover. He wrote on Greco-Bactrian and Athenian coins, Roman epigraphy, &c.—His cousin, FRIEDRICH AUGUST GROTEFEND (1798-1836), from 1835 a professor at Göttingen, made solid contributions to Latin philology. [Groo'-leh-fent.]

Groth, KLAUS, writer in Plattdeutsch, was born at Heide in Holstein, 24th April 1819, and in 1866 became professor of German Language and Literature at Kiel. His masterpiece, Quickborn, (1852, 17th ed. 1892) is a series of poems dealing with life in Ditmarsh; but some of his work is in High German. He died 1st June 1899. [Groat.]

Grotius, HUGO, or HUG VAN GROOT, Dutch jurist, was born at Delft, 10th April 1583, studied at Leyden, and accompanied an embassy to France. On his return he practised as a lawyer in the Hague; in 1613 he was appointed pensionary of Rotterdam. The religious disputes between the Remonstrants or Arminians and their opponents were now at their height. Grotius, like his patron the grand-pensionary Barneveldt, supported the Remonstrants. In 1618 both were arrested, tried, and condemned by the dominant party under Prince Maurice, Barneveldt to death, and Grotius to imprisonment for life. Grotius escaped, however, by the aid of his wife, and found refuge at Paris in 1621, when Louis XIII. for a time gave him a pension. In 1604 Grotius began, and in 1625 issued, his masterpiece, De Jure Belli et Pacis, long the standard work on international law. In 1634 he entered the Swedish service as ambassador at the French court. On his retirement in 1645 he proceeded to Stockholm, but, disliking court and climate, was on his way back to Holland, when he died at Rostock, 29th August 1645. He was an able statesman, a profound theologian, a distinguished scholar, an acute philosopher, a judicious historian, and a splendid jurist; and he wrote both Latin verse and Dutch poems. His best historical work is Annales de Rebus Belgicis (1657). His theological productions are annotations on the Old (1644) and the New (1641-46) Testaments, and the famous De Veritate Religionis Christianæ (1627). See Life by Butler (1827) and the Étude by Hély (1875).

Grouchy, EMMANUEL, MARQUIS DE (1766-1847), French general, born at Paris, threw in his lot with the Revolution, and had his first taste of war during the Vendean revolt, was second to Hoche in the abortive expedition to Ireland, and greatly distinguished himself in Italy (1798). Later he fought at Hohenlinden, Eylau, Friedland, Wagram, and in the Russian campaign of 1812; and after Leipzig covered the retreat of the French. On Napoleon's escape from Elba, he destroyed the Bourbon opposition in the south of France, and helped to rout Blücher at Ligny. After Waterloo, as commander-in-chief of the broken armies of France, he led them skilfully back towards the capital; then, resigning, retired to the United States. He returned in 1819, and was reinstated as marshal in 1831. See his Mémoires (1873-74). [Groo'-shy.]

Grove, SIR GEORGE, born at Clapham, 13th August 1820, was trained as a civil engineer, erected in the West Indies the first two cast-iron lighthouses, and assisted in the Britannia tubular bridge. tionary of the Bible, as editor and part author of the great Dictionary of Music and Musicians (1878-89), by a work on Beethoven (1896), he served the reading public. He greatly distinguished himself in the subjects of electricity and optics, and was professor of Natural Science at the London Institution in 1840-47. In 1839 he invented his powerful battery. He published very important lectures, as those on the Progress of Physical Science (1842), in which he propounded the theory of the mutual convertibility of the natural forces; the Correlation of the Physical Forces (1846); Voltaic Ignition (1847); and the Continuity of Natural Phenomena (1866). He died 3d August 1896.

Grün, ANASTASIUS. See AUERSPERG.

Grundtvig, NIKOLAI FREDERIK SEVERIN, Danish poet and theologian, was born at Udby in Zealand, 8th September 1783. He first became known by his Northern Mythology (1806) and Decline of the Heroic Age in the North (1809). These were followed by the Rhyme of Roeskilde and the Roeskilde Saga (1814), and by a collection of patriotic songs (1815). About this time he took his stand against the current rationalism, and became the head of a religious school, who strove to free the church from state interference; but from 1825 to 1832, for an attack on a conspicuous rationalist, was suspended from preaching. In 1818 he had begun the translation of Snorri Sturluson and Saxo Grammaticus; in 1820 he published a Danish translation of Beowulf. After 1861 he had the title of bishop, though he held no see. He died 2d September 1872.—His son, SVEND HERSLEB GRUNDTVIG (1824-83), was professor of Scandinavian Philology at Copenhagen, and edited many old Danish folk-tales and ballads. [Groont-vig.]

300 works, notable for their accuracy and clear type. Amongst the more noted are the fine Latin Bible of 1550 and Dolet's Commentaria Linguae Latinae (1536). Gryphus's sons, Antoine and François, were also famous French printers.

Gubernatis, ANGELO DE, born at Turin, April 7, 1840, in 1863 became professor of Sanskrit at Florence. He resigned his chair that same year to follow the socialistic dreams of Bakunin, whose cousin he married, but, being restored to reason, was re-elected (1867); in 1891 he accepted a call to Rome. His works on zoological mythology, birth and funeral customs, Vedic mythology, plants, and comparative mythology are marred by fantastic solar interpretation; he has also published biographical reminiscences, a French dictionary of contemporary authors, histories of Indian and of universal literature, &c.

Guercino, properly GIAN-FRANCESCO BARBIERI, Italian painter, was born 2d February 1590, at Cento near Bologna; and at Bologna, where he became the head of a flourishing school of painting, he died 22d December 1666. [Gwer-chee'no.]

Guericke, OTTO VON (1802-86), physicist, was born at Magdeburg, and died at Hamburg, having for a time been engineer in the Swedish army, and afterwards burgomaster of Magdeburg. He made experiments on electricity and the nature and effects of air, and he discovered the air-pump (1650) and the Magdeburg Hemispheres. See Life by Hoffmann (1874).

Guérin, GEORGES MAURICE DE, poet, was born at the château of Le Cayla in Languedoc, 4th August 1810, and bred for the church, entering the community of Lamennais at La Chesnaye in Brittany. He followed his master in his estrangement from Rome, and, going like him to Paris (1833) to try journalism, became a teacher at the College Stanislas. He married a rich Creole lady in November 1838, and died of consumption, 19th July 1839. His Reliquies, including the Centaure (a kind of prose poem), letters, and poems were published in 1860.—EUGÉNIE DE GUÉRIN (1805-48), with something of her brother's genius, left *Journal*s (1861) and letters (1864), both translated into English. See monographs by Marelle (Berlin, 1869) and Harriet Parr (1870). [Gay-ran.]

Guérin, PIERRE NARCISSE, BARON (1774-1833), historical painter, was born in Paris, and died in Rome, where he had been director of the French Academy of Painting 1822-29.

Guerrazzi, FRANCESCO DOMENICO (1804-73), born at Leghorn, had won a great reputation by his patriotic and political fictions, when on the Grand-duke of Tuscany's flight (1849) he was proclaimed dictator in spite of his disinclination for a republic. On the duke's restoration he was condemned to the galleys, but ultimately permitted to select Corsica as his place of banishment. Restored to liberty by later events, Guerrazzi sat in the parliament of Turin in 1862-65. His chief works of fiction are La Battaglia di Benevento (1827), L'Assedio di Firenze (1836), Isabella Orsini (1844), Beatrice Cenci (1854), L'Asino (1857). Guesclin, BERTRAND DU, Constable of France, was born about 1320 near Dinan, and early took part in the contests for the dukedom of Brittany. After King John's capture at Poitiers in 1356, Du Guesclin fought splendidly against the English, his military skill being especially shown at Rennes (1356) and Dinan (1357); he took Melun (1359) and other fortified towns, and freed the Seine from the English. On Charles's accession in 1364 he became governor of Pont-orsion, and the same year gained the battle of Cocherel against Charles the Bad of Navarre, but was defeated and taken prisoner by the English at Auray, and ransomed only for 100,000 livres. He next supported Henry of Trastamare against Pedro the Cruel, king of Castile, but was defeated and taken prisoner by the Black Prince (1367). Again ransomed, Du Guesclin in 1369 defeated and captured Pedro, and placed the crown of Castile on the head of Henry of Trastamare; but was recalled by Charles V. of France, then hard pressed by the English, to be made Constable of France. In 1370 he opened his campaigns against the English, and soon nearly all their possessions were in the hands of the French. He died during the siege of Châteauneuf de Randon, July 13, 1380. See Lives by Guyard de Berville (1767; new ed. 1882), Jameson (1863), Luce (2d ed. 1883), Postel (1893), and Stoddard (1897). [Gay-klan.]

Guest, LADY CHARLOTTE. See SCHREIBER.

Guest, EDWIN (1800-80), LL.D., F.R.S., studied at Caius College, Cambridge, and in 1852 became Master. His History of English Rhythms (1838; 2d ed. revised by Prof. Skeat, 1882) is a work of great erudition.

Guevara, ANTONIO DE (1490-1545), bishop of Mondoñedo and confessor of Charles V., employed in his book on Marcus Aurelius (translated by Lord Berners) the exalted style which anticipated the euphuism of Lyly (q.v.). His 'Familiar Letters' were also very popular in an English version.—LUIZ VALEZ DE GUEVARA (1570-1644), novelist and dramatist, was the model of Le Sage (q.v.).

Guglielmi, PIETRO (1727-1804), composer, was born at Massa di Carrara. [Gool-yel'-mee.]

Guicciardini, FRANCESCO (1483-1540), born at Florence, at twenty-three became professor of Law there, and also practised as an advocate; but his real field was diplomacy. His apprenticeship served in Spain (1512-14), he became papal governor of Modena and Reggio (1515), Parma (1521), the Romagna (1523), and Bologna (1531). Retiring from the papal service in 1534, he secured the election of Cosimo de' Medici as duke of Florence; but, disappointed of the post of mayor of the palace, withdrew to Areetri, and busied himself with his great Storia d'Italia, a dispassionate analytical history of Italy from 1494 to 1532 (ed. by Rosini, 1819). In 1857-67 there appeared at Florence his Opere Inedite; and in 1890 his Counsels and Reflections were translated by N. H. Thomson. See works by Benoist (1862) and Gioda (1880). [Gwitch-ar-dee'nee.]

Guiccioli, TERESA GAMBA, COUNTESS (1801-73), daughter of a Ravenna nobleman, in 1817 married Count Guiccioli, aged 60, and during 1819-23 was mistress to Byron. In 1851 she married the French Marquis de Boissy (1798-1866), and in 1868 published Lord Byron jugé par les témoins de sa vie (Eng. trans. 1869). [Gwitch'o-lee.]

Guidi, CARLO ALESSANDRO (1650-1712), lyric poet, a founder of the academy called L'Arcadia, born at Pavia, died at Frascati. [Gwee'dee.]

Guidi, TOMMASO. See MASACCIO.

Guido, or GUIDO RENI, painter, born at Calvenzano near Bologna, 4th November 1675, studied under Calvaert and Ludovico Caracci, and went to Rome first in 1699 and next in 1695. 'Aurora and the Hours' there is usually regarded as his masterpiece, but some critics rank even higher the unfinished 'Nativity' in San Martino at Naples. Through a quarrel with Cardinal Spinola regarding an altarpiece for St Peter's he left Rome and settled at Bologna, where, an inveterate gambler, he died 18th August 1642. He was a prolific painter, and his works are in all the chief European galleries. He also produced some vigorous etchings. [Gwee'do.]

Guido Aretinus, or GUY OF AREZZO (c. 990-1050), according to some was born at Arezzo, but according to others was born near Paris, and brought up in the monastery of St Maur-les-Fosses. He was a monk at Pomposa near Ferrara, and he is supposed to have died prior of the Camaldolite monastery of Avellana. He greatly promoted musical science; and the invention of the staff is ascribed to him; and he seems to have first adopted as names for the notes of the scale the initial syllables of the hemistichs of a hymn in honour of St John the Baptist (ut, re, mi, &c.). See monographs by Angeloni (1811), Kiesewetter (1844), and Falchi (1882); the new edition of Grove's Dictionary of Music (1904-6); and Dom Germain Morin in Revue de l'Art Chrétien (1888).

Guignes, JOSEPH DE (1721-1800), orientalist, was born at Pontoise, and died in Paris. His great work is L'Histoire Générale des Huns, Turcs, et Mogols (1756-58).—His son, CHRÉTIEN-LOUIS-JOSEPH (1759-1845), published a Chinese dictionary (1813). [Geene; g hard.]

Guillaume, EUGÈNE (1822-1905), sculptor, was born at Montbard, Côte d'Or.

Gullemin, AMADÉE VICTOR (1826-93), professor of Mathematics in Paris, was born and died at Pierre in Saône-et-Loire. Of his numerous illustrated works have been translated The Heavens (1866), The Sun (1869), The World of Comets (1876), The Forces of Nature (1872), and Application of Physical Forces (1877). [Geel-mann.]

Gullim, or GWILLIM, JOHN (1565-1621), born at Hereford, studied at Brasenose, Oxford, and was an official of the College of Arms in London, and in 1610 published A Display of Heraldrie, notes for which, if even so much, may have been furnished by John Barkham (c. 1572-1642), chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Guinness, SIR BENJAMIN LEE (1798-1868), born in Dublin, was a member of the brewing firm established there in 1759. The business, now a limited liability company, is the largest in the world. First lord mayor of Dublin in 1851, and Conservative M.P. for it in 1865-68, he restored St Patrick's Cathedral in 1860-65 at a cost of £140,000; in 1867 he was created a baronet.—His eldest son, ARTHUR (b. 1st Nov. 1840), succeeded to the baronetcy, and in 1880 was created Lord Ardilaun.—His third son, EDWARD CECIL (b. 10th Nov. 1847), created baronet (1885), Baron Iveagh (1891), and viscount (1905), placed £250,000 in the hands of trustees in 1889 to build sanitary dwellings for workmen at low rent, £200,000 to be given to London and the rest to Dublin.

Guiscard, ROBERT, Duke of Apulia and Calabria, the sixth of the twelve sons of Tancred de Hauteville, was born near Contances in Normandy about 1015. He won great renown in South Italy as a soldier, captured Reggio and Cosenza (1060), and thus conquered Calabria. As the pope's champion he, along with his younger brother Roger, waged incessant war against Greeks and Saracens in South Italy and Sicily; later he fought against the Byzantine emperor, Alexius Comnenus, gaining a great victory over him at Durazzo (1081). Marching towards Constantinople, he learned that the Emperor Henry IV. had made an inroad into Italy; he hastened back, compelled Henry to retreat, and liberated the pope, who was besieged in the castle of St Angelo (1084). Then, having returned to Epirus, he repeatedly defeated the Greeks, and was advancing a second time to Constantinople when he died suddenly in Cephalonia, 17th July 1085. See works on the Normans in Europe by A. H. Johnson (1877) and T. W. Barlow (1886).

Guise, a ducal family of Lorraine, named from the town of Guise.—CLAUDE OF LORRAINE (1496-1550), fifth son of René II., Duke of Lorraine, was born at the château of Condé, fought at Marignano in 1515, but after that campaign remained at home to defend France against the English and Germans (1522-23). For suppressing the peasant revolt in Lorraine (1527) Francis created him Duke of Guise.—His daughter, MARY OF LORRAINE (1515-60), in 1534 married Louis of Orleans, Duke of Longueville, and in 1538 James V. of Scotland, at whose death (1542) she was left with one child, Mary Queen of Scots. During the troublous years that followed, the queen-mother acted with wisdom and moderation; but after her accession to the regency in 1554 she allowed the Guises so much influence that the Protestant nobles raised a rebellion (1569), which continued to her death in Edinburgh Castle.—Her brother, FRANCIS (1519-63), second Duke, became one of the greatest generals of France. Having in 1552-53 held Metz against Charles V. of Germany, he added to his reputation at Renti (1554), and in 1556 commanded the expedition against Naples. Recalled in 1557 to defend the northern frontier against the English, he took Calais (1558) and other towns, and brought about the treaty of Cateau Cambrésis (1559). He and his brother Charles, the cardinal (1525-74), afterwards conspicuous at the Council of Trent, managed to become all-powerful during the reign of Francis II. Heading the Roman Catholic party, they sternly repressed Protestantism. Guise and Montmorency won a victory over the Huguenots at Dreux (1562), and Guise was besieging Orleans when he was assassinated by a Huguenot. His memoirs, written by himself, have much historic interest. See Lives by Brisset (1840) and Cauvin (1878).—HENRY (1550–88), third Duke, 'le Balafre,' fought fiercely against the Protestants at Jarnac and Moncontour (1569), and forced Coligny to raise the siege of Poitiers. He was one of the contrivers of the massacre of St Bartholomew (1572), and was the head of the Catholic League. He was, however, ambitious to succeed to the throne of France, when Henry III. procured his assassination at Blois. See Lives by Renauld (1879) and Cauvin (1881).—His grandson, HENRY (1614–64), fifth Duke, at fifteen became Archbishop of Rheims, but in 1640 succeeded to the dukedom. Having joined the League against Richelieu, he was condemned to death, but fled to Flanders. He put himself at the head of Masaniello's revolt in Naples as the representative of the Anjou family, but was taken by the Spanish (1647) and carried to Madrid, where he remained five years. After another attempt to win Naples (1654) he settled at Paris. See his Mémoires (1669). The direct line became extinct on the death (1675) of François Joseph, the seventh Duke. See Ferron, Les Ducs de Guise (2d ed. 1893).

Guizot, FRANÇOIS PIERRE GUILLAUME, was born at Nîmes, October 4, 1787, of Huguenot stock. In 1805 he went to Paris to study law, but soon drifted into literature. In 1809 appeared his Nouveau Dictionnaire des Synonymes, in 1811 an essay on the fine arts, and in 1812 a translation of Gibbon. That same year he married the first of his three wives, Pauline de Meulan (1773–1827), editor of Le Publiciste, and became professor of Modern History in the University of France. After the fall of the Napoleonic régime in 1814 he was appointed secretary of the ministry of the Interior, and after the Hundred Days secretary of the ministry of Justice, in 1816 general director of departmental administration. A constitutional Liberal, out of sympathy with reaction, he was in 1821 deprived of his appointments, and in 1825 interdicted from lecturing. With some friends he now published Mémoires relatifs à l'Histoire de France jusqu'au 13^{me} Siècle (31 vols.) and Mémoires relatifs à la Révolution d'Angleterre (26 vols.), and edited translations of Shakespeare and Hallam. Restored to his chair (1828), he lectured on the history of civilisation; and his lectures, published as Cours d'Histoire Moderne, established his reputation. In the Chamber of Deputies (1830) he became a prominent member of the Opposition, and aided indirectly in bringing about the Revolution of July. Minister first of the Interior, and then of Public Instruction, he established a system of primary schools throughout France, gave an impulse to secondary and university education, and revived the Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques. In 1840 in temporary alliance with his rival, Thiers, he came to London as French ambassador. But at this time Thiers's belligerent policy alarmed Louis-Philippe into virtually dismissing him, and Guizot, summoned to take his place, was the king's chief adviser till the end. To checkmate Palmerston, Guizot plunged into the indefensible 'Spanish Marriages' and revolted the conscience of Europe. He relapsed into reactionary methods of government, let the finances drift into confusion, and resisted the demand for parliamentary reform; whilst his administration became notorious for jobs. On the fall of Louis-Philippe in 1848, Guizot escaped to London; in November 1849 he returned to Paris and made efforts to rally and fuse the monarchial parties; but after the coup d'état of 1851 he gave himself up entirely to literature. He completed his works on the Great Rebellion in England, Révolution d'Angleterre and Monk: Chute de la République. He also published Cornicille et son Temps (1852); Shakspeare et son Temps (1852); Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de mon Temps (1858); Mélanges Biographiques et Littéraires (1868); Mélanges Politiques et Historiques (1869); and Histoire de France racontée à mes petits Enfants, completed by his daughter, Madame Guizot de Witt (1870–75). A devout and influential Protestant, he died at Val Richer in Normandy, September 12, 1874. See his own Memoirs; Guizot in Private Life, by Mme. de Witt (trans. 1880); and shorter Lives by Crozals (1893) and Bardoux (1894). [Guizot-zo.]

His principal works are Canon Triangulorum (1620) and Sector, Cross-staff, and other Instruments (1624). To him are due the invention of the surveying-chain, a quadrant, and a scale, and the first observation of the variation of the compass.

Hare, The Gurneys of Earlham (2 vols. 1895).

Gustavus Vasa, king of Sweden, was born of a noble house at Lindholmen in Upland, 12th May 1496, and in 1518, during the patriotic struggle with Christian II. (q.v.) of Denmark, was treacherously carried off to Denmark as a hostage. After a year he escaped to Lübeck, thence to Sweden, where he strove in vain to rouse up a spirit of resistance against the Danes. Retreating to Dalecarlia, he wandered for months with a price set on his head, and worked on farms and in mines. At last the infamous 'Blood-bath' of Stockholm (1520) roused the Swedes, and ere long Gustavus had an army large enough to attack the enemy, and the capture of Stockholm in 1523 drove the Danes from Sweden. Thus ended the great Scandinavian union which had existed for 126 years, and Gustavus I. was elected king. He found the whole country demoralised. Yet after forty years' rule he left Sweden a peaceful and civilised realm, with a full exchequer and a well-organised army. He promoted trade, fostered schools, and made roads, bridges, and canals. He greatly promoted Lutheranism, and was hardly fair to the Catholic clergy. Missions were sent to the Lapps, and a Finnish Bible was printed for the Finns. He died 29th September 1560, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Eric. See works by Fryxell (Ger. trans. 1831), Forssell (Stockh. 1869-75), Alberg (Lond. 1882), and P. B. Watson (1889).

Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, was born at Stockholm, December 9, 1594, the son of Charles IX., and grandson of the great Gustavus Vasa. When, as Gustavus II., he came to the throne in 1611 he found the country involved in war and disorder; but he conciliated the nobility, reorganised the government, raised men and money, and soon recovered his Baltic provinces from Denmark. His war with Russia was ended in 1617 by the treaty of Stolbova, by which Sweden received a large part of Finland and Livonia. In 1618 he visited Berlin, and in 1620 married the daughter of the Elector of Brandenburg. The old dispute with Poland was terminated in 1629 by a six years' truce, which left Gustavus master of Pillau and Memel. This peace permitted him to turn to Germany; and leaving the government to his chancellor Oxenstiern, he crossed to Pomerania in 1630 with 15,000 men to head the Protestants of Germany in their struggle against the Catholic League and the empire. The Swedes drove the imperialists from Pomerania, and took Stettin; whilst Richelieu promised Gustavus a subsidy. The Emperor Ferdinand had dismissed the imperious Wallenstein; but while the Swedes were besieging Spandau and Küstrin, Magdeburg was taken by Tilly with terrible atrocities. Soon after its fall Gustavus, now regarded as the champion of Protestant Germany, inflicted a severe defeat on Tilly at Breitenfeld, and took the Palatinate and Mainz; in April 1632 the Swedes gained another great victory, whence Tilly was carried to Ingolstadt to die. From thence the march to Munich was one continued triumph; and the road to Vienna lay open, had not the emperor recalled Wallenstein, who with 60,000 men entrenched himself at Nuremberg. After withstanding a desperate assault of the Swedes Wallenstein was obliged to retire into Thuringia; but on November 6, 1632, the two armies came finally face to face at Lützen near Leipzig. The Swedes soon broke the imperial lines, but Wallenstein drove back the Swedish centre. Gustavus hurried to the rescue, got separated from his troops, and riding almost alone into a squadron of Croats, received more than one fatal shot, and fell. The Swedes, burning to revenge their king, fought with irresistible fury, and ultimately gained a hard-won victory. See Lives by Stevens (1885), Trench (new ed. 1886), Fletcher (1890), and Col. Dodge (N.Y. 1896).

Gustavus III. (1746-92), king of Sweden, succeeded his father, Adolphus Frederick, in 1771. He set himself to break the power of the oligarchy of nobles by means of a feigned revolt, and now laboured hard to encourage agriculture, commerce, and science, and to better the lot of the people. But he had an inordinate love for things French, and, in his endeavour to imitate the splendour of Versailles, became embarrassed for money, and had to increase the taxation, thus alienating his people. The nobles tried to regain their power; and Gustavus's scheme to employ the forces of Sweden in behalf of Louis XVI. of France against the Revolution led to his own assassination by Ankarström (q.v.), an emissary of the oligarchical party. See French works by Geoffroy (1867) and Nervo (1876), and an English one by R. N. Bain (1895).

Gustavus IV. (1778-1837) succeeded his father, Gustavus III., in 1792. He was unfitted to rule owing to his obstinate self-will, his exalted ideas of prerogative, and his want of tact; hatred of Napoleon was the ruling principle of his life. He offended Russia by preferring the alliance with England, lost Stralsund and Rügen to the French and Finland to the Russians in 1807-8, and made an unsuccessful attack upon Norway. In 1809 all Sweden was in a frenzy of discontent, and the nobles and the army dethroned Gustavus and gave the crown to his uncle, the Duke of Södermanland, who succeeded as Charles XIII. Gustavus spent his last days abroad, and died at St Gall.

Gutenberg, JOHANNES (1397-1468), regarded by the Germans as the inventor of printing, was born at Mainz. He was probably the illegitimate son of a canon, Friele Gensfleisch, and took his mother's surname. In 1434 he was a mechanic in Strasburg; but by 1448 he returned to Mainz, where in 1450 he entered into partnership with Johannes Fust, a goldsmith who furnished the money for a printing-press. This partnership was dissolved in 1455, Fust securing a verdict against his partner for the moneys advanced, and carrying on the concern with the assistance of Peter Schöffer; while Gutenberg, aided by Konrad Humery, set up another printing-press. Probably rude printing, whether invented by Coster or not, was practised before Gutenberg's development of the art. See, however, Italian monograph by Castellani (1890) and three works in English and German by Van der Linde (1871-86).

In 1845-46 he raised in eleven months £116,000 for providing Free Church manses; in 1847 he published his first Plea for Ragged Schools. He also used his singular gifts of oratory in the cause of temperance and other social reforms, and in favour of compulsory education. Guy, THOMAS (c. 1644-1724), founder of Guy's Hospital, was born, a lighterman's son, at Horsleydown, Southwark. He began business in 1665 as a bookseller, importing English Bibles from Holland; and, on this being stopped, he contracted with the University of Oxford for the privilege of printing Bibles. By this means, and by selling out South Sea shares, he amassed a fortune of nearly half a million. In 1707 he built and furnished three wards of St Thomas's Hospital; in 1722 founded the hospital in Southwark which bears his name, for which he set apart £238,295, 16s. He was a liberal benefactor to the Stationers' Company, and built and endowed almshouses. During his life he was reputed an intensely selfish and avaricious man. See Wilks & Bettany's History of Guy's Hospital (1893).

Guy of Warwick, the hero of an early English metrical romance, who was first at all tournaments, overcame the dreadful Dun Cow near Warwick, at Constantinople slew the cousin of the Soldan, destroyed the dragon wasting Northumberland, rescued distressed knights, conquered Danish and other giants, and died a hermit at Guy's Cliff near Warwick—and all for the love of a fair lady. The romance is perhaps the work of a 13th century Franciscan, improved by a Norman minstrel. See German monographs by Zupitza (1873) and Tanner (1877).

Guyon, JEANNE MARIE BOUTIÈRES DE LA MOTHE, French mystic, was born at Montargis, 13th April 1648. She had destined herself for the cloister, but was married at sixteen to the wealthy and elderly Jacques Guyon. Left a widow at twenty-eight, she determined to devote her life to the poor and needy, and to the cultivation of spiritual perfection. The former part of her plan she began to carry out in 1681 at Geneva, but three years later she was compelled to depart on the ground that her Quietist doctrines were heretical. At Turin, Grenoble, Nice, Genoa, Vercelli, and Paris, where she finally settled in 1686, she became the centre of a movement for the promotion of 'holy living.' In January 1688 she was arrested for heretical opinions, and for having been in correspondence with Molinos, the leader of Quietism in Spain; and out of a commission appointed to inquire into her teachings arose a controversy between Fénelon and Bossuet. Released by the intervention of Madame de Maintenon, after a detention of nine months, but again imprisoned in 1695, she was not released from the Bastille until 1702; and she died at Blois, 9th June 1717. She wrote Les Torrens Spirituels, Moyen Court de Faire Oraison, a mystical interpretation of the Song of Solomon, an autobiography (trans. 1897), letters, and some spiritual poetry. Her collected works appeared in 40 vols. in 1767-91. See books by Upham (2d ed. N.Y. 1870) and Guerrier (1881).

in the struggle for independence. During the retreat of Górgei's army he re-established communication with the government at Dobreczin; he did brilliant service at Kapolya, Komorn, and elsewhere; and after the war, escaping to Turkey and entering the service of the sultan, he as Kourshid Pasha was governor of Damascus, and in the Crimean war organised the army of Kars. He was educated at St Omer, but declined to become a Jesuit, and was next sent to Paris. He married Lucy Herbert, daughter of the first Lord Powis, and has immortalised her in his Castara (1634), a collection of lyrical poems, some of rare beauty and sweetness, and stamped with a purity then unusual. He died 30th November 1654. Other works were The Historie of Edward the Fourth (1640); The Queene of Aragon, a Tragi-comedie (1640); and Observations upon Historie (1641).

Hadrian. PUBLIUS ÆLIUS HADRIANUS, Roman emperor, was born at Rome in 76 A.D. Having filled several high offices, he accompanied the Emperor Trajan, his kinsman and guardian, in his wars; and in 117 remained behind him as prefect of Syria. After Trajan's death on his way home, Hadrian was proclaimed emperor by the army, August 11, 117. Insurrections had broken out in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria; Mæsia and Mauritania were invaded by barbarians; and the Parthians had once more asserted their independence. Hadrian concluded a peace with the last, having resolved to limit the boundaries of the empire in the East; and after appeasing the invaders of Mæsia, he established his authority at Rome, and suppressed a patrician conspiracy against his life. About 119 he commenced his celebrated journey. He visited Gaul, Germany, Britain (where he built the wall from Solway to Tyne), Spain, Mauritania, Egypt, Asia Minor, and Greece, whence he returned to Rome in 126 or 127. He spent about two years in Athens, which city he adorned with splendid buildings. After crushing a desperate Jewish revolt, he returned to Italy, and died July 10, 138. During his reign the army was vigorously reorganised; he took a just and comprehensive view of his duties as a sovereign; and he was a lover of art, poetry, philosophy, rhetoric, and Greek literature. Among his most splendid edifices were his mausoleum (now part of the castle of St Angelo) and the magnificent villa at Tibur; and he founded several cities, such as Adrianopolis. See German works by Gregorovius (3d ed. 1884; Eng. trans. 1899), Dürr (1881), and Plew (1890). For the popes see ADRIAN.

Haeckel, ERNST HEINRICH, naturalist, born 16th February 1834 at Potsdam, studied natural science and medicine at Würzburg, Berlin, and Vienna, under Müller, Virchow, and Kölliker. After working at Naples and Messina, he became a privat-docent at Jena in 1861, professor extra-ordinarius in 1862, and ordinary professor of Zoology in 1865, interrupting his work only by visits to the North Sea shores, the Mediterranean, Madeira, the Canaries, Morocco, south Spain, Arabia, India, and Ceylon. Among his works are monographs on the radiolarians (with an atlas of 35 plates, 1862), calcareous sponges (1872), and jelly-fishes (with 40 plates, 1879), besides his monumental contributions to the Challenger Reports—on Deep-sea Medusæ (1882), Siphono- phora (1888), and Radiolaria (1887). Besides being one of the first to sketch the genealogical tree of animals, Haeckel gave precise and luminous expression to the general fact that the life-history of the individual is a recapitulation of its historic evolution. Among other works are Generelle Morphologie (1866), Die Perigenesis der Plastidules (1876), Ursprung der tierischen Gewebe (1884), Der Monismus (1892), and Die Welträtselfel (1899). Before the publication of Darwin's Descent of Man Haeckel alone clearly recognised the import of sexual selection; his expository works are Natürliche Schöpfungsgeschichte (1868; 8th ed. 1889; Eng. trans. as Creation, 4th ed. 1892); Anthropogenie (1874; 4th ed. 1891); and brilliantly written lectures on development and evolution (1878-79).

Háfiz (the poetical name of Shems ed-Din Muhammed), greatest of Persian lyrical poets, was born and lived at Shiráz, and died there at a good old age in 1388 or 1389. From the charming sweetness of his poetry he was styled by his contemporaries Chagarlab, or Sugar-lip. His ghazals are all on sensuous subjects—wine, flowers, beautiful damsels, &c.; but, while the common people regard them simply as love-songs, while his name is a household word throughout Persia, they yet possess an esoteric signification to the initiated. For Háfiz, like nearly all the greater poets of Persia, was of the sect of Súfi philosophers, the mystics of Islám. His tomb, two miles north-east of Shiráz, has been magnificently adorned by princes, and is visited by pilgrims from all parts of Persia. The earliest rendering of a selection of the ghazals of Háfiz was in Latin by Reviczki (1771). There are English renderings by Nott (1787), Hindley (1800), Rousseau (1801), Richardson (1802), Sir W. Ouseley (1797-98), Bicknell (1875), Love (1877), S. R. [Robinson] (1875), Lieut.-Col. Wilberforce Clarke (1891), and Leaf (1898).

Hagedorn, FRIEDRICH VON (1708-54), poet, born at Hamburg, studied at Jena, and in 1733 became secretary to the 'English Court' trading company at Hamburg. His poetry consists of satirical, narrative, and 'society' verses. See works by Schuster (1883) and Eigenbrodt (1884).

Hagenbach, KARL RUDOLF (1801-74), born at Basel, from 1824 occupied a chair of Theology there. His numerous books on church history, in which he adhered to the 'mediation' school, were issued as one uniform Kirchengeschichte (7 vols. 1868-72; 2d ed. 1885-87). He also wrote a manual of the history of dogma (1840; Eng. trans. 1858-59), a well-known Encyklopädie der theologischen Wissenschaften (1833; 12th ed. 1889), a Life of Ecolampadius (1859), &c.

Haggai, a minor prophet whose prophecies date from the second year of Darius (520 B.C.). He was among those who returned from the Babylonian exile with Zerubbabel. There are commentaries by Hitzig (4th ed. by Steiner, 1881), Ewald (1867), Keil (2d ed. 1873), Reinke (1868), and Van Eaton (1883).

Haggard, DAVID (1801-21), thief and homicide, was born and hanged at Edinburgh. See his curious Autobiography.

Haggard, SIR HENRY RIDER, novelist, was born at Bradenham Hall, Norfolk, June 22, 1856, and was educated at Ipswich grammar-school. He went out to Natal in 1875 as secretary to Sir Henry Bulwer, and next year accompanied Sir Theophilus Shepstone to the Transvaal. He returned in 1879 to England to marry and settle down to a literary life. His first book, Cetewayo and his White Neighbours (1882), pleased the Cape politicians, but attracted no attention elsewhere.

His Dawn (1884) and The Witch's Head (1885) were only successful after the immediate and extraordinary popularity of King Solomon's Mines (1885). This was followed by She (1887), Jess (1887), Allan Quatermain (1887), Maiava's Revenge (1888), Cleopatra (1889), Allan's Wife (1890), Montezuma's Daughter (1893), Joan Haste (1895), The Heart of the World (1896), The Swallow (1897), Stella Fregelinus, The Brethren (1904), and Ayesha (1905), besides A Farmer's Year (1900) and Rural England (2 vols. 1902). In 1895 Mr Haggard stood unsuccessfully for East Norfolk as a Unionist. In 1905 he published an elaborate (and friendly) Report on the Salvation Army Colonies in U.S.A. and at Hadleigh, England. He was knighted in 1912.

Hahnemann, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH SAMUEL, founder of homeopathy, was born at Meissen in 1755, studied at Leipzig, and for ten years practised medicine. At Leipzig he translated foreign works (such as Cullen's Materia Medica); and after six years of experiments on the curative power of bark, came to the conclusion that medicine produces a very similar condition in healthy persons to that which it relieves in the sick. His denunciation of blood-letting and other violent modes of treatment aroused the animosity of physicians, while his own infinitesimal doses of medicine provoked the apothecaries, who refused to dispense them; accordingly he gave his medicines to his patients gratis. For a physician to dispense his own medicine was an infringement of German law, and he was prosecuted in every town in which he attempted to settle from 1798 until 1810, when he returned to Leipzig. Two years afterwards he was appointed a privat-docent of the university; and there he remained, teaching his system to an ever-increasing band of disciples and practising until 1821, when a successful prosecution for dispensing his own medicines drove him out of Leipzig. He retired to Köthen, and in 1835 removed to Paris, where he died 2d July 1843. His Friend of Health (1792) proves him to have been far in advance of his time as to preventive medicine; in 1794 he adopted those principles of non-restraint and kindness in dealing with the insane which later were advocated by Pinel in Paris and Conolly in England. See Life by Albrecht (2d ed. 1875).

Hahn-Hahn, IDA, COUNTESS (1805-80), novelist, born at Tressow in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, in 1826 married; but the union was dissolved in 1829, and she then travelled much in Europe and the East. In 1850 she embraced Catholicism, in 1852 entered a convent at Angers; and she died in one partly founded by her at Mainz. Her later writings are strongly ultramontane. Her best-known novels are Gräfin Faustine, Ulrich, and Clelia Conti. See Life by Jacoby (Mainz, 1894).

Hailes, SIR DAVID DALRYMPLE, LORD, historical antiquary, born at Edinburgh, 28th October 1726, was the great-grandson of the first Lord Stair. He was called to the Scottish bar in 1748, and in 1766 became a judge of the Court of Session as Lord Hailes, in 1776 a justiciary lord. At his country-seat of New Hailes near Edinburgh, he gave his leisure to uninterrupted literary activity. He died 29th November 1792. Among his books are A Discourse on the Gowrie Conspiracy (1757); Memorials relating to the Reigns of James I. and Charles I. (1762-66); and Annals of Scotland, 1057-1371 (1776-79). He wrote besides on legal antiquities and ancient church history, edited old Scotch poems, &c.

Hake, Thomas Gordon (1809-95), 'parable poet,' was born at Leeds, and educated at Christ's Hospital, travelled a good deal on the Continent, took his M.D. at Glasgow, and practised at Bury St Edmunds, Richmond, &c. Among his friends were Borrow, Trelawney, Rossetti, his cousin Gordon Pasha, and Watts-Dunton. He published Madeline (1871), Parables and Tales (1873), The Serpent Play (1883), New Day Sonnets (1890), &c. See his Memoirs of Eighty Years (1893).

Hakim Blamr Allah, from 1019 till his murder in 1044 the sixth Fatimide calif of Egypt, a Nero in cruelty, and, through his apostle Darazi, the author of the religion of the Druses. See also MOKANNA.

Hakluyt, Richard, geographer, born in Herefordshire about 1552, from Westminster passed in 1570 to Christ Church, Oxford, where he afterwards became lecturer on geography or cosmography. He introduced the use of globes into English schools. The publication of Divers Voyages touching the Discovery of America (1582) seems to have procured for him in 1584 the chaplaincy of the English embassy to Paris; there he wrote Discourse concerning Western Discoveries (1584). On his return to England in 1588 he began to collect materials for his Principal Navigations, Voyages, and Discoveries of the English Nation (1598-1600; new ed. 1903-5). Made a prebendary of Westminster in 1602, he died 23d November 1616, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. His unpublished manuscripts were made use of by Purchas in his Pilgrims (1625-26). The Hakluyt Society was instituted in 1846.

Haldane, Robert, born in London, February 28, 1764, and educated at Dundee and Edinburgh, entered the navy in 1780, and was present at the relief of Gibraltar, but left it in 1783 to settle on his estate of Airthrey near Stirling. The French Revolution fired him with new hopes for the regeneration of man, but soon a profound spiritual change turned his energies into completely new channels. By his 'Society for Propagating the Gospel at Home' (1797) he built so many 'tabernacles' and supported so many itinerant preachers that in twelve years he spent over £70,000. In 1817 he lectured to theological students at Geneva and Montauban. He died in Edinburgh, 12th December 1842. His best-known books are Evidences of Divine Revelation (1816), On the Inspiration of Scripture (1828), and Exposition of the Epistle to the Romans (1835).—His brother, JAMES ALEXANDER, born at Dundee, July 14, 1768, and likewise educated at Dundee and Edinburgh, served in the navy 1785-94. With Simeon of Cambridge he traversed Scotland on an evangelistic tour; and in 1799 he was ordained independent pastor of a church in Edinburgh, in which he preached gratuitously for fifty years, and which in 1808 he led into the Baptist fold. He died 8th February 1851. His pamphlets were widely read. Two late books were his Doctrine of the Atonement (1845) and his Exposition of the Epistle to the Galatians (1848). See Memoirs of R. and J. A. Haldane, by Alexander Haldane (1852).—Their great-nephew, RICHARD BURDON, LORD HALDANE, born 30th November 1856, was educated at Edinburgh Academy and University and at Göttingen, in 1879 was called to the Chancery bar, in 1890 was made a Q.C., and sat in parliament in 1885-1911 as Liberal member for Haddingtonshire. He translated Schopenhauer (with Kemp, 1883-86), wrote a Life of Adam Smith (1887), and published his Gifford Lectures at St Andrews as The Pathway to Reality (1903). In Education and Empire (1902) he insisted on educational reform. Secretary for War (1905-12), he remodelled the British army, in 1911 was created Viscount Haldane of Cloan, and in 1912 was appointed Lord Chancellor.

Haldimand, SIR FREDERICK (1718-91), born in the canton of Neuchâtel, served under Frederick the Great, and from 1756 commanded regiments or garrisons in the American colonial wars with French and Indians. In 1778-84 he was governor of Canada. See Life by M'Ilwraith (1905).

Hale, JOHN PARKER (1806-73), born at Rochester, N.H., was returned to congress in 1842 as a Democrat, but opposed the annexation of Texas. Elected to the senate in 1847, he stood unsuccessfully for the presidency in 1852, and was minister to Spain 1865-69.

Hale, SIR MATTHEW (1609-76), born at Alderley in Gloucestershire, studied at Oxford, entered Lincoln's Inn in 1628, and in 1637 was called to the bar. A justice of the Common Pleas from 1654 till Cromwell's death, he was after the Restoration (which he zealously promoted) made Chief-baron of the Exchequer and knighted, and in 1671 Chief-justice of the King's Bench. Devout, acute, learned, and sensible, although a believer in witchcraft, he wrote histories of the Pleas of the Crown and of Common Law, besides religious works. See Lives by Burnet (1682), Williams (1835), Roscoe (1838), Campbell (1849).

Hale, NATHAN, American soldier, born at Coventry, Conn., 6th June 1755, became captain in the Continental army, and, having volunteered to penetrate the British lines and procure intelligence for Washington, was detected, and executed as a spy in New York city, 22d September 1776. See Lossing's Two Spies, Hale and André (1886).

—His grand-nephew, EDWARD EVERETT HALE, D.D. (1822-1909), born in Boston, Mass., and admitted to the Congregational ministry in 1842, in 1856 was called to a Unitarian Church in Boston. His influence in philanthropic movements has been widespread. His book Ten Times One is Ten (1870) originated numerous 'Lend a Hand' clubs, with offshoots in Europe, Asia, Africa, and the Pacific Islands; a development in the United States is the society of 'The King's Daughters.' Dr Hale has edited religious and other journals, Lingard's History of England, and original documents bearing on the founding of Virginia. His books, mostly stories, number over fifty.

Hale, SARAH JOSEPHA (1788-1879), author of Mary's Lamb, born at Newport, N.H., on her husband's death in 1822 devoted herself to authorship, and became in 1828 editor of the Ladies' Magazine. She helped to procure the employment of lady medical missionaries, to complete the Bunker Hill monument, and to secure the simultaneous observance of Thanksgiving Day in all the states. Her works include poems, cookery books, novels, &c.—Her son, HORATIO (1817-97), was ethnologist to the U.S. Pacific exploring expedition. He prepared its report on Ethnography and Philology (1846), and wrote much on kindred subjects.

Hales. See ALEXANDER OF HALES.

Hales, JOHN, the 'Ever-memorable,' was born at Bath, 19th April 1584; in 1597 entered Corpus Christi College, Oxford; and obtained a Merton fellowship in 1605, in 1612 a Greek lectureship. Admitted a fellow of Eton in 1613, in 1616 he went to the Hague as chaplain to the ambassador, Sir Dudley Carleton, for whom he made a report of the famous synod of Dort. Here the contentious zeal of extreme orthodoxy convinced him that it is a hopeless attempt to express spiritual truth within precise dogmatic definitions, and 'he bid John Calvin good-night.' In 1619 he returned to Eton to devote himself to continuous study. His too liberal Tract concerning Schism and Schismatics brought him under the displeasure of Laud, who was, however, satisfied after a personal conference and an apologetic letter, and appointed him to a canonry at Windsor (1639). The Puritan supremacy reduced him to great want; he was forced to dispose of his fine collection of books. A rare example of a profound student without pedantry, a ripe theologian with clearness of mind and directness of phrase, he died at Eton, 19th May 1656. The genial sweetness of his temper and the humble modesty of his bearing fitted well with a singularly devout but unobtrusive piety. Aubrey's false imputation of Socinianism has done much wrong to the memory of one of the most loyal although enlightened sons of the Church of England. The Golden Remains of the Ever-memorable Mr John Hales of Eton College were published in 1659 under the care of Pearson. The best edition is by Lord Hailes (Foulis Press, Glasgow, 1765).

Hales, JOHN WESLEY, in 1877-1903 professor of English at King's College, London, was born at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, 5th October 1836, and was educated at Glasgow, Durham, and Cambridge.

Hales, STEPHEN, born at Beaksbourn, Canterbury, 7th September 1677, entered Bene't (now Corpus Christi) College, Cambridge, in 1696, was elected fellow in 1702, and became in 1709 perpetual curate of Teddington, where he died, 4th January 1761. His Vegetable Statics (1727) is the starting-point of our true knowledge of vegetable physiology; Hæmstatics (1738) treats of the circulation of the blood. Besides a work on dissolving stone in the bladder, he wrote in the Philosophical Transactions on Ventilation, Electricity, Analysis of Air, &c. He also invented ventilating-machines, machines for distilling seawater, preserving meat, &c.

Hales, or D'HELE, THOMAS (c. 1740-80), till 1763 a bibulous English naval officer, then became a successful French dramatist, and died of drink and separation from an actress.

Halévy, JACQUES FRANÇOIS FROMENTAL ÉLIE, composer, was born of Jewish family in Paris, 27th May 1799. His first successful opera was Clari (1828), followed by the comic opera, Le Dilettante d'Avignon (1829). His masterpiece, La Juive (1835), carried his name over Europe. His next best work is the comic opera, L'Éclair (1835), but he produced about a dozen other operatic works. He died at Nice, 17th March 1862. He worthily carried on the succession of the great school of French opera, midway between Cherubini and Meyerbeer. Admitted to the Academy of Fine Arts in 1846, he became perpetual secretary in 1854. His éloges were collected as Souvenirs et Portraits (1861-63). See Lives by his brother Léon (2d ed. 1863) and by Pouglin (1865).—That brother, LÉON HALÉVY (1802-53), was born in Paris, filled a chair in the Polytechnic School, and from 1837 to 1853 a post in the Ministry of Instruction. He wrote the introduction to Saint-Simon's Opinions (1825), also histories, poetry, fables, novels, dramatic poems, and translations of Macbeth, Clavigo, &c. His best books are Résumé de l'Histoire des Juifs (1827-28), Poésies Européennes (1837), and La Grèce Tragique (1845-61).—His son, LUDOVIC, was born in Paris, 1st January 1834, and in 1861 became secretary to the Corps Législatif. He wrote librettos for half-a-dozen of the best-known burlesques of Offenbach (q.v.), and himself produced a series of vaudevilles and comedies. His Madame et Monsieur Cardinal (1873) and Les petits Cardinal (1880) are delightful sketches of Parisian theatrical life; L'Invasion (1872) was personal recollections of the war. In 1882 he published his charming L'Abbé Constantin (176th ed. 1897; Eng. trans. 1897), which was followed by Criquette, Deux Mariages, Princesse, and Mariette (1893). Admitted to the Academy in 1886, he died in 1908.

Halévy, JOSEPH, French orientalist, born 15th December 1827 at Adrianople, in 1868 travelled in northern Abyssinia, next traversed (1869-70) Yemen in quest of Sabæan inscriptions for the French Academy. His books describe his journeys or deal with the dialects of the Falashas, Sabæan and cuneiform inscriptions, &c.

Halford, SIR HENRY (1766-1844), a courtly London physician, born at Leicester, who in 1809 changed his name from Vaughan on coming into a large property, and was created a baronet. See Life by Munk (1895).

Halhed, NATHANIEL. See BROTHERS.

Haliburton, THOMAS CHANDLER, 'Sain Slick,' born at Windsor, Nova Scotia, in December 1796, was called to the bar in 1820, and became a member of the House of Assembly, chief-justice of the common pleas (1828), and judge of the supreme court (1842). In 1856 he retired and settled in England, in 1858 was made D.C.L. by Oxford, and in 1859-63 was Conservative M.P. for Launceston. He is best known as the author of Sam Slick, a sort of American Sam Weller, whose quaint drollery, unsophisticated wit, knowledge of human nature, and aptitude in the use of 'soft sawder' have given him a fair chance of immortality. The newspaper sketches in which this character first appeared were collected in 1837-40 as The Clockmaker, or Sayings and Doings of Samuel Slick of Slickville, continued as The Attaché, or Sam Slick in England (1843-44). Haliburton's other works include A Historical and Statistical Account of Nova Scotia (1825-29); Bubbles of Canada (1839); The Old Judge, or Life in a Colony (1843); Traits of American Humour (1843); and Rule and Misrule of the English in America (1850). He died at Isleworth, 27th August 1865. See Memoir by F. B. Crofton (1889).

Halifax, CHARLES MONTAGU, EARL OF, poet and statesman, a grandson of the Parliamentary general, the Earl of Manchester, was born at Horton, Northamptonshire, 16th April 1661, and from Westminster passed in 1679 to Trinity College, Cambridge. His most notable poetical achievement was a parody on Dryden's Hind and Panther, entitled The Town and Country Mouse (1687), of which he was joint-author with Matthew Prior. M.P. for Maldon (1688) and a lord of the treasury (1692), he in that year proposed to raise a million sterling by way of loan—so the National Debt was established. In 1694 money was again wanted, and Montagu supplied it by originating the Bank of England, as proposed by William Paterson three years earlier. For this service Montagu was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. His next work was the recoinage in 1695, appointing his friend Newton warden of the Mint, and raising a tax on windows to pay the expense; and now he first introduced exchequer bills. In 1697 he became premier, but his arrogance and vanity soon made him unpopular, and on the Tories coming into power in 1699 he was obliged to accept the auditorship of the exchequer and withdraw from the Commons as Baron Halifax. He was impeached for breach of trust in 1701, and again in 1703, but the proceedings fell to the ground. He strongly supported the union with Scotland and the Hanoverian succession. On the queen's death he was appointed a member of the council of regency, and on George I.'s arrival became an earl and prime-minister. He died 19th May 1715.

Halifax, GEORGE SAVILE, MARQUIS OF, was born in 1633, and for his share in the Restoration was created viscount in 1668. In 1675 he opposed Danby's Test Bill, and in 1679 by a display of extraordinary oratory procured the rejection of the Exclusion Bill. Three years later he was created a marquis and made Lord Privy Seal. On the accession of James II. he became president of the council, but was dismissed in 1685 for his opposition to the repeal of the Test and Habeas Corpus Acts. One of the three commissioners appointed by James II. to treat with William of Orange after he landed in England, on James's flight he tendered his allegiance to William and resumed the office of Lord Privy Seal; but, joining the Opposition, he resigned his post in 1689. He died 20th April 1695. He was not so much a fickle party-man as a philosophic statesman, who, to serve his country, was compelled by party excesses often to change side—such at least is the defence in his Character of a Trimmer. His Miscellanies appeared in 1700. Henry Carey (q.v.) was probably his natural son. See Life and Letters by Miss Foxcroft, with new edition of works (2 vols. 1898).

Halifax, SIR CHARLES WOOD, VISCOUNT (1800-85), a Liberal statesman, Chancellor of the Exchequer 1846-52, was made a peer in 1866.

Halkett, ELIZABETH. See WARDLAW.

Halkett, HUGH, BARON VON (1783-1863), a Hanoverian general, born at Musselburgh, Scotland, who fought in the Peninsula, and at Waterloo. See German Life by Knesebeck (1865).

Halkett, SAMUEL (1814-71), from 1848 the Advocates' librarian, Edinburgh, whose Dictionary of Anonymous Literature (4 vols. 1882-88) was carried on by the Rev. JOHN LAING (1809-80), from 1850 librarian of the New College. [Halket].

Hall, ANNA MARIA. See HALL, SAMUEL C.

Hall, ASAPH (1829-1908), astronomer, born at Goshen, Conn., from 1862 to 1891 held a post in the naval observatory at Washington. In 1877 he discovered the two satellites of Mars.

Hall, BASIL, writer of travels, was born in Edinburgh, 31st December 1788. His father was Sir James Hall of Dunglass (q.v.), the geologist. Basil entered the navy in 1802, and in 1816 commanded a sloop in the naval escort of Lord Amherst's mission to Peking, visiting Corea, as described in A Voyage of Discovery to Corea (1818). He also wrote Journal on the Coast of Chili, Peru, and Mexico in 1820-22; Travels in North America in 1827-28; and Fragments of Voyages and Travels (1831-40). Schloss Hainfeld (1836) was a semi-romance, and Patchwork (1841) a collection of tales and sketches. He died insane in Haslar Hospital, Gosport, 11th Sept. 1844.

Hall, CHARLES FRANCIS, Arctic explorer, born in Rochester, New Hampshire, in 1821, was successively blacksmith, journalist, stationer, and engraver, and becoming interested in the fate of Franklin, devoted his leisure to reading about Arctic America. He made two search expeditions (1860-62 and 1864-69), living alone among the Eskimo, and bringing back relics and the bones of one of Franklin's men. In 1871 he sailed in command of the Polaris on an 'expedition to the North Pole,' and on 29th August reached, viâ Smith's Sound, 82° 16' N.—then the highest latitude reached; next turning southward, he went into winter-quarters at Thank God Harbour, Greenland (81° 38' N.). Here he was taken ill, and died 8th November 1871. His companions left in August 1872, and after many hardships and the abandonment of the Polaris, reached home in the autumn of 1873. Hall published Arctic Researches, and Life among the Esquimaux (1864); and from his papers largely was compiled the Narrative of the Second Arctic Expedition (1879).

HALL, CHESTER MOOR (1703-71), a gentleman of Essex who in 1733 anticipated Dollond in the invention of the achromatic telescope.

HALL, CHRISTOPHER NEWMAN, Congregational minister, was born at Maidstone, 22d May 1816, the son of the teetotal bookseller, John Vine Hall (1774-1860), author of The Sinner's Friend. Having graduated at London University, and preached in Hull 1842-54, he then till 1892 was minister of Surrey Chapel, Lambeth, founded by Rowland Hill, and transferred to the new Christ Church (1876; cost £64,000). He had wide repute as an eloquent and popular preacher, and his Come to Jesus, The Call of the Master, and The Man Christ Jesus had an enormous sale. He also wrote Antidote to Fear, &c. A D.D. of Edinburgh, he died 18th Feb. 1902. See his Autobiography (1899).

HALL, or HALLE, EDWARD (c. 1499-1547), historian, born in London, from Eton passed in 1514 to King's College, Cambridge, and, duly elected a fellow, next studied at Gray's Inn. He became a common serjeant in 1532. His Union of the Noble Families of Lancastre and Yorke (1542; 3d ed. 1550) was only brought down to 1532; the rest, down to 1546, was completed by the editor, Grafton. Hall's stately dignity and the reality of his figures had a charm for Shakespeare; and to the student of Henry VIII.'s reign the work is really valuable as the intelligent evidence of an eye-witness, though too eulogistic of the king. The best edition is that by Sir Henry Ellis (1809).

HALL, FITZEDWARD, D.C.L. (1825-1901), philologist, born at Troy, New York, graduated at Harvard in 1846, and then lived in India (later as a school-inspector) till 1862, when he became Sanskrit professor at King's College, London. From 1869 he lived at Marlesford in Suffolk.

HALL, HENRY, or 'HOBIE,' of Haughhead, Roxburghshire, from 1651 was a zealous Covenanter, and fell in a scuffle at Queensferry (1680).

HALL, JAMES, I.L.D. (1811-98), born at Hingham, Mass., was a New York state geologist, and wrote Palæontology of New York (1847-79).

HALL, SIR JAMES (1761-1832), of Dunglass, a Haddingtonshire baronet, father of Basil Hall (q.v.), sought to prove the geological theories of his friend and master Hutton (q.v.) in the laboratory, and so founded experimental geology.

HALL, JOHN (1739-97), engraver after West, Gainsborough, &c., was born at Wivenhoe.

HALL, JOSEPH, born 1st July 1574 at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, became a fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1595, incumbent of Halstead and Waltham, and dean of Worcester (1617). In that year he accompanied James I. to Scotland to help establish Episcopacy, and he was one of the English deputies to the synod of Dort. He became Bishop of Exeter in 1627, and as such on suspicion of Puritanism incurred Laud's enmity, though he zealously defended Episcopacy. In 1641 he was translated to Norwich, and having with other prelates protested against the validity of laws passed during their enforced absence from parliament, was committed to the Tower, but liberated at the end of seven months, on finding bail for £5000. Shortly after his return to Norwich his revenues were sequestered and his property pillaged. He retired to a small farm at Higham in 1647, and died 8th September 1656. His works, including Contemplations, Christian Meditations, Episcopacy, and Mundus Alter et Idem, a Latin satirical romance, were edited by Pratt (1808); by Peter Hall, a descendant (1837-39), and by Wynter (1863). His poetical Satires: Virgideumiarum (1597-98) Pope calls 'the best poetry and the truest satire in the English language.' See Life by George Lewis (1886).

HALL, MARSHALL, physician and physiologist, was born at Basford, Notts., 18th February 1790. After studying at Edinburgh, Paris, Göttingen, and Berlin, he settled at Nottingham in 1817, and practised in London from 1826 until 1853. He died at Brighton, 11th August 1857. He did important work in regard to the reflex action of the spinal system (1833-37); his name is also associated with a standard method of restoring suspended respiration. He wrote on diagnosis (1817), the circulation (1831), Respiration and Irritability (1832), &c. See Memoirs by his widow (1861).

HALL, NEWMAN. See HALL, CHRISTOPHER.

HALL, ROBERT, born at Arusby near Leicester, May 2, 1764, was educated at a Baptist academy at Bristol (1778-81), and at Aberdeen (1781-85), and was appointed assistant minister and tutor in the Bristol academy. Here his eloquent preaching attracted overflowing audiences. He went in 1790 to Cambridge, where he rose to the highest rank of British pulpit orators. Among his writings are Apology for the Freedom of the Press (1793) and On Terms of Communion (1815). In 1806 he settled in Leicester, but returned in 1826 to Bristol. He died February 21, 1831. His works, with a memoir by Dr O. Gregory, were published in 1831-33 (11th ed. 1853).

HALL, SAMUEL CARTER, fourth son of Colonel Robert Hall, was born at Geneva Barracks, Waterford, 9th May 1800. Coming to London in 1822, he studied law, and became a gallery reporter for the New Times. He edited the Amulet annual (1826-36), succeeded Campbell as editor of the New Monthly Magazine, was sub-editor of the John Bull, and founded and edited the Art Journal (1839-80). He was an indefatigable worker, the joint works written and edited by him and his wife exceeding 500 volumes. Amongst these were Ireland, its Scenery (illus. 1841-43), The Book of Gems, British Ballads, and Baronial Halls. A testimonial of £1600 was presented to him in 1874, and in 1880 he received a pension of £150. He died 16th March 1889. See his Retrospect of a Long Life (1883).—Mrs S. C. HALL (Anna Maria Fielding), novelist, was born in Dublin, 6th January 1800. In 1824 she married S. C. Hall. Her first work, Sketches of Irish Character (1828), established her reputation. She wrote nine novels, and hundreds of shorter stories, including The Buccaneer (1832), The Outlaw (1835), Lights and Shadows of Irish Character (1838), Marian (1839), and The Whiteboy (1845). Her Stories of the Irish Peasantry came out in Chambers's Journal. She received a pension of £100 in 1868, and died January 30, 1881. Both are buried at Addlestone, Surrey.

Hallam, HENRY, historian, son of John Hallam, Canon of Windsor and Dean of Bristol, was born at Windsor, 9th July 1777. From Eton he passed in 1795 to Christ Church, Oxford, and was called to the bar in 1802, but gave himself from the first to literary pursuits. He had a small fortune of his own, and his Whig friends found him various appointments. In 1805 he was engaged to write for the Edinburgh Review, but it was not till he was over forty that he published his Europe during the Middle Ages, which gave him a foremost place among English historians. He was made a D.C.L., and a fellow of the Royal, Antiquarian, and other learned societies. He married in 1807 a daughter of Sir Abraham Elton of Clevedon Court (she died in 1840). Of eleven children, four only survived early life. One of them died suddenly at Vienna—the Arthur Henry Hallam (1811–33) of In Memoriam; another, Henry Fitzmaurice Hallam (1824–50), died also abroad. A married daughter remained to soothe with pious care the father's last years. He died 21st January 1859, and was laid beside wife and children in Clevedon church. Hallam's position as a historian rested upon three great works, View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages (1818); The Constitutional History of England from Henry VII. to George II. (1827); and the Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries (1837–39). Hallam's scholarship is accurate, his learning both wide and deep. He is perfectly honest and perfectly disinterested; his style is clear and correct, but wants colour and animation. He was a Whig of the old school, and disposed to look at everything from a party point of view. The Remains of Arthur Henry Hallam, with a memoir by his father, appeared in 1834; his Poems were edited in 1893 by Le Gallienne.

Halle, ADAM DE LA (c. 1235–87), a French poet and composer, nicknamed 'le bossu d'Arras,' although he was not misshapen, was born at Arras, and died at Naples, having followed Robert II. of Artois thither in 1283. He originated the comic opera (in Le Jeu de Robin et de Marion) and the modern comedy (in the half-autobiographic composition called Le ju Adan ou de la fuelle). Of these, the former has hardly a trace of roughness; the latter contains no hint of classical inspiration. His works have been edited by Coussemaker (1872) and Rambeau (1886).

Hallé, SIR CHARLES, pianist, was born at Hagen in Westphalia, 11th April 1819. He studied first at Darmstadt, and from 1840 at Paris, where his reputation was established by his concerts of classical music. But the Revolution of 1848 drove him to England, and he ultimately settled in Manchester, where he died of apoplexy, 25th October 1895. He and his orchestra were familiar to music-lovers from London to Aberdeen; he did much to raise the standard of musical taste by familiarising the British public with the great classical masters. He was made LL.D. of Edinburgh in 1884, and knighted in 1888.—LADY HALLÉ (née Wilhelmine Neruda), violinist, was born at Brünn, 29th March 1839. An organist's daughter, she made her début at Vienna in 1846, and three years later played first in London at the Philharmonic. She married in 1864 the Swedish musician Ludvig Normann, and in 1888 Sir Charles Hallé, and died 15th April 1911. See Sir C. Hallé's Life and Letters (1897).

Halleck, FITZ-GREENE (1790–1867), American poet, born at Guilford, Conn., became a clerk in New York, and in 1832 private secretary to John Jacob Astor; in 1849 he retired, on an annuity of $200 left him by Astor, to Guilford. His longest poem, Fanny (1819), is a satire on the literature, fashions, and politics of the time. His complete Poetical Writings and his Life and Letters were edited by J. G. Wilson in 1868–69; his Orations by W. C. Bryant in 1873.

Halleck, HENRY WAGER (1815–72), American general, born at Westerville, N.Y., during the Mexican war was employed on the Pacific coast, and became captain in 1847. Having taken a leading part in organising the state of California, in the civil war (1861) he was appointed commander of the Missouri, and next year had his command extended over the territory between the Rocky Mountains and the Alleghanies. In May 1862 he captured Corinth; in July became general-in-chief; but in March 1864 he was superseded by General Grant. Chief of staff until 1865, he commanded the military division of the Pacific until 1869, and that of the South until his death. He published Elements of Military Science (1846; new ed. 1861), books on mining laws, &c.

Haller, ALBRECHT VON (1708–77), anatomist, botanist, physiologist, and poet, was born at Bern, and started practice in 1729, but in 1736 was called to a chair at Göttingen. Here he organised a botanical garden, an anatomical museum and theatre, and an obstetrical school; helped to found the Academy of Sciences; wrote anatomical and physiological works; and took an active part in the literary movement. In 1753 he resigned and returned to Bern, where he became magistrate. After this he wrote three political romances, and prepared four large works on the bibliography connected with botany, anatomy, surgery, and medicine. His poems were descriptive, didactic, and (the best of them) lyrical. See Lives and other works by Thomas Henry (1783), Blösch and Hirzel (1877), Frey (1879), Bodemann (1885), Bondi (1891), and Widmann (1893).

Halley, EDMUND, astronomer and mathematician, was born at Haggerston, London, 8th November 1656, and from St Paul's School passed in 1673 to Queen's College, Oxford. In 1676 he contributed papers to the Philosophical Transactions on the orbits of the planets and on a sun-spot; at St Helena (1676–77) he made a catalogue of the stars in the southern hemisphere (Catalogus Stellarum Australium, 1679). Now a F.R.S., he made observations with Cassini at Paris (1680) on the great comet which goes by his name. He published in 1683 (Phil. Trans.) his theory of the variation of the magnet; in 1684 he conferred with Newton as to whether the centripetal force in the solar system varies inversely as the square of the distance; in 1686 he wrote on the trade-winds and monsoons. He embodied in a chart (1701) the results of a voyage he undertook to test his theory of the magnetic variation of the compass; in 1702 surveyed the coasts of the English Channel and made a chart of its tides. In 1703 he became Savilian professor of Geometry at Oxford, and in 1705 published his researches on the orbits of the comets. He was secretary of the Royal Society 1713–21; in 1720 invented a diving-bell and became astronomer-royal; and died at Greenwich, 14th Jan. 1742. His Tabulæ Astronomicæ appeared in 1749. Halley was the first to predict the return of a comet, and to recommend the observation of the transits of Venus with a view to determining the sun's parallax.

Halliday, ANDREW (1680–77), essayist and playwright, was born at Grange manse, Banffshire, and dropped his patronymic Duff soon after coming up to London in 1849.

Halliwel-Phillipps, JAMES ORCHARD, Shake-

spearian scholar and antiquary, was born at Chelsea, 21st June 1820, and studied at Jesus College, Cambridge. His studies embraced the whole field of our earlier literature, and its fruits remain in the publications of the old Shakespeare and Percy societies. In 1839 he became fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. Gradually he concentrated himself upon Shakespeare alone, and more particularly upon the facts of his life, the successive editions of his Outlines of the Life of Shakespeare (1848; 8th ed. 1889) recording the growing results of his discoveries. In 1872 he added to Halliwell the surname Philipps, that of his first wife, a Worcestershire heiress. He accumulated in his house, Hollingbury Copse, near Brighton, an unrivalled collection of Shakespearean books, MSS., and rarities, and gave princely benefactions of such to Edinburgh University, Stratford, and Birmingham. He died January 3, 1889. Besides his sumptuous folio edition of Shakespeare (16 vols. 1853-65) and other Shakespeareana, he published Nursery Rhymes and Tales of England (1845) and Dictionary of Archaic and Provincial Words (1847; 6th ed. 1868).

Halm, KARL (1809-82), editor of Cicero, Tacitus, &c., was born and died at Munich.

Hals, FRANS, the elder, portrait and genre painter, was born, probably at Antwerp, between 1580 and 1584. He settled in Haarlem about 1604, and in 1615 was summoned before the magistrates for ill-treating his wife and for his drunken and disorderly life. In his later years, in spite of unceasing industry, he fell into poverty. He died at Haarlem in August 1666. Hals is regarded as the founder of the Dutch school of genre-painting. His subjects of feasting and carousal are treated with marvellous vivacity and spirit. See monograph on him by Gerald S. Davies (1902, 1905).—His brother, DIRK HALS, was also an excellent genre-painter (b. before 1600, d. 1656); and several of Frans's sons were artists, the most celebrated being Frans Hals, the younger, who flourished from about 1637 to 1669.

Halsbury, HARDINGE STANLEY GIFFARD, EARL OF, born in London, 3d Sept. 1825, graduated 1852 from Merton, Oxford, having in 1850 been called to the bar. He became a Q.C. (1865), solicitor-general (1875), Conservative M.P. for Launceston (1877), and Lord High Chancellor (1885 and 1895), with the titles of baron (1885) and earl (1898).

Halyburton, THOMAS (1674-1712), a Scottish divine, born at Dupplin near Perth, was from 1700 minister of Ceres in Fife, and from 1710 professor of Divinity at St Andrews. Among his works are Natural Religion insufficient, The Great Concern of Salvation, and Ten Sermons preached at the Lord's Supper. The works, especially the autobiographic memoir, of the 'Holy Halyburton' were once very popular in Scotland; they were edited by Dr Burns (1835).

Hamann, JOHANN GEORGE (1730-88), the 'Magus of the North,' was born at Königsberg, and died at Münster, having been in turn a student of philosophy, theology, and law, private tutor, merchant, tutor again, commercial traveller, student of literature and the ancient languages, clerk, and an excise official. His writings are, like his life, desultory, but they influenced Jacobi, Herder, Goethe, and Jean Paul. Symbolical and oracular in style, they are rich in suggestive thought, encrusted with paradox and sarcasm, and bristle with literary allusions. See editions by Roth (1821-45) and Gildemeister (1857-73), and Lives by Poel (1874-76) and Claassen (1885).

Hamering, ROBERT, Austrian poet, was born at Kirchberg-am-Walde, Lower Austria, 24th March 1830, and became a teacher in the Trieste gymnasium in 1855. But after eleven years, ill-health compelled him to retire. From that time until his death, 13th July 1889, he lived at Gratz, confined to bed, but writing poetry busily. His lyric talent found expression in Sinnen und Mienen (1860; 7th ed. 1886), Das Schwanenlied der Romantik (1862), Amor und Psyche (1882), and Blätter im Winde (1887). His best books are three satirical epics—Ahasver in Rom (1866; 17th ed. 1889), Der König von Sion (1869), and Homunculus (1888). See his autobiographical Stationen meiner Lebens-pilgerschaft (1886), and Lehrjahre der Liebe (Letters, &c., 1889); and Life by A. Polzer (1889).

Hamerton, PHILIP GILBERT, writer on art, was born at Laneside, Oldham, the son of a solicitor at Shaw, 10th September 1834. He began as an art-critic by contributing to the Fine Arts Quarterly and Saturday Review, and published a volume of poems on The Isles of Loch Awe (1855), A Painter's Camp in the Highlands (1862), Etching and Etchers and Contemporary French Painters (1868), and Painting in France after the Decline of Classicism (1869). From 1869 he edited the Portfolio. The Intellectual Life (1873) is letters of advice addressed to literary aspirants and others; Human Intercourse (1884) is a volume of essays on social subjects; The Graphic Arts (1882), finely illustrated, is a treatise on drawing, painting, and engraving; Landscape (1885), a superbly-illustrated volume, sets forth the influence of natural landscape on man. Among his other works are two Lives of Turner (1878 and 1889), Portfolio Papers (1889), French and English (1889), Man in Art (1893), The Mount (1897), and two novels. He died at Boulogne-sur-Seine, 6th November 1894. See his Autobiography (1896).

Hamilcar, next to Hannibal the greatest of the Carthaginians, was surnamed Barca (Hebrew Barak) or 'Lightning.' When a young man he came into prominence in the sixteenth year of the First Punic War (247 B.C.). After ravaging the Italian coast, he landed in Sicily near Panormus, and seizing the stronghold of Ercte, with a small band of mercenaries, waged war for three years against Rome. In 244-2 he occupied Mount Eryx, and stood at bay against a Roman army. When at the close of the First Punic War (241) Sicily was yielded to Rome, the Carthaginian mercenaries revolted; but Hamilcar crushed out the rebellion after a terrible struggle in 238. His master-conception was to redress the loss of Sicily by creating in Spain an infantry capable of coping with Roman legionaries. Entering Spain in 237, he in nine years built up a new dominion, but in 228 fell fighting against the Vettones. The conceptions of the great Hamilcar were carried out by his mightier son Hannibal.

Hamilton, THE FAMILY OF, believed to be of English origin, can be traced back to Walter Fitz-Gilbert, called Hamilton, who in 1296 held lands in Lanarkshire, swore fealty to Edward I., and in 1314 held Bothwell Castle for the English. His surrender of it, with the English knights who had fled there from Bannockburn, was rewarded by Robert Bruce with knighthood and grants of lands in Clydesdale, West Lothian, and elsewhere. His grandson, Sir David of Hamilton of Cadzow, was the first to assume the surname of Hamilton. Sir James Hamilton of Cadzow in 1445 was created Lord Hamilton. Allied by marriage and descent to the Douglasses, he followed them in the beginning of their struggle with the crown, but forsook them in 1454, and for reward got large grants of their forfeited lands. After the death of his first wife he received in marriage the Princess Mary, eldest daughter of James II., formerly the wife of the attainted Earl of Arran. His only son by her, James, second Lord Hamilton (c. 1477-1529), was in 1503 made Earl of Arran, and was succeeded by the eldest son of his third wife (a niece of Cardinal Beaton), James, second Earl of Arran. The death of James V. in 1542 left only an infant a few days old between him and the throne. He was chosen regent and tutor to the young queen, and held these offices till 1554. He received in 1548, from Henry II. of France, a grant of the duchy of Châtellerault. His eldest son, James, third Earl of Arran (1530-1609), was proposed as the husband both of Queen Mary of Scotland and of Queen Elizabeth of England, but went mad in 1562. His father, the first Duke of Châtellerault, dying in 1575, the second son, Lord John Hamilton (1532-1604), commendator of Arbroath, became virtual head of the house, and in 1599 was created Marquis of Hamilton. His son James, second Marquis (1589-1625), in 1619 was created an English peer as Earl of Cambridge. His son, James, third Marquis (1606-49), led an army of 6000 men to the support of Gustavus Adolphus in 1631-32, and later acted a conspicuous part in the contest between Charles I. and the Covenanters. Created in 1643 Duke of Hamilton, in 1648 he led a Scottish army into England, but was defeated by Cromwell at Preston, and beheaded. His brother and successor, William (1616-51), in 1639 was created Earl of Lanark, and died of wounds received at Worcester. The duchy of Hamilton now devolved on the eldest daughter of the first Duke, Lady Anne (1636-1717), whose husband, Lord William Douglas, Earl of Selkirk (1635-94), was in 1660 created Duke of Hamilton for life. Their son James (1658-1712) was in 1698 created Duke of Hamilton, and in 1711 Duke of Brandon in England—a title challenged by the House of Lords. He fell in the famous duel with Lord Mohun. His grandson, James, the sixth duke, who married the famous beauty, Elizabeth Gunning, was succeeded in 1758 by his eldest son, James George, an infant of three years. On the death of the Duke of Douglas in 1761, the male representation of the Angus branch of the Douglasses, with the titles of Marquis of Douglas, Earl of Angus, &c., devolved on the Dukes of Hamilton as descendants of the Earl of Selkirk, third son of the first Marquis of Douglas. Dying in 1769, in his fifteenth year, James George, seventh Duke of Hamilton, was succeeded by his only brother, Douglas, who in 1782 took his seat in parliament as Duke of Brandon, the House of Lords being now satisfied that the Act of Union did not prohibit the crown from making a peer of Scotland a peer of Great Britain. Alfred Douglas Douglas-Hamilton, present and thirteenth Duke (born 6th March 1862), a descendant of the duke who was killed by Mohun, succeeded his distant kinsman in 1895.—Lord Claud Hamilton (c. 1543-1622), fourth son of the first Duke of Châtellerault, was made commendator of the abbey of Paisley in 1553, and Lord Paisley in 1587. His descendants obtained successively the titles of Lord Abercorn (1603), Earl of Abercorn (1606), Viscount Strabane (1701), Marquis of Abercorn (1790), and Duke of Abercorn (1868). On the death of the second Duke of Hamilton in 1651, the second Earl of Abercorn claimed the male representation of the House of Hamilton; and in 1861 the second Marquis and tenth Earl of Abercorn was served heir-male of the first Duke of Châtellerault under protest by the Duke of Hamilton. James, second Duke of Abercorn (born 24th August 1838; suc. 1885), is one of three peers who hold peerages in Scotland, in Ireland, and in Great Britain.—A son of Anne, Duchess of Hamilton, was in 1688 created Earl of Selkirk; another in 1696 Earl of Orkney; a fourth in 1697 Earl of Ruglen.—The Earls of Haddington are descended from a younger son of the ancestor of the Hamiltons.—Other titles conferred on members of the house were those of Lord Belhaven, Viscount Boyne, Baron Brancepeth, Viscount Clanboy, and Earl of Clanbrassil. See Gilbert Burnet's Memoirs of James and William, Dukes of Hamilton (1677); Anderson's Memoirs of the House of Hamilton (1825); and the Hamilton MSS. (Historical MSS. Report, 1887).

Hamilton, ALEXANDER, American statesman, was born 11th January 1757 in the West Indian island of Nevis. When a student in New York he wrote a series of papers in defence of the rights of the colonies against Great Britain; and on the outbreak of the war, as captain of artillery, he served in New York and New Jersey, and in 1777 became Washington's aide-de-camp. In 1781, after a quarrel, Hamilton resigned his appointment; but he continued with the army and distinguished himself at Yorktown. The war ended, he betook himself to legal studies, and soon became one of the most eminent lawyers in New York; in 1782 he was returned to congress. In 1786 he took the leading part in the convention at Annapolis, which prepared the way for the great convention that met at Philadelphia in 1787. In the same year he conceived the series of essays afterwards collected as The Federalist, and himself wrote fifty-one out of the eighty-five. On the establishment of the new government in 1789, Hamilton was appointed secretary of the treasury. Under his management the public credit, which had sunk to a state of utter prostration, was raised to the highest point, and altogether he showed himself a great financier. In 1795 he resigned his office, and resumed the practice of law, but was still constantly consulted by Washington. He was the actual leader of the Federal party until his death, and was foremost in the fierce party strife of 1801. His successful effort to thwart the ambition of his rival, Aaron Burr, involved him in a duel with him, 11th July 1804. Hamilton was mortally wounded, and died the next day. His influence is stamped on every page of the American constitution; and his writings, edited by his son in 1851 and by Lodge in 1885, still impress the reader by their vigour, learning, and maturity of intellect. See Lives by his son (1834-40), Riethmüller (1864), Morse (1876), Shea, Lodge, Sumner, Hamilton (1910), and Mrs Atherton's romance, The Conqueror (1902).

Hamilton, COUNT ANTHONY (c. 1646-1720), a cadet of the Abercorn branch of the Hamiltons, was probably born at Roscrea, Tipperary. At twenty-one he went to France, and there got a captain's commission; in 1685 he was appointed governor of Limerick, and fought at the Boyne (1690); thereafter he lived at the exiled court of St Germain-en-Laye. His writings are full of wit and talent, particularly his Contes de Fécité (1730-49; Eng. trans. 1760). For his Mémoires du Comte de Gramont, see GRAMONT.

Hamilton, ELIZABETH (1758-1816), author of The Cottagers of Glenburnie (1808), &c., was born at Belfast, and from 1804 lived at Edinburgh.

Hamilton, EMMA, LADY, was born Amy Lyon or 'Hart,' most likely at Ness, in Cheshire, 26th April 1703. Her girlhood was passed at Hawarden. She had had three places in London, had borne two children to a navy captain and a baronet, and had posed as Hygieia in a quack-doctor's 'Temple of Health,' when in 1782 she accepted the protection of the Hon. Charles Greville (1749-1809), to exchange it in 1786 for that of his uncle, Sir William Hamilton (1730-1803, q.v.). After five years at Naples, in 1791 she was married to the latter, and was admitted to the closest intimacy by Maria Caroline, queen of Ferdinand I. Her 'eminent services' to the British fleet during 1796-98 in furnishing information and procuring supplies were much overrated, where indeed not purely imaginary. Nelson had first met her in 1793; and gradually Platonic friendship ripened to guilty passion, until, four months after the trio's return to England, she gave birth to a daughter (1801-81), 'our loved Horatia,' as Nelson writes of her in a holograph letter to 'my own dear Wife, in my eyes and the face of Heaven.' Her husband's death, followed four years later by Nelson's, left Emma mistress of £2000 a year; but by 1808 she was owing £18,000, and in 1813 was arrested for debt. Next year she fled to Calais, and died 15th January 1815. Her loveliness lives in nearly fifty portraits by Romney, to whom she was ever the 'divine lady.' See the spiteful Memoirs of Lady Hamilton (1815; new ed. 1891), Jeaffreson's Lady Hamilton and Nelson (1888; new ed. 1897), and Lives by Hilda Gamlin (1891), W. Sichel (2 vols. 1905), and J. T. H. Baily (1905).

Hamilton, JAMES. See MORAY.

Hamilton, JAMES (1769-1829), born in London, and educated at Dublin, at Hamburg in 1798 learnt German on an original method, and, his business in Hamburg and Paris ruined by the war, taught language with great success in the United States (from 1815) and in England (from 1823). He discarded grammar, using instead a literal word for word translation, placed below the original, line for line alternately.

Hamilton, JANET, née THOMSON (1795-1873), the lowly 'Coatbridge poetess,' was born in Shotts parish, married in 1809, and from 1855 was blind.

Hamilton, PATRICK, 'the protomartyr of the Scottish Reformation,' was the son of Sir Patrick Hamilton and Catherine Stewart, the illegitimate daughter of the Duke of Albany, second son of James II. Born about 1499 in the diocese of Glasgow, he took his M.A. at Paris in 1520, then proceeded to Louvain, and in 1523 was at St Andrews, whence, to escape troubles on the score of his Lutheranism, he returned to the Continent (1527). After a brief stay at Wittenberg, he settled for some months in Marburg, where he wrote (in Latin) a series of theological propositions known as 'Patrick's Places,' propounding the main doctrines of the Lutheran reformers. He returned that same autumn to Scotland, and married. Next year he was summoned to St Andrews by Archbishop Beaton, and on a renewed charge of heresy was burned before St Salvator's College, 29th Feb. 1528. His death did more to extend the Reformation in Scotland than even his life could have done. See Life by Lorimer (1857).

Hamilton, THOMAS (1789-1842), author in 1827 of Cyril Thornton, was a younger brother of Sir William Hamilton, studied three years at Glasgow University, served eight years in the army, joined Blackwood's staff, and died at Pisa.

Hamilton, WALTER KERR (1808-69), from 1854 the High Church Bishop of Salisbury, was born in London and educated at Eton, Laleham (under Arnold), and Christ Church, Oxford.

Hamilton, WILLIAM (c. 1665-1751), of Gilbertfield near Glasgow, a Scottish minor poet, the friend and correspondent of Allan Ramsay.

Hamilton, WILLIAM (1704-54), born probably at his father's estate of Bangour near Uphall, Linlithgowshire, contributed to Ramsay's Tea-table Miscellany (1724). He joined in the Jacobite rising of the '45, and on its collapse escaped to Rouen, but was permitted to return in 1749 and to succeed to the family estate. He died at Lyons. The first collection of his poems was edited by Adam Smith in 1748 (fuller ed. 1760). One poem—'The Braes of Yarrow'—will never die. See James Paterson's edition of the poems (1850).

Hamilton, SIR WILLIAM, grandson of the third Duke of Hamilton, was born 13th December 1730, and in 1758, after eleven years' service in the Foot Guards, married a beautiful Pembrokeshire heiress, with £5000 a year, who died in 1782. He was British ambassador at Naples 1764-1800, and in 1772 was made a knight of the Bath. He took an active part in the excavation of Herculaneum and Pompeii, and formed rare collections of antiquities, one of them purchased in 1772 for the British Museum. Author of several sumptuous works—Antiquités Etrusques, Grecques, et Romaines (1766-67), Mount Vesuvius (1772), Campi Phlegræi (1776-77), &c.—he died in London, 6th April 1803. See HAMILTON (EMMA).

Hamilton, SIR WILLIAM, Scottish philosopher, was born March 8, 1788, at Glasgow, where his father and grandfather held the chairs of Anatomy and Botany; in 1816 he made good his claim to the old baronetcy which the Covenanting heir lost in 1688 for refusing the oath of allegiance. After gaining high distinction at Glasgow, he went in 1809 to Balliol College as Snell exhibitioner, and graduated in 1810. He was called to the Scottish bar in 1813, but had almost no practice; in 1820 he stood unsuccessfully for the chair of Moral Philosophy in Edinburgh; in 1821 he became professor of History. In 1829 he published in the Edinburgh Review a famous critique of Cousin's doctrine of the Infinite; and other articles were collected in 1852 as Discussions in Philosophy and Literature. In 1836 he became professor of Logic and Metaphysics; and on these subjects he lectured in alternate years till the end of his life, gathering around him enthusiastic disciples. His lectures were published in 1859-61 by Mansel and Veitch; his principal work was his edition of Reid (1846; with notes 1862), defending what he believed to be Reid's sound philosophical doctrine of common sense. Ill-health diminished his power of work; but he edited Dugald Stewart's works in 1854-55, and was generally able with an assistant to perform the duties of his class till his death 6th May 1856. See Life by Veitch (1869), short monographs by Veitch (1882) and Monck (1881), and Seth's Scottish Philosophy (new ed. 1890).

Hamilton, WILLIAM GERARD (1729-96), entered parliament for Petersfield in 1755, and was known as 'single-speech Hamilton,' though his brilliant maiden effort had successors.

Hamilton, SIR WILLIAM ROWAN, the inventor of Quaternions, born in Dublin, August 4, 1805, at fifteen had mastered all the ordinary university course, and commenced original investigations. In 1827 he was appointed professor of Astronomy at Dublin and Irish astronomer-royal; in 1835 he was knighted. His earlier essays connected with caustics and contact of curves grew into the Theory of Systems of Rays (1828; new ed. 1833), which helped to confirm the Undulatory Theory of Light. His General Method in Dynamics (Philos. Trans. 1834) produced a profound sensation. He published many important treatises and papers; thus his memoir on Algebra as the Science of Pure Time was one of the first steps to his grand invention of quaternions. On this subject he published in 1853 a large volume of Lectures; another was edited by his son the year after his death, which took place at Dunsink Observatory, 2d September 1865. See Life by Graves (3 vols. 1883-89), with Addendum (1892).

Hamlet, the doubtfully historical hero of Shakespeare's tragedy, first appears in the legend of Amleth in the third and fourth books of the 12th century Latin history of Denmark by Saxo Grammaticus. See works by Simrock (Stuttg. 1870), Dr Latham (1872), Moltke (Leip. 1881), G. P. Hansen (1887), and Loening (Stuttg. 1893).

SIR EDWARD BRUCE (1824-93), born at Bodmin, studied at Woolwich for the Royal Artillery, served in Ireland, Canada, and the Crimea, and was professor of military education at the Staff College 1858-64, member of the Council of Military Education 1866-70, and commandant of the Staff College 1870-77. He commanded the second division in the Egyptian campaign of 1882, and had a difference with Lord Wolseley over Tel-el-Kebir; was created a K.C.M.G. in 1880, a K.C.B. in 1882; and was Conservative M.P. for Birkenhead 1885-92. See Life by Innes Shand (1895).

Hamlin, HANNIBAL, born in Paris, Maine, 27th August 1809, practised law 1833-48, was Speaker of the Maine house of representatives, and was returned to congress in 1842 and 1844. He sat in the U.S. senate as a Democrat 1848-57, when he was elected governor by the Republicans, having separated from his party over his anti-slavery opinions. In the same year, 1857, he resigned to return to the senate; and in 1861 became vice-president under Lincoln. He was in the senate again 1869-81; in 1881-82 was minister to Spain; and died at Bangor, Maine, 4th July 1891. See his Autobiography (1894).

Hammer-Purgstall, JOSEPH, FREIHERR VON (1774-1856), orientalist, was born at Gratz, studied at Vienna, and was an interpreter at Constantinople 1799-1806. He was ennobled in 1835 on succeeding to the Styrian estates of the Countess von Purgstall. He wrote on the Assassins, the Ottoman empire, several oriental dynasties, and Persian, Turkish, and Arab literature. See Life by Schlotmann (1857).

Hammond, HENRY, divine, was born at Chertsey, August 18, 1605, and educated at Eton and Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1633 he became rector of Peshurst, and in 1643 archdeacon of Chichester. His adhesion to Charles I. cost him his living; yet he officiated as chaplain to the king till 1647, when he returned to Oxford, and was chosen sub-dean of Christchurch. Deprived by the parliamentary commissioners in 1648, he retired to Westwood in Worcestershire, where he died April 25, 1660. His celebrated Paraphrase and Annotations on the New Testament was published in 1653 (new ed. 1845); his works were collected in 1674-84. See Life by Bishop Fell prefixed to his Miscellaneous Theological Works (4 vols. 'Anglo-Catholic Library,' 1847-50).

Hampden, JOHN, patriot, was the eldest son of William Hampden of Hampden, Bucks, by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Henry Cromwell and aunt of Oliver Cromwell. Born, as is believed, in London in 1594, he entered Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1609, and in 1613 the Inner Temple, London. In 1621 he was returned by Gram-pound to parliament, and subsequently he sat for Wendover. Although he was no orator, his judgment, veracity, and high character secured for him a leading position in the opposition party. In 1626 he helped to prepare the charges against Buckingham; next year, having refused to pay his proportion of the general loan which Charles attempted to raise on his own authority, he was imprisoned. His leading associates were Pym and Eliot. When Charles dissolved parliament in 1629, Hampden retired to his seat in Buckinghamshire, and gave himself up to the life of a country gentleman. In 1634 Charles resorted to the impost of ship-money, and in 1636 he extended it to inland places. Hampden refused to pay his share, and in 1637 he was prosecuted before the Court of Exchequer. Seven of the twelve judges sided against him, but the prosecution made Hampden the most popular man in England. He was member for Bucks both in the Short Parliament and the Long, where he took part in almost all its leading transactions, especially those which ended in Strafford's death. He had never any faith in the king, and when it seemed not impossible that Charles would be able to crush the liberties of his country, Hampden, like Cromwell, meditated self-exile to New England. He was one of the five members whose attempted seizure by Charles (1642) precipitated the Civil War. When hostilities broke out, Hampden subscribed £2000 to the public service, took a colonel's commission, and raised a regiment of infantry for the Parliamentary army; at Edgehill and Reading he exhibited personal bravery and generalship. On 18th June 1643, while endeavouring, on Chalgrove Field, to check a marauding force under Prince Rupert, he was wounded in the shoulder; on the 24th he passed away at Thame. He was the most moderate, tactical, urbane, and single-minded of the leaders of the Long Parliament. See Lord Nugent's Memorials of Hampden (1831; 4th ed. 1856), Macaulay's Edinburgh article thereon (1831), the Life in Forster's British Statesmen (1837), and the History of S. R. Gardiner (q.v.).

Hampden, RENN DICKSON (1793-1868), born in Barbadoes, took a double first at Oxford in 1813, and became a fellow and tutor of Oriel. His famous Bampton lectures on the Scholastic Philosophy (1832) raised a controversy that threatened to break up the Church of England; his appointments to the principalship of St Mary's Hall (1833), and to the chairs of Moral Philosophy (1834) and Divinity (1836), were denounced by the High Church party; and his elevation to the see of Hereford in 1847 was regarded as a death-blow to Trinitarian religion. Among his eighteen works are Work of Christ and the Spirit (1847), Lectures on Moral Philosophy (1856), and Fathers of Greek Philosophy (1862). See Memorials by his daughter (1871).

Hampden, VISCOUNT. See BRAND.

Hampole. RICHARD ROLLE (c. 1290-1349), the 'Hermit of Hampole,' near Doncaster, was born at Thornton in Yorkshire, and was sent to Oxford, but from nineteen devoted himself to asceticism. He wrote religious books and English and expounded the Psalms in prose. His great work is The Pricer of Conscience (Stimulus Conscientie), a poem written both in English and in Latin, on the instability of life, death, purgatory, doomsday, the pains of hell, and the joys of heaven (ed. by Morris, Philolog. Soc. 1863). Some of his prose pieces were edited by Perry in 1866; others Dr Carl Horstmann in 1894-96.

Hampton, Lord. See PAKINGTON.

Hampton, Wade (1754-1835), born in South Carolina, served in the revolutionary war, was twice elected to congress, and in 1813, now major-general, made an unsuccessful attempt to invade Canada. He afterwards became wealthy by land speculations, and at his death owned 3000 slaves.—His grandson, Wade (1818-1902), born in Columbia, was a state senator when in 1861 he raised a force known as 'Hampton's Legion.' As brigadier-general he commanded a cavalry force in 1862-63, was wounded at Gettysburg, received the command of Lee's cavalry in 1864, and in 1865 served in South Carolina against Sherman. He became state governor (1876), and was U.S. senator (1878-91).

Hancock, Winfield Scott, general, was born near Philadelphia, 14th February 1824, studied at West Point, served through the Mexican war, and was captain when the civil war broke out. In 1861 he organised the army of the Potomac, was prominent at South Mountain, Antietam, and Fredericksburg, and in 1863 took command of the 2d corps. At Gettysburg he was in command until Meade's arrival; and on 3d July was severely wounded. In 1864 he was conspicuous in the battles of the Wilderness, Spotsylvania, and Cold Harbor, and in 1864 was created brigadier-general, but was disabled for active service by a wound. Democratic candidate for the presidency in 1880, he was defeated by Garfield. He died in New York, 9th Feb. 1886. See Lives by Junkin and Norton (1880), Goodrich (1886), his widow (1887), and Gen. Walker (1890).

Handel, George Frederick, was born at Halle, February 23, 1685. In 1697 his father, a surgeon, died, but his education was carefully continued, and in 1702 he entered the university of Halle, and became organist of a church there; before this he was well known as a musician. In 1703 he went to Hamburg and played in the orchestra of the Opera. In 1704 he produced his first Passion, and had a nearly fatal duel; in January 1705 Almira, his first opera, was brought out, and was followed by Nero, Florindo, and Daphne. He also gave innumerable lessons and wrote much harpsichord music. In 1706 he left Hamburg, in 1707 went to Italy, and produced Rodrigo at Florence, and Agrippina at Venice in 1708. His journey through Italy, one continued triumphal progress, was finished in the middle of 1710. He returned to Hanover and was made Kapellmeister, and in 1710 visited London, where his opera, Rinaldo, was produced in February 1711, with prodigious success. At Hanover again till 1712, he then went back to London, and produced Il Pastor Fido and Teseo. The spring of 1713 saw the Birthday Ode (his first composition to English words) and the Utrecht Te Deum. The operas of this year were Silla and Amadigi. The new king, George I., had been displeased at Handel's long absence from Hanover; but Handel made his peace by the Water Music, written for a royal water-party, August 22, 1715. He received a pension of £200, which was afterwards increased to a permanent income of £600.

In 1716, during a visit to Hanover, he wrote his second German Passion. In 1718-19 he wrote at the Duke of Chandos's seat of Cannons near Edgware the twelve Chandos Anthems and two Te Deums, Esther, Acis and Galatea, and the first set of Lessons, containing the 'Harmonious Blacksmith.' In 1720 the Royal Academy of Music was founded, by subscription of £50,000, 'to secure a constant supply of operas by Handel, to be performed under his direction.' The Royal Academy Theatre opened in April 1720, and Handel's Radamisto was produced. Thirteen other operas are spread over the next eight years—Muzio Scevola, Floridante, Ottone, Flavio, Giulio Cesare, Tamerlano, Rodelinda, Scipione, Alessandro, Admeto, Riccardo, Siroe, Tolomeo. When in 1727 George II. succeeded to the throne, Handel, naturalised the year before, as court composer composed Zadok the Priest for the coronation. In 1728 the Royal Academy of Music was at an end. Handel and Heidegger then took the house on their own account, but the speculation was not successful, the quarrels with the singers and rival composers were continual, and an opposition opera drove him, amidst worries and vexations, ultimately to Covent Garden, where, in partnership with Rich, he produced six new operas, Ariodante, Alcina, Atalanta, Giustino, Arminio, Berenice. In June the opposition opera collapsed, but Handel's losses had been so severe that he was obliged to compound with his creditors. His health broke down, and his mind was for a time disordered. A visit to Aix-la-Chapelle restored him, and by November he was back in London. Handel's opera days were over. True, he wrote a few more for his old partner Heidegger—Faramondo, Serse, Imeneo, and Deidamia; but he now began the composition of the oratorios which have rendered him immortal. Esther had been composed before 1720, Deborah and Athalia in 1733, Alexander's Feast in 1736, in the very thick of his opera squabbles. Then came the funeral anthem for Queen Caroline (1737). Saul was produced early in 1739; Israel in Egypt followed in three months; then the Ode for St Cecilia's Day, November 1739, and L'Allegro, February 1740. The Messiah was produced in Dublin, April 13, 1742. At London he produced Samson. In 1743 his health again broke down, and in 1751 he was at Cheltenham drinking its waters. From 1744 to 1750 oratorio followed oratorio. The Dettingen Te Deum and an anthem were followed by Joseph, Semele, Belshazzar, Hercules, The Occasional Oratorio, Judas Maccabaeus, Alexander Balus, Joshua, Solomon, Susanna, and Theodora. His great organ performances were very popular, and he composed for all occasions, so that at his death he had £2500 in the funds. In 1750 he wrote Jephthah, his last oratorio. In 1752 he was couched unsuccessfully for cataract; and henceforward, with some slight glimmering, he was virtually blind. He died April 14, 1759, and was buried in Poet's Corner, Westminster Abbey. See Lives by Mainwaring (1770), Chrysander (Leip. vols. 1.-iii. 1858-67), Rockstro (1883), and David (Par. 1884); also A. J. Balfour's Essays and Addresses (1893). Triennial Handel Festivals at the Crystal Palace date from 1859.

Hanna, William, D.D. (1808-82), the son of a theological professor at Belfast, was educated at the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh, and ordained in 1835 to East Kilbride. He came out at the Disruption, and became in 1850 colleague to Dr Guthrie in Edinburgh. He resigned his church through ill-health in 1866. Among his works were Memoirs of Dr Chalmers, his father-in-law (5 vols. 1849-53), Our Lord's Life on Earth (1869), and Letters of Erskine of Lanlathen (1877-78).

Hannay, JAMES, born at Dumfries, 17th Feb. 1827, after five years in the navy, was dismissed at eighteen by a court-martial sentence, afterwards quashed as irregular. He edited the Edinburgh Courant 1860-64, and from 1868 was British consul at Barcelona, where he died 3d Jan. 1873. Of his novels the best are Singleton Fontenoy (1850) and Eustace Conyers (1855). His Lectures on Satire and Satirists (1854) and Essays from the Quarterly (1861) show wide knowledge and fine literary sense. Other works were Three Hundred Years of a Norman [the Gurney] House (1866) and Studies on Thackeray (1869). See Bookman for February and March 1893.

Hannibal ('the grace of Baal') was born in 247 B.C., the son of the Carthaginian general Hamilcar Barca; in his ninth year his father bade him swear eternal enmity to Rome. He served in Spain under Hamilcar and Hasdrubal; and in 221-219 as general reduced all Spain up to the Ebro, with the exception of the Greek colony of Saguntum. That town fell in 218, and the Second Punic war began. In 218 he left New Carthage with 90,000 foot, 12,000 horse, and 37 elephants, crossed the Pyrenees, gained the Rhone, defeated the Gauls, and crossed the Alps in fifteen days, in the face of almost insuperable obstacles. His troops, reared under African and Spanish suns, perished in thousands amid ice and snow. On the Italian side, he had but 20,000 foot and 6000 horse; but he overcame the Taurini, forced Ligurian and Celtic tribes to serve in his army, and at the Ticinus drove back the Romans under Scipio. The first great battle was fought in the plain of the Trebia, when the 40,000 men of the Roman consular army were either cut to pieces or scattered in flight. Wintering in the valley of the Po, in spring Hannibal crossed the Apennines, wasted Etruria with fire and sword, and marched towards Rome. He awaited the consul Flaminius by the Lake Trasimene, where he inflicted on him a crushing defeat; the Roman army was annihilated. Passing through Apulia and Campania, he wintered at Gerontium, and in the spring at Cannæ on the Aufidus utterly destroyed another Roman army of 80,000 men. The battle became a butchery; 50,000 lay dead on the field, and nearly 20,000 were taken prisoners; himself he lost but 5700 men. But after Cannæ the tide turned. His niggardly countrymen denied him necessary support. As his veterans were lost to him he had no means of filling their places, while the Romans could put army after army into the field. But through the long years during which he maintained a hopeless struggle in Italy he was never defeated. He spent the winter of 216-215 at Capua, where his men grew demoralised by luxurious living. When he again took the field the Romans wisely avoided a pitched battle, though the Carthaginians overran Italy, took towns, and gained minor victories. But Capua fell in 210. In 207 his brother Hasdrubal, marching from Spain to his aid, was defeated and slain at the Metaurus by the consul Nero. For four years Hannibal stood at bay in the hill-country of Bruttium, till in 202 he was recalled to Africa to repel the Roman invasion. In the same year he met Scipio at Zama; his raw levies fled, his veterans were cut to pieces, and Carthage was at the mercy of Rome. So ended the Second Punic war. Peace being made, Hannibal turned his genius to political reforms, but raised such virulent opposition that, a voluntary exile, he betook himself to the court of Antiochus at Ephesus, then to that of Prusias, king of Bithynia. The Romans again demanding his surrender, he took poison, and died at Libyssa about the year 183. See Bosworth Smith's Carthage (1879), Hennebert's Annibal (1870-92), and Lives by Dodge (1891) and W. O'C. Morris (1897).

Hannington, JAMES, born 3d Sept. 1847 at Hurstpierpoint, studied at Oxford, and in 1882, after a seven years' curacy in his native parish, went out to Uganda under the Church Missionary Society. Fever and dysentery forced him to return to England; but he was in June 1884 consecrated first Bishop of Eastern Equatorial Africa, and in Jan. 1885 came to Mombasa. In July he started thence for Uganda, where he was slain by King Mwanga, 29th Oct. 1885. See Life by Dawson (1887) and his Last Journals (1888).

Hanno, a Carthaginian, undertook between 570 and 470 B.C. a voyage along the west coast of Africa. He founded colonies, and reached Cape Nun or the Bight of Benin. We have a Greek translation of his Periplus. See monographs by Mer (Par. 1885) and Fischer (Leip. 1893).

Hanotaux, GABRIEL, born at Beauvoir, Aisne, 19th Nov. 1853, held minor government offices, and in 1892-98 was twice foreign minister. An Academician (1897), he has written Henri Martin (1885), Cardinal Richelieu (1893-96), and a great history of Contemporary France (trans. 1904-5).

Hanoteau, HECTOR (1823-90), French landscape and genre painter, born at Decize (Nièvre).

Hansard, LUKE (1752-1828), came from Norwich to London, and entered the office of Hughes, printer to the House of Commons, becoming acting manager in 1774, and in 1798 succeeding as sole proprietor of the business. He and his descendants printed the parliamentary reports from 1774 to 1889; and Cobbett's Parliamentary History 1066-1800 was continued from 1806 by his son and successors. See Memoir (1829).

Hanseman, DAVID JUSTUS LUDWIG (1790-1864), a Prussian Liberal statesman and banker.

Hansom, JOSEPH ALOYSIUS (1803-82), a Roman Catholic architect, the inventor in 1834 of the 'Patent Safety (Hansom) Cab,' which brought him £300, was born at York, and died in London.

Hansteen, CHRISTOPH (1784-1873), Norwegian astronomer, was born and died at Christiania. In 1814 he became professor of Mathematics there, in 1819 published his Investigations into Terrestrial Magnetism, and in 1821 discovered the 'law of magnetic force.' He made a scientific journey to Eastern Siberia in 1828-30, and wrote on astronomy, mechanics, and geometry.

Hanway, JONAS (1712-86), traveller and philanthropist, was born at Portsmouth. Apprenticed at seventeen to a Lisbon merchant, he afterwards traded at St Petersburg, and in 1743-50 travelled through Russia and Persia. He published an account of his travels in 1753, and spent the rest of his life mostly in London as a navy victualling commissioner from 1762 to 1783. He was an unwearied friend to chimney-sweepers, pauper infants, and unfortunates, and advocated solitary confinement for prisoners and milder punishments. The author of seventy-four works, he attempted to write down the giving of veils, and was the first Englishman to carry an umbrella. His attack on tea-drinking was met by Dr Johnson. See Life by Pugh (1787) and Austin Dobson's Eighteenth Century Vignettes (1892).

Hapsburg, or Habsburg, HOUSE OF, the Austrian imperial family is named from the castle of Habsburg, or Habichtsburg ('Hawk's Castle'), on the Aar, in the Swiss canton of Aargau. The founder of the family was Albert, Count of Hapsburg in 1153. Under him and his son, Rudolf I., the family became one of the most powerful in Swabia. Rudolf III. (Rudolf I. of Austria), who was elected emperor (1273), by wresting Upper and Lower Austria, Styria, and Carniola from Ottocar of Bohemia, greatly increased the power of his family. Carinthia and the Tyrol were added in 1336-64. From 1440 to 1806 the Hapsburgs almost uninterruptedly wore the imperial crown, as since they have worn that of Austria. Meanwhile the original family possessions were absorbed by the Swiss confederated cantons (1386-1474). See Coxe's House of Austria (1807), and German works by Prince Lichnowski (1836-44), Schulte (1887), and Wehrich (1893).

Harcourt, EDWARD (1757-1847), was born at Sudbury Hall, Derbyshire, the youngest son of the first Lord Vernon, and in 1791 became Bishop of Carlisle, in 1807 Archbishop of York.

Harcourt, SIR WILLIAM VERNON, second son of the Rev. William Vernon Harcourt of Nuneham Park, Oxfordshire, and grandson of the Archbishop of York, was born October 14, 1827, and graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, with high honours in 1851. He was called to the bar in 1854, and was made Q.C. in 1866. During this period he acquired distinction by his contributions to the Saturday Review, and by his letters in the Times signed 'Historicus,' and collected in 1865. After unsuccessfully contesting the Kirkcaldy burghs, he was returned to parliament for the city of Oxford as a Liberal in 1868. In 1869 he was elected professor of International Law at Cambridge; in 1873 was appointed solicitor-general and knighted. He held office till 1874, and in 1880 became Home Secretary. On seeking re-election at Oxford he was defeated, but was returned for Derby. In 1880 Sir William piloted the Ground Game Bill, and in 1881 he introduced the Arns Bill (Ireland) in a speech strongly resented by the Irish members. He brought in the Prevention of Crimes Bill (1882) and the Explosives Bill of 1883. In 1885 he went out of office with his chief, but returned with him for six months in 1886, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer—an office he resumed in 1892. On Gladstone's retirement in 1893 Sir William became leader of the Lower House. His principal work was the revision of the death duties and his 1894 budget. At the general election of 1895 he was defeated at Derby (as champion of local option), but was returned for West Monmouthshire. His lukewarm support of his chief led to Lord Rosebery's resignation in 1896. After a crusade against Ritualism in 1898, he resigned the Liberal leadership, remaining a private member of the party; and he died on the 1st of October 1904.

Hardenberg, HEINRICH VON. See NOVALIS.

Hardenberg, KARL AUGUST, PRINCE VON (1750-1822), born at Essenroda in Hanover, after holding appointments in Hanover, Brunswick, Ansbach, and Baireuth, on Baireuth's union to Prussia in 1791 became a Prussian minister, and in 1803 first Prussian minister. His policy was to preserve neutrality in the war between France and England; but in 1806, under Napoleon's influence, he was dismissed. In 1810 he was appointed chancellor, and addressed himself to the task of completing the reforms begun by Stein. In the war of liberation he played a prominent part, and after the treaty of Paris (June 1814) was made a prince. He took part in the congress of Vienna, and in the treaties of Paris (1815). He reorganised the council of state (1817), of which he was appointed president, and drew up the new Prussian system of imposts. To Hardenberg Prussia is mainly indebted for the improvements in her army system, the abolition of serfdom and the privileges of the nobles, the encouragement of municipalities, and the reform of education. See Life by Ranke (1877).

Hardicanute (c. 1019-42), king of England, son of Canute by Emma, at whose death (1035) the throne was given to Harold, an elder son, Wessex, however, was reserved for Hardicanute, who was elected King of England on Harold's death (1040). He only reigned two years, but had time to provoke the discontent of his subjects by imposing a very heavy danegeld.

Hardie, CHARLES MARTIN, painter, was born at East Linton, Haddingtonshire, 16th March 1858; came to Edinburgh in 1875; and was elected A.R.S.A. in 1886, and R.S.A. in 1895.

Hardie, J. KEIR, born in 1856, was a miner near Cumnock in Ayrshire, and from 1892 to 1895 Independent Labour M.P. for West Ham, and for Merthyr Tydvil since 1900. In 1896 he stood unsuccessfully for East Bradford.

Harding, JAMES DUFFIELD (1798-1863), water-colour landscapist and drawing-master, was born at Deptford, and died at Barnes.

Harding, JOHN. See HARDYNG.

Harding, STEPHEN, born at Sherborne in Dorset, from 1110 to 1133 was the third abbot of Cîteaux, and endeavoured to restore the Benedictine rule to its original simplicity. He died 28th March 1134, and was canonised.

Hardinge, HENRY HARDINGE, VISCOUNT, governor-general of India, was born at Wrotham, Kent, 30th March 1785. Gazetted an ensign in 1798, he served through the Peninsular war, being wounded at Vimiera and Vittoria. From 1809 to 1813 he was deputy-quartermaster-general of the Portuguese army. After Napoleon's escape from Elba, Hardinge was appointed commissioner at the Prussian headquarters, and was severely wounded at Ligny. From 1820 to 1844 he took an active share in parliamentary life, being Secretary of War under Wellington in 1828, and afterwards Chief Secretary for Ireland. In 1844 he was appointed governor-general of India. During the first Sikh war he was present at the battles of Mudki, Firozshah, and Sobraon as second in command to Lord Gough. After the peace of Lahore (1845) he was created a viscount, and granted a pension of £5000 by the East India Company, as well as one of £3000 for three lives by parliament. Returning to England in 1848, he succeeded (1852) Wellington as commander-in-chief, and in 1855 was made field-marshal. He died at South Park, Tunbridge Wells, 24th Sept. 1856. See Life by his son (1891).

Hardouin, JEAN (1646-1729), an eccentric classical scholar, was born at Quimper, entered the Jesuit order at twenty, and from 1683 was librarian of the Collège de Louis le Grand in Paris. He maintained that the entire body of classical literature, with the exception of Cicero, Pliny's Natural History, Virgil's Georgics, Horace's Satires and Epistles, Homer's Iliad, and Herodotus, was spurious, and had been written by the monks of the 13th century. He rejected all the reputed remains of ancient art; he even extended his scepticism to the Septuagint version of the Old Testament, and to the Greek text of the

New, the original language of which he held to have been Latin! Besides this, he condemned as apocryphal all councils of the church anterior to the Council of Trent. Yet Hardonin was a scholar of real attainments, and most of his works possess historical and critical value, particularly his edition of Pliny (1689). Valuable also are his Collectio Conciliorum (1715), a commentary on the New Testament, and several volumes on numismatics and chronology.

Hardwick, PHILIP (1792-1870), a London architect, like his father THOMAS (1752-1829).

Hardy, ALEXANDRE (c. 1570-1631), dramatist, born in Paris, from 1600 wrote for the Théâtre du Marais from five to seven hundred pieces, of which but forty-one are extant. They were modelled on Spanish examples, from their merits down to their bombast and entangled plot. The best is Mariamne. A late edition is Stengel's (1883-84). See French monograph by Rigal (1890).

Hardy, GATHORNE. See CRANBROOK.

Hardy, THOMAS (1752-1832), a Radical London bootmaker, born at Larbert, Stirlingshire, founded in 1792 the Corresponding Society, and in 1794 was acquitted of high-treason.

Hardy, THOMAS, novelist, was born at Upper Bockhampton in Dorsetshire, June 2, 1840. He was brought up and practised as an architect, in 1863 gaining the prize and medal of the Institute of British Architects and Sir W. Tite's prize for architectural design. His intention was now to become an art-critic, but the experiment of a not wholly unsuccessful novel, Desperate Remedies (1871; new ed. 1889), shaped his destiny otherwise. Under the Greenwood Tree (1872) and A Pair of Blue Eyes (1873), preceded his first great work, Far from the Madding Crowd (1874). It was followed by The Hand of Ethelberta (1876), The Return of the Native (1878), The Trumpet-major (1880), A Laodicean (1881), Two on a Tower (1882), The Mayor of Casterbridge (1886), A Group of Noble Dames (1891), Tess of the D'Urbervilles (1891), Jude the Obscure (1895), The Well-beloved (1897), Wessex Poems (1897), The Dynasts (1904-8). See Studies by Miss Macdonell (1894) and L. Johnson (1894).

Hardy, SIR THOMAS DUFFUS, paleographer, born 23d May 1804 at Port Royal, Jamaica, in 1819 entered the Record Office in the Tower, and quickly became an expert in reading ancient MSS. His earliest writings — illustrating the reign of King John — appeared in Archæologia and the Excerpta Historica. In 1861 he became deputy-keeper of the Public Records. He was knighted in 1870, and died 15th June 1878. He edited Close Rolls (1833-44), Patent Rolls (1835), Norman Rolls (1835), and Charter Rolls (1837); William of Malmesbury (1840); Catalogue of Lord Chancellors, Keepers of Great Seal, &c. (1843); Modus tenendi Parliamentum (1846); Syllabus of Rymer's Fœdera (1869-85), &c. — His brother, SIR WILLIAM HARDY, was born 6th July 1807, and became a clerk at the Record Office. He succeeded his brother as deputy-keeper, and retired in 1886. Already an F.S.A. in 1837, he was knighted in 1883. Among his works are an edition of Jehan de Waurin's Chroniques et Anchiennes Istories de la Grant Bretagne (1864-84), and a translation of the first and second volumes (1864-87). He died 17th March 1887.

Hardy, SIR THOMAS MASTERMAN, G.C.B. (1769-1839), an admiral associated from 1796 with Nelson, was born at Portisham, Dorset, and from 1834 was governor of Greenwich Hospital.

Hardyng, JOHN (1378 - c. 1465), a rhyming chronicler, in 1390 entered the household of Harry Percy, 'Hotspur,' whom he saw fall on Shrewsbury Field in 1403. Pardon'd for his treason, he became constable of Warkworth Castle, fought at Agincourt, and served the crown in confidential missions to Scotland. His chronicle, composed in limping stanzas, and treating the history of England from the earliest times down to Henry VI.'s flight into Scotland, he rewrote and presented to Edward IV. just after his accession. It is poor history and poorer poetry, but the account of the Agincourt campaign has the interest of the eye-witness. Richard Grafton continued it down to Henry VIII. See edition by Sir Henry Ellis (1812).

Hare, SIR JOHN, comedian and manager, was born in London, 16th May 1844, and educated at Giggleswick. He came out in London in 1865.

Hare, JULIUS CHARLES, a leader of the Broad Church party, was born near Vicenza in Italy, September 13, 1795. From the Charterhouse he passed in 1812 to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow in 1818, and in 1822 classical lecturer. He took orders in 1826, and succeeded his uncle in the rich family living of Hurstmonceaux, Sussex, in 1832; in 1844 married Frederick Maurice's sister; became Archdeacon of Lewes in 1840, and in 1853 chaplain to the Queen; and died January 23, 1855. His annual charges awakened Englishmen to the fact that they had much to learn in theology from Germany. In 1820 he translated Fouqué's Sintram; in 1827 he, with his brother Augustus, published anonymously Guesses at Truth. His next work was the translation of Niebuhr's History of Rome (1828-32) in collaboration with Thirlwall, and his own Vindication of Niebuhr's History (1829). The Victory of Faith (1840) and The Mission of the Comforter (1846) are sermons. In 1848 he published with a Life the Remains of John Sterling, to which Carlyle's masterpiece was meant to be a corrective. Other books are Parish Sermons (1841-49) and a Vindication of Luther (1854). — His elder brother, AUGUSTUS WILLIAM HARE, was born in Rome, 17th Nov. 1792, and educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford. He became a fellow and tutor, and in 1829 rector of Alton Barnes near Devizes; in 1829 married the gifted Maria Leycester (1798-1870); but died prematurely at Rome, 18th Feb. 1834. Besides his share in the Guesses at Truth, he left fifty-six sermons (1837). — A nephew, AUGUSTUS JOHN CUTHBERT HARE (1834-1903), born in Rome and educated at Harrow and University College, Oxford, wrote the famous and often reprinted Walks in Rome (1871), Wanderings in Spain (1873), Days near Rome (1875), Cities of Northern and Central Italy (1876), Walks in London (1878; new ed. 1894), Cities of Southern Italy and Sicily (1883), Sussex (1894), &c. Other works are his delightful biography of Maria Hare, Memorials of a Quiet Life (1872-76), Life and Letters of Baroness Bunsen (1879), Two Noble Lives (1894), and The Gurneys of Earham (1895). See his Autobiography (6 vols. 1896-1900).

Hare, ROBERT (1781-1858), scientist, born in Philadelphia, was professor of Chemistry there 1818-47. In 1801 he described his oxyhydrogen blowpipe, in 1816 invented the calorimeter, a galvanic apparatus; and he devised a new voltaic pile. He published Spiritualism demonstrated (1855).

Hargraves, EDMUND HAMMOND (1815-91), born at Gosport, went out as a youth to Australia. Attracted to the Californian gold-diggings in 1849, he was led by the similarity in geological formation to suspect that gold would be found in Australia also. On his return he justified his surmise by discovering gold on the Blue Hills, N.S.W., in 1851, was appointed commissioner of crown lands, and received a government reward of £10,000. In 1855, a year after his return to England, he published Australia and its Goldfields.

Hargreaves, JAMES, born probably at Blackburn about 1745, was an illiterate weaver and carpenter of Standhill near that town. In 1760 he invented a carding-machine, and about 1764 the spinning-jenny. But his fellow-spinners, prejudiced against machinery, broke into his house and destroyed his frame (1768). He removed to Nottingham, where he erected a spinning-mill, but his patent proved invalid. Hargreaves continued to carry on business as a yarn manufacturer till his death on 22d April 1778. See Espinasse's Lancashire Worthies (1874).

Haring, GEORG WILHELM HEINRICH, 'Wilhelm Alexis' (1797-1884), born at Breslau, wrote the historical romance Walladmor (1823-24), professedly as by Sir Walter Scott, a fraud that led to its translation into several languages (into English, very freely, by De Quincey, 1824). It was followed by Die Geächteten (1825), Schloss Avalon (1827), books of travel, sketches, dramas, &c.

Harrington. See HARRINGTON.

Hariri ('Silk-merchant'), the name by which the Arabic writer ABU MOHAMMED AL KASIM IBN ALI (1054-1121) is known. He was born and died at Basra, and, besides works on Arabic grammar, syntax, &c., wrote Makamat (Literary Gatherings), a collection of witty rhymed tales of adventure. See the edition by Silvestre de Sacy (1822; re-edited 1847-53). English translations (partial) are by Preston (1850) and Chenuy (1867).

Harlamoff, ALEXIS, Russian artist, born at Saratoff in 1844, became a member of the St Petersburg Academy in 1869, and afterwards settled in Paris. See R. Walker in Good Words (1889).

Harless, GOTTLÖB CHRISTOPH ADOLF VON (1806-79), Lutheran theologian, born at Nuremberg, became professor of Theology at Erlangen in 1836, and at Leipzig in 1845, court preacher at Dresden in 1850, and in 1852 president of the Munich consistory. His chief works (strongly orthodox) were Theologische Encyclopädie (1837) and Christliche Ethik (1842; Eng. trans. 1808). See his Autobiography (1873-75).

Harley, ROBERT, EARL OF OXFORD, the son of Sir Edward Harley, born in London, 5th December 1661, entered the Inner Temple in 1682, and the House of Commons as a Whig in 1689; in 1701 he was elected Speaker, and in 1704 became also Secretary of State. Shortly after he began to intrigue with the Tories, and he found a most useful ally in his cousin, Abigail Hill (Mrs Masham). In 1708 the conviction of his secretary for treasonable correspondence with France caused Harley to resign office; he then set to work to undermine the power of the Whigs, and in 1710 Godolphin was dismissed, and Harley made Chancellor of the Exchequer and head of the government. In 1711 a French priest and spy calling himself the Marquis de Guiscard was brought before the council, and suddenly stabbed Harley with a penknife. On his recovery he was made Earl of Oxford and Mortimer, a K.G., and Lord High Treasurer. The principal act of Harley's administration was the treaty of Utrecht. But his popularity was already on the wane; his friendship with Bolingbroke had turned to bitter hatred, and Mrs Masham sided with Bolingbroke.

In July 1714 he was dismissed from office, in July 1715 sent to the Tower, but after two years was acquitted by the Peers. He spent the remainder of his life in retirement, the friend of men of letters, and founder of the Harleian collection in the British Museum. He died in London, May 21, 1724.

Harlow, GEORGE HENRY (1787-1819), a London historical and portrait painter.

Harman, THOMAS, a Kentish gentleman who in 1566 wrote an early work upon vagrants.

Harmodius and Aristogeiton, two Athenians strongly attached to each other, who in 514 B.C. murdered Hipparchus, younger brother of the 'tyrant' Hippias. They meant to kill Hippias also, but Harmodius was cut down, whilst Aristogeiton, who fled, was taken and executed. Subsequently they were regarded as patriotic martyrs, and received divine honours.

Harms, CLAUs (1778-1855), a Kiel pastor, whose tercentenary treatise on Luther's theses (1817) produced a sensation. See his Autobiography (new ed. 1888).

Harnack, THEODOSIUS (1817-89), Lutheran theologian, born at St Petersburg, was professor of Theology at Dorpat (1848-53), next (till 1866) at Erlangen, and again at Dorpat (until 1873). His principal works were a Practical Theology and a work on Luther's Smaller Catechism.—His son, ADOLF, born 7th May 1851 at Dorpat, became a professor at Leipzig (1876), Giessen (1879), Marburg (1886), and Berlin (1889). His chief writings are on Gnosticism (1873), Ignatius (1878), Monasticism (2d ed. 1882), History of Dogma (1886-90; trans. 1895), Outlines of the History of Dogma (trans. 1893-97), Christianity and History (trans. 1896), What is Christianity? (trans. 1901), The Expansion of Christianity (trans. 1905), and books on the history of old Christian literature and a history of the Berlin Academy (of which he is a member), besides essays and minor treatises innumerable. In 1905 he was made keeper of the Imperial Library. He holds the order Pour le Mérite, &c. From 1893 the orthodox suspected him of heresy on account of his criticism of the Apostles' Creed.

Harness, WILLIAM (1790-1869), from 1826 a London clergyman, Shakespeare's editor and biographer, and the friend of Byron and Miss Mitford.

Harold I., 'Harefoot,' king of England, was the younger of Canute's two sons by his first wife, Alfgiva. On Canute's death (1035) the witan gave Harold the provinces north of the Thames, and Wessex to Canute's second wife, Emma, for her son Hardicanute. But in 1037 Wessex submitted to Harold. He died 17th March 1040.

Harold II., last of the native English kings, was the second son of Earl Godwin, and was born about 1022. By 1045 he was Earl of East Anglia, and in 1053 succeeded to his father's earldom of Wessex. Henceforward he was the right hand of King Edward the Confessor, and he directed the affairs of the kingdom with unusual gentleness and vigour. His brother Tostig became Earl of the Northumbrians in 1055, and two years later two other brothers were raised to earldoms. Meantime Harold drove back the Welsh marauders, and added Herefordshire to his earldom. The death in 1057 of the Ætheling Edward, son of Edmund Ironside, opened up the path for Harold's ambitious hopes of the crown. He made a pilgrimage to Rome in 1058, and after his return completed his church at Waltham. In 1063, provoked by the fresh incursions of the Welsh king Griffith, he marched against him, traversed the country, beat the enemy at every point, and gave the government to the dead king's brothers. It is impossible to state exactly the date of Harold's visit to Duke William in Normandy, although it is put by Freeman at 1064. Probably Harold did make some kind of oath to William, most likely under compulsion. It is certain that Harold helped William in a war with the Bretons. On his return he married Ealdgyth, Griffith's widow, though Edith Swan-neck, who had borne him five children, was still alive. In 1065 the Northumbrians rebelled against Tostig, and Harold acquiesced in their choice of Morcar and Tostig's banishment. In January 1066 King Edward died; and Harold, his nominee, was chosen king, and crowned in Westminster Abbey. Duke William lost no time in preparing for the invasion of England, and Tostig, after trying the Normans and the Scots, succeeded in drawing to his side Harold Hardrada, king of Norway. In September the two reached the Humber, and Harold marched to meet them. At Stamford Bridge he won a complete victory (September 25, 1066), Tostig and Harold Hardrada being among the slain. But four days later William landed at Pevensey. Harold marched southwards with the utmost haste, and the two armies met at Senlac, about nine miles from Hastings. From nine in the morning, 14th October 1066, the English fought with the most stubborn courage till nightfall, when the pretended flight of the Normans drew them from their impregnable position and gave the Normans the victory, Harold himself fell pierced through the eye with an arrow. His body was recognised by Edith Swan-neck, and was buried at Waltham. See vols. ii. and iii. of Freeman's Norman Conquest.

Harold I., surnamed HAARFAGER ('Fair-haired'), the first king of all Norway, after a severe struggle (863-872) subdued the chiefs between Trondhjem and the Sogne Fjord, and finally the kings of the south-west. The conquered districts he placed under such jarls as were devoted to his service. This led many of the old nobles to emigrate to the Orkneys, Hebrides, and Iceland, whence they conducted piratical expeditions against Norway, until at length Harold sailed westwards and chastised them in their own seas. He died in 933.

Harold III., surnamed HARDRADA ('stern in council'), king of Norway, when a boy was present at the battle (1030) in which his brother, St Olaf, king of Norway, was slain. Harold sought an asylum with his relative, Yaroslav, prince of Novgorod. Going on to Constantinople, he became captain of the Varangians or Scandinavian bodyguard of the Greek emperors, and defeated the Saracens in Sicily and Italy. He incurred the vengeance of the Empress Zoe, whose proffered love he rejected, with difficulty escaped to Russia, and married Duke Yaroslav's daughter. He returned about 1045 to Norway, where his nephew Magnus agreed to divide the supreme power with him. Magnus's death in 1047 left Harold sole king; with Svend of Denmark he waged unrelenting war until 1064. In 1066 he landed in England to aid Tostig against King Harold (q. v.), but fell at Stamford Bridge.

Haroun Al-Raschid (763-809), born near Teheran, succeeded to the califate in 786. He owed his peaceful accession to the Barmecide Yahya, whom he made grand-vizier. To him and his four sons he left the administration of his extensive kingdom; and the energy of their rule and the general prosperity proved that his confidence was not misplaced. Meantime Haroun gave himself up to pleasure, and his taste and hospitality made his court at Bagdad a centre of all the wit, learning, and art of the Moslem world. Eventually a strange and deeply-rooted hatred towards the Barmecides possessed him, and in 803 he caused the vizier, his sons, and all their descendants save one to be executed, not even excepting his favourite Jaafar (Giafar), his companion in his semi-apocryphal nocturnal rambles through Bagdad. To quell a rising in Khorassan, he marched against the rebels, but died of apoplexy at Tûs. The Arabian Nights have thrown a false halo round his memory. See Life by Palmer (1880).

Harpe, LA. See LA HARPE.

Harper, SIR WILLIAM (c. 1496-1573), Lord Mayor of London in 1561-62, was a great benefactor to his native town, Bedford.

Harper and Brothers, a firm of New York publishers, consisted originally of James (1795-1869), John (1797-1875), Joseph Wesley (1801-70), and Fletcher (1806-77). James and John commenced to publish in 1818; the firm of Harper and Brothers, established in 1833, is carried on by descendants; and that of Messrs Osgood was amalgamated with it in 1897. Besides books, the firm issues Harper's Magazine (monthly, since 1850), Harper's Weekly (1857), Harper's Bazar (1867), and Harper's Young People (1881).

Harraden, BEATRICE, born at Hampstead, 24th January 1864, the youngest daughter of Samuel Harraden (1821-98), musical-instrument importer, is a B.A. of London, and has travelled on the Continent and in America. She has written Ships that pass in the Night (1893), In Varying Moods, The Fowler, Katharine Frensham (1903), &c.

Harrington, JAMES (1611-77), born at Upton, Northants, the son of Sir S. Harrington of Exton, Rutlandshire, studied at Trinity, Oxford. He travelled to Rome, and though a republican, became in 1646 a personal attendant of Charles I., and attended him to the scaffold. His semi-romance Oceana (1656), setting forth the best form of commonwealth, maintains that the real basis of power is property, especially landed property, from which no one person should derive more than £3000 a-year; and that the rulers should be changed every three years, their successors being elected by ballot. In 1661 he was arrested for attempting to change the constitution, and in prison went temporarily insane.

Harrington, SIR JOHN (1561-1612), born at Kelston near Bath, from Eton passed in 1578 to Christ's College, Cambridge, and thence to the court of his god-mother, Queen Elizabeth. His wit brought him into much favour, which he endangered by the freedom of his satires. In 1599 he served under Essex in Ireland, and was knighted by him on the field, much to the queen's displeasure. To fortify his amazing application to King James for the office of chancellor and archbishop of Ireland he composed in 1605 A Short View of the State of Ireland, an interesting and singularly modern essay (ed. by Macray, 1880). He is remembered as the metrical translator of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso (1591); his other writings include Rabelaisian pamphlets, epigrams, and a Tract on the Succession to the Crown (ed. by Clements Markham, with Memoir, Roxb. Club, 1880).

Harris, SIR AUGUSTUS GLOSSOP (1852-96), son and grandson of two managers, became lessee of Drury Lane in 1879, and was knighted in 1891. He was something of a playwright himself.

Harris, HOWEL (1714-73), a founder of Welsh

Calvinistic Methodism, born at Trevecca in Brecon, for seventeen years was a lay itinerant preacher. Then retiring to Trevecca in 1752, he still preached daily at his own home, where he built a large house, whose inmates led a kind of monastic life. See his Autobiography (1791).

Harris, JAMES (1709-80), born at Salisbury, studied at Wadham, Oxford, and Lincoln's Inn. On his father's death (1738) left master of an ample fortune, he devoted himself to the classics, but in 1761 entered parliament, and in 1763 became a Lord of the Admiralty and of the Treasury, in 1764 secretary and comptroller to Queen Charlotte. In 1744 he published Art and Happiness; in 1751 Hermes, an inquiry into universal grammar. See his works edited in 1801-3 with a Memoir by his son, the diplomatist, James, first Earl of Malmesbury (1746-1820).

Harris, JOEL CHANDLER, American author, was born in Eatonton, Ga., 8th December 1848, and was in turn printer, lawyer, and journalist. His Uncle Remus (1880) quickly carried his name to the Old World, at once to children and to students of folklore. Later works are Nights with Uncle Remus, Mingo, Daddy Jake, Aaron in the Wildwoods, Sister Jane, Tales of the Home Folks, Plantation Pageants, Minervy Ann (1899), besides a history of Georgia (1899). He died 4th July 1908.

Harris, RENATUS (c. 1640-1715), a celebrated London organ-builder, Father Smith's rival.

Harris, THOMAS LAKE (1823-1906), born at Penny Stratford, Bucks, at three was taken to America, about 1845 became a Universalist pastor, and in 1850 was drawn into spiritualism. He founded the 'Church of the Good Shepherd' about 1858, lectured in Great Britain in 1859, and in 1861 reorganised his society as the 'Brotherhood of the New Life.' Property was held in common, and farming and industrial occupations were engaged in by his followers, numbering 2000 at one time in America and Great Britain, amongst them Lady Oliphant and her son Laurence Oliphant (q.v.). About 1876 Harris removed from Brocton, N.Y., to Santa Rosa in California. The inspired head of the brotherhood, whose doctrines are a compound of Swedenborg and Fourier, he had published many poems and prose works—Wisdom of Angels (1856), Modern Spiritualism (1860), Star-flowers (1886), &c.

Harrison, BENJAMIN, twenty-third president of the United States, was born at North Bend, Ohio, August 20, 1833. His father was the third son of President W. H. Harrison. Benjamin graduated at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, in 1852, and in 1854 settled as a lawyer in Indianapolis. Entering the Union army in 1862, he was first lieutenant and then colonel of the 70th Regiment Indiana Volunteers. He served in Sherman's Atlanta campaign, distinguishing himself in the battles of Resaca, Peach Tree Creek, and Nashville, and in 1865 he became brevet-brigadier-general. He took an active part in the Grant campaigns of 1868 and 1872, and was nominated by the Republicans for the state governorship in 1876, but defeated. In 1878 he presided over the State Convention, in 1880 was chairman of his state delegation, and was elected U.S. senator for Indiana. In 1888 he was nominated for president, Cleveland being put forward by the Democrats for re-election. Contest turned on protection or free trade, and Harrison's election was a triumph for protection; but in 1892 he was defeated by Cleveland. In 1893 he became a professor at San Francisco, and he died in March 1901. See Life by Lew Wallace (1888).

Harrison, FREDERIC, born in London, October 18, 1831, was educated at King's College School, London, and Wadham College, Oxford, taking a classical first-class in 1853. He became fellow and tutor of his college, but was called to the bar in 1858, and practised conveyancing and in the Courts of Equity. He sat on the Royal Commission upon Trades-unions (1867-69), served as secretary to that for the Digest of the Law (1869-70), and from 1877 till 1889 was professor of Jurisprudence and International Law at Lincoln's Inn Hall. A Positivist and an advanced Liberal, he has written The Meaning of History (1862), Order and Progress (1875), The Present and the Future (1880), Lectures on Education (1883), On the Choice of Books (1886), Oliver Cromwell (1888), Annals of an old Manor House (1893), Early Victorian Literature (1895), several books on Positivism, William the Silent, Byzantine History, and Ruskin (1902). From 1889 to 1892 he was an alderman of the London County Council.

Harrison, JOHN (1693-1776), inventor of the chronometer, was born at Foulby near Pontefract. By 1726 he had constructed a timekeeper with compensating apparatus for correcting errors due to variations of climate. In 1713 government had offered three prizes for the discovery of a method to determine the longitude accurately. After long perseverance Harrison made a chronometer which, in a voyage to Jamaica in 1761-62, determined the longitude within 18 geographical miles. After further trials, he was awarded the largest prize of £20,000 (1765-73). He also invented the gridiron pendulum, the going fusee, and the remontoir escapement. He wrote five works on his chronometer, &c.

Harrison, THOMAS, regicide, born at Newcastle-under-Lyme in 1606, joined the Parliamentary army, commanded the guard that carried the king from Hurst Castle to London, sat among his judges, and signed his death-warrant. He did good service at Worcester, but was too uncompromising alike in religion and politics to favour Cromwell's tolerant ideas, and was deprived of his commission, and later imprisoned for his share in plots hatched by the more irreconcilable bigots. He would not fly at the Restoration, and was executed October 13, 1660. See Life by C. H. Firth (1893), and by Simpkinson (1905).

Harrison, WILLIAM (1534-93), born in London, studied at Cambridge and Oxford. He became chaplain to Lord Cobham, who presented him to the rectory of Radwinter in Essex (1559); and in 1586 he was installed canon of Windsor. The fruit of his studies, and of his use of Leland's MSS., was his famous Description of England, as well as his Description of Britain, written for Holinshed's Chronicle. Books ii. and iii. of the Description of England were edited by Furnivall for the New Shakspeare Society (1877-81).

Harrison, WILLIAM HENRY, ninth president of the United States, was born in Charles City, county Virginia, 9th February 1773. His father, Benjamin Harrison (1740-91), was one of the signers of the declaration of independence. Harrison joined the army Wayne led against the Indians, and distinguished himself at the battle on the Miami (1794). He represented the Northwest Territory in congress in 1799-1800, and when Indiana Territory was formed (1800) was appointed governor. He laboured to avert war with the Indians, but was compelled to quell Tecumseh's outbreak, ending in the battle at Tippecanoe (7th November 1811). In the war of 1812-14 he received the command in the northwest, repulsed the British under Proctor, and by the victory of Perry on Lake Erie was enabled to pursue the invaders into Canada, where, on 5th October 1813, he routed them in the battle of the Thames. In 1816 he was elected to congress, and in 1824 became U.S. senator. In 1828-29 he was ambassador to Colombia, and for twelve years was clerk of a county court in Ohio. He received 73 votes for the presidency in 1836 against Van Buren's 170; in 1840, the Whig party having united, he defeated Van Buren by an overwhelming majority, but died at Washington a month after his inauguration on 4th April 1841. See Lives by Dawson (1834), Hall (1836), Hildreth (1839), Burr (1840), and Montgomery (new ed. 1886).

Harry, BLIND, a Scottish minstrel, blind from his birth, who lived by telling tales, and in 1490-92 was at the court of James IV., receiving occasional small gratuities. His poem on Wallace exists in a MS. of 1488, copied by John Ramsay. This MS. does not ascribe the work to Blind Harry, nor is his name given to it in the earlier printed editions. The poem, which contains 11,861 lines, is written in rhyming couplets. The language is frequently obscure, but the work is written with vigour, and kindles sometimes into poetry. The author seems to have been familiar with the metrical romances, and represents himself as indebted to the Latin Life of Wallace by Master John Blair, Wallace's chaplain, and to another by Sir Thomas Gray, parson of Liberton. The poem transfers to its hero some of the achievements of Bruce, and contains many mistakes or misrepresentations, but much of the narrative can bear the test of historical criticism. It is believed to have been printed in Edinburgh in 1520, but no perfect copy is known of any earlier edition than that of 1570, The Actis and Deidis of the Maist Illuster and Vailyeand Campioun Schir William Wallace, Knicht of Ellerslie. Good editions are by Jamieson (1820) and by Moir for the Scottish Text Society (1885-89). The work was for 200 years one of the most popular in Scotland, but as its language ceased to be understood, its place was supplied by a modernised version by Hamilton of Gilbertfield (1722).

Hart, SOLOMON ALEXANDER, painter, was born at Plymouth in April 1806, the son of a Jewish goldsmith, who in 1820 removed to London. Apprenticed to a line engraver, in 1823 he became a student at the Royal Academy. Amongst his works are 'The Elevation of the Law' (1830), 'Isaac of York' (1830), 'Milton visiting Galileo in Prison' (1847), and 'The Three Inventors of Printing' (1852). He also painted miniatures and portraits. An A.R.A. (1835), an R.A. (1840), professor of Painting (1854), and librarian to the Academy (1865), he died 11th June 1881. See his Reminiscences (1882).

Hart, WILLIAM (1822-94), landscape painter, was born at Paisley, and died in New York, having come with his parents to Albany in 1831.

Harte, FRANCIS BRET, was born in Albany, N.Y., August 25, 1839, went to California in 1854, and opened a school at Sonora; but having failed both in this and in mining, next became a compositor in San Francisco. Sketches of his experiences among the miners attracted much attention, and as a result he joined the staff of the Golden Era. He was secretary of the U.S. Mint in San Francisco 1864-70, and during this period wrote some of his most famous poems, among them 'John Burns of Gettysburg,' 'The Society upon the Stanislaus,' &c. He founded in 1868 and edited the Overland Monthly, to which he contributed The Luck of Roaring Camp, The Outcasts of Poker Flat, Miggles, Tennessee's Partner, The Idyl of Red Gulch, and Plain Language from Truthful James ('The Heathen Chinese'). Returning to the East, he became a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly, and from time to time lectured in various cities. In 1878-80 he was U.S. consul at Crefeld, and in 1880-85 at Glasgow; thereafter he lived in London till his death, 6th May 1902. Later publications were Flip (1882), In the Carquinez Woods (1883), Snowbound at Eagle's (1886), A Drift from Redwood Camp (1888), The Heritage of Dedlow Marsh (1889), Clarence (1895), Some Later Verses (1898), &c. See Life by Merwin (1912).

Hartington, LORD. See CAVENTISH.

Hartley, DAVID, philosopher, was born at Luddenden, Halifax, in June 1705. A clergyman's son, at fifteen he entered Jesus College, Cambridge, and in 1727 became a fellow. He studied for the church, but, dissenting from some points in the Thirty-nine Articles, abandoned his intention. In his mature years he impugned the eternity of hell-punishment; in all other points he remained a devout member of the Church of England. As a medical practitioner he attained considerable eminence at Newark, Bury St Edmunds, London, and Bath. He died 25th August 1757. His Observations on Man (1749) turns upon two hypotheses—one 'The Doctrine of Vibrations,' or a theory of nervous action analogous to the propagation of sound (whence he was charged—unjustly, he maintained—with materialism); the other the doctrine that the Association of Ideas explains almost all mental phenomena. See G. S. Bower, Hartley and James Mill (1881).—His son, DAVID (1732-1813), was a fellow of Merton College, Oxford, a dull M.P., and a fire-proofing inventor.

Hartlib, SAMUEL (c. 1600-70), was born at Elbing in Prussia, son of a Polish refugee and an English mother. Coming to England about 1628, he busied himself in trade, in agriculture, and on a school to be conducted on new principles, which inspired his friend Milton's Treatise on Education (1644), as well as Sir William Petty's Two Letters (1647-48). Cromwell gave him a pension of £100, increased to £300. He wrote on education and husbandry. See Life by Dircks (1865).

Hartmann, EDUARD VON, philosopher, born at Berlin, 23d February 1842, served as an artillery officer 1858-65, but from 1867 has lived in Berlin, working out his philosophical scheme, a synthesis of Hegel, Schelling, and Schopenhauer, in which 'the Unconscious' plays the rôle of creator and providence. His great work is Die Philosophie des Unbewussten (1869; 10th ed. 1890; Eng. trans. by Coupland, 1884), followed by books on the ethical consciousness (1878), the development of the religious consciousness (1882), German aesthetics (1886), Lotze (1888), and Kant (1893), besides a work on the self-destruction of Christianity (1874), criticisms of Neo-Kantianism and contemporary philosophies, defences of his own system, and political and educational treatises. A pessimist as regards the inevitable misery of existence, he was an optimist as champion of evolutionary progress. He died 6th June 1906.

Hartmann von Aue (c. 1170-1215), a poet of the Middle High German period, took part in the Crusade of 1197. The most popular of the narrative poems is Der arme Heinrich (ed. by Robertson, 1895), which, based on a Swabian tradition, is utilised in Longfellow's Golden Legend. Erec and Iwein are both drawn from the Arthurian cycle, and closely follow Chretien de Troyes. In Gregor vom Steine Hartmann depicts worldly passion purified by religious faith. The songs are mainly love songs. F. Bech published a critical edition of Hartmann's collected writings in 1866-69 (3d ed. 1891). See German monographs by Schreyer (1874), L. Schmid (1874), Cassel (1882), Rötkeken (1887), Saran (1889), and Schönbach (1894).

Hartzenbusch, JUAN EUGENIO (1806-80), Spanish dramatic poet, born at Madrid, a German carpenter's son by a Spanish mother, was employed in the national library, of which he became director in 1862. His writings comprise dramas, comedies, dramatic poems, and several volumes of prose. He also edited the plays of Tirso de Molina, Calderon, and Lope de Vega.

Harvard, JOHN (1607-38), born in Southwark, studied at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and in 1637, having married, went out to Charlestown, Mass., where he preached a while, but soon died of consumption. He bequeathed £779 and over 300 volumes to the proposed college since named after him. See monograph by W. Rendle (1885).

Harvey, CHRISTOPHER (1597-1663), a feeble imitator of George Herbert, died vicar of Clifton in Warwickshire. Dr Grosart has edited his works.

Harvey, GABRIEL (c. 1545-1630), a poet and Cambridge don, cantankerous and arrogant, was born and died at Saffron Walden. Dr Grosart has also edited his works.

Harvey, SIR GEORGE (1806-76), was born at St Ninians near Stirling, and settled in Edinburgh in 1823. He was successively A.R.S.A. (1826), R.S.A. (1829), P.R.S.A. (1864), and was knighted in 1867. He painted 'Covenanters Preaching,' 'Battle of Drumclog,' 'A Highland Funeral,' 'Bunyan in Bedford Gaol,' 'Shakespeare before Sir T. Lucy,' 'The Curlers,' and 'Leaving the Manse.'

Harvey, WILLIAM, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood, was born at Folkestone, 1st April 1578. After six years at King's School, Canterbury, in 1593 he entered Caius College, Cambridge, took his degree in 1597, and after studying at Padua, graduated M.D. both there and at Cambridge in 1602, then settled in London as a physician. In 1609 he was appointed physician to St Bartholomew's Hospital, and in 1615 Lulleian Lecturer at the College of Physicians. In 1628 he published his celebrated treatise, Exercitatio Anatomica de Motu Cordis et Sanguinis, in which is expounded his views of the circulation of the blood. Successively physician to James I. and Charles I., he accompanied the Earl of Arundel in his embassy to the emperor in 1636, and publicly demonstrated his theory at Nuremberg. Harvey was present at the battle of Edgehill in attendance on Charles I. (October 23, 1642); afterward he resided at Oxford, being elected warden of Merton College. On the surrender of Oxford to the Parliament in July 1646, he returned to London. During the remainder of his life he was usually the guest of one or other of his brothers. His Exercitationes de Generatione Animalium appeared in 1651. In 1656 he resigned his Lulleian lectureship, and in taking leave of the college presented to it his little estate at Burwash in Sussex. He died 3d June 1657, and was buried at Hempstead near Saffron Walden. In 1883, at the cost of the College of Physicians, his remains were removed from the dilapidated vault to the Harvey Chapel in the same church. Harvey's works in Latin were published in 1766; a translation by Dr Willis appeared in 1847 (new ed. 1881), and his Prælectiones Anatomicae in 1887. See Willis's Life of Harvey (1878), Huxley's Tercentenary discourse (1878), and sketch by D'Arcy Power (1897).

Harvey, WILLIAM (1796-1866), wood-engraver and book-illustrator, was born at Newcastle, and came to London in 1817. See Austin Dobson, Bewick and his Pupils (1884).

Harvey, WILLIAM HENRY (1811-66), from 1856 professor of Botany at Dublin, was born near Limerick, and died at Torquay.

Hase, KARL AUGUST VON (1800-90), theologian, born at Steinbach in Saxony, was expelled from Erlangen University for his connection with the political 'Burschenschaften,' became in 1823 tutor at Tübingen, but after a new trial was imprisoned for ten months. From 1830 to 1883 he was professor of Theology at Jena, after which he was ennobled. His chief writings are Des alten Pfarrers Testament (1824), a handbook of dogmatics (1826), Gnosis (1826-28), Hutterus Redivivus (i.e. Hutter's theology were he alive now, 1828), a Life of Christ (1829; recast 1876), a Church History (1834), Das Leben Jesu (1829), a Life of St Francis (1856), a handbook of Protestant polemical theology (1863), a Life of St Catharine of Siena (1864), and lectures on church history (1880). See his Ideale und Irrthümer, Jugenderinnerungen (5th ed. 1894).

Hassall, ARTHUR HILL, M.D. (1817-94), analyst, in 1877 settled at San Remo.

Haselrig, SIR ARTHUR, one of the Five Members, sat in the Long and Short Parliaments for his native county, Leicestershire, commanded a parliamentary regiment of cuirassiers, and in 1647 became governor of Newcastle. In 1660 he half acquiesced in the Restoration, but died a prisoner in the Tower, 7th January 1661.

Haslewood, JOSEPH (1769-1833), antiquarian editor, by profession a London solicitor.

Hasse, JOHANN ADOLF (1699-1783), composer, born near Hamburg, became famous as 'Il Sassone' through his opera Sesostrate (Naples, 1725); was kapellmeister at Dresden; and in 1733 was brought to London, as representing the Italian school, to head an opposition to Handel. Here Artaserse was produced with success. In 1763 he retired with a pension from Dresden to Vienna, and he died in Venice. He married the Venetian singer, Faustina Bordoni (1693-1786).

Hasted, EDWARD (1732-1812), author of The History of Kent (4 vols. fol. 1778-99).

Hastings, FRANCIS RAWDON-HASTINGS, MARQUIS OF, was born 9th December 1754, and educated at Harrow. He fought with distinction against the revolted Americans 1775-81, rising to be adjutant-general; in 1783 was created Baron Rawdon; in 1790 took the additional surname Hastings; and in 1793 succeeded his father as second Earl of Moira. In 1794 he led reinforcements to the Duke of York at Malines; in 1795 was at Quiberon; and in 1806 became master-general of ordnance, in 1813 governor-general of India and commander of the forces. The chief events of his administration were the wars against the Goorkhas (1816), and against the Pindaris and Mahratas (1817). Created Marquis of Hastings (1816), he encouraged native education and the freedom of the press, reformed the law system, and elevated the civil service. His resignation (1821) was caused by imputations against his public conduct in connection with a banking firm. Appointed governor of Malta (1824), he died in Baia Bay, off Naples, 28th November 1826. See his Private Journal, edited by his daughter (2d ed. 1858); Prinsep's history of his administration (1825); and Major Ross's monograph (1893).

Hastings, WARREN, was born of an old but impoverished family at Churchill, Oxfordshire, 6th December 1732. Educated at Westminster, in 1750 he went out to Calcutta as a writer in the service of the East India Company, was British resident at Murshidabad in 1758-61, and then a member of council at Calcutta. He came home in 1764, in 1769 returned to India as second in council at Madras, and in 1772 became governor of Bengal and president of the council. A year later he was created governor-general, with a council of four members, three appointed from home. The majority in council led by Philip Francis was opposed to Hastings from the first; the finances were in disorder. One of Hastings' first tasks was to bring to trial the two chief fiscal ministers of Bengal on charges of embezzlement; but the case broke down. A corrupt official, Nuncomar (Nand Kumar), who had been employed in conducting it, and who had subsequently brought charges of corruption against Hastings, in 1775 was tried and executed on an old charge of forgery, a proceeding which threw obloquy on Hastings and on the chief-justice, Sir Elijah Impey (q.v.). Hastings made an appraisal of the landed estates, revised the assessment, improved the administration of justice, organised the opium revenue, waged vigorous war with the Maharrattas, and made the Company's power paramount in many parts of India. In 1777 an attempt was made to depose him, which was only frustrated by the action of the Supreme Court; that same year, his first wife having died eighteen years before, he married the divorced wife of Baron Imhoff, a German officer. In 1780 he was freed from embarrassment in the council by the retirement of Philip Francis, whom he wounded in a duel; himself he resigned office in 1784 and sailed for England, where he soon became subject to a parliamentary inquiry with a view to impeachment. Among the charges preferred against him by the Whig opposition were the aid given to the Nawab of Oudh against the Rohilla Afghans, his punishment of the Zemindar of Benares for non-compliance with a demand for aid in the first Maharratta war, and his connivance in the forfeiture of property belonging to the Begums or dowager-princesses of Oudh. On these grounds he was impeached at the bar of the House of Lords, and the trial began 13th February 1788 in Westminster Hall, among the managers for the Commons being Edmund Burke, Fox, Sheridan, the future Lord Minto, and Grey. It occupied more than seven years and 145 sittings. At last, on 23d April 1795, Hastings was acquitted on all the charges, unanimously on all that affected his personal honour. But he left the court a ruined man, the £80,000 that he brought from India having been all but consumed in expenses. The East India Company, however, made generous provision for his declining years; and, at the ancestral seat of Daylesford, Worcestershire, which in 1788 he had bought back in pursuance of his boyhood's ambition, he passed the rest of his life as a country gentleman. He gave evidence before parliamentary committees; the prince-regent in 1814 made him a privy-councillor; and he received honours from the City and from parliament. He died 22d August 1818. See Sir J. F. Stephen's Story of Nuncomar (1885); and Lives and other works by Gleig (1841), Trotter (1878), Lyall (1889), Strachey (1892), Forrest (1892), Malletson (1894), and Lawson (1896).

Hatch, EDWIN, theologian, born at Derby, 4th September 1835, from King Edward's School, Birmingham, passed in 1853 to Pembroke College, Oxford, where he took a second-class in classics in 1857. He was professor of Classics at Toronto 1859-62, then rector of Quebec High School, and vice-principal of St Mary Hall, Oxford, 1867-85. He became rector of Purleigh, Essex, in 1883, and next year reader in Ecclesiastical History at Oxford. His articles in the Dictionary of Christian Antiquities had already attracted attention, when his Bampton Lectures (1880), on The Organisation of the Early Christian Churches, very hostile to High Church claims, established his reputation in England and Germany. In 1888 he delivered a course of Hibbert Lectures on Greek Influence on the Christian Church (1890). Hatch was made D.D. by Edinburgh (1883); published in 1887 The Growth of Church Institutions, Essays in Biblical Greek in 1889; and was working at a Concordance to the Septuagint when he died, 10th November 1889. A collection of religious poetry, Towards Fields of Light (1889) and a volume of sermons, The God of Hope (1890), appeared posthumously. See Memorials by his brother (1890).

Hatchard, JOHN (1768-1849), from 1797 was a London Evangelical publisher. See the Life of him by Humphreys (1893).

Hatfield, JOHN (c. 1758-1803), swindler, forger, and trigamist—his third wife 'Mary of Buttermere'—was hanged at Carlisle.

Hathaway, ANNE. See SHAKESPEARE.

Hatherley, SIR WILLIAM PAGE WOOD, LORD (1801-81), born in London, the son of a Lord Mayor, was educated at Winchester, Geneva, and Trinity College, Cambridge, and called to the bar in 1827. Returned in 1847 as Liberal member for Oxford, he was successively solicitor-general 1851-52, with a knighthood, vice-chancellor, a lord justice in the Appeal Courts, and in 1868-72 lord chancellor, with the title Baron Hatherley. His name is associated with a Bankruptcy Act (1869). He wrote Truth and its Counterfeits (1857) and The Continuity of Scripture (1867-69). See Memoir by his nephew, Dean Stephens (1883).

Hatto, the name of two archbishops of Mainz, one in 891-913, the other 968-970. By some the latter is treated as an excellent man, by others as the hard-hearted and selfish bishop who was eaten by mice, as told in Southey's ballad. Possibly, however, the name of the island castle Mäuseturm, 'Mouse-tower,' is only a corrupted form of Mauth-thurm, 'Toll-tower.' See Baring-Gould's Curious Myths of the Middle Ages (1869) and Max Beheim's Die Mäuseturm-sage (1888).

Hatton, SIR CHRISTOPHER (1540-91), born at Holdenby in Northamptonshire, from Oxford proceeded to the Inner Temple, and by 1564 had won the favour of Queen Elizabeth. In 1571 he entered parliament, in 1587 was appointed lord chancellor. See Life by Harris Nicolas (1847).

Hatton, JOHN LIPTROR, was born at Liverpool, 12th October 1809, and, settling in London in 1832, soon made his name known as a composer. In 1853-59 he was conductor of the Princess's Theatre. He composed numerous operas, cantatas, overtures, entr'actes, &c., but is remembered chiefly for his songs, such as 'Good-bye, Sweetheart,' 'To Anthea,' 'Simon the Cellarer,' &c. He died at Margate, 20th September 1886.

Hatton, JOSEPH (1830-1907), journalist, novelist, and playwright, was born at Andover.

Hauch, HANS CARSTEN (1790-1872), Danish poet, was born at Frederikshald in Norway, and in 1846 was appointed professor of Northern Literature at Kiel. The Holstein revolution (1848) drove him to Copenhagen, and in 1850 he became professor of Æsthetics there. He wrote nine historical tragedies (1828-50), lyrical poems (1842-69), many tales and romances, &c.

Hauff, WILHELM, novelist, born at Stuttgart, 29th November 1802, studied at Tübingen, was for two years a tutor, and had been editor of a paper for nearly a year when he died, 18th November 1827. His Märchen (1826-28) and his Novellen (1828) are admirable for their simplicity and playful fancy—Die Bettlerin vom Pont des Arts and Das Bild des Kaisers almost rival Phantasien im Bremer Rathskeller (1827). Lichtenstein (1826) is an imitation of Scott. Memoiren des Satans (1827) is rich in satiric humour. [Howff.]

Haug, MARTIN (1826-76), Sanskritist, born in Württemberg, was professor at Poona 1859-66, and at Munich from 1868. [Howg.]

Hauréau, JEAN BARTHÉLEMY (1812-96), author of Histoire de la Philosophie Scolastique (1872-81), and works on Poland, Francis I., Charlemagne, &c., was born in Paris, and held posts in the National Library and the National Printing Office.

Hauser, KASPAR, the 'wild boy,' was found in the market-place of Nuremberg on 26th May 1828. Though apparently sixteen years old, his mind was a blank, his behaviour that of a little child. Afterwards he was able to give some account of himself. So long as he could remember he had been in a hole; he was attended by a 'man,' who had at last taught him to stand and walk, and who had brought him to the place where he was found. At first he showed a wonderful quickness of apprehension, but his moral character began to deteriorate, and he was being gradually forgotten, when on 14th December 1833 he was found with a wound in the side, dealt, he said, by 'the man.' Three days later he died. Many have regarded him as an impostor and suicide; others, as of noble birth and the victim of a hideous crime. See the Quarterly (1888), and works by Elizabeth Evans (1892) and the Duchess of Cleveland (1892).

Hausmann, GEORGES EUGÈNE, born in Paris, 27th March 1809, entered the public service, and under Napoleon III. became prefect of the Seine (1853). He then began his task of improving Paris by widening streets, laying out boulevards and parks, building bridges, &c. For these services he was made baron and senator; but the heavy burden (£35,000,000) laid upon the citizens led to his dismissal in 1870. In 1871 he was appointed director of the Crédit Mobilier, in 1881 was elected to the Chamber of Deputies. He died in comparative poverty, 11th Jan. 1891. See his Mémoires (1890-93). Häly, RENÉ JUST (1743-1822), mineralogist, born at St Just, dep. Oise, discovered the geometrical law of crystallisation.—His brother VALENTIN (1746-1822) devoted his life to the education of the blind. [Aw-vee.]

Havelock, SIR HENRY, was born April 5, 1795, at Bishop-Wearmouth, Sunderland, where his father was a merchant and shipbuilder. He was educated at the Charterhouse, and studied for a twelvemonth at the Middle Temple, but entered the army a month after Waterloo, and, going out to India in 1823, was converted during the voyage. He distinguished himself in the Afghan and Sikh wars, and in 1856 commanded a division in Persia. On the outbreak of the Indian mutiny he organised a column of a thousand Highlanders and others at Allahabad with which to relieve Cawnpore and Lucknow, engaged and broke the rebels at Fatehpur, and, driving them before him, entered Cawnpore, and saw the horrors of the massacre. Next crossing the Ganges, he fought eight victorious battles, but through sickness in his little army had to retire upon Cawnpore. In Sept. Outram arrived with reinforcements, and Havelock again advanced, Outram waiving his superior rank, and serving under Havelock as a volunteer. The relieving force engaged the enemy at the Alum Bagh, three miles from Lucknow; next they fought their way to the Residency, where they in turn were besieged until Nov., when Sir Colin Campbell forced his way to their rescue. A week after the relief Havelock, now a K.C.B., died of dysentery, Nov. 22, 1857. The rank of a baronet's widow and a pension were given to his widow, daughter of the Baptist missionary Dr Marshall. The baronetcy was conferred on his son, SIR HENRY HAVELOCK ALLAN, V.C. (1830-97), who from 1874 was a Liberal and Unionist M.P. for Sunderland and S.E. Durham, took the name Allan in 1880, and was killed by Afridis in the Khyber Pass. See Lives of Havelock by Brock (1858), Marshall (1860), and Arch. Forbes (1890).

Havergal, FRANCES RIDLEY (1836-79), hymn-writer, born at Astley Rectory, Nunaton, died near Swansea. Her Poetical Works appeared in 1884. See Memorials (1880) and Letters (1885).

Hawke, EDWARD, LORD (1705-81), born in London, in 1744 commanded the Berwick in the fleet watching the French and Spanish fleets at Toulon; in the disgraceful battle of 11th Feb. she was one of the few ships handled with spirit. In 1747, a rear-admiral of the white, Hawke was despatched with fourteen sail to intercept a French convoy for the West Indies; on 14th Oct. off Cape Finisterre he caused six of the guarding squadron to strike, though the convoy itself escaped. For this he was knighted, and in the same year became M.P. for Bristol. In 1756, now a full admiral, he was sent out to supersede Byng; in 1757-58 he commanded in the Channel. During 1759 the French were preparing fleets at Brest and Rochefort to cover an invasion of England; the Brest fleet of twenty ships was watched by Hawke with a fleet of twenty-three. On 14th November the English fleet was driven off by gales, and the French admiral, De Conflans, slipped out to sea; but Hawke steered to cut him off at Quiberon. On 20th November he caught the French, and, although it was blowing a fresh gale, attacked at once. The result was the destruction of the French fleet and the collapse of the invasion scheme. First Lord of the Admiralty in 1766-71, Hawke in 1776 was made Baron Hawke of Townton. He died at Shepperton, Middlesex. See The Life by Montagu Burrows (1883).

Hawker, ROBERT STEPHEN, was born at Plymouth, 3rd December 1803. His father, then a physician, afterwards took orders; his grandfather, the Rev. Robert Hawker, D.D. (1753-1827), the author of the well-known Morning and Evening Portions, was for fifty years a vicar in Plymouth. He went up to Pembroke College, Oxford in 1823; his father found himself unable to keep him there; but that same autumn he married a lady of fortune and forty-one (Charlotte l'Ans), and with her returned to Oxford. He carried off the Newdigate in 1827, was ordained in 1831, and in 1834 became vicar of Morwenstow, on the Cornish coast. Its parishioners were demoralised by generations of wrecking, smuggling, and spiritual ignorance; but in his forty years' labour he rebuilt the vicarage, restored the church, built a school, and introduced a weekly offertory and a striking ceremonial largely of his own devising. He shared many of the superstitions of his people, as to apparitions and the evil eye. In his poetry Hawker is absolutely delightful. His Tendrils by Reuben, published at seventeen, he did not reprint; but by his Cornish ballads in Records of the Western Shore (1832-36), the Quest of the Sangrael (1863), &c., he showed himself unmistakably a poet. His Footprints of Former Men in Cornwall (1870) was a collection of miscellaneous papers on local traditions. None of Hawker's poems is better known than his spirited ballad based on the old Cornish refrain, 'And shall Trelawny die?' Hawker's wife died in February 1863—a blow that drove him to melancholy and opium, from which he was saved only by the loyalty of his second wife (1864), who bore him three daughters, and nursed his declining years with rare devotion. He died at Plymouth, 15th August 1875, having been admitted twelve hours before to the Roman Catholic communion. There were Lives by Baring-Gould (1875) and Lee (1876); the definitive Life and Letters by his son-in-law, C. E. Byles, appeared in 1905. His Cornish Ballads and other Poems were reprinted in 1904.

Hawkesworth, JOHN, LL.D. (c. 1715-73), born in London, in 1744 succeeded Dr Johnson on the Gentleman's Magazine; and in 1752 started, with Johnson and others, The Adventurer, half of whose 140 numbers were from Hawkesworth's pen. He published a volume of fairy tales (1761), edited Swift, and prepared the account of Captain Cook's first voyage, which formed vols. ii.-iii. of Hawkesworth's Voyages (3 vols. 1773).

Hawkins, BENJAMIN WATERHOUSE (1807-89), naturalist, born in London, died in New York.

Hawkins, A. H. See HOPE, ANTHONY.

Hawkins, EDWARD (1789-1882), born at Bath, was educated at Merchant Taylors' and St John's College, Oxford, and from 1813 was a fellow, from 1828 provost, of Oriel. See Burgon's Twelve Good Men (1888).—His brother, CÆSAR HENRY (1798-1884), was an eminent London surgeon.

Hawkins, HENRY, BARON BRAMPTON (cre. 1890), born at Hitchin, 14th Sept. 1817, and educated at Bedford, became a Q.C. in 1858 and a judge of the High Court of Justice in 1876, the same year being transferred to the Exchequer Division and knighted. He retired in 1898, and died in 1907.

Hawkins, SIR JOHN. See HAWKYNs.

Hawkins, SIR JOHN (1719-89), born in London, and bred an attorney, got £10,000 with his wife (1753); and, becoming a magistrate, was knighted in 1772 for his services in riots in 1768-69. He collected a valuable musical library, and produced in 1776 his History of Music, a tedious work, but of permanent value (reprinted 1876). He was Johnson's literary executor, and published in 1787-89 a Life and an edition of him.—His son, JOHN SIDNEY (1758-1842), published a history of Gothic architecture; his daughter, LETITIA, her own Memoirs (1822), with much about Dr Johnson.

Hawks, FRANCIS LISTER (1798-1866), born at New Berne, N.C., practised law, but in 1827 was ordained to the Episcopal ministry. He was professor of Divinity at Hartford 1830-31, and afterwards rector of churches in New York, New Orleans, and Baltimore. Besides writing works on the Episcopal communion, he edited Appleton's Cyclopædia of Biography (1856), &c.

Hawkshaw, SIR JOHN (1811-91), a civil engineer, knighted in 1873.

Hawksbee, or HAWKSBEe, FRANCIS, physicist, became F.R.S. in 1705, and died soon after 1713. He carried further the observations by Gilbert and Boyle on electricity, inventing the first glass electrical machine; improved the air-pump; contributed forty-three memoirs to the Philosophical Transactions; and published Physico-Mechanical Experiments (1709).—FRANCIS HAWKSBEe, the younger (1687-1763), apparently his son, was also an electrician, and was in 1723 appointed clerk and housekeeper to the Royal Society.

Hawksmoor, NICHOLAS (1661-1736), an architect, much of whose work is at Oxford.

Hawwood, SIR JOHN DE, Italianised ACUTO, an English captain who won both renown and riches as a condottiere in Italy, was born at Sible Hedingham in Essex. He distinguished himself at Crécy and Poitiers, was knighted by Edward III., and in 1360 led a band of mercenaries to Italy, where he at first took service with Pisa against Florence, and fought in various causes, but at last agreed to fight the battles of Florence for an annual pension. He died 17th March 1394. See Temple Leader and Marcotti's Life (Eng. trans. by Mrs Leader Scott, 1889), and Quarterly Review (Jan. 1890).

Hawkins, SIR JOHN (1532-95), born at Plymouth, was the first Englishman to traffic in slaves (1562); his 'commercial' career closed with his disastrous third voyage (1567). He became navy treasurer in 1573, was knighted for his services against the Armada in 1588, and thereafter made havoc of the Spanish West India trade. In 1595, with his kinsman Drake, he commanded an expedition to the Spanish Main, but died at Porto Rico.—His only son, SIR RICHARD HAWKYNs (c. 1562-1622), was also a naval commander, from 1592 to 1602 a prisoner of Spain.

Hawley, HENRY (c. 1679-1759), a weak general, defeated by the Jacobites at Falkirk in 1746.

Hawthorne, NATHANIEL, was born July 4, 1804, at Salem, Mass., the son of a merchant captain, who died when the boy was only four years old; his mother lived afterwards in close retirement and straitened circumstances. At fourteen he went with her to a lonely farm in the woods of Raymond, Maine, and formed there a habit of solitude; at Bowdoin College, where he graduated in 1825, he began his first novel. But his progress was slow. After his return to Salem he shut himself up for twelve years 'in a heavy seclusion,' writing tales and verses. In 1828 he published anonymously his first novel, Fanshawe, which was unsuccessful. Continuing to contribute to annuals and magazines, he edited in 1836 a short-lived periodical for Goodrich, for whom he wrote Peter Parley's Universal History. Meanwhile some of his short stories had gained such favourable notice from the London Athenæum that in 1837 Twice-told Tales, a volume of them, was issued and made his name. His genius, however, was not yet appreciated in his own country; diligent though he was with his pen, he was still unable to live by it. In 1839 the historian Bancroft, then collector of the port of Boston, appointed him weigher and gauger in the custom-house, a post he held until 1841; he then joined for a twelvemonth the Brook Farm idyllic, semi-socialistic community near Boston. Meanwhile he wrote and published a series of simple stories for children from New England history—Grandfather's Chair, Famous Old People, and Liberty Tree (1841). Removing to Concord, Mass., he issued Biographical Stories (1842) for children, and brought out an enlarged edition of the Twice-told Tales (1842). He wrote sketches and studies for the Democratic Review, which formed the Mosses from an Old Manse (1846). The Review failed; and, as he lost all his savings at Brook Farm, he was forced to accept a place in the custom-house again—this time as surveyor in Salem. By the expiration of his term he had completed (1850) The Scarlet Letter, still the best known of his works. At Lenox, Mass., he now entered upon a phase of remarkable productiveness, writing The House of the Seven Gables (1851), The Wonder Book (1851), The Snow Image (1852); and The Blithedale Romance (1852), which drew colouring from the Brook Farm episode. He settled at Concord in 1852, and wrote a Life of General Franklin Pierce, his old college friend. Immediately afterwards he completed Tanglewood Tales (1853), a continuation of The Wonder Book. Pierce, on his inauguration as president in 1853, named Hawthorne consul at Liverpool, where he remained until near the close of 1857. A sojourn of a year and a half in Rome and Florence, beginning in 1858, supplied him with the materials for The Marble Faun (1860), published in England as Transformation. Returning to Concord, he wrote for the Atlantic Monthly the brilliant papers on England collected as Our Old Home (1863). He began a new romance, founded on the idea of an elixir of immortality, which remained unfinished at his death, May 18, 1864, at Plymouth, N.H., whither he had gone in search of health. He was buried at Concord. With little faculty for the harmonies of verse, Hawthorne had a singular command over the musical qualities of prose. Although exceptionally fitted for conveying subtleties of thought and fantasy, his style is equally adapted to the comprehension of children, being invariably clear and strongly marked by common sense. Hawthorne was but slowly recognised in his own country; but his fame has rapidly and steadily increased since his death. One version of the unfinished romance was published by his daughter Una as Septimius Felton (1872); another by his son Julian appeared as Dr Grimshaw's Secret (1883). His widow published his American Note-books (1868), English Note-books (1870), and French and Italian Note-books (1871), besides her own Notes in England and Italy (1868). See the Riverside edition (11 vols. 1883), edited by G. P. Lathrop, who published A Study of Hawthorne (1876); a complete memoir by Julian Hawthorne (1883); and other works by Henry James (1879), Lowell (1890), Moncreu Conway (1890), H. Bridge (1893), and Rose Hawthorne Lathrop (1897).—His son, JULIAN, born at Boston, Mass., June 22, 1846, studied at Harvard; devoted himself to engineering at Dresden; next worked in the New York docks; and returned to Dresden to pursue a life of letters, continued later in England, New York, and Jamaica. His first novels, Bressant (1873) and Idolatry (1874), were followed by Garth (1875), Sebastian Strome (1880), Prince Saroni's Wife (1882), Fortune's Fool (1883), Dust (1884), An American Monte Cristo (1892), Six Cent Sam's (1893), Love is a Spirit (1896), &c.

Hawtrej, EDWARD CRAVEN, D.D. (1789–1862), born at Buryham, Maidenhead, in 1814 became under-master, in 1834 head, and in 1852 provost of Eton. See Life by St John Thackeray (1896).

Hay, GEORGE, D.D. (1729–1811), born in Edinburgh, was a surgeon in Prince Charles Edward's army 1745–46; was converted to Catholicism (1748), and consecrated priest at Rome (1758); laboured in Banffshire till 1767; became a bishop (1769) and vicar apostolic of the Lowlands (1778); and died at Aquhorties, Aberdeenshire. He wrote ten theological works.

Hay, JOHN (1838–1905), born at Salem, Ind., and admitted to the Illinois bar in 1861, was assistant private secretary to President Lincoln, and during the war served for some months. He was secretary of legation at Paris (1865–67) and Madrid (1868–70), and chargé d'affaires at Vienna (1867–68); in 1870–75 on the staff of the New York Tribune; and in 1879–81 first assistant-secretary of state. His Pike County Ballads (1871) include 'Little Breeches' and 'Jim Bludso'; he has also published Castilian Days (1871), The Bread-winner (anon. 1883), and, with Nicolay, a Life of Lincoln (1891). In 1897 he became ambassador to England; in 1898 secretary of state to President McKinley.

Hay, LUCY. See CARLISLE.

Hayden, FERDINAND VANDEVEER, LL.D. (1829–88), geologist, born at Westfield, Mass., in 1853–62 was employed in surveys in the north-west. He served as Federal surgeon during the war, filled the chair of Geology in Pennsylvania University 1865–72, and was subsequently connected with the U.S. geological survey.

Haydn, JOSEPH, composer, was born a poor Croat wheelwright's son, at Rohrau on the confines of Austria and Hungary, 31st March 1732, and until his eighteenth year was a chorister in St Stephen's at Vienna. His voice then broke, and he earned a precarious livelihood by playing the violin. Ultimately he was able to hire an attic and a piano, and devoted all his leisure time to study. One evening, as, with other instrumentalists, he was playing a serenade of his own composition under the window of the wife of a manager, her husband was struck by the music, and commissioned Haydn to write him an opera. That opera made him acquainted with the poet Metastasio, by whom he was introduced to the composer Porpora. In 1750 he composed his first quartet for stringed instruments, in 1759 wrote his First Symphony in D; he was now a popular music-master in Vienna. In 1760 Prince Esterhazy gave him the post of vice-capellmeister. Many of his most beautiful symphonies were written in the prince's service, and the greater number of his magnificent quartets. After the prince's death in 1790 Haydn came to England, where in 1791-92 he produced six of his Twelve Grand Symphonies. In 1794 he made a second engagement in England, and brought out the remaining six symphonies. In England he first obtained full recognition. On his return to Austria he composed his oratorios the Creation and the Seasons. He died at Vienna, 31st May 1809. Haydn's musical style is marked by the predominance of melody; hence his works have more spontaneity and charm than the older school of Bach and Handel, but less massiveness, sublimity, and majesty. He is the father of the symphony, and did more than any other composer to separate instrumental music from vocal as an independent art. See Lives by Reissmann (Berl. 1879), Pohl (Berl. 1875-82, unfinished), Miss Townsend (1884), and W. H. Hadow (1898).

Haydn, JOSEPH, compiler of the Dictionary of Dates (1841; 25th ed. 1910) and other works, died in London, 18th January 1856.

Haydon, BENJAMIN ROBERT, historical painter, was born at Plymouth, 26th January 1786. His father, a bookseller, placed him in his shop, but the boy was resolved to become a painter, and in 1804 he was admitted a student of the Royal Academy. In 1807 he exhibited 'Joseph and Mary resting on the Road to Egypt,' and in 1809, after studying the Elgin Marbles, 'Dentatus,' whose cold reception by the Academy began the painter's feud with that body. His 'Judgment of Solomon' (1814), probably his finest production, he sold for 700 guineas. 'Christ's entry into Jerusalem' (1820) realised £1700 by exhibition in the Egyptian Hall, and is now at Philadelphia. While he was painting 'The Raising of Lazarus,' in 1823, he was arrested for debt, and he was never after free from financial embarrassments: this though he took to portrait-painting, though his 'Mock Election' was purchased by George IV. for 500 guineas, though a public subscription was raised on his behalf, and though he delivered a series of lectures on painting and design (1836; published 1844). In 1832 Lord Grey commissioned 'The Reform Banquet,' and in 1834 the Duke of Sutherland gave 400 guineas for 'Cassandra.' It was a bitter disappointment when he failed to gain employment on the decoration of the Houses of Parliament; under this and other vexations his mind gave way, and on 20th June 1846 he shot himself in his studio. His works are lofty in aim, but very unequal; his execution was seldom equal to his conception. See his Autobiography and Journals, edited by Tom Taylor (1853); and his Correspondence and Table Talk, with a Memoir by his son (1876).

Hayes, AUGUSTUS ALLEN (1806-82), chemist, born at Windsor, Vt., settled in Boston in 1828. He discovered new processes for the manufacture of iron and copper, improved furnaces, boilers, and copper-sheathing for vessels, modified methods of making chloroform and saltpetre, studied the properties of alcohol, guano, sea-water, &c.

Hayes, CATHERINE (1690-1726), was burnt for murdering her husband, a London carpenter. See Thackeray's Catherine in Fraser's (1839-40).

Hayes, CATHERINE (1825-61), operatic and ballad soprano, was born at Limerick, came out at Covent Garden in 1849, and in 1857 married an American, W. A. Bushnell (1823-58).

Hayes, ISAAC ISRAEL (1832-81), Arctic explorer, born in Chester county, Penn., sailed as surgeon in the Kane expedition, 1853-54; see his Arctic Boat-journey (1860). In 1860-61 he conducted a second Arctic expedition, and in 1869 a third one, described in The Land of Desolation (1871). He served in the New York Assembly for five years.

Hayes, RUTHERFORD BIRCHARD, nineteenth president of the United States, was born at Delaware, Ohio, 4th October 1822. He graduated at Kenyon College, Ohio, in 1842; and practised as a lawyer at Cincinnati, 1849-61. In the civil war Hayes served with distinction, retiring as major-general. He was returned to congress from Ohio in 1865 and 1866, and governor in 1867, 1869, and 1875. In 1876 he was Republican candidate for the presidency, the Democratic candidate being Samuel J. Tilden. Some of the electoral votes being disputed, a commission gave them to Hayes, thus securing him a majority. Under the Hayes administration the country recovered commercial prosperity. Features in his policy were reform of the civil service, the conciliation of the southern states, and the resumption of specie payments; but the bill for the monetisation of silver was carried against his veto. He died at Fremont, Ohio, 16th January 1893. See Life by Stoddard (1893).

Hayley, WILLIAM (1745-1820), born at Chichester, wrote verse Essays, plays, Lives of Milton and Romney, and his most memorable monument, The Life of Cowper (1803). See his Memoirs (1823).

Haym, RUDOLF (1821-1901), born at Grünberg in Silesia, in 1848 sat in the Frankfort national assembly, and became professor at Halle in 1860. He wrote biographies of Humboldt (1856), Hegel (1857), Schopenhauer (1864), Herder (1877-85), and Duncker (1891), and a monograph, Die Romantische Schule (1870). [Hinc.]

Haynau, JULIUS JAKOB, BARON VON (1786-1858), born at Cassel, entered the Austrian service in 1801, and signalled himself during the Italian campaign of 1848-49 by his ruthless severity, especially at the capture of Brescia, where his flogging of women gained him the name of the 'Hyæna of Brescia.' From the siege of Venice he was summoned to the supreme military command in Hungary in 1849; and his successes at Raab, Komorn, and Szegedin did much to secure Austrian supremacy, though his atrocious severity excited the detestation of Europe. Appointed dictator of Hungary after its pacification, he was dismissed in 1850, and that same year in London was assaulted and severely handled by Barclay & Perkins's draymen. See the Life of him by Schönhal's (3d ed. Vien. 1875). [Hinc.]

Hayne, ROBERT YOUNG (1791-1839), born in South Carolina, was admitted to the bar in 1812, and served in the war with Great Britain. He became Speaker of the state legislature and attorney-general of the state, and sat in the U.S. senate in 1823-32. He opposed protection, and in 1832 supported the doctrine of Nullification. South Carolina in 1832 adopted an ordinance of nullification, Hayne was elected governor, and the state prepared to resist the federal power by force of arms. A compromise, however, was agreed to, and the ordinance was repealed.—His nephew, PAUL HAMILTON HAYNE (1830-86), the 'Lanreate of the South,' was born at Charleston, and died near Augusta, Ga. His war-songs, sonnets, &c., were collected in 1882.

Hayter, Sir George (1792-1871), portrait and historical painter, was born in London, and knighted in 1842.

Hayward, Abraham, essayist and talker, was born at Wishford, Wiltshire, 31st October 1802, and called to the bar in 1852. He founded and edited the Law Magazine, and was made a Q.C. in 1845. He published in 1833 his prose translation of Faust (part i.), and soon became a busy contributor to the newspapers and magazines, especially the Quarterly. By his brilliant conversation, his whist-playing, and his artistic interest in 'the art of dining' he delighted society almost down to his death, 2d February 1884. Many of his best articles were reprinted in his Biographical and Critical Essays (1858-73) and Eminent Statesmen and Writers (1880). Other books were The Art of Dining (1852), George Selwyn (1856), Autobiography of Mrs Piozzi (1861), Diary of a Lady of Quality (1864), Goethe (1877), and Modern Whist (1878). His Selected Essays appeared in 1878, his Select Correspondence in 1886.

Haywood, Eliza, née Fowler (c. 1693-1736), author of over thirty loose and long-forgotten novels, &c., was born and died in London.

Hazlitt, William, was born at Maidstone, April 10, 1778, the son of a Unitarian minister, who removed to Boston, U.S., in 1783, and to Wem in Shropshire in 1787. The boy was at fifteen sent to Hackney to study for the ministry, but had abandoned the notion when in 1798 he met Coleridge, and by him was encouraged to write Principles of Human Action (1805). Having tried portrait-painting, he published in 1806 his Free Thoughts on Public Affairs, in 1807 his Reply to Malthus, and in 1812, coming up to London from Winterslow near Salisbury, found employment on the Morning Chronicle and Examiner. From 1814 to 1830 he contributed to the Edinburgh Review; his Round Table essays and Characters of Shakespeare's Plays appeared in 1817. Between 1818 and 1821 he delivered at the Surrey Institute his lectures on The English Poets, English Comic Writers, and Dramatic Literature of the Age of Elizabeth. His marriage with Sarah Stoddart in 1808 had proved incongruous, and they got a divorce at Edinburgh in 1822. His essays in the London Magazine were afterwards republished in his Table Talk (1821) and Plain Speaker (1826). A passion for the daughter of a tailor with whom he lodged found expression in the frantic Liber Amoris (1823; new ed. 1894). In 1824 he married a charming widow with £300 a year, who travelled with him to Italy, but left him for ever on the return journey. His Spirit of the Age, or Contemporary Portraits appeared in 1825; his Life of Napoleon Bonaparte in 1828-30. His last years darkened by ill-health and money difficulties, he died in London, Sept. 18, 1830, with the words, 'Well, I've had a happy life.' Hazlitt was one of the deadliest controversialists, a master of epigram and burning invective and withering irony. His style ranges from lively gossip to glowing rhapsody; at its best it touches the high-water mark of English. See the Memoirs by his grandson (1867), A. Birrell's Hazlitt (1902), and the edition of the works edited by Waller and Glover (12 vols. 1902-3).—That grandson, William Carew Hazlitt, born 22d August 1834, was called to the bar, but devoted himself to letters, and has compiled or edited many works; see his Four Generations of a Literary Family (1897).

Head, Sir Edmund Walker (1805-68), born near Maidstone, took a first in classics from Oriel College, Oxford, in 1827, and became a fellow of Merton; in 1838 he succeeded his father as eighth baronet. After serving as poor-law commissioner, he was lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick 1847-54, and then became governor-general of Canada till 1861. He wrote a Hand-book to Spanish and French Painting (1847), Ballads and other Poems (1868), &c.

Head, Sir Francis Bond (1793-1875), born at the Hermitage near Rochester, entered the Royal Engineers, served at Waterloo, and as major retired in 1825. He then took a post in gold and silver mines on the River Plate, and published his spirited Rough Notes (1826) of his travels across the pampas and over the Andes. In 1835-37 he was governor of Upper Canada, where he suppressed an insurrection; in 1836 he was created a baronet. His books include Bubbles from the Brunneys of Nassau, Stokers and Pokers, A Fortnight in Ireland, A Faggot of French Sticks, The Horse and his Rider, and Lives of Bruce 'the Abyssinian' and Sir John Burgoyne.—His brother, Sir George Head (1782-1855), a Peninsular veteran, also wrote books of travel, &c.

Head, Richard (c. 1637-86), a London hack-writer, best known as the author of part i. of The English Rogue (1665-71), the other three parts being by the bookseller Francis Kirkman. Head was born in Ireland, and drowned at sea.

Healy, Timothy Michael, K.C., born at Bantry, 17th May 1855, entered parliament in 1880, headed in 1890 the revolt against Mr Parnell, and himself in 1895 was 'fired out' from the parliamentary committee.

Heaphy, Thomas (1775-1835), a portrait-painter like his son Thomas (1813-73).

Hearn, Lafcadio (1850-1904), son of an Irish army doctor and a Greek girl, was born on the island of Leucadia, trained a journalist in the United States, and becoming a naturalised Japanese, wrote enthusiastically on things Japanese. See his Life by Miss Bisland (1907).

Hearne, Thomas (1678-1735), 'who studied and preserved Antiquities,' was born at White Waltham, Berkshire, graduated from St Edmund Hall, Oxford, and in 1712 became second keeper to the Bodleian Library—a post he had to resign as a Jacobite in 1716. Among his forty-one works were Reliquiae Bodleianae (1703), Leland's Itinerary (1710-12) and Collectanea (1715), Curious Discourses upon English Antiquities (1720); and the editions of Camden's Annals (1717), William of Newburgh (1719), Fordun's Scotichronicon (1722), Robert of Gloucester's Chronicle (1724), and that of Peter Langtoft (1725). The Bibliotheca Hearniana was published in 1845; Reliquiae Hearnianae, by Philip Bliss, in 1857. See his autobiography in the Lives of Leland, Hearne, and Wood (1772), and Doble and Rannie's Collections of Thomas Hearne (Oxf. Hist. Soc. 1884-1902). [Hern.]

Heath, Francis George, born at Totnes, 15th January 1843, entered the Customs branch of the civil service in 1862. He has written on ferns, trees, the peasantry, &c.

Heathfield, George Augustus Eliott, Lord, seventh son of Sir Gilbert Eliott, was born at Stobs in Roxburghshire, on Christmas-day 1717. He was educated at Leyden, the French military college of La Fère, and Woolwich, and served in the war of the Austrian succession and the Seven Years' War and in Cuba (1762), returning lieutenant-general. When, in 1775, Britain became involved in hostilities with Spain, Eliott was sent out to Gibraltar. His heroic defence, from June 1779 to February 1783, ranks as one of the most memorable achievements of British arms. He was in 1787 raised to the peerage as Lord Heathfield, Baron of Gibraltar—Heathfield being a Sussex estate which he had purchased in 1763. He died at Aix-la-Chapelle, 6th July 1790. See Drinkwater's Siege of Gibraltar (1785).

Hebbel, FRIEDRICH (1813–63), lyrical and dramatic poet, was born at Wesselburen in Ditmarsh, and died at Vienna, his home since 1846. His masterpiece is Die Nibelungen (1862). His collected works appeared in 1866–68. See Biographies by Kuh (1877) and Frankl (1884), and Hebbel's Tagebücher (1887).

Heber, REGINALD, born at Malpas, Cheshire, 21st April 1783, entered Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1800, and in 1803 wrote his prize poem Palestine. Inducted into the family-living of Hodnet in Shropshire (1807), he was a frequent contributor to the Quarterly Review, and in 1812 published a volume of Hymns. He was appointed Bampton lecturer in 1815, a prebendary of St Asaph in 1817, and preacher of Lincoln's Inn in 1822. In 1823 he accepted the see of Calcutta; but an episcopate of apostolic zeal was terminated by his sudden death at Trichinopoly, 3d April 1826. He published sermons, A Journey through India, &c., and edited Jeremy Taylor's Works (1822). As a poet, his fame rests upon Palestine and his Hymns, which include 'Lord of Mercy and of Might,' 'From Greenland's Icy Mountains,' 'Holy, Holy, Holy,' and 'The Son of God goes forth to War.' See Lives by his widow (1830) and G. Smith (1895).—His half-brother, RICHARD HEBER (1774–1833), was a famous bibliomaniac. Allibone estimated his collections in England and abroad at 146,827 vols., which had cost him £100,000, and fetched £56,774.

Heberden, WILLIAM (1710–1801), a London physician, like his son WILLIAM (1767–1845).

Hébert, JACQUES RENÉ, 'Père Duchesne,' one of the vilest of the French Revolutionists, was born at Alençon in 1755. A servant in Paris, he was dismissed more than once for embezzlement, but soon after the outbreak of the Revolution became a prominent Jacobin and editor of Le Père Duchesne, established to crush a constitutional newspaper of the same title. As a member of the revolutionary council, he played a conspicuous part in the September massacres. He was on the commission appointed to examine Marie Antoinette, and his name will survive in infamy for one foul and baseless charge he brought against her. He and his fellows were mainly instrumental in converting Notre Dame into a temple of Reason. But he went too fast for Robespierre, who had him guillotined 24th March 1794. See Life by Brunet (Par. 1857). [Ay-bair.]

Hecataeus of Miletus (c. 550–476 B.C.), Greek historian and geographer, visited Greece, Thrace, Persia, and parts of Italy, Spain, and Africa, and wrote the Tour of the World. Of this and of his Histories, a prose version of Greek poetical legends, only fragments remain.

Hecker, FRIEDRICH KARL FRANZ (1811–81), born at Eichtersheim, Baden, became an advocate, headed the republican movement of 1848, with a band of revolutionists invaded Baden, but was defeated and fled to America. In the civil war he commanded a brigade.

Hecker, ISAAC THOMAS (1819–88), the son of New York Germans, passed from Brook Farm socialism to Behmenite mysticism, became a Catholic (1844) and, after studies in England, a Redemptorist Father. Claiming new freedom, he was extruded from that order, but founded 'the Missionary Priests of St Paul,' and greatly extended Catholicism in America. His 'Americanism' or tendency to democratise Catholicism has created much controversy. See his The Church and the Age (1888), and Life by Elliott (1895).

Hecker, JUSTUS FRIEDRICH KARL (1795–1850), professor of Medicine at Berlin, wrote Epidemics of the Middle Ages (trans. 1846), &c.

Hedericus, or HEDERICH, BENJAMIN (1675–1748), schoolmaster at Grossenhain in Saxony from 1705, in 1722 published his Greek lexicon.

Hedin, SIR SVEN ANDERS (knighted 1909), born at Stockholm in 1865, began in 1885 that famous series of travels which resulted in important additions to knowledge concerning Central Asia.

Hedley, WILLIAM (1770–1843), a colliery 'viewer' and lessee, born at Newburn near Newcastle, who in 1813 improved Trevithick's locomotive. See Life by Archer (3d ed. 1885).

Heem, JAN DAVIDSZ VAN (c. 1606–84), born at Utrecht, was one of the Antwerp guild of painters.—His son, CORNELIS (1631–95), was also a painter. [Haym.]

Heer, OSWALD (1809–83), Swiss botanist.

Heeren, ARNOLD HERMANN LUDWIG (1760–1842), born near Bremen, in 1787 became professor of Philosophy, and in 1801 of History, at Göttingen. His first great work was on the politics and commerce of the ancient world (1793–96; Eng. trans. 1833); he also wrote on the study of the classics since the Renaissance (1797–1802), a history of the states of the ancient world (1799; trans. 1840), Political System of Europe and its Colonies (1800; trans. 1834), &c. [Hay-ren.]

Hefele, KARL JOSEPH VON (1800–93), Catholic church historian, born at Unterkochen in Württemberg, became in 1836 privat-docent and in 1840 Catholic professor of Church History at Tübingen. He showed himself a dangerous enemy to the dogma of papal infallibility even after his consecration as bishop of Rottenburg in 1869 by his contributions to the Honorius controversy (1870). But in 1871 he gave in his adhesion to the dogma, with an explanation. He wrote on the conversion of south-west Germany (1837), Ximenes (1844; Eng. trans. 1860), church history (1864–65), &c.; his great work is the Konziliengeschichte (1855–74; 2d ed. 1873–79; Eng. trans. coming down to 787 A.D., 1871–96). [Hayfe-leh.]

Hegel, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH, philosopher, was born at Stuttgart, 27th August 1770, and educated at Tübingen, where he formed an intimate friendship with Schelling. For seven years a private tutor at Berne and Frankfurt, in 1800 he settled at Jena, and next year published an essay on the difference between the philosophies of Fichte and Schelling, in which he sided with the latter, with some divergences. From 1801 to 1806 he continued to teach at Jena, first as privat-docent and then as professor extraordinary, and with Schelling edited the Critical Journal of Philosophy; in one of his latest contributions to it the reasons for his subsequent separation from Schelling are clearly indicated. In 1807 Hegel published the Phenomenology of the Spirit, the first work in which he fully exhibited the depth and independence of his philosophic genius. In consequence of Napoleon's victory, the university of Jena was for a time broken up, and Hegel found employment as the editor of a newspaper at Bamberg. In 1808 he was appointed rector of the gymnasium of Nuremberg, where he remained nine years. In 1811 he married, and in 1812 published the first volume of his greatest work, the Logic, a treatise which treats of what is ordinarily called Logic in connection with Metaphysics. In 1816 his growing fame as a writer secured his nomination to a professorship in Heidelberg; this, two years after, he exchanged for the chair of Philosophy at Berlin, where he died of cholera, 14th November 1831. During these years he published the Philosophy of Right, contributed to the Philosophical Year-book, and was the philosophical dictator of Germany. His lectures, published as the Philosophy of Religion, the Philosophy of Art, the History of Philosophy, and the Philosophy of History, are specially important. Hegel was an Idealist, and maintained that the world of objects is not only related to an intelligence, but that it can be nothing but the revelation or manifestation of intelligence. The material world is an incomplete reality which could not exist by itself; matter is but the necessary object and counterpart of spirit, in which spirit reveals and realises itself. Accepting a doctrine of Evolution or Development, he held that we must take the man as explaining the animal, and the organic as exhibiting what is latent and obscure in the inorganic. Evolution is a progress by antagonism. In order to develop, the principle must manifest itself in different forms, which must inevitably come into conflict with each other, but are ultimately subordinated to the unity which they express. Hegel's philosophy falls into three departments—logic, or the science of thought in its pure unity with itself; the philosophy of nature, in which the ideal principle is shown to underlie even the material world; and the philosophy of spirit. Hegel's collected works appeared in 18 vols. in 1832-45. On his life and philosophy, see German works by Rosenkranz (1855-70), Haym (1857), Köstlin (1870), Schmitt (1888), and Barth (1890); Hutchison Stirling, The Secret of Hegel (1865; 2d ed. 1898); E. Caird, Hegel (1883); Seth, The Development from Kant to Hegel (1882); Hegel's Aesthetic, by Kedney (1883); Hegel's Logic, by W. T. Harris (1890); Hegel's Philosophy of Religion, by A. M. Fairbairn; and Hegel's Philosophy of History and the State, by G. S. Morris (1886-90). There are translations of various works of Hegel by Sibree, Bosanquet, Prof. W. Wallace, Hastie, Dyde, Speirs, Sanderson, and Miss E. S. Haldane.—Hegel's eldest son, KARL (1813-1901), was professor of History successively at Rostock and Erlangen.—Another son, IMMANUEL (1814-91), held high offices under the Prussian government and was leader of the Conservative and High Church party. [Hay-gel; g hard.]

Hegesippus, the earliest Christian church historian, was almost certainly a Jewish convert. He made a journey by way of Corinth to Rome, and there compiled a list of the bishops of Rome to Anicetus (156-167 A.D.), so that he must have written his history about that period. It was entitled Five Memorials of Ecclesiastical Affairs, and unhappily survives only in a few fragments which Eusebius embodied in his own history.

Höhn, VIKTOR (1813-90), a writer on Italy, Goethe, &c., born at Dorpat, died in Berlin. See Lives by Schrader (1891) and Schiennann (1894).

Heiberg, JOHAN LUDVIG (1791-1860), a Danish dramatic poet, like his father, PETER ANDREAS HEIBERG (1758-1841).

Heidegger, JOHN JAMES (c. 1659-1749), opera manager, was the son of a Zurich pastor, and settled in London before 1707.

Heijn, or HEYNS, PIET (1578-1629), born at Delfshaven, after an adventurous career became in 1623 vice-admiral under the Dutch East India Company. In 1624 he defeated the Spaniards near San Salvador in Brazil, and again in 1626 off Bahia, returning with an immense booty. In 1626 he captured the Spanish silver flotilla, valued at 12,000,000 guilders; in 1629 was made Admiral of Holland; and on 20th August fell in a sea-fight against the privateers of Dunkirk.

Heilprin, ANGELO (1853-1907), geologist, was born of Polish ancestry in Hungary, and brought in 1856 to America. In 1885 he became a professor of Geology at Philadelphia.

Heine, HEINRICH, was born of Jewish parents at Düsseldorf, 13th December 1797. At sixteen he was sent to Frankfurt to learn banking, and next tried trading on his own account in Hamburg, but soon failed. In 1819 he went to Bonn; there, and at Berlin and Göttingen, he studied law, taking his doctor's degree in 1825. But his thoughts were given to poetry. At Berlin in 1821 he published Gedichte, which at once arrested attention. A second collection, Lyrisches Intermezzo, appeared in 1823. In 1826-27 the first and second volumes of the Reisebilder were published; and Das Buch der Lieder created excitement throughout Germany. These two works are Heine's masterpieces. Nearly all his writings are of an occasional nature—lyrical, autobiographical, journalistic, polemical—but the genius is always there. In 1825 he had himself baptised, simply to secure the rights of German citizenship and a respectable standing. But by this step he only alienated the esteem of his own people. His revolutionary opinions remained insuperable hindrances to his official employment in Germany. When his enthusiasm was roused by the July revolution in Paris, he hastened thither, going into a voluntary exile from which he never returned. Since 1825 he had travelled in England and Italy; he had worked on newspapers in Bavaria; and he wrote two more volumes of Reisebilder (1830-31). The July revolution seems to have awakened seriousness in Heine. He turned from poetry to politics, and assumed the rôle of leader of the cosmopolitan democratic movement. One of his chief aims was to make the French and the Germans acquainted with one another's intellectual and artistic achievements. Hence sprang the Französische Zustände (1833), first printed in the Allgemeine Zeitung; De l'Allemagne (1835), the French version of Die Romantische Schule (1836); and Philosophie und Literatur in Deutschland, part of the miscellaneous writings entitled Der Salon (4 vols. 1835-40). Heine was always an Ishmael—he would fight under nobody's flag but his own. His ambiguous attitude and his attack on Börne (q.v.) brought down upon him the enmity of his revolutionary compatriots. On the eve of a duel, which his book on Börne (1840) ultimately cost him, he married Eugénie Mirat (d. 9th February 1883), a Paris grisette, with whom he had been living seven years in free love. Then came his rich uncle Solomon's death, and a quarrel with the family, because of their refusal to continue his annuity of 4000 francs; but a compromise was effected in 1847, and the annuity resumed. Since 1844 he had been confined to his bed by spinal paralysis. He lingered on in excruciating pain, borne with heroic patience, until 17th February 1856. During these years of suffering he published Neue Gedichte and Deutschland, a satirical poem (1844); Atta Troll, the 'swan-song of romanticism' (1847); a collection of poems, Romancero (1851); and three volumes of Vermischte Schriften (1854). See the editions by Strodtmann (1861-66), Karpeles (1885 and 1886-87), and Elster (1887), and in French by himself (1852 et seq.); the biographies by Proelss (1886) and Strodtmann (3d ed. 1884); Heines Autobiographie by Karpeles (1888); Heines Familienleben, by his nephew, Baron von Emden (1892; trans. 1893); and Lives by W. Sharp (1888) and Stigand (1875). There are translations by Ackerslos (1854), Wallis (1856), Bowring (1859), Lord Lytton, Stein (1873), Snodgrass (1879; new ed. 1888), Sir Theodore Martin (1879), J. Geikie (1887), Storr (1887), Havelock Ellis (1888), R. M'Clintock (1890), Leland (1891-92), &c. [H'neh.]

Heineccius, JOHANN GOTTLIEB (1681-1741), jurist, was professor at Halle (from 1713), Franeker (1723), and Frankfort-on-the-Oder (1727); but in 1733 returned to Halle. He published in Latin a Syntagma of Roman legal antiquities (1718), a history of the Civil Law (1733), the elements of German law (1735), and a Jus Naturæ et Gentium (1737; Eng. trans. 1763).—His brother, JOHANN MICHAELIS (1674-1722), a famous preacher in Halle, first studied seals scientifically.

Heinse, JOHANN (1749-1803), a German romance-writer and poet. See Life by Schober (1882).

Heinsius, ANTHONY (1641-1720), Dutch statesman, born at Delft, in 1688 became Grand Pensionary of Holland, and was the close friend of William III. (of England).

Heinsius, DANIEL (1580-1655), Dutch classical scholar, born at Ghent, became professor at Leyden. He edited many Latin classics, and published Latin poems and orations.—His son, NICOLAAS (1620-81), obtained distinction as a diplomatic agent and classical scholar.

Hel'ena, saint and empress, originally (according to St Ambrose) a tavern-keeper, a native apparently of Bithynia, not of Trèves or Britain, was first the mistress then the wife of Constantius Chlorus, to whom she bore Constantine the Great. She early became a Christian, but was not baptised till after the defeat of Maxentius. In 326, according to tradition, she visited Jerusalem, and discovered the Holy Sepulchre and the cross. She died at the age of eighty.—Another sainted Helen was the wife of the Russian Grand-duke Igor, and was baptised at Constantinople in 955; a third was a native of West Gothland, and lived in the 12th century.

Heliodorus, earliest and best of the Greek romance writers, was born at Emesa in Syria, and was a sophist of the second half of the 3d century A.D. His Athiopia narrates in poetic prose, at times with almost epic beauty and simplicity, the loves of Theagenes and Chariclea.

Helio-gabalus (204-222 A.D.), emperor of Rome, was born at Emesa. His real name was Varius Avitus Bassianus, but having, when a child, been appointed high-priest of the Syro-Phœnician sun-god Elagabal, he assumed the name of that deity. Soon after the murder of Caracalla (217), Helio-gabalus was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers; he defeated his rival Macrinus on the borders of Syria and Phœnicia in 218. His reign of nearly four years was infamous for his gluttony and unparalleled debaucheries. He was murdered in an insurrection of the prætorians.

Heller, STEPHEN (1813-88), born at Pesth, made his début as a pianist at nine. From 1830, settling in Augsburg, he studied composition; in 1838 he removed to Paris, where he composed and taught until his death. He wrote almost exclusively for the pianoforte; his works consist of sonatas, études, &c. See Life by Barbedette (1876).

Helmholtz, HERMANN VON, one of the world's greatest physicists, was born at Potsdam, 31st August 1821, and was professor of Physiology from 1849 at Königsberg, from 1855 at Bonn, and from 1858 at Heidelberg. In 1871 he became professor of Physics in Berlin. Ennobled in 1883, he died at Charlottenburg, 8th September 1894. Helmholtz was equally distinguished in physiology, mathematics, and experimental and mathematical physics. His physiological works are principally connected with the eye, the ear, and the nervous system. Of a semi-physical nature are his Analysis of the Spectrum, his explanation of Vowel Sounds, and his papers on the Conservation of Energy with reference to Muscular Action. In physical science he is known by his paper on Conservation of Energy (1847); by two memoirs in Crelle's Journal, on Vortex-motion in fluids, and on the Vibrations of Air in open pipes, &c.; and by researches into the development of electric current within a galvanic battery. His Populäre wissenschaftliche Vorträge appeared in 1865-76 (Eng. trans. 1873-81), his work on Die Lehre der Tonempfindungen (trans. 1875) in 1862, and his Wissenschaftliche Abhandlungen in 1881-83. See books by M'Kendrick (1901) and Königsberger (trans. 1907).

Helmont, JEAN BAPTISTE VAN (1577-1644), chemist, born at Brussels, studied medicine, but soon threw himself into mysticism. Then, falling in with the writings of Paracelsus, he began to study chemistry and natural philosophy. In 1605 he married a noble lady of Brabant, and spent the remainder of his life in chemical investigation. Van Helmont first emphasised the use of the balance in chemistry, and by its means showed the indestructibility of matter in chemical changes. He devoted much study to gases, and invented the word gas. He was also the first to take the melting-point of ice and the boiling-point of water as standards for temperature. He first employed the term saturation to signify the combination of an acid with a base; and he was one of the earliest investigators of the chemistry of the fluids of the human body. His works, entitled Ortus Medicinæ, were often reprinted. See French monograph by Rommelaere (1868).—His youngest son, FRANCISCUS MERCURIUS (1614-99), was a teacher of deaf-mutes. See French Life by Broeckx (1870).

Héloise. See ABELARD.

Helps, SIR ARTHUR, essayist and historian, was born at Streatham, 10th July 1813, and, passing from Eton to Trinity College, Cambridge, was thirty-first wrangler in 1835. He became private secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and next to the Irish secretary. On the fall of the Melbourne ministry he retired to enjoy twenty years of lettered leisure. Thoughts in the Cloister and the Crowd (1835) was followed by The Claims of Labour (1844) and Friends in Council (1847-59), discussions on social questions. Then came Realmah (1869) and Talk about Animals and their Masters (1873). Helps's strong interest in the slavery question prompted his Conquerors of the New World and their Bowsmen (1848-52) and The Spanish Conquest in America (1855-61). Other works are biographies of Las Casas (1868), Columbus (1869), Pizarro (1869), Cortes (1871); Thoughts upon Government (1872); and Social Pressure (1875). In 1860 he was appointed Clerk to the Privy-council; and he edited Prince Albert's Speeches and Addresses (1862) and the Queen's Leaves from a Journal of our Life in the Highlands (1868). Made a D.C.L. by Oxford in 1864, a C.B. in 1871, and a K.C.B. in 1872, he died in London 7th March 1875.

Helst, BARTHOLOMÆUS VAN DER (c. 1611-70), Dutch painter, born at Haarlem, was joint-founder in 1653 of the painters' guild of St Luke at Amsterdam, where he attained great celebrity as a portrait-painter.

Helvétius, CLAUDE ADRIEN (1715-71), French Encyclopædist, born at Paris, in 1738 was appointed a farmer-general, and became chamberlain to the queen's household, associating much with the French philosophers of the day. In 1751 he withdrew to a small estate at Voré (Le Perche), where he spent his life in the education of his family, the improvement of his peasantry, and literary labours. In 1758 appeared his De l'Esprit, in which he endeavoured to prove that sensation is the source of all intellectual activity. It was denounced by the Sorbonne and condemned by the parliament of Paris to be publicly burned. Everybody read it, and it was translated into the principal European tongues. Helvétius left behind him a work, De l'Homme (1772). His collected works were published in 1796 and again in 1818. His gifted wife (1719-1800) settled in 1771 at Auteuil. See Morley's Diderot and the Encyclopædists (1878) and French works by Avezac-Lavigne (1875) and Guillois (1894).

Hemans, FELICIA DOROTHEA, née BROWNE, was born, a merchant's daughter, in Liverpool, 25th September 1793, and from 1800 was brought up near Abergele. In 1808-12 she published three volumes of poems, and in 1812 married an Irishman, Captain Hemans, whose health had suffered in the retreat on Corunna and in the Walcheren expedition, and who went to Italy in 1818; they never met afterwards. Mrs Hemans spent the rest of her life in North Wales, Lancashire, and Dublin, where she died, 16th May 1835. Her principal works are The Siege of Valencia (1823), The Forest Sanctuary (1827), Records of Women (1828), Songs of the Affections (1830), Hymns for Childhood (1834), and Scenes and Hymns of Life (1834). A volume of Poetical Remains was published after her death, and a complete edition of her works, with a memoir by her sister, in 1839. Without great originality or force, her poems are yet sweet, natural, and pleasing; and some of her lyrics, The Voice of Spring, The Better Land, The Graves of a Household, The Treasures of the Deep, and The Homes of England, have been exceedingly popular. See Memorials by Chorley (1836), Recollections by Mrs Lawrence (1836), editions with memoirs by Delta (1836) and W. M. Rossetti (1873), and Espinasse's Lancashire Worthies (1874).

Hemsterhuis, TIBERIUS (1685-1766), born at Groningen, became professor of Greek at Franeker in 1720, and of Greek History at Leyden in 1740. One of the greatest Grecians of his time, he created a new school of Greek scholarship. His editions of the Onomasticon of Pollux (1706), of Lucian's Select Dialogues (1708-32), and of Aristophanes' Plutus (1744) are his chief works. See Ruhnken's Elogium Hemsterhusii (1768).—His son, FRANS (1721-90), philosopher and archaeologist, was born at Groningen, and died at the Hague. See French Life by Grucker (1866) and German by E. Meyer (1893). [Hem-ster-hois.]

Henderson, ALEXANDER (c. 1583-1646), born at Creich in Fife, and educated at St Andrews, in 1610 became professor there of Rhetoric and Philosophy, and about 1614 was presented by Archbishop Gladstones to the living of Leuchars.

Although the nominee of a prelate, he soon embraced the popular cause, and became one of its foremost leaders. He is supposed to have had a great share in drawing up the National Covenant; he withstood the lukewarm theologians of Aberdeen; and he was moderator of the memorable General Assembly at Glasgow in 1638, which restored all its liberties to the Kirk of Scotland. In all the negotiations with the king Henderson took a principal part. He was moderator at Edinburgh in 1641 and in 1643, drafted the famous Solemn League and Covenant, and was one of the Scottish commissioners who sat for three years in the Westminster Assembly. See Lives by Aiton (1836) and M'Creie (1846).

Hendricks, THOMAS ANDREWS (1819-85), vice-president of the United States, born in Ohio, was admitted to the Indiana bar in 1843. He served in the state legislature, sat in congress 1851-55, in the U.S. senate 1863-69, and in 1872 became governor of Indiana. In 1876 he was the Democratic candidate for the vice-presidency; in 1884 he was elected along with Cleveland.

Hengist and Horsa, two brothers, said by Nennius and the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle to have led the first band of Teutonic invaders to Britain. They landed from Jutland at Ebbsfleet in the Isle of Thanet in 449 to help King Vortigern against the Picts, and were rewarded with a gift of Thanet. Soon after they turned against Vortigern, but were defeated at Aylesford, where Horsa was slain in 455. Hengist, however, is said to have conquered Kent; he died in 488. Both names mean 'horse.'

Hengler, FREDERICK CHARLES (1820-87), circus manager, born at Cambridge, died at Hampstead.

Hengstenberg, ERNST WILHELM (1802-69), orthodox theologian, born at Fröndenbergl in Westphalia, at Bonn studied Orientalia and philosophy, and took enthusiastic part in the Burschenschaften. At first a rationalist, at Basel (1823) he passed to the opposite extreme, and going next year as privat-docent to Berlin, became the head of a rising orthodox party. In 1826 he was made extra-ordinary, in 1828 ordinary professor; and in 1829 doctor of theology. His Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, begun in 1827, combated rationalism in every form, and sought to restore the orthodoxy of the 16th century. His chief works, all translated into English, were Einleitung ins Alte Testament (1831-39-48), Christologie des Alten Testaments (2d ed. 1854-57), Geschichte des Reiches Gottes unter dem Alten Bunde (1869-70), Ezechiel (1867-68), and Die Bücher Moses und Aegypten (1841), besides commentaries on the Psalm (1842-45), Apocalypse (1850-51), and St John's Gospel (1861-62). Henley, JOHN (1692-1756), 'Orator Henley,' born at Melton-Mowbray vicarage, whilst an undergraduate at Cambridge sent a witty letter to the Spectator (1712), and in 1714 published a fair poem, Esther. He taught in the school of his native town, compiled a grammar of seven languages, The Complete Linguist (1719-21), and was ordained in 1716. But his ambition brought him back to London, where he wrote for the booksellers, and in 1726 set up an 'oratory,' to teach universal knowledge in week-day lectures and primitive Christianity in Sunday sermons. He drew large crowds; but his addresses were a medley of ribaldry and solemnity, wit and absurdity. He was a pensioner of Walpole's to the extent of £100 a year, and edited a weekly paper. His Oratory Transactions contain a Life of himself.

Henley, WILLIAM ERNEST, LL.D., poet, playwright, critic, and editor, was born at Gloucester, 23d August 1849. Months of sickness in Edinburgh Infirmary (1873-75) bore fruit in A Book of Verses (1888), which won much attention, and was followed by Views and Reviews (1890), The Song of the Sword (1892), For England's Sake, Hawthorn and Lavender, &c. He edited the Magazine of Art, the Scots (or National) Observer, and the New Review, besides (with another) a Burns; and he collaborated with R. L. Stevenson in three plays, Deacon Brodie, Beau Austin, and Admiral Guinea (reprinted 1892). He died 11th July 1903.

Hennessey, SIR JOHN POPE, K.C.M.G. (1834-91), Irish M.P. and colonial governor, was born at Cork.

Henningsen, CHARLES FREDERICK (1815-77), born in England of Swedish parentage, served with the Carlists in Spain, with the Russians in Circassia, with Kossuth in Hungary, and with Walker in Nicaragua. In the American civil war he commanded a Confederate brigade, and afterwards superintended the manufacture of Minié rifles. He wrote The White Slave (1845), The Past and Future of Hungary (1852), &c.

Henrietta Maria, born at the Louvre, 25th November 1609, was the youngest child of Henry IV. of France, whose assassination six months afterwards left the babe to the unwise upbringing of her mother, Marie de' Medici. A lovely little thing, bright of eye and wit, but spoilt and wayward, she was married in 1625 to Charles I., and evinced her bigotry by refusing to share in her husband's coronation. The dismissal, however, of her French attendants and the murder of Buckingham removed two conflicting causes of jealousy; and for ten years Henrietta might call herself 'the happiest woman in the world.' But she was the best-hated woman in England. Stratford fallen, and herself menaced with impeachment, in February 1642 she repaired to Holland, and there raised £2,000,000. A year later she landed at Bridlington, and met Charles near Edgehill. On 3d April 1644 they separated at Abingdon, never to meet. At Exeter, on 16th June, she gave birth to a daughter; a fortnight later she had to fly to France. A liberal allowance was assigned her, but she pinched herself to send remittances to England; and the war of the Fronde (1648) reduced her for a time to destitution. The story of her secret marriage to her confidant, Henry Lord Jernyn (afterwards Earl of St Albans), rests solely on gossip. After the Restoration she paid two visits to England, in 1660-61 and 1662-65. She died 31st August 1669. See CHARLES I. and works there cited; also Strickland's Queens of England (new ed. vol. v. 1851) and Baillon's Henriette Marie de France (2d ed. 1884).—HENRIETTA, DUCHESS OF ORLEANS, Charles I.'s youngest child, was born 16th June 1644. Her mother, Henrietta Maria, had to leave her behind at Exeter, which in April 1646 was taken by Fairfax; but three months afterwards, disguised as a French beggar-woman, her governess, Lady Dalkeith, escaped with her from Oatlands to Calais. Her mother brought her up a Catholic. In 1661 she was married to Louis XIV.'s only brother, Philip, Duke of Orleans; 'of all the love he had borne her there soon remained nothing but jealousy.' As Louis's ambassadress in 1670 she wheedled Charles II. into signing the secret treaty of Dover; and she had been back in France about a fortnight, when on 30th June she died, almost certainly of poison, but possibly without her husband's cognisance. See CHARLES

II. and works there cited; and Lives by Mdme. de la Fayette (1720; new ed. by Anatole France, 1882), Mrs Everett Green (Princesses of England, vol. vi. 1855), Baillon (2d ed. 1887), and Julia Cartwright (1893).

Henriot, FRANÇOIS (1761-94), spy, thief, and revolutionist, was born at Nanterre near Paris, and himself at last was happily guillotined.

Henry I., king of England, youngest and only English-born son of William the Conqueror, was born in 1068, traditionally at Selby. When war broke out between his brothers, William Rufus and Robert of Normandy, Henry helped the latter to defend Normandy; yet in the treaty which followed (1091) he was excluded from the succession. Immediately after William's death (2d August 1100) Henry seized the royal treasure, and was elected king by the Witan. He issued a charter restoring the laws of Edward the Confessor and the Conqueror, recalled Anselm, and set about great and popular reforms in the administration of justice. He strengthened his position by a marriage with Eadgyth (Matilda), daughter of Malcolm of Scotland and Queen Margaret, who was descended from the old English royal house. Robert had been granted a pension of 3000 marks to resign his claim to the English crown, but in 1105-6 Henry made war against his badly-governed duchy; Robert was defeated at Tinchebrai, September 28, 1106, and was kept a prisoner for life (28 years). To hold Normandy Henry was obliged to wage nearly constant warfare. The French king took part with William, Robert's youthful son; but the first war ended in the favourable peace of Gisors (1113); and in 1114 his daughter Matilda was married to the Emperor Henry V. The second war (1116-20) was marked by the defeat of the French king at Noyon in 1119, and Henry was able to satisfy the pope, who succeeded in bringing about a peace. In 1120 Henry's only legitimate son, William, was drowned on his way from Normandy to England. A fresh rebellion in Normandy ended in the battle of Bourgtheroulde (1124). In 1126 Matilda, now a widow, came back from Germany; Henry made the barons swear to receive her as Lady of England; and the same year she was married to Geoffrey Plantagenet, son of the Count of Anjou. Henry died near Ronen, December 1, 1135, and the crown was seized by his sister Adela's son, Stephen of Blois. Henry I. was posthumously styled Beauclerc, or the Scholar, in honour of his learning, which was considerable for a king in his age. Able he was, but crafty, consistent, passionless in his policy, and often guilty of acts of cold-blooded cruelty. Law was administered during his reign with strictness, and the mass of his subjects reaped the blessings of his firm rule. See Freeman's Norman Conquest, vol. v.; Stubbs's Constitutional History, vol. i.; and Dean Church's Saint Anselm (1870).

Henry II., the son of Matilda, Henry I.'s daughter, and her second husband, Geoffrey Plantagenet, was born at Le Mans, March 5, 1133. At eighteen he was invested with the duchy of Normandy, his mother's heritage, and within a year after became also, by his father's death, Count of Anjou; while in 1152 his marriage with Eleanor of Aquitaine, the divorced wife of Louis VII., added Poitou and Guienne to his dominions. In January 1153 he landed in England, and in November a treaty was agreed to whereby Henry was declared the successor of Stephen; he was crowned in 1154. He confirmed his grandfather's laws, re-established the exchequer, banished the foreign mercenaries, demolished the hundreds of castles erected in Stephen's reign, and recovered the royal estates. The whole of 1156 he spent in France, reducing his brother, Geoffrey of Nantes, who died in 1158, and, having secured his territories, he spent the next five years warring and organising his possessions on the Continent. Henry's object was that of all the Norman kings—to build up the royal power at the expense of the barons and of the church. From the barons his reforms met with little serious opposition; with the clergy he was less successful. To aid him in reducing the church to subjection, he appointed his chancellor, Becket (q.v.), to the see of Canterbury. Henry compelled him and the other prelates to agree to the 'Constitutions of Clarendon,' but Becket proved a sturdy churchman, and the struggle between him and his monarch was terminated only by his murder. In 1174 Henry did penance at Becket's tomb, but he ended by bringing the church to subordination in civil matters. Meanwhile he organised an expedition to Ireland. The English pope Adrian IV. had in 1155 given Henry authority over the entire island; and a number of Norman-Welsh knights had gained a footing in the country—among them Richard de Clare, Earl of Pembroke, nicknamed Strongbow, who in 1170 married the heiress of Leinster and assumed rule as the Earl of Leinster. Henry was jealous of the rise of a powerful feudal baronage in Ireland, and during his stay there (1171-72) he broke the power of Strongbow and the other nobles. In 1185 Prince John was appointed king of Ireland. But before the end of 1186 he was driven from the country, and all was left in confusion. The eldest of Henry's sons had died in childhood; the second, Henry, born in 1155, was crowned as his father's associate and successor in 1170. In 1173, incited by their jealous mother, Queen Eleanor, the prince and his brother Richard rebelled against their father, and their cause was espoused by the kings of France and Scotland. The latter, William the Lion, was ravaging the north of England when he was taken prisoner at Alnwick in 1174, and to obtain his liberty he submitted to do homage to Henry. In a few months Henry had re-established his authority in all his dominions. During a second rebellion Prince Henry died; and in 1185 Geoffrey, the next son, was killed in a tournament at Paris. In 1188, while Henry was engaged in a war with Philip of France, Richard joined the French king; and in 1189, Henry, having lost Le Mans and the chief castles of Maine, agreed to a treaty of peace granting an indemnity to the followers of Richard. The sight of the name of his favourite son John in the list broke his heart; he died at Chinon 6th July 1189. Upon the whole, Henry was an able and enlightened sovereign, a clear-headed, unprincipled politician, and an able general; his reign was one of great legal reforms. Fair Rosamond (see CLIFFORD) was said to have borne him two sons, William Longsword, Earl of Salisbury, and Geoffrey, who became Archbishop of York, but this is quite improbable. See Freeman and Stubbs, and the Life by Mrs Green (1888).

Henry III. was born at Winchester, 1st October 1207, and succeeded his father, King John, in 1216. In 1227 he declared himself of age; in 1232 he deprived Hubert de Burgh, who had ruled as regent and justiciary, of all his offices; and in 1234 he took the administration into his own hands. A war with France cost him Poitou, and might have cost him all his continental possessions but for the generosity of Louis IX. He reissued the Great Charter, with omissions; and he confirmed it more than once as a condition of a money grant. He was beset with favourites; his misrule and extortion roused all classes, and in 1258 parliament, headed by his brother-in-law, Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, forced him to agree to the Provisions of Oxford, transferring his power to a commission of barons. But disunion among the barons enabled Henry to repudiate his oath, and after a brief war (1263) the matter was referred to Louis of France, who annulled the Provisions. De Montfort and his party took up arms against the king, defeated him, made him prisoner at Lewes (1264), and forced him to the humiliating agreement called the Mise of Lewes. Earl Simon now summoned the parliament (January 1265), the first in which boroughs were represented. Within a year the Earl of Gloucester deserted Montfort, and, with Prince Edward, defeated and slew Montfort at Evesham (1265). Henry died at Westminster, 16th Nov. 1272. See Freeman and Stubbs; works cited at MONTFORT; and Richardson's National Movement under Henry III. (1897).

Henry IV., the first king of the House of Lancaster, was born 3d April 1367, the son of John of Gaunt, and was surnamed Bolingbroke, from his birthplace in Lincolnshire. His father was fourth son of Edward III., his mother daughter of Duke Henry of Lancaster. In 1386 Henry married the rich heiress, Mary de Bohun. In 1397 he supported Richard II. against the Duke of Gloucester, and was created Duke of Hereford; in 1398 he was banished, and in 1399, when his father died, his estates were declared forfeit to Richard. In July Henry landed at Ravenspur in Yorkshire; on September 29 he induced Richard, deserted and betrayed, to sign a renunciation of his claims; thereupon he had himself crowned; and four months later Richard died, of starvation probably, in Pontefract Castle, January 1400. During Henry's reign rebellion and lawlessness were rife, and frequent descents were made upon the coast by expeditions from France. The king's movements were constantly hampered for want of money, and 'war treasurers' were ultimately appointed by the impatient Commons to watch the disbursement of the sums voted. In 1404 parliament proposed to confiscate the property of the clergy; but Henry not only discountenanced all such proposals, but permitted severe enactments against heretics. In 1401 William Chatrys was burnt for heresy at Smithfield. Under Owen Glendower the Welsh maintained their independence throughout this reign. Scotland Henry invaded in 1400, besieging Edinburgh Castle until compelled by famine to retire. In 1402, while Henry was engaged against the Welsh, the Scots made an irruption into Northumberland; but they were encountered by the Earl of Northumberland and his son Harry Percy, and were defeated (14th September) at Humbleton (or Homildon), where Douglas was taken prisoner. Harry Percy (Hotspur) and his house shortly after leagued with Douglas and Glendower against Henry; but the king met the Percies at Shrewsbury (21st July 1403), where they were utterly defeated, Hotspur slain, and Douglas again taken prisoner. In 1406 Prince James of Scotland (afterwards James I.) was captured on his way to France, and was detained and educated in England. The civil wars in France gave Henry an opportunity to send two expeditions (1411-12) thither; but in his later years he was a miserable invalid, afflicted with epileptic fits.

He died in the Jerusalem Chamber at Westminster, 20th March 1413. Latterly he had been cruel, vindictive, suspicious, and irresolute. See Stubbs, vol. iii.; Gairdner's Houses of Lancaster and York (1874); and Wylie, History of England under Henry the Fourth (4 vols. 1854-98).

Henry V. was born at Monmouth, 9th August 1387, the eldest of the six children of Henry IV. by Mary de Bohun, and in 1399 was created Prince of Wales. From 1401 to 1408 he was engaged against Glendower and the Welsh rebels; in 1409 he became constable of Dover, and in 1410 captain of Calais. To this time belong the exaggerated stories of his wild youth. He was crowned on 10th April 1413, and at the outset of his reign liberated the young Earl of March, the true heir to the crown, restored Hotspur's son to his father's lands and honours, and had Richard II.'s body buried in Westminster. The great effort of his reign was an attempted conquest of France; and in 1414 he demanded the French crown, to which he seems to have believed that he had a valid claim through his great-grandfather, Edward III. In August 1415 he sailed with an army of 30,000 men, and on 22d September took Harfleur. On 25th October, at Agincourt, he gained a battle against such odds as to make his victory one of the most notable in history. Two years after he again invaded France, and by the end of 1418 Normandy was once more subject to the English crown. In 1420 was concluded the 'perpetual peace' of Troyes, under which Henry was recognised as regent and 'heir of France,' and married the French king's daughter, Catharine of Valois (q.v.). In February 1421 he took his young queen to England to be crowned; but in a month he was recalled by news of the defeat at Beaugé of his brother, the Duke of Clarence. Henry's wonted success was attending him, when he was seized with illness, and died at Vincennes, 31st August 1422, leaving an infant to succeed him. Henry was devout, just, and pure of life; yet his religion did not make him merciful to a conquered enemy; and, like his father, he persecuted the Lollards. See Stubbs, Gairdner's Lancaster and York, and A. J. Church's Henry V. (1889).

Henry VI., only child of Henry V. and Catharine of France, was born at Windsor, 6th December 1421. During his minority his uncle, the Duke of Bedford, was appointed to govern France, and another uncle, Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, to be protector of England, with a council appointed by parliament. In France, the incapable Charles VI. having died, the dauphin assumed the title of Charles VII., but his army was almost annihilated by the English at Verneuil (1424). In 1429 the siege of Orleans was raised by the French, inspired by Joan of Arc, and after this the English power declined steadily. Henry was crowned king of England in 1429, and king of France at Paris in 1431. Bedford, the only great English leader, died in 1435; Paris was recovered by the dauphin in 1436, Normandy was lost in 1450; and in 1453 the English were expelled from all France (Calais excepted). In 1445 Henry married the strong-minded Margaret of Anjou; in 1447 the Beaufort party and she had Gloucester arrested for treason; and five days later he was found dead in his bed, but there is no proof that he was murdered. Jack Cade (q.v.) obtained temporary possession of London, but was soon captured and executed. As a descendant of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, Edward III.'s third son, Richard, Duke of York, had a better title to the crown than Henry; in 1454, when the latter's weak mind was entirely eclipsed, he was appointed protector by parliament. On the king's recovery York levied an army to maintain his power, and at St Albans (1455) the Yorkists were victors and the king taken prisoner. This was the first of twelve battles between the Houses of York and Lancaster in the Wars of the Roses. A return of Henry's disorder made York again protector in 1455-56; and on his recovery Henry vainly strove to maintain peace between the factions. Margaret headed the Lancastrian forces; but in 1461 Edward IV. was proclaimed king, and in 1465 Henry was captured and committed to the Tower. In 1470 Warwick restored him to the throne, but six months after he was again in Edward's hands; and at Tewkesbury (4th May 1471) his son was slain and Margaret taken prisoner. Edward returned to London on 21st May; and that night Henry was murdered. Margaret was ransomed by Louis XI. in 1475, and returned to France. Henry, the 'royal saint,' founded Eton and King's College, Cambridge. See Stubbs, Gairdner's Lancaster and York, and his introduction to the Paston Letters (1872).

Henry VII., founder of the Tudor dynasty, was born at Pembroke Castle, January 28, 1457. His father, Edmund Tudor, was the son of Owen Tudor, a knight of Wales, and of his wife, Queen Catharine, widow of Henry V.; he had been created Earl of Richmond by his half-brother, Henry VI. His mother, Margaret Beaufort, was the lineal representative of the House of Lancaster, being descended from John of Gaunt and Catharine Swinford. After Tewkesbury fight (1471) he found asylum in Brittany, but in August 1485 he landed at Milford Haven, and at Bosworth defeated and slew Richard III. Henry now ascended the throne; and in the following January married Elizabeth of York, Edward IV.'s eldest daughter, by which the White Rose and the Red were united. The two pretenders, Lambert Simnel (q.v.) and Perkin Warbeck (q.v.), were captured in 1487 and 1497. In 1492 Henry invaded France, but was bought off with a promise of 745,000 crowns; his diplomacy gave him an influence in continental politics greater than that of any earlier king of England. Ferdinand and Isabella's daughter, Catharine of Aragon, was married to his son Arthur, Prince of Wales, a boy of fifteen, just before he died; and was thereafter betrothed to his next son, who became Henry VIII. The marriage of his elder daughter, Margaret, to James IV. of Scotland brought about the union of the crowns. In February 1503 Henry's queen died, and he was engaged in looking out for a second wife, with a sufficiently large dowry, when he died at Richmond, April 21, 1509, leaving behind him £1,800,000, worth £18,000,000 now. He was a lover of peace, the friend of the church, the patron of scholarship and architecture as well as of commerce and adventure. Under him the trading-class became powerful; and the extortions of his lawyers, Dudley and Empson, did not touch the great mass of the people. See Bacon's History of Henry VII., Gairdner's Henry VII. (1889), and a German work by W. Busch (1893).

Henry VIII., second son of Henry VII., was born at Greenwich, 28th June 1491, and ascended the throne in 1509. During the first years of his reign he held a place in the hearts of his people such as no other king has held before or since. In his earlier manhood he was accounted the handsomest and most accomplished prince of his time; and his accession to the throne was hailed with delight by such men as Colet, Erasmus, and More. Seven weeks later Henry married Catharine of Aragon, his brother Arthur's widow—a step of tremendous consequence. As a member of the Holy League, formed by the pope and Spain against Louis XII., he in 1512 invaded France, and next year won the so-called Battle of Spurs, and captured Terouenne and Tournay. During his absence a greater triumph was gained in the defeat of the Scots at Flodden. It was in this French war that Wolsey became prominent. So early as 1514 he was, after the king, the first man in the country. The chief aim of Wolsey and his master was to hold in equipoise France and Spain, and to win for England as arbiter an importance to which her own resources hardly entitled her. The support of England was accordingly till 1525 given to Spain against France. The struggle between Charles V. and Francis proceeded with varying success till, in 1525, Francis was brought to the verge of ruin by his defeat and capture at Pavia. As the ascendancy thus gained by the emperor endangered the balance of power, England was now thrown into alliance with France. In 1521 the Duke of Buckingham, a descendant of Edward III., was executed on an almost groundless charge of treason. The same year Henry published his famous book on the Sacraments in reply to Luther, and received from Pope Leo X. the title borne by all Henry's successors, 'Defender of the Faith.' To enable him to play his part in continental affairs, Henry had frequent need of heavy supplies; and Wolsey took on himself all the odium of excessive taxation. Wolsey made himself still further odious by the suppression of all monasteries with less than seven inmates, devoting the revenues to educational purposes. In 1525 Henry's expensive foreign policy again brought him into straits, and Wolsey proposed an illegal tax, the Amicable Loan; it met with the strongest opposition, and Wolsey was forced to abandon it. The turning-point in Henry's reign is the moment when he determined that his marriage with Catharine of Aragon must be dissolved. All her children, except Mary, had died in infancy, and Henry professed to see in this the judgment of Heaven on an unnatural alliance; any doubt of the legitimacy of Mary might lead to a renewal of the civil wars; further, Henry had set his affections on Anne Boleyn, a niece of the Duke of Norfolk. Pope Clement VII. was at first disposed to humour Henry, and in 1528 sent Cardinal Campeggio to England to try the validity of the marriage. The visit settled nothing; and the pope, under pressure from the emperor, revoked the case to the Roman curia. This impotent conclusion was the ruin of Wolsey, who now found himself without a friend at home or abroad. In 1529 he was stripped of his goods and honours, and dismissed in disgrace; next year he was summoned to London on a charge of high-treason, but died on the way. Despite the coldness of the pope, Henry was as determined as ever on the divorce, and by humbling the clergy he thought he could bring the pope to terms. In 1531 the whole body of the clergy, on the same grounds as Wolsey, were declared guilty of treason under the law of premunire, and purchased pardon only by the payment of £118,840. He extorted from them his recognition as 'protector and supreme head of the church and clergy of England,' and in 1532 abolished the annates paid to the pope. Sir Thomas More, who had succeeded to the chancellorship, and who saw the inevitable end of Henry's policy, prayed to be relieved of the Great Seal. In further defiance of Rome, Henry (1533) was privately married to Anne Boleyn. In 1534 it was enacted that all bishops should be appointed by a congé d'élire from the crown, and that all recourse to the bishop of Rome should be illegal. It was also enacted that the king's marriage with Catharine was invalid, that the succession to the crown should lie with the issue of Henry's marriage with Anne Boleyn, and that the king was the sole supreme head of the Church of England. To this last act Bishop Fisher and Sir Thomas More refused to swear, and both were executed next year. The supporters of Luther were treated with the same severity as those of the old church who refused to acknowledge the king in the place of the pope. To show that his quarrel was with the pope and not the church, and to proclaim his soundness in doctrine, Henry ordered (1537) the publication of the Bishops' Book or the Institution of a Christian Man, strictly orthodox save on the headship of the pope. In the famous Statute of the Six Articles, known as the Bloody Statute, all the fundamental doctrines of the Church of Rome are insisted on, with the severest penalties, as necessary articles of belief (1539). In 1535 Henry appointed a commission under Thomas Cromwell to report on the state of the monasteries for the guidance of parliament; and the document seemed to justify the most drastic dealing. An act was passed for the suppression of all monasteries with a revenue under £200 a year—a high-handed and unpopular step. This, together with the fact that everywhere there was much misery by reason of the land being extensively converted from agricultural to pastoral purposes, caused, the year after the suppression of the smaller monasteries, a formidable insurrection in the northern counties, known as the Pilgrimage of Grace. The revolt was crushed, and Henry next (1536) suppressed all the remaining monasteries. The bulk of the revenues passed to the crown and to those who had made themselves useful to the king. In 1536 Queen Catharine died, and the same year Anne Boleyn herself was executed for infidelity. The day after her execution Henry was betrothed to Jane Seymour (c. 1509–37), who died leaving a son, afterwards Edward VI. Anne of Cleves was chosen as the king's fourth wife, in the hope of attaching the Protestant interest of Germany. Anne's personal appearance proved so little to Henry's taste that he consented to the marriage only on the condition that a divorce should follow speedily. Cromwell had made himself as generally detested as Wolsey. It was mainly through his action that Anne had been brought forward, and his enemies used Henry's indignation to effect his ruin. Accused of high-treason by the Duke of Norfolk, he was executed on a bill of attainder, without a trial (1540); and Henry married Catharine Howard, another niece of the Catholic Duke of Norfolk. Before two years had passed Catharine suffered the same fate as Anne Boleyn, on the same charge; and in July 1543 Henry married his sixth wife, Catharine Parr, widow of Lord Latimer, who was happy enough to survive him. During all these years Henry's interest in the struggle between Francis and the emperor had been kept alive by the intrigues of France in Scotland. At length Henry and Francis concluded a peace (1546), of which Scotland also had the benefit. The execution of the young Earl of Surrey, son of the Duke of Norfolk, on a charge of high-treason, completes the long list of the judicial murders of Henry's reign. Norfolk himself was saved from the same fate only by the death of Henry himself, January 28, 1547. Henry is apt to be judged simply as an unnatural monster, influenced by motives of cruelty and lust. Yet from first to last he was popular with all ranks of his people, and he inspired the most devoted affection of those in immediate contact with him. In point of personal morals he was pure compared with Francis and James V. of Scotland; even in the shedding of blood he was merciful compared with Francis. Only a prince of the most imperious will could have effected the great ecclesiastical revolution. See Froude's History of England (vols. i.-iv.), Brewer's Henry VIII. (ed. Gairdner, 1884), Creighton's Wolsey (1888), Gasquet's Dissolution of the English Monasteries (1889), A. F. Henry, PRINCE. See HENRY FREDERICK.

Henry THE LION (1129-95), Duke of Saxony and Bavaria, was the head of the Guelphs. After Bavaria (taken from his father) was restored to him (1154) by the Emperor Frederick I., his possessions extended from the North Sea and the Baltic to the Adriatic. His power and ambitious designs roused against him a league of princes in 1166; but Henry was able to make head against his enemies till the emperor, alarmed, deprived him of his dominions and placed him under the ban of the empire in 1180. Ultimately he was reconciled to Frederick's successor, Henry VI. He encouraged agriculture and trade, fostered the commerce of Hamburg and Lübeck, and was the founder of Munich.

Henry III. (1017-56), emperor, son of Conrad II., became king of the Germans in 1026, Duke of Bavaria in 1027, Duke of Swabia in 1038, and emperor in 1039. He resolutely maintained the imperial prerogatives of power, and encouraged the efforts of the Clugniac monks to reform the ecclesiastical system of Europe. In 1046 he put an end to the intrigues of the three rival popes by deposing all three and electing Clement II. in their stead. In 1042 he compelled the Duke of Bohemia to acknowledge himself a vassal of the empire. By repeated campaigns in Hungary he established the supremacy of the empire in 1044. Henry also stretched his authority over the Norman conquerors of Apulia and Calabria. He promoted learning and the arts, founded numerous monastic schools, and built many great churches. See German monograph by Steindorff (1874-81).

Henry IV. (1050-1106), emperor, elected king of the Germans in 1054, succeeded his father, Henry III., in 1056, his mother being regent. About 1070 he began to act for himself. His first care was to break the power of the nobles; but his measures provoked a rising of the Saxons, who in 1074 forced upon Henry humiliating terms. In 1075 he defeated them at Hohenburg, and then proceeded to take vengeance upon the princes, secular and ecclesiastical, who had opposed him. The case of the latter gave Pope Gregory VII. a pretext to interfere in the affairs of Germany. This was the beginning of the great duel between pope and emperor already recorded under Gregory VII. In 1076 Henry declared the pontiff deposed. Gregory retaliated by excommunicating Henry. The king, seeing his vassals and princes falling away from him, hastened to Italy to make submission at Canossa as a humble penitent, and in January 1077 the ban of excommunication was removed. Having found adherents among the Lombards, Henry renewed the conflict, but was again excommunicated. He thereupon appointed a new pope, Clement III., hastened over the Alps and besieged Rome, and in 1084 caused himself to be crowned emperor by the antipope. In Germany, during Henry's absence, three rival kings of the Germans successively found support. But Henry managed to triumph over them all. He had crossed the Alps for the third time (1090) to support Clement III., when he learned that his son Conrad had joined his enemies and been crowned king at Monza. Disheartened, he retired to Lombardy in despair, but at length returned (1097) to Germany. His second son, Henry, was elected king of the Germans and heir to the empire. This prince, however, was induced to rebel by Pope Pascal II.; he took the emperor prisoner, and compelled him to abdicate. The emperor escaped and found safety at Liège, where he died, August 7, 1106. See German monographs by Floto (1855-57), Kilian (1886), and Meyer von Knonau (1890 et seq.).

Henry II., king of France, born 31st March 1519, married Catharine de' Medici in 1533, and succeeded his father, Francis I., in 1547. Immediately after his accession he proceeded to oppress his Protestant subjects. Through the influence of the Guises he formed an alliance with Scotland, and declared war against England, which ended in 1558 with the taking of Calais, after that city had been 210 years an English possession. In 1552 he formed alliances with the German Reformers, and sent an army to aid Maurice of Saxony against the emperor. His troops captured Toul and Verdun, while Montmorency seized Metz. In 1557 Guise's design to conquer Naples was frustrated by the generalship of Alva, whilst in the Low Countries Montmorency sustained a crushing defeat at St Quentin. These reverses were followed by the treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis (1559). Shortly afterwards Henry was accidentally wounded in a tournament by Montgomery, a Scottish nobleman, and died 10th July 1559. See French works by Barre-Duparcq (1887) and Bourgiez (1891).

Henry III., king of France, third son of Henry II. and Catharine de' Medici, was born 19th September 1551. In 1569 he gained victories over the Protestants at Jarnac and Moncontour, and he took an active share in the massacre of St Bartholomew. In 1573 the intrigues of the queen-regent secured his election to the crown of Poland; but in 1575 he succeeded his brother, Charles IX., on the French throne. His reign was a period of almost incessant civil war between Huguenots and Catholics, the Duke of Guise having formed the Holy League to assert the supremacy of Catholicism and secure the reversion of the throne to the Guises. Henry showed fickleness and want of courage in his public conduct; and in private his life was spent in an alternation of dissolute excesses and wild outbreaks of religious fanaticism. In 1588 the assassination of the Duke of Guise roused the Catholics to the utmost pitch of exasperation; Henry threw himself into the arms of Henry of Navarre, and the two marched upon Paris at the head of a Huguenot army. But on 1st August 1589 Henry was stabbed by a fanatical Dominican named Jacques Clément; he died, the last of the House of Valois, on the following day, nominating Henry of Navarre as his successor. See Freer's Henry III. (1858).

Henry IV., king of France and Navarre, was born at Pau, 13th December 1553, third son of Antoine de Bourbon and Jeanne d'Albret, heiress of Henry, king of Navarre and Bearn. After his father's death, his mother, a zealous Calvinist, had him carefully educated. In 1569 she took him to La Rochelle, and presented him to the Huguenot army, at whose head he fought at the battle of Jarnac. Henry was chosen chief of the Protestant party, and the third Huguenot war began. The peace of St Germain was followed by a marriage between Henry and Margaret of Valois, sister of Charles IX., in 1572, within less than a week of the massacre of St Bartholomew. Henry's life was spared on condition of his professing himself a Catholic. Three years he was virtually a prisoner at the French court, but in 1576 escaped to Alençon. Having revoked his compulsory conversion, he resumed the command of the army, and gained signal advantages and a favourable peace. The death in 1584 of the Duke of Anjou made Henry presumptive heir to the crown, the succession to which was opened to him by the murder of Henry III. in 1589. As a Protestant he was obnoxious to most of the nation; and finding that the Dukes of Lorraine and Savoy, and Philip II. of Spain, were prepared to dispute his claims, he retired to the south until he could collect more troops and money. His cause gradually gained strength through the internal dissensions of the Leaguers, and in 1590 he defeated the Duke of Mayenne at Ivry. In 1593 he formally professed himself a member of the Church of Rome; this was followed by the speedy surrender of the most important cities of the kingdom, including Paris. In 1598 peace was concluded between Spain and France by the treaty of Vervins; and on 15th April of that year Henry signed an edict at Nantes by which he secured to Protestants liberty of conscience and impartial justice. Heretofore the remote provinces were at the mercy of governors and landed proprietors in the matter of taxes and compulsory services. These abuses Henry completely stopped, and by road-making opened up his kingdom to traffic and commerce, and established new sources of wealth and prosperity. His great minister Sully reorganised the finances, and in ten years reduced the national debt from 330 millions to 50 millions of livres. On 14th May 1610, the day after the coronation of his second wife, Mary de' Medici, and when about to set out to commence war in Germany, Henry was assassinated by a fanatic named Ravalliac, a tool of the Jesuits. According to Henri Martin, Henry 'remains the greatest, but above all the most essentially French, of all the kings of France.' His unbridled licentiousness was his worst fault. Besides the histories of France, Memoirs of Sully and others, see French monographs on Henry IV. by Pérefixe (1661), Lescure (1873), Lacombe (1878), Guadet (1879), Anquez (1887), and De la Ferrière (1890), and English ones by Freer (1860-63), Wilert (1894), and Blair (Phila. 1894).

Henry THE NAVIGATOR (1394-1460), fourth son of João I., king of Portugal, and the English Philippa, a daughter of John of Gaunt, distinguished himself at the capture of Ceuta in 1415. He took up his residence at Sagres, in Algarve; and during the war against the Moors his sailors reached parts of the ocean before unknown. He erected an observatory and a school for navigation, and despatched some of his pupils on voyages of discovery, resulting in the discovery of the Madeira Islands in 1418. Henry's thoughts were now directed towards the gold-producing coasts of Guinea; and in 1433 one of his mariners sailed round Cape Nun, and touched Cape Bojador. Next year another expedition reached a point 120 miles beyond Cape Bojador; in 1440 Cape Blanco was reached. Up to this period the prince had borne the expense of these voyages himself; henceforth societies for the purpose were formed under his guidance. In 1446 Henry's captain, Nuno Tristam, doubled Cape Verd, and in 1448 Gonzalez Vallo discovered three of the Azores. Henry died in 1460, after his mariners had reached Sierra Leone. See books by Major (1868-77) and C. R. Beazley (1895).

Henry Frederick (1594-1612), born at Stirling Castle, the elder son of James I., was created Duke of Rothesay in 1594, and Prince of Wales in 1610. His promising career was cut short by typhoid fever, though poisoning (even by the king his father) was hinted at.

Henry of Blois, bishop of Winchester from 1129, and legate from 1139, was King Stephen's brother. He died in 1171.

Henry of Huntingdon (c. 1084-1155), about 1109 became Archdeacon of Huntingdon, in 1139 visited Rome. His Historia Anglorum comes down to 1154 (ed. by T. Arnold, 1879; trans. 1853).

Henry the Minstrel. See HARRY, BLIND.

Henry, JOSEPH, LL.D. (c. 1797-1878), physicist, born at Albany, N.Y., became instructor in mathematics there in 1826, in 1832 professor of Natural Philosophy at Princeton, and in 1846 first secretary of the Smithsonian Institution. With Henry's name are associated discoveries in electro-magnetism, electrical induction, meteorology, and acoustics. See Memorial (1880) and his Scientific Writings (2 vols. 1886).

Henry, MATTHEW (1662-1714), was born at Broad Oak farmhouse, Malpas, Flintshire, the son of Philip Henry (1631-96), one of the 2000 ministers ousted from the Church of England by the 'Act of Uniformity.' In 1687 he became pastor of a dissenting congregation at Chester, whence in 1712 he removed to Hackney near London. He died at Nantwich. His Exposition of the Old and New Testament (1710) was carried down only to the Acts of the Apostles, and was completed by others. See biographies by Tong (1716), Davies (1844), Hamilton (1853), Chapman (1859), and Williams (1865), and his father's Diaries and Letters (ed. by Lee, 1882).

Henry, PATRICK (1736-99), born in Hanover county, Va., failed in store-keeping and in farming, so turned lawyer in 1760, and first displayed his great eloquence in pleading the cause of the people against an unpopular tax (1763). Soon he was foremost of American orators. A zealous patriot in the war of independence, he was a delegate to the Continental congress (1774), and delivered the first speech in that assembly. In 1776 he carried the vote of the Virginia convention for independence, and became governor of the new state. He was four times re-elected. In 1791 he retired from public life. See Lives by William Wirt (1817; new ed. 1884), Everett (Sparks's American Biography), Tyler (1887), and W. W. Henry (3 vols. 1891).

Henry, ROBERT (1718-90), born at St Ninlans, studied at Edinburgh, and from 1768 till his death was a minister there. In his History of Britain (6 vols. 1771-93) he devoted chapters to the social aspects of successive periods; but the work is now of little value.

Henry, WILLIAM (1774-1836), chemist, born at Manchester, studied medicine at Edinburgh, practised in Manchester, but soon devoted himself to chemistry. He wrote valuable papers in the Philosophical Transactions and Experimental Chemistry (1799; 11th ed. 1829).

Henryson, ROBERT (c. 1430-1500), poet, is usually designated schoolmaster of Dunfermline, and was certainly a notary in 1478. His Testament of Cresseid is a kind of supplement to Chaucer's poem on the same subject; Robene and Makynne is the earliest Scottish specimen of pastoral poetry. Other works are a metrical version of thirteen Morall Fables of Esope and a feeble Orpheus and Eurydice. See Gregory Smith's edition (1906-8).

Henschel, GEORG, composer and conductor, was born at Breslau, 18th February 1850, studied music at Leipzig, and in 1877 came to England.—He married in 1881 the soprano-singer, LILLIAN JUNE BAILEY (1860-1901), born in Ohio.

Henslow, JOHN STEVENS (1796-1861), botanist, was born at Rochester, studied at Cambridge, and from 1837 was rector of Hitcham in Suffolk.

Henslowe, PHILIP, a stage-manager, was originally a dyer and starch-maker, but became in 1584 lessee of the Rose theatre on the Bankside. From 1591 till his death in 1616 he was in partnership with Edward Alleyn (q.v.), who married his step-daughter in 1592. Henslowe's business diary from 1593 to 1609, preserved at Dulwich College (ed. with interpolations, &c., by J. P. Collier, 1841; W. W. Greg, 1904-7), contains invaluable information about the stage of Shakespeare's day.

Henty, GEORGE ALFRED, newspaper correspondent, writer since 1868 of numberless boys' books, and editor of the Union Jack, was born at Trumpington in 1832, educated at Westminster and Caius College, and died in 1902.

Heracl'ian, as prefect of Africa, rendered the Emperor Honorius good service during Alaric's invasion; but, revolting, invaded Italy, was defeated, and soon after was beheaded in Africa (413 A.D.).

Heraclitus, Greek philosopher, was born at Ephesus in Asia Minor, flourished about 500 B.C., and died at sixty. Known as the 'weeping philosopher' in opposition to Democritus, he wrote a work On Nature, of which only a few fragments remain. The fundamental tenets in his philosophy are that all things are in a constant flux of becoming and perishing, that fire is the primordial principle of all existence, and that the supreme law of existence is the harmony that results necessarily from the operations of universal reason. See Lassalle's monograph (1858) and the edition of his fragments by Bywater (1877).

Heracl'ius (c. 575-641), Byzantine emperor, born in Cappadocia, in 610 headed a revolt against Phocas, slew him, and mounted his throne. At this time the Avars threatened the empire on the north-west, and the Persians invaded it. Chosroes II. captured Damascus in 613, and in 614 Jerusalem; then all Syria, Egypt, and Asia Minor were conquered. At length Heraclius, having in 622 concluded a treaty with the Avars, in 622 took the field against the Persians, routed them in a series of brilliant campaigns, won back his lost provinces, and shut up Chosroes in Ctesiphon (628). But soon the followers of Mohammed won from Heraclius nearly all he gained from the Persians, he meanwhile wasting his time in self-indulgence and theological disputes. See French monograph by Drapeyron (1869).

Herauld de Sechelles, JEAN MARIE (1760-94), a

French revolutionist of noble birth, attached himself to Danton, and like him was guillotined.

Herbart, JOHANN FRIEDRICH (1776-1841), philosopher, born at Oldenburg, in 1805 was appointed extra-ordinary professor of Philosophy at Göttingen, in 1809 went to Königsberg as Kant's successor, but in 1833 returned to Göttingen. His works were collected by Hartenstein (1850-52; new ed. 13 vols. 1883-93). He posits a multiplicity of 'reals' or things which possess in themselves absolute existence apart from apperception by the mind of man. He rejects the notion of separate mental faculties; and devised a statics and a dynamics of mind amenable to mathematical manipulation. His services to the science of education were conspicuous. See De Garmo's Herbart and the Herbartians (1895), Felkin's translation of his Science of Education (1895), and Ufer's Introduction to Herbart's Pedagogy (trans. 1896).

Herbelot, BARTHÉLEMY D' (1625-95), orientalist, born in Paris, in 1692 became professor of Syriac in the Collège de France. His Bibliothèque Orientale (1697; 3d ed. 1777-83) is a universal dictionary of all knowledge known to the Orient.

Herbert. 'Herbertus Camerarius' came over with the Conqueror; seven or eight generations later the Herberts diverged into the Earls of Powis, the Lords Herbert of Chisbury, the Herberts of Muckcross, and several untitled branches in England, Wales, and Ireland. Sir William Herbert of Raglan Castle, Monmouth, was knighted in 1415 by Henry V. for his valour in the French wars. His eldest son, an adherent of the House of York, was created Earl of Pembroke by Edward IV. in 1468, but was captured by the Lancastrians and beheaded 28th July 1469. His son William (1460-91) in 1479 exchanged the earldom of Pembroke for that of Huntingdon. The title of Earl of Pembroke was restored in 1551 to Sir William Herbert (c. 1501-70), the son of an illegitimate son of the first earl. The new earl was one of the most influential men of his time. By his wife, a sister of Catharine Parr, he had a son, Henry, second earl (c. 1534-1601), to whose countess, Mary (c. 1555-1621), her brother, Sir Philip Sidney, dedicated his Arcadia. It has been attempted to identify Shakespeare's 'W. H.,' the 'onlie beggetter' of the Sonnets, with William Herbert, third earl (1580-1630), who succeeded in 1621. Phillip, fourth earl (1584-1650), Lord Chamberlain to Charles I. 1626-41, and then Chancellor of the university of Oxford, was also in 1605 made Earl of Montgomery. Thomas, eighth earl (1656-1733), was Lord High Admiral under Queen Anne. Lord Herbert of Lea was a younger son of the eleventh earl; and his son GEORGE (1850-95) became (1862) thirteenth Earl of Pembroke and tenth Earl of Montgomery. With George Henry Kingsley, M.D., he wrote South Sea Bubbles (1872). The Earls of Carnarvon (q.v.) descend from the eighth Earl of Pembroke.

Herbert, EDWARD, LORD HERBERT OF CHERBURY, soldier, statesman, poet, and philosopher, was born 3d March 1583 at Eytton in Shropshire. In 1599, before he had quite quitted his studies at University College, Oxford, he married an heiress four years older than himself. At James I.'s coronation he was made a knight of the Bath; in 1608 he visited France, and in 1610 was at the recapture of Julich. In 1614 he was with Maurice of Orange, travelled through Germany and Italy, and got into trouble attempting to recruit Protestant soldiers in Languedoc for the Duke of Savoy. Made a member of the Privy-council, he was sent to France as ambassador (1619), and tried negotiation between Louis XIII. and his Protestant subjects. He was in 1624 made a peer of Ireland, and in 1629 of England with the title of Baron Herbert of Cherbury. When the Civil War broke out he at first sided very half-heartedly with the Royalists, but in 1644 surrendered to the Parliamentarians. He died in London, 20th August 1648. His De Veritate is an anti-empirical theory of knowledge. His De Religione Gentilium (1645) proves that all religions recognise five main articles—that there is a supreme God, that he ought to be worshipped, that virtue and purity are the main part of that worship, that sins should be repented of, and that there are rewards and punishments in a future state. Hence Herbert came to be reckoned the first of the deistical writers. The Expediitio Buckinghami Ducis (1656) is a vindication of the ill-fated Rochelle expedition. The ill-proportioned Life and Reign of King Henry VIII. (1649) is by no means accurate. His Autobiography, a brilliant picture of the man and of contemporary manners, is a masterpiece in its kind, but is disfigured by overweening self-glory. The Poems, Latin and English, reveal a representative of the 'metaphysical' school. See Rémusat's monograph on Herbert (1874), Churton Collins's edition of the Poems (1881), and Sidney Lee's edition of the Autobiography (1886).

Herbert, GEORGE, poet, was born in Montgomery Castle, Wales, 3d April 1593. His eldest brother was Lord Herbert of Cherbury. From Westminster he passed in 1609 to Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1614 was elected a fellow, and was Public Orator 1619-27. He looked for advancement at court, but, by the gift of a prebend of Lincoln (1626) and the friendship of Nicholas Ferrar, became drawn towards a religious life, and in 1630, the year after his marriage, was presented to the vicarage of Benetton near Salisbury. He held it only three years, being buried 3d March 1633. His Country Parson is doubtless a picture of himself; The Temple, or Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations (printed in 1633), contains some of the purest pious verse in the language. See his Works in Prose and Verse, with the Life by Izaak Walton, and notes by Coleridge (1846); other editions by Nichol (1863), Grosart (1876), Shorthouse (1882), and Palmer (1906); the S.P.C.K. Life (1893), and one by A. G. Hyde (1907).

Herbert, JOHN ROGERS (1810-90), historical and religious painter, was born at Maldon, about 1840 turned Catholic, and was elected an A.R.A. in 1841, an R.A. in 1846.

Herbert, SIDNEY, LORD HERBERT OF LEA, statesman, son of the eleventh Earl of Pembroke by his second wife, was born at Richmond, 16th September 1810. Educated at Harrow and Oriel College, Oxford, in 1832 he was elected Conservative M.P. for South Wilts, and was Peel's Secretary to the Admiralty from 1841 to 1845, when he became Secretary-at-war. He opposed Cobden's motion for a select committee on the corn laws. In 1852 he was again Secretary-at-war under Aberdeen, and the sufferings of the army before Sebastopol were laid in a great degree at his door. He was for a few weeks Palmerston's Colonial Secretary in 1855, and his Secretary-at-war in 1859. Great improvements in the sanitary condition and education of the forces, the amalgamation of the Indian with the imperial army, and the organisation of the volunteer movement signalled his army administration. After he resigned he was called (1861) to the Upper House as Baron Herbert of Lea. He died 2d August 1861. See his Life by Lord Stanmore (1906).

Herculano DE CARVALHO, ALEXANDRE (1810-77), Portuguese poet and prose-writer.

Herd, DAVID (1732-1810), an Edinburgh clerk, born at Marykirk in Kincardine, editor of Ancient Scottish Ballads (1776; new ed. by Hecht, 1905).

Herder, JOHANN GOTTFRIED, critic and poet, was born at Mohrunge in East Prussia, 25th August 1744, studied at Königsberg, and there got to know Kant and Hamann. In 1764 he became teacher in a school and assistant-pastor in a church at Riga. Between 1766 and 1769 he wrote two works, in which he maintained that the truest poetry is the poetry of the people. In 1769 he made the acquaintance of Goethe at Strasburg; in 1770 was appointed court-preacher at Bückeberg, and in 1776 first preacher in Weimar. He died 18th December 1803. Herder's love for the songs of the people, for human nature unadulterated, found expression in an admirable collection of folk-songs, Stimmen der Völker in Liedern (1778-79), a work on the spirit of Hebrew poetry (1782-83; trans. 1833), a treatise on the influence of poetry on manners (1778); in oriental mythological tales, in parables and legends, in his version of the Cid (1805), and other works. The supreme importance of the historical method is fully recognised in these and a book on the origin of language (1772), and especially in his masterpiece, Ideen zur Geschichte der Menschheit (1784-91; trans. 1800), which is remarkable for its anticipations and adumbrations of evolutionary theories. Man is the crowning work of the universe; he is also the first link in a still higher series of existences. His last works were the Humanitätsbriefe (1798-97) and an ill-advised polemic against Kant. His works have been edited by Suphan (32 vols. 1877-87). See Erinnerungen, by Herder's widow (1830); Herder's Lebensbild, by his son (1846-47); various collections of his Letters; and Lives and other works by Haym (1880-85), Joret (1875), Nevinson (1884), and Kühnemann (1893-96).

Herdman, ROBERT (1829-88), portrait and subject painter, born at Rattray near Blairgowrie, in 1847 came to Edinburgh, and was elected an A.R.S.A. in 1858, an R.S.A. in 1863.

Hérodias, JOSÉ MARIA DE (1842-1905), French sonneteer, was born near Santiago in Cuba, but completed his studies in Paris, and made it his home. In 1895 he was elected to the Academy. See Gosse's Critical Kit-kats (1896) and E. R. Taylor's translation of his Sonnets (San Fran. 1897).

Hereward, commonly called HERWARD THE WAKE, was a Lincolnshire squire who held the Isle of Ely against William the Conqueror in 1070-71. When William had succeeded in penetrating to the English camp of refuge, Hereward cut his way through to the fastnesses of the swampy fens northwards. The noble lineage assigned him in Kingsley's romance of Hereward the Wake (1866) has been shown by Freeman to be destitute of foundation. See a monograph by General Harward (1896).

Hergenröther, JOSEPH (1824-90), a Catholic historian, was born at Würzburg, and died in a Cistercian monastery near Bregenz, having been made a cardinal in 1879.

Heriot, GEORGE, born at Edinburgh 15th June 1563, started business as a goldsmith in 1586, and was in 1597 appointed goldsmith to Anne of

Denmark, and soon after to James VI. Heriot followed James to London, where, as court-jeweller and banker, he amassed considerable riches. He died 12th February 1624, and bequeathed £23,625 to found a hospital or school in Edinburgh for sons of poor burghers. 'Jingling Gordie' figures in Scott's Fortunes of Nigel. See Steven's History of Heriot's Hospital (1859).

Herkomer, STR HUBERT VON (knighted 1907), was born at Waal in Bavaria in 1849, the son of a wood-carver who took him to the United States in 1851, and to England in 1857. He studied art at Southampton, Munich, and South Kensington, and in 1870 settled in London, where, besides painting industriously, he worked for the Graphic. His best picture is 'The Last Muster' (1875); and many of his portraits are famous. In 1879 he was elected an A.R.A., in 1885 and 1889 Slade professor at Oxford, and in 1890 an R.A. Besides founding a school of art at Bushey, he has applied himself to the work of the engraver, wood-carver, iron-smith, architect, magazine-writer, playwright and composer, singer and actor. See Art Annual, by W. L. Courtney, for 1892.

Hermann. See ARMINIUS.

Hermann, JOHANN GOTTFRIED JAKOB (1772-1848), born at Leipzig, from 1803 was professor there of Eloquence and Poetry. He wrote on classical metre, Greek grammar, &c., and left Opuscula (1827-77). See Lives by Jahn (1849) and Köchly (1874).—Another classical scholar, KARL FRIEDRICH HERMANN (1804-55), was born at Frankfort, and died at Göttingen.

Hermas, who as the author of the early Christian treatise called the Shepherd is usually reckoned one of the Apostolic Fathers, may have been the brother of Pius I., Bishop of Rome in 142-57, and written during his brother's episcopate. There has, however, been recently a tendency to throw the date of the Shepherd back to the beginning of the century. The treatise contains little positive dogmatic teaching, but is an interesting monument of early Christian thought. There is a good Latin and Greek edition by Gebhardt and Harnack (1877). See also Zahn, Der Hirt des Hermas (1868).

Hermes, GEORG (1775-1831), Roman Catholic philosopher, born at Dreyerwalde in Westphalia, became theological professor at Münster in 1807, and in 1819 at Bonn. In Die Innere Wahrheit des Christentums (1805), Philosophische Einleitung in die Christkatholische Theologie (1819), and Christkatholische Dogmatik (1834-36), he sought to base the Catholic faith and doctrines on a critical theory of knowledge like Kant's. The Hermesian method departed widely from the old text-books of the schools; and although his substantial orthodoxy was not questioned, his doctrines were condemned by a papal brief in 1835 as heretical, and his followers were deprived of their chairs. See works by Esser (1832), Elvenich (1836), Niedner (1839), and Stupp (1845). [Her'mays.]

Hultsch edited his fragments in 1864-77.—A so-called HERO THE YOUNGER wrote on mechanics and astronomy at Constantinople about 935 A.D.

Herod, the name of a family which rose to power in Judæa in the century B.C.; they were of Idumean descent, but Jewish in religion. HEROD THE GREAT, second son of Antipater, procurator of Judæa, was born 72 or 62 B.C., and in 47 was made governor of Galilee; ultimately he and his elder brother were made joint-tetrarchs of Judæa. Displaced by Antigonus of the Hasmonean dynasty, he fled to Rome, where he obtained, through Antony, a full recognition of his claims, and became tetrarch of Judæa, 40 B.C. On Antony's fall he secured the favour of Augustus, and obtained the title of king of Judæa in 31 B.C.; his reign was stained with cruelties and atrocities. Every member of the Hasmonean family, and even those of his own blood, fell a sacrifice to his jealous fears; and latterly the lightest suspicion sufficed as the ground for wholesale butcheries. The slaughter of the innocents at Bethlehem is quite in keeping with his character, but is not alluded to by Josephus; so was his ordering the death of his wife Mariamne and his two sons by her. Herod's one eminent quality was his love of magnificence in architecture. He married ten wives, by whom he had fourteen children. He died in 4 B.C., the true year of the Nativity.—His son, HEROD ANTIPAS, was by his will named tetrarch of Galilee and Perea. He divorced his first wife in order to marry Herodias, the wife of his half-brother Philip—a union against which John the Baptist remonstrated at the cost of his life. It was when Herod Antipas was at Jerusalem for the passover that Jesus was sent before him by Pilate for examination. He afterwards made a journey to Rome in the hope of obtaining the title of king; he not only failed, but, through the intrigues of Herod Agrippa, was banished to Lugdunum (Lyons), where he died.—HEROD AGRIPPA I., son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great, was educated and lived at Rome until his debts compelled him to take refuge in Idumea. From this period almost to the death of Tiberius he suffered a variety of misfortunes, but, having formed a friendship with Caligula, he received from him four tetrarchies, and after the banishment of Herod Antipas that of Galilee and Perea. Claudius added to his dominions Judæa and Samaria. He was eaten of worms at Cæsarea, 44 A.D.—His son, HEROD AGRIPPA II. (27-100 A.D.), was at Rome when his father died. Claudius detained him, and re-transformed the kingdom into a Roman province. In 53 he received nearly all his paternal possessions, which were subsequently enlarged by Nero. Agrippa spent great sums in adorning Jerusalem. He did all in his power to dissuade the Jews from rebelling. When Jerusalem was taken he went with his sister to Rome, where he became prætor. It was before him Paul made his defence.

Herodes Atticus (c. 107-177 A.D.), a Greek orator, was born and died at Marathon, won Hadrian's favour, and was summoned to Rome in 140 by Antoninus Pius. See French monograph by Vidal Lablache (1871).

Herodian (c. 170-240 A.D.), a Greek historian, who was born in Syria, and lived in Rome. His History, in eight books, from the death of Marcus Aurelius (180) to the accession of Gordian III. (238), is fairly trustworthy. See editions by Bekker (1855) and Mendelssohn (1883).

Herodotus, 'the father of history,' was born between 490 and 480 B.C. at Halicarnassus, a Greek colony on the coast of Asia Minor. When the colonies were freed from the Persian yoke, he left his native town, and travelled in Asia Minor, the Aegean islands, Greece, Macedonia, Thrace, the coasts of the Black Sea, Persia, Tyre, Egypt, and Cyrene. In 443 B.C. the colony of Thurii was founded by Athens on the Tarentine Gulf, and Herodotus joined it. From Thurii he visited Sicily and Lower Italy. He died about 425 B.C. On his travels, his zeal in collecting information and making inquiries, historical, geographical, ethnological, mythological, and archaeological, was extraordinary. His history was designed to record not only the wars but the causes of the wars between Greece and the barbarians. Beginning with the conquest of the Greek colonies in Asia Minor by the Lydian king Croesus, he gives a history of Lydia, and then passes to Persia, Babylon, and Egypt. In books v. to ix. we have the history of the two Persian wars. The work of Herodotus is to the bald, brief, disconnected notes of his predecessors what the work of Homer was to the poems of his predecessors. Few writers have so many devoted personal friends as Herodotus counts amongst his readers—he is simple, frank, talkative, amiable, and respect-worthy. For, though doubts have been expressed as to his honesty, e.g. by Professor Sayce, he never says what he does not believe. He did not believe all that he was told, though he did believe sometimes things which were not true. The editio princeps is by Aldus (1502). The best critical editions are those by Gaisford (1824) and Stein (1869), and of books iv.—vi. by Macan (1895). The best Latin commentary is that of Bähr (1856); the best German, of Stein (1877); the best English, by Rawlinson (2d ed. 1876), contains a translation. Another English translation is by G. C. Macaulay (1890). The appendices to Professor Sayce's edition of books i.—iii. (1883) are valuable.

Héroid, LOUIS JOSEPH FERDINAND (1791–1833), composer, born at Paris, wrote many operas, among them Zampa (1831) and Le Pré aux Clercs (1832). See Life by Jouvin (1868). [Ay-rauld.]

Herondas, or HERO'DAS, a Greek poet of the 3d century B.C., of whose Mimiam, pictures of Greek life in dialogue, some 700 verses were discovered on an Egyptian papyrus in the British Museum in 1891.

Herophilus (fl. 300 B.C.), a founder of the medical school of Alexandria, born at Chalcedon.

Herostratus in 356 B.C. fired the temple of Diana at Ephesus, thereby to immortalise his name.

Herrera, ANTONIO DE (1549–1625), a Spanish historian, born at Cuellar near Segovia, wrote a history of Castilian Exploits in the Pacific (1601–15; trans. by John Stevens, 1725), a description of the West Indies, a history of England and Scotland in the time of Mary Stuart, &c.

Herrera, FERNANDO DE (c. 1534–97), Spanish lyric poet, born at Seville, took orders. Many of his love-poems are remarkable for tender feeling, while his odes display a lofty enthusiasm. He wrote a prose history of the war in Cyprus (1572), and translated from the Latin of Stapleton a Life of Sir T. More (1592). [Erray'ra.]

Herrera, FRANCISCO, 'the Elder' (1576–1656), painter, born in Seville, painted historical pieces, wine-shops, fairs, carnivals, and the like.—His son, FRANCISCO, 'the Younger' (1622–85), born at Seville, worked at Rome, but was ultimately painter to the king at Madrid. His best works are a fresco, 'The Ascension,' in the Atocha church in Madrid, and 'St Francis,' in Seville cathedral.

Herrick, ROBERT, born in London, was baptised

24th August 1591, and in 1613–17 studied at St John's and Trinity Hall, Cambridge. His 'wild, unbaptised rhymes' quickly earned him the friendship of Ben Jonson and his ring of hilarious spirits in London. In 1629 he took orders, and was presented to the Devon living of Dean Prior near Totnes. In 1647 the Puritan supremacy ejected him, but he resumed his duties in August 1662, and died in October 1674. Herrick's one volume of verse contained the Hesperides (1648) and Noble Numbers (1647). The last is a collection of professedly religious poetry; the former, a group of lyrical poems addressed to contemporaries, amatory poems, epithalamia, epigrams, fairy poems, and short occasional odes and poems on all kinds of subjects, of which sixty-two had already appeared in Wit's Recreations (1640). The whole embrace more than 1200 poems of various lengths, many of which are among the most exquisite examples of lyrical art in English, e.g. 'The Mad Maid's Song,' 'The Night Piece to Julia,' 'Gather ye rose-buds,' 'To Daffodils,' 'Cherry Ripe,' 'Bid me to live,' and (though much of his religious poetry is weak) such masterpieces as 'The Litany,' 'Jephthah's Daughter,' and 'Lord, Thon hast given me a cell.' See editions by Nott (1810), T. Maitland (Lord Dundrennan, 1823), W. C. Hazlitt (1869), Dr Grosart (3 vols. 1876), Pollard (1891 and 1905), Saintsbury (1893); Palgrave's Chrysmela (1877), Gosse's essay in Seventeenth-century Studies (1883), a German work by Hale (1892), a French by Delattre (1912).

Herries, JOHN CHARLES (1778–1855), a Tory statesman, Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1827 and War Secretary in 1834–35. See Life (1880).

Herring, JOHN FREDERICK (1795–1865), a self-taught painter of sporting scenes, born in Blackfriars, was for some years a mail-coachman in Yorkshire. See J. B. Muir's Catalogue of his engraved works (1894).

Herschel, SIR WILLIAM, born at Hanover, November 15, 1738, was the son of a bandmaster, and first visited England in 1755 as oboist in the band of the Hanoverian Guards; in 1766 he became an organist and teacher of music at Bath, where he first turned his attention to astronomy. Unable to buy a good reflecting telescope, he made one for himself (1773–74); in 1781 he discovered the planet Uranus, called by him 'Georgium Sidus.' In 1782 he was appointed private astronomer to George III.; and at Slough near Windsor, assisted by his sister Caroline, he continued his researches. Knighted in 1816, he died 25th August 1822. He wrote sixty-nine papers for the Philos. Trans. 1780–1815. He greatly added to our knowledge of the solar system, of the Milky Way, and of the nebulae; he discovered, besides Uranus, two satellites of Saturn, the rotation of Saturn's ring, the period of rotation of Saturn and that of Venus, and the motions of binary stars; and he made a famous catalogue of double stars, &c. He erected a monster telescope 40 feet long, and in 1789 by means of it detected the sixth satellite of Saturn. See his Life and Works by E. S. Holden (1881).—His sister, CAROLINE LUCRETIA, born 16th March 1750, came to England in 1772 to live with her brother at Bath. While acting as his assistant she found time for independent observations, and discovered eight comets and several nebulae and clusters of stars. In 1798 she published a star catalogue. She returned to Germany in 1822, and died 9th January 1848. See her Memoir and Correspondence, edited by Mrs Herschel (1876).—SIR JOHN FREDERICK WILLIAM HERSCHEL, the only son of Sir William, was born at Slough, 7th March 1792, and educated at Eton and St John's, Cambridge, where in 1813 he was senior wrangler and first Smith's prizeman. His first publication was on the Calculus of finite differences (1820). In 1822 he applied himself especially to astronomy, and helped to re-examine the nebulae and clusters of stars in his father's catalogues. The results were given in 1833 to the Royal Society along with observations on 525 nebulae and clusters of stars not noticed by his father, and on a great number of double stars—in all between 3000 and 4000. His treatises on Sound and Light appeared in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana (1830-31); his Astronomy (1831) and Natural Philosophy in Lardner's Cyclopædia. In 1834 he visited the Cape to examine the southern hemisphere; the results published in 1847 completed a survey of the heavens begun in 1825. He was made a knight (1831), a baronet (1838), and a D.C.L. of Oxford (1839), and was Master of the Mint (1850-55). His articles on Meteorology, Physical Geography, and Telescope, contributed to the Encyclopædia Britannica, were published separately; and his Popular Lectures and Collected Addresses are well-known works. Herschel was a distinguished chemist, and attained important results in photography. His researches on the undulatory theory of light were very valuable. He had also a profound interest in poetry, and made translations from Schiller and from the Iliad. He died at Collingwood near Hawkhurst, Kent, 12th May 1871, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See Miss Clarke's The Herschels (1896). [Her'shel.]

Herschell, FARRER, BARON, born 2d Nov. 1837, the son of the Rev. R. H. Herschell, was educated at University College, London, and at Bonn, in 1860 was called to the bar, in 1872 became a Q.C., was Liberal M.P. for Durham 1874-85, and in 1880 was made solicitor-general and a K.B., in 1886 a peer and Lord Chancellor, as again 1892-95. Hertz, HENRIK (1798-1870), Danish poet, was born and died in Copenhagen. Gjenangerbrevene ('Letters of a Ghost,' 1830) was a rhymed satirical poem. His best dramas are Svend Dyrings Hus (1837) and Kong René's Datter (1845); trans. four times into English—in 1850 by Sir T. Martin.

Hervey, JAMES, was born at Hardingstone near Northampton, 26th February 1714, studied at Lincoln College, Oxford, succeeded to his father's livings of Weston-Favell and Collingtree, and died on Christmas-day 1758. The best of his works (all Calvinistic in tone) are Meditations and Contemplations (1746), including his famous 'Meditations among the Tombs'; Contemplations on the Night (1747); and Theron and Aspasio (1755), a series of dialogues and letters which gave rise to a controversy as to the nature of saving faith. See his Life and Letters (1760).

Hervey, JOHN (1665-1751), Whig M.P. for Bury St Edmunds from 1694, was in 1703 created Baron Hervey of Ickworth, in 1714 Earl of Bristol. See his Letter Books and Diary (4 vols. 1895).

Herwarth von Bittenfeld, KARL EBERHARD (1796-1884), Prussian general, served in the war of liberation, in 1864 captured Alsen, and in 1866 contributed to the victories ending with Königgrätz. In 1870 he was made governor of the Rhine provinces, in 1871 a field-marshal. [Her-vart.]

At the same time he managed a pianoforte factory. [Hairts.]

Heselrige. See HASELRIG.

Hesiod, was born in Ascra, at the foot of Mount Helicon. His poems show acquaintance with a wider geographical horizon than do those of Homer; the language is in a later stage, and in Hesiod there are unmistakable imitations of Homer. Hesiod was therefore later than Homer, and may belong to the end of the 8th century B.C. The Works and Days is generally considered to consist of two originally distinct poems, one preaching up honest labour and denouncing corrupt and unjust judges; the other containing advice as to the days lucky or unlucky for the farmer's work. The Theogony teaches the origin of the universe out of Chaos and the history of the gods. Critics are not agreed whether the unity of the poems is the work of the original composer, disturbed by interpolations, or is the work of some late editor harmonising lays originally unconnected. Hesiod's poetry is not very poetical, but the Works and Days gives us an invaluable picture of the village community as it existed in Greece in the 8th century B.C., and the Theogony is of the utmost importance to the comparative mythologist. The first edition of Hesiod appeared in 1493; other editions are by Schömann (1869), Fick (1887), and Sittl (1890).

Hesychius, a 4th century Greek grammarian of Alexandria, whose Greek lexicon, in spite of the corruption of the text, is most useful for understanding the works of the classic writers of Greece.—HESYCHIUS of Miletus wrote a work on the eminent Greek writers and a universal history down to 518 A.D. [He-zik-i-us.]

Heuglin, THEODOR VON (1824-76), a Württemberger who travelled in the Eastern Soudan, Abyssinia, &c., and in 1870-71 visited Spitzbergen.

Hewitson, WILLIAM CHAPMAN (1806-78), born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, from 1848 at Oatlands Park, Surrey, collected, depicted, and wrote about butterflies, birds' eggs, &c.

Heylin, PETER, D.D., born at Burford, Oxfordshire, November 29, 1599, studied at Oxford, in 1615 became a fellow of Magdalen, and from Charles I. got several preferments. He was deprived of them under the Commonwealth, but after the Restoration became sub-dean of Westminster. He died May 8, 1662. Heylin was a voluminous controversial writer on the anti-Puritan side, and wrote a Life of Laud, cosmographies, histories of England, of the Reformation, and of the Presbyterians. [Haylin.]

Heyn, PIET. See HEIJN.

Heyne, CHRISTIAN GOTTLÖB (1729-1812), classical scholar, born at Chemnitz, studied at Leipzig, and in 1763 became professor of Eloquence at Göttingen. Among his works were editions of Virgil, Pindar, Apollodorus, and Homer's Iliad (1802); six volumes of Opuscula Academica (1785-1812); and 7500 reviews of books in the Göttinger Gelehrte Anzeigen. See Life by Heeren (1813) and Carlyle's Miscellanies. [Hf'neh.]

Heyse, PAUL JOHANN, poet, dramatist, and novelist, was born in Berlin, 15th March 1830, and settled at Munich in 1854. He has published more than thirty collections of novelettes, good specimens of which are contained in Das Buch der Freundschaft (1883-84). His poetic works include narrative poems, such as Urrica (1852), and epics, such as Die Braut von Cypern (1856) and Thekla (1858). As a dramatist he has been almost as copious as a novelist, but few of his pieces have been unequivocally successful. He has also written two more ambitious and successful novels, Die Kinder der Welt (1873) and Im Paradiese (1875).

Heywood, JOHN, the epigrammatist, was born about 1497, perhaps in London, perhaps at North Mimms, near St Albans. After studying at Oxford, he was introduced at court by Sir Thomas More, and made himself by his wit and skill in music a favourite with Henry VIII. and with Mary. He was a devout Catholic, and on the accession of Elizabeth went to Malines, where he died about 1580. He wrote several short plays or interludes, whose individual characters represent classes, as the Pedlar, the Pardoner, and the like. They thus form a link between the old moralities and the modern drama. His Epigrams reach six hundred. His wearisome allegorical poem, The Spider and the Flie (Spenser Soc. 1894), contrasts Catholicism and Protestantism.

Heywood, THOMAS, dramatist and actor, a Lincolnshire man, was educated at Cambridge. He seems to have been writing plays as early as 1596; and in 1598 he was engaged by Philip Henslowe as an actor. Down to 1633 he had a large share in the composition of 220 plays; and he continued to write for the stage. He was also the author of an historical poem, Troja Britannica (1609); an Apology for Actors (1612); Nine Books of Various History concerning Women (1624); a long poem, The Hierarchie of the Blessed Angels (1635); a volume of rhymed translations from Lucian, Erasmus, Ovid, &c.; various pageants, tracts, and treatises; and The Life of Ambrosius Merlin (1641). It is usually supposed that he was alive in 1648. Twenty-four of Heywood's plays have come down. The best is A Woman killed with Kindness (1607), a pathetic tragedy of domestic life; and with this may be coupled The English Traveller (1633). His work is usually distinguished by naturalness and simplicity. In the two parts of The Fair Maid of the West (1631), and in Fortune by Land and Sea (1655), partly written by William Rowley, he gives us some spirited descriptions of sea-fights. The Rape of Lucrece (1608) is chiefly noticeable for its songs; Love's Maistrisse (1636) is fanciful and ingenious; and there is much tenderness in A Challenge for Beautie (1636). In The Royall King and Loyall Subject (1637) the doctrine of passive obedience to kingly authority is carried to extreme lengths. The Captives, or the Lost Recovered (1624) was first published by Bullen in 1885. A collection of Heywood's plays was issued in 1874.

Hibbert, ROBERT (1770-1849), a Jamaica merchant, who in 1847 founded the Hibbert Trust, whose funds, in 1878 applied to the Hibbert Lectures, help also to support the Hibbert Journal.

Hichens, ROBERT SMYTHE, son of a canon of Canterbury, born 1864, studied music, but made his name as a novelist by The Green Carnation (1894), The Garden of Allah (1905), The Call of the Blood (1906), and other novels.

Hickes, GEORGE, D.D., nonjuror and philologist, born at Newsham near Thirsk, June 20, 1642, in 1664 was elected fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford, took orders in 1666, and in 1683 became Dean of Worcester. Refusing to take the oaths to William III., he was deprived of his benefices. In 1693 he was sent with a list of the nonjuring clergy to the exiled king at St Germain's, and in 1694 was consecrated Bishop of Thetford. He published works in controversial and practical divinity, a Thesaurus Linguarum Veterum Septentrionalium (1705), and a grammar of Anglo-Saxon and Mæso-Gothic (1689). He died December 15, 1715.

Hicks, ELIAS (1748-1830), born at Hempstead, Long Island, at twenty-seven was a well-known Quaker preacher. He exercised great influence among his co-religionists until his unitarianism brought him into disfavour with orthodox Friends; but he defended his views with perseverance, and at eighty he still preached. The result was a schism of the society into two divisions, known as Orthodox and Hicksite Friends. See his Journal (1828) and Letters (1834).

Hicks, WILLIAM, 'Hicks Pasha' (1830-83), the English officer in command of the Egyptian forces annihilated by the Mahdi at Il Obeid in November 1883.

Hicks-Beach, SIR MICHAEL EDWARD, made in the year 1905 Viscount St Aldwyn, was born in London, 23d October 1837, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, succeeded his father as ninth baronet in 1854, and in 1864 became Conservative M.P. for East Gloucestershire, in 1885 for West Bristol. He was Chief-secretary for Ireland 1874-78 and 1886-87, Colonial Secretary 1878-80, and Chancellor of the Exchequer 1885-86—an office he held again in 1895-1902.

Hiero I., king of Syracuse from 478 B.C. till his death in 467, won a great naval victory over the Etruscans in 474. Though violent and rapacious, he was a lover of poetry, and the patron of Simonides, Æschylus, Bacchylides, and Pindar.—Hiero II., son of a noble Syracusan, came to the front during the troubles in Sicily after the retreat of Pyrrhus (275 B.C.), and in 269 was elected king of the Syracusans. He joined the Carthaginians in besieging Messana, which had surrendered to the Romans; but was beaten by Appius Claudius. In 263 he concluded a fifteen years' peace with Rome, and in 248 a permanent one. In the second Punic war Hiero supported the Romans with money and troops. He died in 215. He was a patron of the arts, and Archimedes was his relative and friend.

Hierocles, a 5th century Neoplatonist of Alexandria, is usually reckoned the author of a commentary on the 'Golden Verses' of Pythagoras. A collection of jests (Asteia) used also erroneously to be fathered on him. [Hier-o-kleez.]

Hieronymus. See JEROME.

Higden, RALPH (d. 1364), a Benedictine monk of St Werburgh's monastery in Chester, author of the Polychronicon, a general chronicle from the beginning of the world to the death of Edward III. Higden's share in the work is believed to end with 1326 or 1327, the rest having been written by two continuators. An English translation of the Polychronicon by John of Trevisa was printed by Caxton in 1482. See the edition by Babington and Lumby in the Rolls series (1865-86).

Higgins, MATTHEW JAMES ('Jacob Omnium'), essayist, was born at Benown Castle, County Meath, 4th December 1810; from Eton passed in 1828 to University College, Oxford; and died at Kingston House near Abingdon, 14th August 1868. His intellectual force, his humour and irony, were enlisted in the warfare against the abuses and minor evils of social and public life; he stood 6 feet 8 inches high. He contributed to the New Monthly Magazine, Morning Chronicle, Times, Cornhill, Edinburgh Review, Pall Mall Gazette, &c. See Memoir by Sir W. Stirling Maxwell, prefixed to his Essays on Social Subjects (1875).

Higginson, THOMAS WENTWORTH (1823-1911), born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, was ordained to the ministry, from which he retired in 1858. Meanwhile he had been active in the anti-slavery agitation, and, with others, had been indicted for the murder of a man killed during an attempt to rescue a fugitive slave, but had escaped through a flaw in the indictment. In the civil war he commanded the first regiment raised from among former slaves; in 1880-81 was a member of the Massachusetts legislature. His books include, besides histories of the United States, Outdoor Papers (1863), Army Life in a Black Regiment (1870), Oldport Days (1873), Common-Sense about Women (1881), Hints on Writing and Speech-making (1887), and Concerning All of Us (1892).

Highmore, NATHANIEL (1613-85), a Dorsetshire physician and anatomist, the friend of Harvey.

Hilarion, ST (c. 290-372), founder of the monastic system in Palestine, was educated at Alexandria, lived as a hermit in the desert between Gaza and Egypt, and died in Cyprus.

Hilary, ST (c. 300-66), was born of pagan parents at Limonum (Poitiers), and did not become a Christian till he was advanced in life. About 350 he was elected Bishop of Poitiers, and immediately rose to the first place in the Arian controversy. His principal work is that on the Trinity, but his three addresses to the Emperor Constantius are remarkable for the boldness of their language. See German Lives by Reinkens (1864) and Baltzer (1881), a French one by Barbier (1887), and an English by Cazenove (1883).

Hilary of Arles, ST (c. 403-49), educated at Lerins, became Bishop of Arles in 429. He presided at several synods, especially that of Orange in 441, whose proceedings involved him in a serious controversy with Leo the Great.

Hilda, ST (614-80), patroness of Whitby, the daughter of a nephew of Edwin of Northumbria, was baptised at thirteen by Paulinus. In 649 she became abbess of Hartlepool; in 657 founded the famous monastery at Streoneshall or Whitby, a double house for nuns and monks, over which she ruled wisely for twenty-two years.

Hildebrand. See GREGORY VII.

Hildebrandt, THEODOR (1804-74), historical and portrait painter, was born at Stettin, and died at Düsseldorf.—EDUARD HILDEBRANDT (1818-68), at first a poor house-painter, and afterwards a water-colour landscapist in all four continents, was born at Danzig, and died at Berlin. See Life by Arndt (2d ed. Berl. 1869).

Hilgenfeld, ADOLF, liberal theologian, born 2d June 1823, at Stappenbeck near Salzwedel, in 1850 became professor of Theology at Jena. Among his works are books on the Clementines (1848), the Apostolic Fathers (1853), the Gospels (1854), Das Urchristenthum (1855), the Jewish Apocalyptic Writings (1857), Ezra and Daniel (1863), Novum Testamentum extra Canonem receptum (1866; 2d ed. 1876-84), Messias Judeorum (1869), Ketzergeschichte des Urchristenthums (1884), and Hermas (1887). From 1858 he edited the Zeitschrift für Theologie. He died 12th Jan. 1907.

HILL, AARON (1685-1750), poetaster, playwright, and speculator, was born and died in London.

HILL, MATTHEW. See HILL, SIR ROWLAND.

HILL, OCTAVIA, born about 1838, laboured amongst the London poor under Frederick D. Maurice, and in 1864, supported by Mr Ruskin, commenced her great work of improving the homes of working-men in the slums of the metropolis. She has written Homes of the London Poor (1875), Our Common Land (1878), &c.

HILL, ROWLAND, a popular but eccentric preacher, was born 12th August 1744, at Hawkston Park, the sixth son of a Shropshire baronet. At St John's College, Cambridge, he fell under the influence of Whitefield, and began to tread in his footsteps. Ten years after his ordination were spent in itinerant preaching; but having built Surrey Chapel in Blackfriars Road, London, in 1783, he preached there to his life's end. It is said that the first Sunday-school in the metropolis was established by him. He died 11th April 1833. His Village Dialogues (1801) has sold in vast numbers. See Lives by Sidney (1834), W. Jones (1834), Sherman (1857), Broome (1881), and Charlesworth (1876; 2d ed. 1886).

HILL, ROWLAND, VISCOUNT HILL, general, son of Sir John Hill, Bart., of Hawkston, was born at Prees Hall, Shropshire, August 11, 1772. He commanded the 90th Regiment in Abercromby's Egyptian expedition. Wellington's right arm throughout the Peninsular war, he was made C.B. in 1811, and in 1814 Baron Hill. At Waterloo he led the brigade which swept the Old Guard from the field, and he remained as second in command with the army of occupation in France. He succeeded Wellington as commander-in-chief in 1828, but resigned in 1842, when he was made Viscount Hill. He died December 10, 1842. See Life by the Rev. Edwin Sidney (1845).

HILL, SIR ROWLAND, K.C.B., originator of penny postage, was born at Kidderninster, 3d December 1795, and was a teacher from an early age down to 1833. He was one of the founders of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge (1826), interested himself in the socialistic schemes of Robert Owen, and took an active share in the colonisation of South Australia. Sensible of the urgent need for reducing the high rates of postage, he advocated a low and uniform rate between all places in the British Isles in a pamphlet, Post-office Reform (1837). His plan was eagerly taken up by Mr Wallace, M.P. for Greenock. Two years later Hill was attached to the Treasury for the purpose of putting his projected reforms into execution; and on 10th January 1840 the present uniform penny rate came into force. In 1841 the Conservative government, which had opposed the reduction, came into office, and in 1842 Rowland Hill was dismissed. Four years later a sum of £13,000, raised by public subscription, was presented to him; and the Liberals, returning to power, made Hill secretary to the Postmaster-general, and in 1854 secretary to the Post-office. In 1864 he resigned owing to ill-health, and was awarded a pension of £2000 for life, together with a parliamentary grant of £20,000. He carried through the establishment of the book-post (1848), the reform of the money-order office (1848) and of the packet service. Made K.C.B. in 1860, he died at Hampstead, 27th August 1879, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See Sir Rowland Hill (1907) by his daughter, and the Life (1880) by his nephew, GEORGE BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L. (1835-1903), who, till 1876 head-master of Bruce Castle School, Tottenham, also wrote Dr Johnson: his Friends and his Critics (1878), and edited letters by Boswell and Hume, selections from Johnson, &c., and compiled a book on General Gordon in Africa.—Sir Rowland's eldest brother, MATTHEW DAVENPORT HILL (1792-1872), recorder of Birmingham 1839-66, did much for education and the reformation of criminals. See Memoir by his daughters (1878).—Another brother, FREDERIC (1803-96), was first an inspector of prisons, and then till 1876 assistant-secretary of the Post-office. See his Autobiography (1894).

Hillel (c. 60 B.C.-10 A.D.), surnamed HABABLI ('the Babylonian') and HAZAKEN ('the Elder'), one of the greatest doctors of the Jewish law, was born in Babylonia, and, coming about forty to Palestine, was chosen president of the Sanhedrim. See Delitzsch's Jesus unil Hillel (3d ed. 1879).

Hiller, FERDINAND (1811-85), pianist, composer, and writer on music, born at Frankfort-on-Main, from 1829 to 1836 taught in Paris, and was municipal music-director in Düsseldorf 1847-50, and then in Cologne till his death. Of his 200 musical works few have retained their footing, not even his oratorio Die Zerstörung von Jerusalem (1839). But his book on harmony reached a 14th edition in 1891; and other books are monographs on Beethoven (1871) and Mendelssohn (1874).

Hiller, JOHANN ADAM (1728-1804), a German composer of operettas. See Life by Peiser (1894).

Hillard, NICHOLAS (1537-1619), court goldsmith and miniaturist, was born at Exeter.

Hilton, WILLIAM (1756-1839), a religious and historical painter, born at Lincoln, was elected an A. R. A. in 1813 and an R. A. in 1818.

Hincmar (c. 806-882), a churchman of the family of the Counts of Toulouse, educated in the monastery of St Denis, was abbot of Compiègne and St Germain, and in 845 was elected Archbishop of Rheims. His suffragan Rothadus deposed a priest whom Hincmar ordered him to restore. For his refusal to comply Hincmar excommunicated the bishop, who appealed to the pope, and the pope, Nicholas I., annulled the sentence. Hincmar helped to degrade and imprison Gottschalk (who died in 868 after eighteen years' captivity) for his predestinarian views; he strenuously opposed Adrian II.'s attempts to compel to obedience in imperial politics by church censures; and with equal firmness he resisted the emperor's intruding unworthy favourites into benefices. See Life by Prichard (1849), and Germain works by Noorden (1862), Sdralek (1881), Schrörs (1884), and Büchting (1887).

Hind, JOHN RUSSELL, astronomer, born at Nottingham, May 12, 1823, in 1840 obtained a post at Greenwich Observatory, and in 1844 passed to Mr Bishop's observatory, Regent's Park, London, where he calculated the orbits of seventy planets and comets, noted new stars, and between 1847 and 1854 discovered ten minor planets. In 1852 he received a pension of £200 a-year, from 1853 to 1892 edited the Nautical Almanac. He died 23d December 1895. Amongst his works are Astronomical Vocabulary (1852), The Comets (1852), The Solar System (1852), Illustrated London Astronomy (1853), and Treatise on Comets (1857).

Hinton, JAMES, aurist and mystic, born at Reading in 1822, the son of a Baptist minister, settled in 1850 to a London practice, becoming a specialist in aural surgery. From 1862 till 1874 he was a lecturer at Guy's Hospital. He died in the Azores, 16th December 1875. He wrote Man and his Dwelling-place (1859), Life in Nature (1862), The Mystery of Pain (1865), Philosophy and Religion (1881), and The Law-breaker and Coming of the Law (1884). See Life by Elice Hopkins (1878).

Hipparchus, the first great astronomer, was born at Nicea in Bithynia, flourished between 160 and 125 B.C., and observed at Rhodes. He discovered the precession of the equinoxes and the eccentricity of the sun's path, determined the length of the solar year, estimated the distances of the sun and moon from the earth, drew up a catalogue of 1080 stars, and fixed the geographical position of places on the earth by giving their latitude and longitude.

Hippas and Hipparchus. See PISISTRATUS.

Hippocrates, the most celebrated physician of antiquity, was born in the island of Cos, probably about 460 B.C.; and there, after visiting Athens, he settled in practice. He died at Larissa in Thessaly in 377 or 359. The seventy-two works bearing his name were divided by Dr Greenhill into eight classes. The first class comprises works certainly written by Hippocrates, including Prognostica; Aphorismi (perhaps not all genuine); De Morbis Popularibus; De Ratione Victus in Morbis Acutis; De Aère, Aquis, et Locis; and De Capitis Vulneribus. The second class is composed of works perhaps written by Hippocrates. The others consist of works written before Hippocrates, works whose authorship is conjectural, works by quite unknown authors, wilful forgeries, &c. Hippocrates seems to have gathered up all that was sound in the past history of medicine, was good in diagnosis and prognosis, and believed that the four fluids or humours of the body (blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and black bile) are the primary seats of disease. His works were first printed in a Latin translation in 1525. The first Greek edition (the Aldine) appeared in 1526. Good editions are by Littré, with French translation (10 vols. 1839-61) and Fuchs (3 vols. Mun, 1895). A scholarly edition by Ermerius, with a Latin rendering, was published in 1859-65; and an excellent English translation of the Genuine Works of Hippocrates in 1849 by Adams. [Hip-pok'ra-teez.]

Hippolytus, a Greek Christian writer who wrote against the Gnostics and defended the doctrine of the Logos. He was with Irenæus in Gaul in 194 A.D., was a presbyter at Rome, and in 217 became anti-bishop in opposition to the heretical (Monarchian) Calixtus. The schism lasted till 235, when Hippolytus and the successor to Calixtus were both deported to Sardinia, and there Hippolytus died. He is generally believed to be the author of a Refutation of all Heresies in ten books, discovered in 1842 in a 14th century MS. at Mount Athos. The first book only had heretofore been known, and was attributed to Origen. He wrote also a smaller work against heretics extant in a Latin translation. There is a good edition of the works and fragments of Hippolytus by Lagarde (1858). For the vast controversy over him, see works by Bunsen (1852), Döllinger (1853; trans. 1874), Volkmar (1855), and Ficker (1893).

Hirsch, BARON MAURICE DE (1831-96), Jewish financier, millionaire, turfite, and philanthropist.

Hitchcock, EDWARD (1793-1864), born at Deerfield, Mass., was successively a Congregational pastor and professor of Chemistry, Natural History and Geology, and Natural Theology (1845-64) in Amherst College, of which he was also president 1845-54. He was state geologist of Massachusetts 1830-44, and of Vermont 1857-61, and wrote Ich-nology of New England (1858-65), &c.

Hitzig, FERDINAND (1807-75), rationalist critic, born at Hauningen in Baden, in 1833 became professor of Theology at Zurich, and in 1861 at Heidelberg. His commentary on Isaiah established his fame (1833). Besides a translation of the Psalms (1835-36), he furnished for the Ez-etisches Handbuch zum A. T. (1838-75) the commentaries on the twelve minor prophets, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Ecclesiastes, Daniel, the Song of Solomon, Proverbs, and Job. He also wrote Erfindung des Alphabets (1840), Urgeschichte und Mythologie der Philistæer (1845), Geschichte Israels (1869-70), &c.

Hoadly, BENJAMIN (1676-1761), born at Westerham, Kent, in 1697 became a fellow of Catharine Hall, Cambridge, in 1701 lecturer of St Mildred in the Poultry, and in 1703 rector of St Peter-le-Poor. Hoadly figures amongst the principal controversial writers of the 18th century, defending the cause of civil and religious liberty against both crown and clergy, and carrying on a controversy with Dr Atterbury on the obedience due to the civil power by ecclesiastics. In 1710 he was presented to the rectory of Streatham, and in 1715 was made Bishop of Bangor. In 1717 he preached before the king a sermon on 'My kingdom is not of this world,' in which he sought to show that Christ had not delegated His powers to any ecclesiastical authorities. This originated the Bangorian Controversy, which branched off into such a multiplicity of side-issues that the main question became lost. The dispute had, however, one important consequence—the indefinite pro-longation of Convocation. In 1721 Hoadly was translated to Hereford, in 1723 to Salisbury, and in 1734 to Winchester. His son published his Collected Works in 1773, with Life.

Hoare, SIR RICHARD COLT (1758-1838), anti-quary, was born and died at Stourhead, Wiltshire. The son of a banker, and after his accession to the baronetcy (1787) a gentleman of wealth, he devoted his leisure to travel and antiquarian pursuits, publishing a translation of Giraldus Cambrensis (1808), A Classical Tour through Italy and Sicily (1819), Ancient History of Wiltshire (1812-19), and Modern History of South Wiltshire (1822-44).

Hoare, WILLIAM (c. 1707-92), a portrait-painter, born in Suffolk, and known as 'Hoare of Bath,' became an original R.A. in 1768.—His son, PRINCE HOARE (1755-1834), wrote the words for musical farces, &c.

Hobart Pasha, the HON. AUGUSTUS CHARLES HOBART-HAMPDEN, third son of the Earl of Buckinghamshire, was born at Waltham-on-the-Wolds, Leicestershire, 1st April 1822, and in 1836 entered the British navy. He served against the slavers in Brazilian waters, then in the Baltic during the Crimean war. On the outbreak of the civil war in America he, as 'Captain Roberts,' repeatedly ran the blockade of the Southern ports with valuable cargoes. He entered the service of Turkey (1867), and for his services in checking the Greek blockade-runners to Crete was made pasha and admiral of the Ottoman fleet. In the Russo-Turkish war (1878) he commanded the Turkish Black Sea fleet. After each of these undertakings his name was struck off the British Navy list, but always restored. He died 19th June 1886 at Milan. He wrote Never Caught (1867), on his blockade-running exploits, and Sketches from My Life (ed. by his widow, 1887).

Hobbema, MEINERT, one of the greatest Dutch landscape-painters, born in 1638, probably at Amsterdam. He is believed to have studied art under Jacob Ruysdael, whose name appears as a witness to his marriage at Amsterdam, 2d October 1668, to Eeltje Vinck. She predeceased him in 1704; and he himself died in poverty at Amsterdam, 7th December 1709. Old Cromé's last words were, 'Hobbema, my dear Hobbema, how I have loved you!' His art usually deals with subjects of Dutch cottage and woodland scenery; the figures were executed by Berchem, Vanderveelde, and others. Small landscapes from his hand have repeatedly fetched over £4000, and one in 1892 brought 9610 guineas. Seven are in the National Gallery, London. See a French monograph by E. Michel (1890).

Hobbes, JOHN OLIVER. See CRAIGIE.

Hobbes, THOMAS, born at Malmesbury, 5th April 1588, was the son of the vicar of Charlton and Westport, and at fifteen was entered at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. At twenty, having taken his degree, he became tutor to the eldest son of Lord Cavendish, afterwards Earl of Devonshire, and in 1610 he went abroad with his pupil. After his return he continued to live with the Cavendishes, and came to know Bacon, Herbert of Cheshire, and Ben Jonson. Meanwhile he devoted his leisure to a study of the classical poets and historians. The outcome was his translation of Thucydides (1628). The Earl of Devonshire died in 1626, and to Hobbes's great grief the second earl, his pupil, in 1628. Next year Hobbes became travelling tutor to the son of Sir Gervase Clifton, and paid a second visit to the Continent; but in 1631 he undertook the education of the young Earl of Devonshire, the son of his former pupil, then only thirteen. From 1634 to 1637 they travelled abroad; and now Hobbes met Galileo in Italy, and Père Mersenne in Paris. Since 1629 he had been an ardent student of geometry, and he began to be drawn to the new 'mechanical philosophy' of Galileo. When he returned to England it was with the outline of a comprehensive philosophical system already before his mind, which he meant to embody in three treatises, De Corpore, De Cive, and De Homine. Owing to the civil troubles they did not appear in this order. In 1640 he wrote 'a little treatise in English' in defence of the royal prerogative. This is preserved in MS. under the title of The Elements of Law, Natural and Politic, and is identical with the two treatises, Human Nature and De Corpore Politico, published separately ten years later. Fearful lest the parliament should take notice of his treatise, Hobbes fled to Paris, where he stayed till 1651. In 1642 appeared the De Cive, a fuller statement of his theory of government. In 1650 were issued the two treatises already mentioned, and in 1651 a vigorous English translation of the De Cive (Philosophical Rudiments concerning Government and Society). Leviathan was printed in England, and appeared in 1651. Its rationalistic criticism and its uncompromising reduction of religion to a department of state mortally offended the royalist clergy. Hobbes had been mathematical tutor to Prince Charles in 1647, but on the publication of Leviathan the young king refused to see him. Hobbes returned to England in 1651, and sent in his submission to the Commonwealth. The De Corpore appeared in 1655, and the De Homine, a rather perfunctory revision of the old Human Nature, in 1658. From 1654 onwards Hobbes was engaged in almost perpetual controversy on liberty and necessity and in defence of his own hopelessly indefensible mathematical ideas. After the Restoration Charles granted him a pension of £100, but the church party looked with no favour upon the author of Leviathan, which was condemned by parliament in 1666. Three of his later works—Behemoth, The Common Laws, and a metrical Historia Ecclesiastica, all written about 1670—he was obliged to leave unpublished (though Behemoth issued surreptitiously from the press just before his death). A collected edition of his Latin works in 1668 had to appear at Amsterdam. At eighty-four Hobbes wrote an autobiography in Latin verse, and within the next three years he completed a verse translation of the Iliad and the Odyssey. From 1675 he lived at Hardwick and Chatsworth. He died at Hardwick, 4th December 1679, and was buried at Hault Hucknall. Hobbes stands in time between Bacon and Locke, but apart from both. It is by his contributions to scientific psychology, ethics, and political theory that he takes rank as an original thinker. His ethical theory, based on pure selfishness and the arbitrary prescription of a sovereign power, determined negatively ethical speculation in England for a hundred years—the great moralists wrote, directly or indirectly, as his opponents. His political absolutism, however, is the most famous part of his speculations. The state of nature, he argues, is a state of war and insecurity. Moved by a desire to escape from the intolerable evils of such a condition, human beings enter into a species of contract by which they surrender their individual rights, and constitute a state under an absolute sovereignty. The sovereign power need not be monarchical, but, whatever form it assume, it is absolute and irresponsible. A collected edition of his works was published by Molesworth (16 vols. 1839-45). See monograph by Croom Robertson (1886).

Hobhouse, JOHN CAM (1786-1869), the friend of Byron, was educated at Westminster and Trinity College, Cambridge. His Journey through Albania with Lord Byron he published in 1813. An advanced Liberal, he was returned for Westminster in 1820, and sat later for Nottingham and Harwich. Successively Irish Secretary, First Commissioner of Woods and Forests, and President of the Board of Control, he succeeded to his father's baronetcy in 1831, was created Baron Broughton in 1851. See his Recollections (1909-12) edited by his daughter.

Hobson, THOMAS (c. 1544-1631), the rich Cambridge carrier who let no one pick and choose in his livery-stables—hence 'Hobson's choice,' and whom Milton immortalised.

Hoby, SIR THOMAS (1530-66), translator of Castiglione's Courtier, was half-brother to the Protestant diplomatist, SIR PHILIP HOBY (1505-58).

Hoccleve, or OCCLEVE, THOMAS, poet, was born about 1368, was a clerk in the Exchequer, and was writing verse so late as 1448. His chief work is a free but tedious version of the De Regimine Principum of Egidius Romanus, in Chaucer's seven-line stanza, edited by T. Wright for the Roxburghe Club in 1860. His Minor Poems and Complaint were edited by Dr Furnival (E.E.T.S. 1892).

Hoche, LAZARE, French Republican general, born 25th June 1768, at Montreuil. In 1793 he defended Dunkirk against the Duke of York, and drove the Austrians out of Alsace. He put an end to the civil war in La Vendée (1795), and was appointed to command the expedition to Ireland (1796). In 1797 he crossed the Rhine at Neuwied, defeated the Austrians in several battles, and died 18th September. Of half-a-dozen Lives, that by Font-Realux (1900) is one of the best. [Hoach.]

Hocking, JOSEPH, novelist, born at St Stephens in Cornwall in 1849, was from 1878 a land-surveyor and 1884 a Nonconformist minister. Since 1891 he has published over a dozen novels, including Jabez Easterbrook (1891), All Men are Liars, and The Birthright.—His younger brother, SILAS KITTO, born 1850, held from 1870 several cures as a minister of the Methodist Free Church, but resigned in 1896. Of the score of novels published by him since 1878 (Iler Benny, Caleb Carthew, In Spite of Fate, &c.), well over a million copies were sold in 1900 alone.

Hodge, CHARLES (1797-1878), theologian, born in Philadelphia, in 1822 became professor in Princeton Theological Seminary. He founded and edited the Princeton Review, and wrote commentaries on Romans, Corinthians, and Ephesians, a history of the Presbyterian Church in America (1840), and the well-known Systematic Theology (1871-72). See Lives by Patton (1888) and his son (1880).—That son, ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER (1823-86), who succeeded his father at Princeton in 1878, wrote Outlines of Theology (1860) and works on the Atonement and the Confession of Faith.

Hodgkin, THOMAS, D.C.L., the author of Italy and her Invaders (8 vols. 1880-99), &c., was born of Quaker stock at Tottenham, 29th July 1831, and became a banker in Newcastle.

Hodgkinson, EATON (1789-1861), a Manchester engineer, the great authority on iron beams, in 1847 became professor of Engineering in University College, London.

Hodgson, BRIAN HOUGHTON, F.R.S. (1800-95), orientalist, was born near Macclesfield, entered the East India Company's service in 1818, was Resident in Nepal 1820-43, and settled in England in 1858. He wrote some 170 very valuable papers on the ethnology, languages, and zoology of Nepal and Tibet, sent home 354 MSS., on which our knowledge of northern Buddhism is mainly based, and made a collection of 10,500 birds. See the Life by Sir William Hunter (1896).

Hodgson, JOHN EVAN, a painter largely of Moorish subjects, was born in London, 1st March 1831, and educated at Rugby. In 1878 he was elected an A.R.A., in 1879 an R.A.; in 1882 became Academy librarian and professor of Painting. He died at Coleshill, Bucks, 19th June 1895.

Hodson, WILLIAM STEPHEN RAIKES, born at Maisemore Court near Gloucester, 19th March 1821, joined the Indian army in 1845, served in the first Sikh war, and in 1847 became second in command of the Punjab Guides. In 1849-52 he did civil work in the Punjab, and then as commandant of the Guides did excellent service on the turbulent frontier. But in 1856 he was deprived of his command for irregularities in the regimental accounts and unjust treatment of the natives. During the Mutiny he was head of the intelligence department before Delhi, and raised the irregular cavalry known as Hodson's Horse. On the fall of Delhi he discovered the Mogul and his sons; these last he shot with his own hand. He himself was shot on 11th March 1858 at Lucknow, and died the day after. See Rev. G. Hodson's Hodson's Horse (4th ed. 1883), and L. T. Trotter's Life of him (1901).

Hoeven, JAN VAN DER (1801-68), physician and zoological professor at Leyden, wrote a handbook of Zoology (trans. 1858).—His brother, CORNELIS PRUYS (1792-1871), professor of Medicine at Leyden, wrote De Historia Medicinæ (1842) and De Historia Morborum (1846). [Hoo-ven.]

Hoey, FRANCES SARAH, née JOHNSTON, novelist and translator, was born at Bushy Park, Rathfarnham, Co. Dublin, 15th February 1830, and in 1858 married for her second husband John Cashel Hoey, Esq., C.M.G. She died in July 1908.

Hofer, ANDREAS, the patriot peasant leader of the Tyrolese, was born at St Leonhard, 22d November 1767, and like his forefathers kept a small inn. When in 1809 he called the Tyrolese to arms to expel the French and Bavarians, they responded with enthusiasm; in seven weeks he swept the Bavarians out. As the armistice after Wagram left Tyrol out in the cold, the French again invaded them; but in eight days Hofer routed the foe and retook Innsbruck, and for the next two months was ruler of his native land. By the peace of Vienna (October 14) Austria again left Tyrol at the mercy of her enemies. Hofer once more took up arms; but this time the French and Bavarians were too strong for him; Hofer had to disband his followers and take refuge in the mountains. Two months later he was betrayed, carried to Mantua, tried by court-martial, and shot, 20th February 1810. See Lives by Weidinger (3d ed. 1861), Heigel (1874), and Stampfer (1874).

Hoffmann, AUGUST HEINRICH ('Hoffmann von Fallersleben'), poet and philologist, was born 2d April 1798, at Fallersleben in Lüneburg, and became keeper of the university library of Breslau, and professor of the German Language there from 1835. The publication of his Unpolitische Lieder (1842) cost him his chair. In 1860 he became librarian to the Duke of Ratibor at Korvei, and there he died 19th January 1874. He wrote Horæ Belgicæ (1830-62), Reineke Vos (1834), Geschichte des Deutschen Kirchenlieds (1832), collections of ancient German Political (1843) and Social (1844) songs, &c. His poetry often approaches good Volkstlieder in its simplicity, tenderness, and playful banter. His political poetry helped to bring about the fermentation of 1848. An edition of his works in 8 vols. appeared in 1890-93. See his Autobiography (6 vols. 1868-70) and Life by Wagner (1869-70).

Hoffmann, ERNST THEODOR WILHELM, writer, composer, critic, and caricaturist, was born at Königsberg, 24th January 1776. In 1796 he was appointed assessor at Posen; but his love of caricature got him into trouble, and he was degraded to an inferior post. Recovering ground again, he was transferred to Warsaw (1804); but the occupation by the French in 1806 deprived him of office. For the next ten years he led a precarious existence, writing meantime a remarkable essay on Mozart's Don Juan, composing an opera on Fouque's Undine, and for two months (1808) director of the theatre at Bamberg. In 1815 he resumed his career in the Prussian service, and from 1816 until his death, 25th June 1822, held a position in the supreme court at Berlin. Hoffmann was the arch-priest of ultra-German romanticism. He waged incessant war upon the sticklers for routine and conventionalism. His wit bubbled over in irony, ridicule, sarcasm; and his imagination was inexhaustible, but utterly undisciplined, wild, and fantastic. His shorter tales were mostly published in the collections Phantasiestücke (1814), Nachtstücke (1817), and Die Serapiensbrüder (1819-25). His longer works include Elixire des Teufels (1816; trans. 1824), Seltsame Leiden eines Theaterdirektors (1819), Klein Zaches (1819), and Lebensansichten des Katers Murr (1821-22), partly autobiographical. Of his fairy tales, Der Goldene Topf was translated by Carlyle (1827). A complete edition of his works appeared in 1879-83 (15 vols.). Collections of his tales have been translated into English by Gillies (1826), Bealy, with biography (1885), and Ewing (1886). See German Lives by Hitzig (1823), Funck (1836), and Ellinger (1894); and Carlyle's Miscellanies.

Hoffmann, FRIEDRICH (1660-1742), was professor of Medicine at Halle, and body physician to Frederick I. of Prussia. His chief work is Medicina Rationalis Systematica (1718-40).

Hoffmann, HEINRICH (1809-94), a Frankfort doctor, the author and illustrator of the immortal Struwwelpeter (1847).

Hofland, BARBARA, née Wreaks (1770-1844), author of The Son of a Genius and over twenty more novels, was born at Sheffield, and married in 1796 a manufacturer, T. B. Hoole, in 1808 the landscape-painter, THOMAS CHRISTOPHER HOFLAND (1777-1843), who was born at Worksop.

Hofmann, AUGUST WILHELM VON, chemist, born at Giessen, 8th April 1818, became assistant there to Liebig. When the Royal College of Chemistry was established in London in 1845 Hofmann was made superintendent; and from 1856 to 1865 he was chemist to the royal mint. In 1865 he went to Berlin as professor of Chemistry, and, ennobled in 1888, he died there, 5th May 1892. His contributions to the scientific journals were mainly on organic chemistry. In the course of these researches he obtained aniline from coal-products. He devoted much labour to the theory of chemical types. His Introduction to Modern Chemistry (1865; 7th ed. 1877) led to great reforms in the teaching of chemistry. He wrote The Life-work of Liebig (1876), and, in German, on the chemists Wöhler (1883) and Dumas (1885), as also Chemische Erinnerungen (1882).

Hoffmann, JOHANN CHRISTIAN KARL VON, theologian, was born at Nuremberg, 21st December 1810, and having been docent and extra-ordinary professor of Theology at Erlangen, became professor at Rostock, whence in 1845 he returned to Erlangen. He was ennobled in 1857, and died 20th December 1877. In his works he maintained unwavering Lutheranism, the chief being his book on prophecy (1841-44) and the defence of Christianity from its records, Der Schriftbeweis (1852-56; 2d ed. 1857-60).

Hogarth, WILLIAM, born in London, 10th November 1697, served his apprenticeship to a silversmith, and studied art at Sir James Thornhill's school. About 1720 he set up for himself. His first employment was to engrave coats of arms, crests, shop-bills, &c., after which he began to design plates for the booksellers—as for Gray's edition of Hudibras (1726). He next tried portrait-painting, and soon had ample employment. In 1729 he married clandestinely the daughter of Sir James Thornhill. In 1730-31 he painted 'A Harlot's Progress,' a series of six pictures engraved by himself, like many of his other works. This was followed by other moral histories and satiric delineations, such as 'A Midnight Modern Conversation' (1734), 'Southwark Fair' (1735), 'A Rake's Progress' (1735), 'The Distressed Poet' (1736), 'The Four Times of the Day,' and the 'Strolling Actresses dressing in a Barn' (1738). With far less success he produced the large canvases still in Bartholomew's Hospital—the 'Pool of Bethesda' and the 'Good Samaritan' (1736); and he also painted several portraits. The series of graphic satires was, however, continued by the 'Enraged Musician' (1741); 'Mariage à la Mode' (his masterpiece), six pictures now in the National Gallery; 'Industry and Idleness,' twelve plates (1747); 'Calais Gate' (1749); and the fine plate known as the 'March to Finchley' (1750). The plates of 'Beer Street' and 'Gin Lane' and 'The Progress of Cruelty' belong to 1751. In 1752 he published the Analysis of Beauty, a treatise containing many shrewd remarks, but confused and illiterate in its style. After this he produced (with the aid of Grignon and others) the four prints of the 'Election Series' (1755-58), the 'Cockpit' (1759), and other pieces. In 1757 he was appointed sergeant-painter to the king. In 1762-63 an unhappy excursion into politics involved him in a quarrel with Wilkes and Churchill, one result of which was the well-known portraits of Wilkes and of Churchill (the latter as a bear). By this time his health was failing. He composed a tail-piece to his works, 'Finis, or the Bathos,' March 1764; and died 25th October of that year. He was buried at Chiswick. Hogarth's powers of invention and combination were extraordinary; as a humorist and social satirist with the pencil he has never been surpassed. His prints can be studied in the collections of Boydell (1790) or of Baldwin and Cradock (1820-22). See biographical studies by G. A. Sala (1866), Austin Dobson (1879; enlarged in successive editions until 1907), G. E. Anstruther (1902), Mrs Bell (1902), discussion of his engravings in works by Ireland (1791-98), Nichols and Stevens's Genuine Works (1808-17), and F. G. Stephens's *B.M. Hogg, JAMES, the 'Ettrick Shepherd,' was born near the parish church of Ettrick, Selkirkshire, in 1770, and baptised 9th December. His education was conducted very irregularly, owing to his being frequently taken from school to help his father in tending sheep. About 1786 a perusal of The Gentle Shepherd and Life and Adventures of Sir William Wallace kindled his poetic fancy; but it was not till 1796 that he attempted to write verses. In 1800 one of his poems, 'Donald M'Donald,' having for its subject the threatened invasion by Napoleon, was published anonymously. In 1801, having visited Edinburgh to sell his employer's sheep, he had printed in pamphlet form Scottish Pastorals, Poems, Songs, &c., but it fell flat. At this time Hogg contemplated emigration to Harris, and wrote a 'Farewell to Ettrick.' His scheme fell through, but he was fortunate enough to make the acquaintance of Scott, then Sheriff of Selkirkshire. Having written out several ballads from his mother's recitation, he sent them to Scott, who gave them a place in vol. iii. of his Border Minstrelsy (1803). The same year Constable published a volume of verse entitled The Mountain Bard, and also a treatise, Hogg on Sheep. The two brought him £300, which he sank in a farm that proved a total failure. After several years of vicissitude Hogg repaired to Edinburgh, and entered on a literary career. He published in 1810 a second volume of poems, The Forest Minstrel, which proved a failure, and started a weekly paper, The Spy, which lasted a twelve-month. In 1813 appeared his greatest work, The Queen's Wake, and at once obtained cordial recognition from the critics. Hogg had made the friendship of Harriet, Duchess of Buccleuch, and in accordance with her death-bed request her husband granted him, at a nominal rent, one of his farms known as Altrive Lake (now Eldinhope). But Hogg hampered himself by taking the neighbouring farm of Mount Benger, and was more or less in pecuniary difficulties to the end of his days. In 1820 he married Margaret Phillips, the daughter of a tenant-farmer in Annandale. She proved an admirable wife, although twenty years younger than her husband. Hogg now produced in rapid succession a number of works both in verse and prose. Of the former the chief are Mador of the Moor, The Pilgrims of the Sun, Queen Hynde, and the Border Garland; of the latter, The Brownie of Bodsbeck, Winter Evening Tales, The Three Perils of Man, The Three Perils of Woman, and Confessions of a Justified Sinner, otherwise known as The Private Memoirs and Confessions of a Fanatic. Hogg was at this time a well-known figure in Edinburgh society, wrote considerably for Blackwood's Magazine, and was the 'Shepherd' of the Noctes Ambrosianæ. In 1831 he visited London to arrange for the publication of a complete edition of his works. He died at Altrive, November 21, 1835. Hogg's description of himself as 'the king of the Mountain and Fairy School' of poetry, egotistic though it is, holds good so far as Scotland is concerned. Some of his ballads, such as 'The Witch of Fife,' and a few of his songs, especially 'When the Kye comes Hame,' belong to the immortal part of Scottish if not of English literature. After Burns, Hogg is unquestionably the greatest peasant-poet Scotland has produced. His prose, much more unequal than his poetry, is marked by a strong though coarsish humour. See Hogg's Autobiography, and Memorials of the Ettrick Shepherd, by his daughter, Mrs Garden (1885).

Hohenlohe, CHLODWIG, FÜRST ZU (1819-1901), statesman, born at Rothenburg in Bavaria, in 1866-70 was Bavarian prime-minister, and in 1874 became German ambassador to France, in 1885 governor-general of Alsace-Lorraine, and in 1894 Caprivi's successor as chancellor of the German empire and prime-minister of Prussia.

Hohenstaufen, a German princely house, members of which held the Imperial throne from 1188 to 1254 as Conrad III., Frederick I., Henry VI., Philip I., Frederick II., and Conrad IV. See the history of the house by Raumer (5th ed. 1878).

Hohenzollern, a German family descended from Count Thassilo, who early in the 9th century founded a castle on the Zollern hill in the Swabian Alb. About 1165 a separation took place into an elder or Swabian and younger or Franconian line. The elder line was subdivided, in 1576, into the branches of Hechingen and Sigmaringen. In 1415 the younger line received from the Emperor Sigismund the electorate of Brandenburg, thus founding the Prussian dynasty; and in 1849 the two princes of the elder line ceded their rights to the king of Prussia.

Holbach, PAUL HEINRICH DIETRICH, BARON D' (1728-89), philosopher and French encyclopædist, was born at Heidesheim in the Palatinate, and settled and died in Paris. The intimate friend of Condorcet, Diderot, Helvetius, Rousseau, Buffon, &c., he was the zealous champion of naturalism, and contended not only against Christianity, but against every positive religion. In his principal work, Système de la Nature (1770), he endeavours to expound the natural principles of morality, and prove, among other things, that self-interest is the ruling motive of man, and that God is only an imaginary being, created by kings and priests. Holbach was, in spite of his theories, a man of most unselfish benevolence.

Holbeach, HENRY. See RANDS.

Holbein, HANS, the younger, was born at Augsburg in 1497, the son of Hans Holbein the elder (c. 1460-1524), also a painter of merit. He studied under his father, and was influenced by the work of Burgkmair. The finest of his early pictures was the altarpiece for the monastery of St Catharine (1515-16), now in the Pinakothek, Munich. About 1516 he was at work in Basel, but did not settle there till 1520; during the interval he was painting at Zurich and Lucerne. Among works executed at Basel are the portraits of the Burgo-master Meier and his wife, the 'Meier Madonna' (at Darmstadt and, in replica, at Dresden), eight scenes of the Passion, painted upon a panel (and now in the Basel museum), and the doors of the organ of Basel Cathedral. Among the portraits are also two of Erasmus and one of Melancthon. During his residence at Basel Holbein was largely employed upon designs for the wood-engravers, including illustrations for various editions of Luther's Old and New Testaments (1522 and 1523), as also the large single woodcuts of 'Christ bearing the Cross,' 'The Resurrection,' 'The Sale of Indulgences,' and 'The True Light.' His most important woodcuts, however—the noble series of 'The Dance of Death' and the 'Old Testament Cuts'—were not issued till 1538. About the end of 1526 Holbein visited England, where he was introduced by Erasmus to Sir Thomas More, and began his great series of portraits of eminent Englishmen of his time, the studies for many of which exist in the royal collection at Windsor. Among the most notable of these portraits are 'Archbishop Warham,' 'Sir Henry Guildford,' 'Nicholas Kratzer,' the king's astronomer, in the Louvre; and 'The Family of Sir Thomas More,' now lost, but known by copies and the original sketch. On his return to Basel (1529) Holbein painted the group of his wife and two children now in the museum there; and in 1530 resumed work in the council-hall, executing pictures that are now destroyed. Probably in 1532 he again visited London, where he painted many portraits for the German merchants of the Hanseatic League. To this period are also due the great portrait group at Longford Castle known as 'The Ambassadors,' the portraits of Thomas Cromwell, and the miniatures of Henry and Charles Brandon, sons of the Duke of Suffolk, in the royal collection at Windsor. In 1536 he was appointed painter to Henry VIII., and as such executed at Whitehall Palace a mural painting of the monarch and Queen Jane Seymour, with Henry VII. and Elizabeth of York, destroyed in the fire of 1698. His portrait of Jane Seymour is in the Belvedere, Vienna. To the same period is referable the half-length of Sir Nicholas Carew at Dalkeith Palace, and the portrait of Morett the jeweller in the Dresden Gallery. In 1538 Holbein was despatched to the Netherlands to paint a likeness (now in the possession of the Duke of Norfolk) of Christina of Denmark, proposed as successor to Jane Seymour; and in 1539 he painted Anne of Cleves, at Cleves, a work now in the Louvre; while about 1540 he executed the portrait of the Duke of Norfolk, of which the original is at Windsor. His last work was 'Henry VIII. granting a Charter to the Barber-Surgeons,' still in their guildhall. He died of the plague in London between 7th October and 29th November 1543. Holbein is seen at his highest in portraiture; in this department he ranks with the greatest masters. See Lives by Woltmann (2d ed. 1874-76) and Knackfuss (1900), both translated; French works by Mantz (1879) and His (1886); English Lives by Wornum (1867) and Mrs Fortescue (1904), but especially that by G. S. Davies (1903).

Holberg, LUDVIG, BARON, creator of modern Danish literature, born at Bergen in Norway, 8d December 1684, became professor at Copenhagen of Metaphysics (1717), Eloquence (1720), and History (1730), quæstor of the university (1737), and a baron (1747). He died 28th January 1754. His first notable works were satirical poems, among them Peder Paars (1719-20), in which he ridicules the pedantic stiffness and stupidity of contemporary life and thought. In 1721 the first Danish theatre was opened at Copenhagen, and Holberg began to write comedies with marvellous success. After 1724 he turned to history, and wrote, amongst other books, a History of Denmark, a General Church History, a History of the Jews, and Comparative Biographies of Great Men and Women. In 1741 he produced another classic, the satirico-humorous romance Niels Klim's Subterranean Journey; and lastly the serious reflective works, Moral Thoughts (1744) and Epistles (1748-54), and his own Autobiography (1727-43). Peder Paars, the Subterranean Journey, and the Autobiography have been translated into English. The best edition of his Comedies is that published by the Holberg Society (1848-53; new ed. 1884). See monographs by Rahbek (1815-17), Werlauff (2d ed. 1856), Prutz (1857), Holm (1879), Brandes (Berl. 1885), and Olsvig (1895).

Holcroft, THOMAS, playwright and novelist, was born in London, 10th December 1745 (o.s.). His father, in whom fondness alternated with fury, was by turns a shoemaker, horse-dealer, and pedlar; and he himself, after three years as a Newmarket stable-boy, then eight as a shoemaker, schoolmaster, and servant-secretary to Granville Sharpe, in 1770 turned strolling player. But settling in London (1777), he took to authorship. Alwyn, or the Gentleman Comedian (1780), was the first of four novels; Duplicity (1781), of upwards of thirty plays. Of the latter, The Follies of a Day (1784), brought him more than £600; and The Road to Ruin (1792), £1300. Between these befell the death of his eldest son, William (1773-89), who having robbed his father of £40, and been found by him on an American-bound vessel, shot himself. An ardent democrat, in 1794 he was tried for high-treason with Hardy, Horne Tooke, and nine others. The proceedings fell through, but the animosity of party spirit entailed a run of ill-luck at the theatres, which, with unfortunate speculations, led Holcroft to sell his books and effects (1799), and to retire for four years to Hamburg and Paris. He died in London, 23d March 1809. See his own Memoirs, continued by Hazlitt (3 vols. 1816).

Holden, EDWARD SINGLETON, born at St Louis, Missouri, 15th Nov. 1846, in 1881 became professor of Astronomy at Madison, in 1886 president of the University of California, and in 1888-98 director of the Lick Observatory on Mount Hamilton.

Holden, HUBERT ASHTON, LL.D. (1822-96), the editor of Aristophanes, graduated as senior classic in 1845 from Trinity College, Cambridge, of which in 1847 he was elected a fellow. From 1858 to 1883 he was head-master of Ipswich School.

Holden, SIR ISAAC, inventor, was born 7th May 1807, at Hurler, Renfrewshire. While a worker in a cotton-mill in Paisley he fitted himself for the post of an assistant-teacher, and in 1829, while teaching chemistry at Reading, he hit on the principle of the lucifer match, though in this John Walker of Stockton had anticipated him. In 1846 he joined with Mr Lister, who had done much to improve wool-combing, in starting a mill near Paris. Lister retired, the firm became Isaac Holden & Sons in 1859, and the Alston works near Bradford were founded. After he had spent some £50,000 in experiments, Holden's wool-combing machinery brought him fame and fortune. He was Liberal member for Knaresborough 1865-68, for the North-west Riding 1882-85, and for the Keighley division of Yorkshire 1885-95. In 1893 he was created a baronet. He died at Oakworth near Keighley, 13th Aug. 1897.

Hole, WILLIAM, historical and portrait painter and etcher, born at Salisbury, 7th Nov. 1846, from Edinburgh Academy passed to the university, became a civil engineer, but took to art, and was elected A.R.S.A. in 1878, R.S.A. in 1889.

Holinshed, RAPHAEL, chronicler, born apparently of Cheshire family, came to London early in Elizabeth's reign, got employment as a translator in Reginald Wolfe's printing-office, and died about 1580. For Wolfe and his successors he undertook the compilation of The Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland (2 vols. fol. 1577; best ed. 6 vols. 1807-8). This together with its predecessor, the Chronicle of Hall, was the direct source from which Shakespeare drew materials for legendary and historical plays. Holinshed was not the only writer of the work which bears his name. He was assisted by William Harrison (q.v.); by Richard Stanyhurst, who contributed the description of Ireland; and by John Hooker, who wrote most of the history of Ireland. Holinshed had access to Leland's manuscripts. See Boswell Stone, Shakespeare's Holinshed (1896).

Holkar, a powerful Mahratta family, whose members have been formidable enemies to the British empire in India. Its founder, Mulhar Rao Holkar, was born in the Deccan in 1693, and in 1724 obtained from the Peishwah the western half of Malwa, with Indore for his capital.

Holl, FRANK, R.A., painter, was born in Kenilworth Town, 4th July 1845, a son of the engraver, Francis Holl, A.R.A. (1815-84). In 1860 he entered the schools of the Royal Academy, where in 1863 he won a two years' scholarship, and in 1868 the travelling studentship. He exhibited in the Royal Academy many genre-subjects, usually pathetic scenes from modern life; after 1877 he attained immense popularity in portraiture. He was elected A.R.A. in 1878, and R.A. in 1884. He died in London, 31st July 1888.

Holland, SIR HENRY, physician and writer, was born at Knutsford, Cheshire, 27th October 1788. He graduated at Edinburgh in 1811, and in 1815 published Travels in Albania, Thessaly, &c. He settled in London in 1816; became one of the heads of his profession; and in 1840 was appointed physician to the Prince Consort, in 1852 to the Queen; and in 1853 was created a baronet. He published Medical Notes and Reflections (1839), Chapters on Mental Physiology (1852), Essays on Scientific Subjects (1862), and Recollections of Past Life (1871). He died in London, 27th October 1873.—His eldest son, HENRY THURSTON HOLLAND, born 3d August 1825, and educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge, was called to the bar in 1849, in 1874 entered parliament as a Conservative, was Colonial Secretary 1887-92, and in 1888 was created Baron, in 1895 Viscount, Knutsford.

Holland, HENRY RICHARD FOX, LORD, F.R.S., was born at Winterslow House, Wilts, 21st November 1773, and succeeded his father as third lord in 1774. Educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, he was trained for public life by his uncle, Charles James Fox, after whose death he was Lord Privy Seal in the Grenville ministry (1806-7). He then shared the long banishment of the Whigs from office. He laboured to mitigate the severity of the criminal code; made manful war, though a West India planter, on the slave-trade; threw his whole heart into the Corn Laws struggle; and laboured to extend and confirm the liberties of the subject. Chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster (1830-34), he died at Holland House, Kensington, October 22, 1840. He wrote biographies of Guillen de Castro and Lope de Vega, translated Spanish comedies, prepared a Life of his uncle, and edited the memoirs of Lord Waldegrave.—His wife, ELIZABETH VASSALL (1770-1845), daughter of a wealthy Jamaica planter, married in 1786 Sir Godfrey Webster, but the marriage was dissolved in 1797 for her adultery with Lord Holland, who immediately married her. She was distinguished for beauty, conversational gifts, and autocratic ways; and till the end of her life her house was the meeting-place of the most brilliant wits and distinguished statesmen of the time.—Their son, the fourth Lord Holland (1802-59), edited two works by his father, Foreign Reminiscences (1850) and Memoirs of the Whig Party (1854). See Further Memoirs (1905) and Lady Holland's Journals (1908).

Holland, HENRY SCOTT, born at Ledbury in 1847, and educated at Eton and Balliol, took first-class honours in 1870, and, after having been theological tutor at Christ Church and select preacher, became a canon of Truro in 1882, of St Paul's in 1884, of Christ Church in 1910, when he was appointed regius professor of Divinity, Oxford. He published some volumes of sermons.

Holland, JOSIAH GILBERT (1819-81), born in Belchertown, Mass., became assistant editor of the Springfield Republican and part proprietor in 1851. In 1870, with Roswell Smith and the Scribners, he founded Scribner's Monthly, which he edited, and in which appeared his novels, Arthur Bonnicastle (1873), The Story of Sevenoaks (1875), and Nicholas Minturn (1876). Other works were Timothy Titcomb's Letters (1858), a Life of Lincoln, and his poems, Bitter Sweet (1858), Katharina (1867), and The Mistress of the Manse (1874). See Life by Mrs Plunkett (1894).

Holland, PHILEMON (1552-1637), 'the translator-general in his age,' was born at Chelmsford, from about 1595 practised medicine at Coventry, and in 1628 became for ten months head-master of the free school there. His more notable translations were Livy, Pliny's Natural History, Suetonius, Plutarch's Morals, Ammianus Marcellinus, Xenophon's Cyropædia, and Camden's Britannia.—His son, HENRY HOLLAND (1583-c. 1650), a bookseller in London, published Buzilitologia (1618) and Herologia Anglica (1620).

Hollar, WENCESLAUS (1607-77), engraver and etcher, born at Prague; came to London with the Earl of Arundel in 1637; served in a royalist regiment, and was taken prisoner at Basing House; from 1645, to 1652 lived at Antwerp; and then returning to London, was at the Restoration appointed 'His Majesty's designer.' See German monograph by Partley (Berl. 1853-58).

Holles, DENZIL, LORD, the second son of the Earl of Clare, was born 31st October 1599. He entered parliament in 1624. In 1629 he was one of the members who held the Speaker in his chair whilst resolutions were passed against Arminianism and tonnage and poundage. For this he was fined a thousand marks, and lived seven or eight years in banishment. He was one of the 'five members' whom Charles attempted to arrest in 1642, and was a leader of the Presbyterians. In the Civil War, dreading the supremacy of the army more than the pretensions of the king, he was an advocate of peace. For proposing in 1647 to disband the army he was accused of treason, but fled to Normandy. In 1660 he was the spokesman of the commission delegated to recall Charles II. at Breda; in 1661 he was created Lord Holles of Ifield in Sussex. His last important public duty was the negotiation of the treaty of Breda in 1667. As Charles's propensities towards absolutism became more pronounced Holles leaned more to the opposition. He died 17th February 1680. See his own Memoirs, 1644-48 (1699).

Hollingshead, JOHN (1827-1904), journalist and theatrical director, born in London, began to write for Household Words in 1857. See his My Lifetime (1895) and Gaiety Chronicles (1898).

Hollingshead. See HOLINSHED.

Holloway, THOMAS (1800-83), patent medicine man, was born at Devonport, and died at Titchenhurst, Berkshire, having latterly spent £50,000 a-year on advertising. He founded at Egham, near Virginia Water, a women's college and a sanatorium or asylum for the insane.

Holman, JAMES, 'the Blind Traveller,' was born at Exeter, 15th October 1786, and was a lieutenant in the navy when, in 1810, the loss of sight compelled him to quit the service. Yet in 1819-21 he travelled through France, Italy, and the Rhine lands. He next started on a journey (1822-24) round the world, but at Irkutsk in Siberia was arrested as a spy and sent back. He again set off in 1827, and this time accomplished his purpose. Finally, he visited the countries of south-east Europe. He died 29th July 1857. He published narratives of his successive journeys.

Holmes, JAMES (1777-1860), painter and miniaturist. See work by A. T. Story (1894).

Holmes, OLIVER WENDELL, born in Cambridge, Mass., August 29, 1809, graduated at Harvard College in 1829, and, giving up law for medicine, spent two years in the hospitals of Europe. In 1839-41 he was professor of Anatomy and Physiology at Dartmouth College; then he engaged in general practice in Boston. From 1847 to 1882 he was professor of Anatomy at Harvard. He began writing verse while an undergraduate, but his first efforts were not remarkable. Twenty years passed with desultory efforts and a slowly increasing power, when The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table (1857-58) suddenly made him famous by its fresh unconventional tone, its playful wit and wisdom, and its lovely vignettes of verse. The Professor at the Breakfast Table (1858-59) and The Poet at the Breakfast Table (1872) deal with deeper questions in a less familiar way. His first effort in fiction was Elsie Venner (1859-60), a study of heredity. The Guardian Angel (1867) is a picture of rural New England. A Mortal Antipathy (1885) contains but a thread of story. These works appeared in the Atlantic Monthly, of which he was one of the founders. He wrote for it also many occasional essays and poems. Besides the early volume of poems (1856), he published Songs in Many Keys (1862), Songs of Many Seasons (1875), The Iron Gate (1880), and Before the Curfew (1888). Other prose works are Currents and Counter-currents (1861), Soundings from the Atlantic (1864), Border Lines of Knowledge (1862), Mechanism in Thought and Morals (1871), and Memoirs of Motley (1879) and Emerson (1885). He also wrote Our Hundred Days in Europe (1887), an account of a visit made in 1886, during which he received honours from the universities of Cambridge, Oxford, and Edinburgh. He died at Boston, 7th October 1894. See Lives by Kennedy (1883), Brown (1884), Morse (1896), and Townsend (1909).

Holroyd. See SHEFFIELD, EARL OF.

Holsten, KARL CHRISTIAN JOHANN, Protestant theologian, born at Güstrow, 31st March 1825, became professor at Bern in 1870, in 1876 at Heidelberg. His startling work on the Gospel of Paul and Peter (1867) was followed by Das Evangelium des Paulus (1880), a work on the three original, unwritten gospels (1883), and Die Synoptischen Evangelien (1886). He died 27th January 1897.

Holt, SIR JOHN, born at Thame, 30th December 1642, from Winchester passed in 1658 to Oriel College, Oxford, and, entering at Gray's Inn, was called to the bar in 1663. He figured as counsel in most of the state-trials of that period, and in 1686 was made recorder of London and king's serjeant, and knighted. In 1689 he became Lord Chief-justice of the King's Bench, and filled the post until his death, 3d March 1710. He was a Whig, but his judicial career was entirely free from party bias or intrigue. See Life (1764).

Holt, JOSEPH (1756-1826), Irish rebel, born near Arklow, was transported to Sydney in 1800, but, having got a pardon, returned to Dublin in 1814. See his Autobiography (1888).

Holt, WILLIAM (1545-99), a Jesuit plotter against Elizabeth, was born at Ashworth in Lancashire, and died at Barcelona.

Holtei, KARL VON (1798-1880), German poet and romance-writer, was born and died at Breslau.

Holtzendorff, FRANZ VON (1829-89), jurist, born at Vietnansdorf in Brandenburg, practised law at Berlin till 1857, and was successively professor of Law at Berlin (1861) and Munich (1873). He wrote much on the reform of the penal system, a work on Irish prisons, one on the principles of politics, an encyclopædia of law, and several handbooks. See Life by Störk (1889).

Holtzmann, ADOLF (1810-70), Germanist, born at Carlsruhe, in 1852 became professor of German at Heidelberg. He wrote on the connection between Greek and Indian fables (1844-47); on Celts and Germans (1855), maintaining that the two races were originally identical; and on the Nibelungenlied (1854). After his death appeared German. Altertümer (1873), Deutsche Mythologie (1874), and Die ältere Edda (1875).—His son, HEINRICH JULIUS (1832-1910), born at Carlsruhe, became professor of Theology at Heidelberg (1861), and at Strasburg (1874). Ultimately a representative of the advanced modern school, he published Kanon und Tradition (1859), Die Synoptischen Evangelien (1863), Kritik der Epheser- und Kolosserbriefe (1872), Die Pastoralbriefe (1881), an introduction to the New Testament (1885), and Das Neue Testament und der Römische Staat (1892). He prepared the New Testament portion of Bunsen's Bibelwerk (1865-73), and collaborated with others in Geschichte des Volkes Israel (1867), Lexikon für Theologie und Kirchenwesen (1882), and Handkommentar zum N. T. (1890-91).

Holyoake, FRANCIS (1567-1653), a Warwickshire schoolmaster and clergyman, compiler of an Etymological Latin Dictionary (1633).

Holyoake, GEORGE JACOB (1817-1906), the founder of 'Secularism,' was born at Birmingham. He taught mathematics for some years at the Mechanics' Institution in Birmingham, lectured on Robert Owen's socialist system, was secretary to Garibaldi's British contingent, edited the Reasoner, and promoted the bill legalising secular affirmations. Holyoake was the last person imprisoned in England on a charge of atheism (1841). He wrote History of Co-operation in Rochdale (1857-72), History of Co-operation in England (1875-79; new ed. vol. i. 1886), and Self-help a Hundred Years Ago (1888). Other works are The Limits of Atheism (1861), Trial of Theism (1877), Sixty Years of an Agitator's Life (1892), Public Speaking and Debate (1895), &c.

Home, DANIEL DUNGLAS, spiritualist, born near Edinburgh, March 20, 1833, had by 1850 become a famous medium in the United States, and in 1855 came to London. He was a proficient in mesmerism, and to table-turning and spirit-rapping he added the power of floating in the air. He turned a Catholic in 1856, but in 1864 was expelled from Rome as a sorcerer. In 1866 he acceded to a Mrs Lyon's suggestion that he should become her adopted son, she assigning to him £60,000; but this money she afterwards compelled him to restore. He died at Auteuil, 21st June 1886. He published Incidents of my Life (1863-72) and Lights and Shadows of Spiritualism (1867-72); see also two works by his widow (1888-90).

Home, HENRY. See KAMES (LORD).

Home, JOHN, born at Leith, 21st September 1722, graduated at Edinburgh in 1742. He was taken prisoner fighting on the Hanoverian side at Falkirk (1746), but made a daring escape from Doune Castle. Next year he became minister of Athelstaneford, where he wrote the tragedy Agis, and, in 1754, Douglas, founded on the ballad of Gil Morrice. Each of these was rejected by Garrick, but Douglas, brought out at Edinburgh (1756), met with brilliant success, and evoked equal enthusiasm in London. Its production, however, gave such offence to the Edinburgh Presbytery that the author resigned his ministry (1757), and became private secretary to the Earl of Bute and tutor to the Prince of Wales, who on his accession as George III. gave him a pension of £300 a-year, to which a sinecure of equal value was added in 1763. The success of Douglas induced Garrick to bring out Agis, and to accept Home's next play, The Siege of Aquileia. Home's other works are The Fatal Discovery, Alonzo, Alfred, occasional poems, and, in prose, A History of the Rebellion of 1745. He married happily in 1770, and in 1779 settled in Edinburgh, where he died 5th September 1808. The last of our tragic poets whose works for any time held the stage, Home had interesting plots and occasional flashes of genuine poetry; but he did not succeed in discarding the pompous declamation of his fore-runners. See the Life by Henry Mackenzie prefixed to his works (1822).

Homer (Gk. Homēros), the Greek poet to whom are attributed the great epics, the Iliad, the story of the siege of Troy, and the Odyssey, the tale of Ulysses' wanderings. The place of his birth is doubtful: Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, and Athens contended for the honour of having been his birthplace; his date, formerly put as far back as 1200 B.C. is, from the style of the poems attributed to him, referred to 850-800 B.C. Wolf (q.v.) in 1795 fiercely assailed the current opinions about Homer; defended the view, as old as the days of the Greek commentators, that the Iliad and Odyssey were not by the same hand; and contended that both had their origin in lays by Homer and his followers (Homeridæ) in Chios, chanted and altered for centuries by the Rhapsodists, and finally digested into the poems we know by Pisistratus about 540 B.C. Even those who insist most strongly on the general unity of plan of the poems and assign the main authorship to one man, Homer, probably born in a Greek colony on the coast of Asia Minor, admit that they were doubtless based on current ballads, and have, since they were moulded into the two great epics, been doubtless considerably modified and extended. The various problems of the 'Homeric question' cannot be regarded as solved; and of the true Homer we know nothing positively, not even that he was blind. The so-called Homeric Hymns and the humorous Batrachomyomachia ('Battle of the Frogs and Mice') are certainly of a later age. See the histories of Greek literature and works on Homer by W. L. Collins ('Anc. Class. for Engl. Readers,' 1869-70), Jebb (Homer: a Short Intro. to the Iliad and Odyssey, 1889), Mr Gladstone (1858-78), and Andrew Lang (Homer and the Epic, 1893); prose translations of the Iliad by Leaf, Myers and Lang, and of the Odyssey by Butcher and Lang; verse translations of the Iliad by Chapman, Pope, Cowper, Lord Derby, Blackie, Worsley and Conington, Way, Wright, Green, and of the Odyssey by Chapman, Pope, W. Morris, Worsley, Lord Carnarvon, Way, and Schomberg.

Homer, WINSLOW (1836-1910), painter and book-illustrator, was born at Boston, U.S.

Hondius, or DE HONDT, ABRAHAM (c. 1638-91), animal painter, removed about 1665 from Rotterdam, his birthplace, to London.

Hone, WILLIAM, born at Bath, June 3, 1780, at ten became a London lawyer's clerk, at twenty started a book and print shop, which, however, soon failed. He struggled to make a living by writing for various papers, started the Traveller (1815), and next the Reformist's Register (1817). In December 1817 he was acquitted on three separate trials for publishing things calculated to injure public morals and bring the Prayer-book into contempt. Among his later satires, illustrated by Cruikshank, were The Political House that Jack built, The Queen's Matrimonial Ladder, The Man in the Moon, and The Political Showman. Works that revealed much reading in obscure channels were the Apocryphal New Testament (1820), Ancient Mysteries (1823), Every-day Book (1826), Table-book (1827-28), and Year-book (1829). Yet Hone at the end found himself in a debtors' jail, from which his friends extricated him to start him in a coffee-house—also a failure. In 1830 he edited Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, and contributed later to the Penny Magazine and the Patriot. About this time he swung back to devout theology, and often preached on Sundays. He died at Tottenham, 6th November 1842.

Honorius, FLAVIUS (384-423 A.D.), second son of Theodosius the Great, at whose death the empire was divided between his sons Arcadius and Honorius, the latter (only ten years old) receiving the western half. Stilicho (q.v.) was the de facto ruler of the western empire until 408; and after his death Alaric the Goth overran Italy, and took Rome in 410. Honorius died at Ravenna, which he had made his capital in 403.

Honorius I., Bishop of Rome from 625, had to do with the paschal controversy in Ireland and with the Anglo-Saxon Church. In the Monothelite controversy he abstained from condemning the new doctrines, and for so doing was stigmatised as a heretic at the Council of Constantinople (680). He died in 638.—Three other popes, all Italians, were HONORIUS II. (1124-30), III. (1216-27), and IV. (1285-87).

Honthelm, JOHANN NIKOLAUS VON (1701-90), Bishop of Treves, wrote two works on the history of Treves (1750-57), but is chiefly memorable for a theological essay (1763) by 'Febronius', in which he propounded a system of church government combining an exaggerated Gallicanism with the democratic element of congregationalism. See German work by O. Mejer (2d ed. 1885). [Hon-time.]

Honthorst, GERARD VAN (1590-1656), Dutch painter, who was born and died at Utrecht, twice visited England (1620 and 1628), and painted portraits of the royal family. He was fond of painting interiors dimly illumined.—His brother WILLIAM (1604-66), historical and portrait painter, worked for the court of Berlin 1650-64.

Hood, EDWIN PAXTON (1820-85), biographer, &c., from 1852 to 1880 a Congregational minister.

Hood, JOHN BELL (1831-79), born at Owingsville, Kentucky, commanded a brigade in the Confederate army, and was wounded at Gaines's Mill, Gettysburg, and Chickamauga. He commanded a corps in the retreat to Atlanta, and in July 1864 succeeded Johnston in command. On Sept. 1 he had to evacuate the city, and leave the road free for Sherman's march to the sea. He afterwards pushed as far north as Nashville; but, defeated by Thomas, was relieved of command (1864). See his Advance and Retreat (1880).

Hood, ROBIN. See ROBIN HOOD.

Hood, SAMUEL, VISCOUNT, admiral, was born at Thorncombe, Dorset, 12th December 1724, entered the navy in 1741, and became post-captain in 1756. In command of the Vestal frigate, he took a French frigate after a fiercely-contested action (1759); in 1778 he was made commissioner of Portsmouth dockyard. In 1780, promoted to flag rank, he was sent to reinforce Rodney on the North American and West Indian stations; in 1781 he fought an action with De Grasse, and was engaged in the battle off the Chesapeake. In the West Indies in 1782 he showed himself a masterly tactician in the series of manoeuvres by which he outwitted De Grasse off St Kitts; and he had a conspicuous share in the decisive victory of Dominica on 12th April. For his services he was made Baron Hood in the Irish peerage. In 1784 he stood against Fox for Westminster, and was elected; in 1788 he became a Lord of the Admiralty. In 1793, appointed to the Mediterranean, he directed the occupation of Toulon and the operations in the Gulf of Lyons. In 1796 he was made Viscount Hood, and he died at Bath, 27th June 1816. See his Letters 1781-83, edited by D. Hannay (Navy Records Soc. 1895).

His brother, ALEXANDER HOOD, VISCOUNT BRIDPORT (1727-1814), entered the navy in 1741. In 1761 he recaptured from the French the Warwick, a 60-gun ship, and during the French revolutionary war he served under Howe in the Channel and the Strait of Gibraltar, sharing in the 'glorious first of June' off Ushant (1794). He attained flag rank in 1780, and was made in 1796 Baron, and in 1800 Viscount, Bridport.

Hood, THOMAS, was born in London, the son of a Scotch bookseller from Errol, 23d May 1799. At about thirteen he was placed in a merchant's counting-house in the City, but, his health failing, was sent in 1815 to Dundee, where he resided among his father's relations. Threatened consumption was for a time warded off; he had ample leisure for reading and sketching, and he began to practise his pen in local newspapers and magazines. In 1818 he returned to London, and entered the studio of his uncle, an engraver. After a short apprenticeship he began to work on his own account, until, the literary instinct becoming stronger than the graphic, he discovered where lay the true field for his genius. In 1821 he was appointed sub-editor of the London Magazine, and found himself in daily companionship with such men as Procter, Cary, Allan Cunningham, De Quincey, Hazlitt, and Charles Lamb. It was, however, the intimacy with John Hamilton Reynolds, whose sister he married in 1825, that chiefly encouraged and trained Hood's poetic faculty. Between July 1821 and July 1823 Hood published in the magazine some of his finest poems—Lycus the Centaur, The Two Peacocks of Bedford, and the Ode to Autumn. But these, issued anonymously, failed to attract notice, and when in 1827 he produced them and others in book-form, the volume fell all but dead from the press. In 1825 Hood and Reynolds published (anonymously) a volume of Odes and Addresses to Great People, suggested by the success of Hood's burlesque Ode to Dr Kitchener in the magazine. They at once attracted notice and determined Hood's chief occupation for the remainder of his life. In the first series of Whims and Oddities (1826) Hood first exhibited such graphic talent as he possessed in those picture-puns of which he seems to have been the inventor. A second series appeared in 1827, followed by National Tales. In 1829 he edited The Gem, a remarkable little 'annual,' for, besides Lamb's 'Lines on a Child dying as soon as born' (Hood's first child), it contained Hood's Eugene Aram. Hood and his wife left London in 1829 for Winchmore Hill, where he schemed the first of those comic annuals which he produced yearly and single-handed from 1830 to 1839. In 1832 he removed to Wanstead, in Essex, where he wrote his one novel, Tynney Hall (1834). In 1834 the failure of a publisher plunged Hood into serious difficulties; and in 1835 the family went for five years to Coblenz and Ostend. During these years Hood, struggling against a fatal disease, continued to produce his Comic Annuals, and schemed his Up the Rhine (1839), which at once hit the public taste, but seems to have brought little profit to its author. By the kindness of friends Hood was enabled to return to England, with security from his creditors, in 1840. Disease was now so far advanced that a fatal issue was only a question of time, but he struggled on bravely and cheerfully. In 1841 he became editor of the New Monthly Magazine at £300 a-year; in January 1844 he started a periodical of his own, Hood's Monthly Magazine. Meantime in the Christmas number of Punch (1843) had appeared the 'Song of the Shirt,' and in Hood's Magazine there followed the 'Haunted House,' the 'Lay of the Labourer,' and the 'Bridge of Sighs.' In November 1844 Sir Robert Peel granted a pension of £100 a-year to Mrs Hood. Hood died at Devonshire Lodge, Finchley Road, 3d May 1845, and was buried in Kensal Green Cemetery. His only surviving son, TOM HOOD (1835-74), from 1865 was editor of Pun. Much of Hood's serious poetry is remarkable, and a small portion of first-rate excellence. Lyrics such as the 'Song of the Shirt,' the 'Bridge of Sighs,' 'Eugene Aram,' 'I remember, I remember,' and the 'Ode to Melancholy' are of an assured immortality. His humorous verse is of a kind that Hood absolutely created. See his Literary Reminiscences, in Hood's Own; the poor memoir (1860) by his daughter, FRANCES FREELING BRODERIP (1830-78); Ainger's edition of his Poems (1897); and his Life and Times, by W. Jerrold (1907).

Hook, JAMES CLARKE (1819-1907), painter, born in London, in 1845 gained the Academy travelling studentship by his 'Rizpah.' After eighteen months in Italy, he painted Italian, Shakespearean, and Biblical subjects; but, elected an A.R.A. in 1850 and an R.A. in 1860, is best known for his seafaring pieces—'Widow's Son going to Sea,' 'Ship-boy's Letter,' 'Luff, Boy,' 'A Mermaid,' &c. He was also a skilful etcher. See Art Journal Annual of 1888.

Hook, THEODORE EDWARD, was born in London, 23d September 1788, second son of the Vauxhall composer, James Hook (1746-1827), by his first wife, the beautiful Miss Madden, who died in 1802. His elder brother, DR JAMES HOOK (1771-1828), became in 1802 chaplain to the Prince of Wales, in 1825 Dean of Worcester, and was himself the author of a couple of novels. Theodore's education was almost limited to a year at Harrow and two terms at Oxford; but while yet a minor he achieved celebrity as the author of thirteen successful comic operas and melodramas (1805-11), as a punster and matchless improvisatore, and as a practical joker—his greatest performance the Berners Street Hoax (1809). He gained the entrée of very high society; the Prince Regent remarked that 'something must be done for Hook;' and in 1812 that something was found in the post, worth £2000 a-year, of treasurer to the Mauritius. There Hook fared gloriously, until in 1818 a grave deficiency was detected in the public chest; he was arrested and sent, almost penniless, to England. Himself he ascribed the 'unfortunate defalcation' to a black clerk, who had committed suicide; anyhow, though criminal proceedings were dropped, in 1823 he was pronounced a crown debtor for £12,000, and was again sold up and arrested. In 1825 he was released from the King's Bench, but not from the debt; however, he made no effort to discharge it. Meanwhile, in 1820, he had started the Tory John Bull, which in its palmy days brought him £2000 per annum. Sayings and Doings (9 vols. 1824-28) yielded other £4000, and nine more three-volume novels followed between 1830 and 1839—Maxwell, the half-autobiographical Gilbert Gurney, Jack Brag, &c.—four of them first appearing in the New Monthly Magazine, of which Hook was editor from 1836. He died 24th August 1841, and was buried in Fulham churchyard. See his Life and Remains, by Barham (2 vols. 1849), and Lockhart's Quarterly article (May 1843; reprinted 1851).

Hook, WALTER FARQUHAR, born in London, 13th March 1798, son of the future Dean of Worcester, was educated at Winchester and Christ Church, Oxford, and became vicar of Leeds in 1837. Mainly by his energy and enthusiasm twenty-one new churches were built in Leeds, as well as twenty-three parsonages and twenty-seven schools. Dean of Chichester from 1859, he died 20th October 1875. Among his works are A Church Dictionary (1842), Ecclesiastical Biography (1845-52), and Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury (1860-76). See his Life and Letters, by Dean Stephens (1878; new ed. 1896).

Hooke, ROBERT, natural philosopher, was born at Freshwater, Isle of Wight, July 18, 1635, and educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford. In 1662 he became curator of experiments to the Royal Society, and in 1677 its secretary; in 1665 professor of Geometry in Gresham College; and after the great fire of 1666 surveyor of works. He died 3d March 1703. Hooke has justly been considered the greatest of philosophical mechanics. His theory of gravitation subsequently formed part of Newton's; he anticipated the invention of the steam-engine. His other discoveries were the law of the extension and compression of elastic bodies, the simplest theory of the arch, the balance-spring of watches and the anchor-escapement clocks. The quadrant, telescope, and microscope are also materially indebted to him. Crooked in his person, he was upright in character, although solitary and penurious in his habits.

Hooker, JOHN. See HOOKER, RICHARD.

Hooker, JOSEPH, American general, born at Hadley, Mass., 13th November 1814, served in the Mexican war, and in 1853-61 was a farmer in California. He commanded a division of the 3d corps in the Peninsular campaign of 1862, and it was he who compelled the enemy to evacuate Manassas. In command of the 1st corps he opened the battle at Antietam. In January 1863 he succeeded Burnside in the command of the army of the Potomac. In April, crossing the Rappahannock, he marched through the Wilderness to near Chancellorsville, where he awaited Lee's attack. But the Confederates turned the National flank, and, attacking the rear (May 2), threw part of Hooker's army into confusion. Next day the Confederates drove Hooker to the north side of the river, and he was superseded by Meade in June. In November he carried Lookout Mountain, and took part in the attack on Missionary Ridge. He accompanied Sherman in his invasion of Georgia, and served till the fall of Atlanta. He died in New York, 31st October 1879.

Hooker, SIR JOSEPH. See HOOKER, WILLIAM.

Hooker, RICHARD, theologian, was born in or near Exeter in March 1554. At an early age he showed a 'quick apprehension of many perplex parts of learning,' and through his uncle, the antiquary, John Hooker or Vowell (1525-1601), chamberlain of the city, was brought under the notice of Jewel, Bishop of Salisbury, and sent to Corpus College, Oxford. He graduated M.A. in 1577, and got a fellowship; in 1581 he took orders, and preached at Paul's Cross. He was led into a marriage with Joan Churchman, the shrewish unlovely daughter of his landlady in London; in 1584 he became rector of Drayton-Beachamp near Tring. Next year he obtained, through Whitgift, the Mastership of the Temple, against a strong effort made to promote the afternoon reader Travers, a prominent Puritan. The sermons of Travers soon became attacks upon the latitudinarianism of Hooker. When Whitgift silenced Travers, the fiery Puritan appealed to the Council with charges against Hooker's doctrine, and Hooker answered him with masterly conclusiveness and temperance. But having been drawn into controversy against his inclination, he felt it his duty to set forth the real basis of all church government, and to this end desired Whitgift to remove him to some quiet living. Accordingly, in 1591, he accepted the living of Boscombe near Salisbury, becoming also sub-dean and prebendary of Sarum; and here he finished four of the proposed eight books of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, published in 1594. The year after he removed to Bishopsborne near Canterbury, where he remained till his death. His fifth book appeared in 1597, but the author did not live to complete his work, dying 2d November 1600. The sixth (so-called) and eighth books appeared in 1648, and again in 1651; the seventh in 1662, in Gauden's new edition of Hooker. The Life by Walton was published in 1665 in order to correct the inaccuracies in the Life provided by Gauden. All earlier editions of Hooker's works were superseded by that of Keble, containing also Walton's Life and an exhaustive preface from his own pen (1836; 7th ed., revised by Dean Church and Canon Paget, 1888). Hooker's Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity is the earliest great work of the kind in the English tongue, and is a noble monument of massive prose no less than of profound thought and masterly logic. It furnishes a conclusive answer to the Puritan exaggeration of the central position of Protestantism, the making of Scripture the sole guide of human conduct. It is mainly to Hooker's work that Anglican theology owes the tone and the direction that it has never since entirely lost.

Hooker, THOMAS (c. 1586-1647), born at Markfield, Leicester, became a fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and was for three years a Puritan lecturer at Chelmsford. In 1630 he retired to Holland; in 1633 sailed for Massachusetts, and received a charge at Cambridge. In 1636 he removed with his congregation to Connecticut, and founded Hartford. See Life prefixed to a selection of his works (1849).

Hooker, SIR WILLIAM JACKSON, born at Norwich, 6th July 1785, botanised in Scotland in 1806, and in Iceland in 1809, writing Recollections of Iceland (1811; 2d ed. 1813). He became professor of Botany at Glasgow in 1820, and in 1841 director of the Royal Gardens at Kew. Made F.R.S. in 1810 and K.H. in 1836, he was also D.C.L., LL.D., &c. He died August 12, 1865. He published some forty botanical works.—His son, SIR JOSEPH DALTON HOOKER, born at Halesworth in Suffolk, June 30, 1817, was educated at Glasgow High School and University, graduating M.D. in 1839. In 1839-43 he accompanied the Erebus and Terror antarctic expedition, returning to issue his magisterial Flora Antarctica (1844-47), Flora Novae Zelandiae (1853-55), and Flora Tasmaniae (1860). In 1846 he became botanist to the Geological Survey, and next year started on a three years' botanical expedition to the Himalayas, resulting in his Himalayan Journals (1854) and the Rhododendrons of the Sikkim-Himalaya (1849-51). With Dr Thomson he undertook a Flora Indica (vol. i. 1855), and himself published a flora of British India (1874). In 1871 he visited Morocco, and ascended the Great Atlas; in 1877 he accompanied Dr Asa Gray through Colorado, Utah, and California. He became assistant-director at Kew in 1855, and on his father's death director. He was G.C.S.I. (1897), O.M. (1907). He died 11th December 1911. His best-known work is his Students' Flora of the British Islands (1870); his most important are the Genera Plantarum (with Bentham, 1862-83) and Index Kewensis (with Jackson, 1893 et seq.).

Scott describes the translator of Ariosto as 'a noble transmutter of gold into lead.' His dramas Cyrus (1768), Timantes (1770), and Cleoneia (1775) were failures. See Anecdotes of the Life of John Hoole (1803).

Hooper, JOHN, bishop and martyr, born in Somerset about 1495, was educated at Oxford, whence in 1518 he passed to a Cistercian monastery at Gloucester. The reading of Zwingly made him a Reformer. He went in 1539 for safety's sake to the Continent, married in 1546, and settled at Zurich. After his return in 1549 he became a popular preacher in London, and in 1550 was appointed Bishop of Gloucester, but for his scruples over the oath and the episcopal habit was imprisoned for some weeks in the Fleet. In 1552 he received the bishopric of Worcester in commendam; in 1553, under Mary, was committed to the Fleet, and on Feb. 9, 1555, was burned for heresy at Gloucester. His Writings were edited by Carr and Nevinson in 1843-52.

In 1809 he published Costume of the Ancients and Architecture of Theatres, in 1812 Modern Costumes, and in 1819 (anonymously)

Anastasis, or Memoirs of a Modern Greek. This last is his masterpiece, though it wants the dramatic vis of a work of genius. Hope died 3d February 1831, leaving behind him a very heterodox but rather eloquent essay On the Origin and Prospects of Man (1831) and an Historical Essay on Architecture (1835).—His third son, ALEXANDER JAMES BERESFORD-HOPE, born 25th January 1820, was educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1841. Horace. QUINTUS HORATIUS FLACCUS, Latin poet and satirist, was born near Venusia in southern Italy, 8th December 65 B.C. His father was a manumitted slave, who as collector of taxes or auctioneer had saved enough money to buy a small estate. Horace was taken to Rome and sent to the best masters. About eighteen he proceeded to Athens to complete his education; and he was still there when the murder of Julius Caesar (44 B.C.) rekindled civil war. The same year he joined Brutus, who visited Athens while levying troops. He was present as an officer at the battle of Philippi, and joined in the flight that followed the Republican defeat, but found his way back to Italy. His property having been confiscated, he found employment in the civil service; but poverty, he says, drove him to make verses. His earliest were chiefly satires and lampoons; but some of his first lyrical pieces made him known to Varius and Virgil, who about 38 B.C. introduced him to Mæcenas, minister of Octavianus and a munificent patron of art and letters. To his liberality Horace owed release from business and the gift of the farm among the Sabine hills. Henceforward his springs and summers were generally spent at Rome, his autumns at the Sabine farm or a small villa at Tibur. As the unrivalled lyric poet of the time he had gradually acquired the position of poet-laureate, when he died 27th November 8 B.C. The first book of Satires, ten in number, appeared 35 B.C.; a second volume of eight satires in 30 B.C.; and about the same time the small collection of lyrics known as the Epodes. In 19 B.C. he produced his greatest work, three books of Odes, which placed him at once in the front rank of poets. To about the same date belong his incomparable Epistles. The remainder of his writings are the Carmen Seculare; a fourth book of Odes; and three more epistles, one of which, known as the Ars Poetica, was perhaps left unfinished at his death. From his own lifetime till now Horace has had a popularity unexemplified in literature. He was not a profound thinker; his philosophy is that rather of the marketplace than of the schools; he does not move among high ideals or subtle emotions. But of the common range of thought and feeling he is perfect and absolute master; and in the graver passages of the Epistles, as in the sad and noble cadence of his most famous Odes, the melancholy temper which underlay his quick and bright humour touches the deepest springs of human nature. His poetry supplies more phrases which have become proverbial than the rest of Latin literature put together. The editio princeps of Horace appeared in 1470 at Milan; later editions are by Lambin (1561), Bentley (1711), Orelli and Baiter (1850-52), Maclean (1853), Yonge (1867), Wickham (Odes and Epodes, 1874), Wilkins (Epistles, 1885), and Palmer (Satires, 1883). There are translations by Francis, Conington (the whole), Sir Theodore Martin (Odes and Satires), Rutherford Clark (Odes), De Vere (Odes and Epodes, 1893), and Gladstone (Odes, 1894). See Lives by Dean Milman (1849) and Sir T. Martin (1870).

Horatii, three brothers chosen by King Tullus Hostilius to fight for Rome against the three Curatii of Alba Longa. Two of the Horatii were speedily slain; the third, feigning flight, engaged each of his wounded opponents singly, and overcame them all. It was a descendant of the survivor, Horatius Cocles, who in 505 B.C. held the bridge against the army of Lars Porsena.

Horne, RICHARD HENRY 'HENGIST,' born 1st January 1803, was educated at Sandhurst, found his way into the Mexican naval service, and took his share in all the fighting at Vera Cruz, San Juan Ulloa, and elsewhere. After passing through perils of all kinds, from yellow fever, sharks, broken ribs, shipwreck, mutiny, and fire, he returned to England and plunged into a busy life of letters. His famous epic Orion he published at the price of one farthing in 1843, to show his contempt for a public that would not buy poetry. In 1852 he went to Australia to dig for gold, and became a person of consequence in Victoria; but he returned in 1869. He maintained incessant activity almost up to his death at Margate, 13th March 1884. Among his books are False Barriers excluding Men of Genius (1833); A New Spirit of the Age (1844), in which E. B. Browning helped him; Australian Facts and Prospects (1859); two tragedies, Cosmo de' Medici (1837) and The Death of Marlowe (1837); Judas Iscariot (1848); and The Dreamer and the Worker (1851). In 1818 he published his Introduction to the Holy Scriptures, a work which procured him admission to orders, a London rectory, a prebend of St Paul's, and an assistant librarianship at the British Museum. He published many theological works. The Introduction passed through many editions: in the 10th (a revolutionary one, 1856) he was assisted by Dr Samuel Davidson and S. P. Tregelles. See Reminiscences by his daughter (1862).

Horner, FRANCIS, was born at Edinburgh, 29th August 1778, a merchant's son of mixed English and Scottish ancestry. From the High School he passed at fourteen to the university; and, after three years there, spent two more with a clergyman in Middlesex, to 'unlearn' his broad native dialect. On his return (1797) he was called to the Scottish bar, from which in 1802 he removed to the English; in 1806 he became Whig member for St Ives. He had made his mark in the House as a political economist, when, at thirty-eight, he died of consumption at Pisa, 8th February 1817. He left little to preserve his name, beyond some contributions to the Edinburgh Review, of which he was one of the founders. Yet, in Lord Cockburn's words, he was 'possessed of greater public influence than any other private man.' See his Memoir and Correspondence (1843) and Cockburn's Memorials of his Time (1856).

He died suddenly Jan. 3, 1641. The observation of the transit was not his sole achievement, as he added to our knowledge of the physical cause of celestial motions, deduced the solar parallax, corrected the solar diameter, and made tidal observations. In 1678 Horrocks's fragmentary works were edited by Dr Wallis.

But the grand event in his career was the controversy (1783-89) with Priestley, who in his History of the Corruptions of Christianity included the orthodox doctrine of Christ's uncreated divinity. His services were rewarded with the bishopric of St Davids in 1788, Rochester in 1793, and St Asaph in 1802. He died at Brighton.

His father, 'single-speech Milnes' (1784–1858), of Fryston, Bawtry, and Great Houghton, declined the chancellorship of the exchequer and a peerage; his mother was a daughter of the fourth Lord Galway. Educated by private tutors, at home and in Italy, he went up in 1827 to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was a leader in the Union, and one of the famous 'Apostles.' From 1837 till 1863 he represented Pontefract, first as a Conservative, but latterly as an Independent Liberal; and then was called by Lord Palmerston to the Upper House. In 1851 he married a daughter of the second Lord Crewe. She died in 1874; and he himself died suddenly at Vichy, 11th August 1885. A Mæcenas of poets, he got Lord Tennyson the laureateship, soothed the dying hours of poor David Gray, and was one of the first to recognise Mr Swinburne's genius. His own poetry is always respectable, and some of the shorter pieces were in their day exceedingly popular—'Strangers Yet,' for example, and 'The beating of my own heart.' Besides this, Lord Houghton—the 'Mr Vavasour' of Beaconsfield's Tancred—was a traveller, a philanthropist, an unrivalled after-dinner speaker, and Rogers' successor in the art of breakfast-giving. In 1829 he abandoned wife, country, and civilisation, and spent three years among the Cherokees. In the Texan war he was made commander-in-chief. The Americans at first sustained severe losses, but in April 1836 Houston inflicted a crushing defeat on the Mexicans on the banks of the San Jacinto, and achieved Texan independence. He was elected president of the republic, re-elected in 1841, and on the annexation of Texas, in 1845, returned to the U.S. senate. Elected governor of Texas in 1859, he opposed secession, was deposed in 1861, and retired to private life. He died 26th July 1863. See works by Bruce (1891) and Williams (1893).

Howard, a house which stands at the head of the English Catholic nobility, was founded by Sir William Howard, Chief-justice of the Common Pleas (d. 1308). His grandson, Sir John Howard, was a captain of the king's navy and sheriff of Norfolk; and his grandson married the co-heiress of the ancient and noble House of Mowbray, Dukes of Norfolk. The son of this union, John Howard (c. 1430-85), was by Edward IV. made constable of Norwich Castle, sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk, treasurer of the royal household, Lord Howard and Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal of England (a distinction still borne by his descendants), and Lord Admiral of England, Ireland, and Aquitaine. He fell next year at Bosworth Field, and his honours were attained, as also were those of his son Thomas, Earl of Surrey (1443-1524). The latter, after three years' imprisonment in the Tower, obtained a reversal of his own and his father's attainders, and, being restored to his honours, is celebrated for his defeat of the Scotch at Flodden (1513). His son Thomas, third Duke of Norfolk (1473-1554), was attainted by Henry VIII., but was afterwards restored in blood, and by his marriage with a daughter of King Edward IV. became the father of the Earl of Surrey (q.v.), executed by Henry VIII. The same sentence had been passed on the duke, when the death of Henry saved him. His grandson Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk (1536-72), was attainted and executed for high-treason, for his communication with Mary Queen of Scots. The family honours were again restored, partly by James I. and partly by Charles II. In one or other of their widespread branches, the Howards have enjoyed, or still enjoy, the earldoms of Carlisle, Suffolk, Berkshire, Northampton, Arundel, Wicklow, Norwich, and Effingham, and the baronies of Bindon, Howard de Walden, Howard of Castle Rising, and Howard of Effingham. Sir Edward Howard, K.G., brother of the first Earl of Surrey, was made by Henry VIII. the king's standard-bearer and admiral of the fleet. His brother, Sir Edmund, was marshal of the horse at Flodden; and his half-brother, Sir Thomas Howard, was attainted, and died a prisoner in the Tower, for aspiring to the hand of the Lady Margaret Douglas, niece of Henry VIII., one of whose consorts was the Lady Catharine Howard. See Henry Howard's Memorials of the Howard Family (1834).

Howard, CATHARINE. See CATHARINE HOWARD.

Howard, EDWARD, sub-editor to Captain Marryat, and the true author of Rattlin the Reef (1836), died 30th December 1841.

Howard, HENRY (1769-1847), painter, born in London, became an A.R.A. in 1800, an R.A. in 1808, secretary of the Academy in 1811, and professor of Painting in 1833. See memoir prefixed to Lectures (1848) by his son, FRANK HOWARD (1805-66), who was also a painter.

Howard, JOHN, prison reformer, was born at Hackney, 2d September 1726. The fortune left him in 1742 by his father, an upholsterer, enabled him to travel; and in 1756, the year after the death of his first elderly wife, he set sail for Lisbon, but was captured by a French privateer, and carried to a Brest prison. A short captivity left a lasting impression of the inhuman treatment of prisoners of war. He married a second time, and settled at Cardington near Bedford. In 1773, now high-sheriff for Bedfordshire, he recognised that many prisoners were unjustly detained in prison untried, or even after being pronounced innocent, until they or their friends had paid certain fees to the jailers, and began a series of tours through Great Britain and Ireland, for the purpose of investigating the condition of prisons and prisoners. Chiefly as the result of his efforts, two acts were passed in 1774, one providing for fixed salaries to jailers, and the other enforcing cleanliness. His remaining years were principally spent in visiting the prisons of Great Britain and of the Continent. Whilst at Kherson, in Russia, he was struck down by typhus fever, and died 20th January 1790. The chief results of his observations were recorded in The State of Prisons in England and Wales, with an Account of some Foreign Prisons (1777; 4th enlarged ed. 1790); and An Account of the Principal Lazarettos in Europe (1780). See Lives by Baldwin Brown (2d ed. 1823), Taylor (1836), Hepworth Dixon (1849), Field (1850), Stoughton (1853; new ed. 1884), Scullard (1899), and Gibson (1901).

Howard, LUKE (1772-1864), chemist, botanist, and early meteorologist, was born of Quaker parentage in London, and died at Tottenham.

Howard, OLIVER OTIS, born at Leeds, Maine, 8th November 1830, took command of a regiment of Maine volunteers in 1861. In 1864 he commanded the Army of the Tennessee, and led the right wing of Sherman's army in the march to the sea. He was commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau 1865-74; was first president of Howard University at Washington, named after him; conducted two Indian campaigns; and died 26th October 1909.

Howard, SIR ROBERT (1626-98), a Restoration dramatist, Dryden's brother-in-law.

Howard of Effingham, CHARLES, LORD (1536-1624), in 1573 succeeded his father (ninth son of the second Duke of Norfolk), who in 1554 had been raised to the peerage and been made Lord High Admiral. In 1585 that dignity was conferred on the son, who in 1588 commanded against the Armada. For his share with Essex in the Cadiz expedition (1596) he was made Earl of Nottingham; in 1601 he quelled Essex's rising. There is no proof that he was a Catholic.

Howe, ELIAS, inventor of the sewing-machine, born at Spencer, Mass., 9th July 1819, worked at Lowell and Boston as a mechanic. At the latter place he developed, constructed, and patented (1846) the sewing-machine. He made an unsuccessful visit to England to introduce his invention, and returning in 1847 to Boston, found his patent had been infringed. Harassed by poverty, he yet entered on a seven years' war of litigation to protect his rights, which was ultimately successful (1854). By his royalties he in time obtained $200,000 per annum, and amassed a fortune of $2,000,000. During the civil war he served as a private. He died 3d October 1867.

Howe, properly Howe HUTCHINSON, HENRY (1812-96), born at Norwich of Quaker parentage, about nineteen took to the stage, and died at Cincinnati whilst touring with the Lyceum company.

Howe, JOHN, Puritan divine, was born 17th May 1630 at Loughborough. He studied at Cambridge and Oxford, and, after preaching for some time at Winwick and Great Torrington, he was appointed domestic chaplain to Cromwell in 1656. In 1659 he returned to Torrington, but the Act of Uniformity ejected him in 1662, and he wandered about preaching in secret till 1671. In 1668 he published The Blessedness of the Righteous, in 1671 became domestic chaplain to Lord Massereene, of Antrim Castle in Ireland. Here he wrote his Vanity of Man as Mortal, and began his greatest work, The Good Man the Living Temple of God (1676-1702). In 1676 he became pastor of the dissenting congregation in Silver Street, London. In 1685 he travelled with Lord Wharton on the Continent, and settled at Utrecht, till in 1687 the Declaration of Indulgence recalled him to England. He died in London, 2d April 1705. He was a profound thinker, sagacious and tolerant. See Life by Calany prefixed to his works (1724), and that by Henry Rogers (1836; new ed. 1879).

Howe, JOSEPH (1804-73), proprietor and editor of the Halifax Nova Scotian, became the chief public man in the province, and was ultimately its governor. See Life by Longley (1905).

Howe, RICHARD HOWE, EARL, admiral, son of the second Viscount Howe, was born in London, 8th March 1726. He left Eton at thirteen, and, entering the navy, served under Anson against the Spaniards in the Pacific. Made post-captain at twenty, he the same year drove from the coast of Scotland two French ships conveying troops and ammunition to the Pretender. After serving off the coast of Africa, Howe specially distinguished himself in the naval operations of the Seven Years' War. In 1758 he succeeded to the Irish title of viscount on the death of his brother, George Augustus (1724-58), the brigadier-general, who was killed before Ticonderoga. Appointed a Lord of the Admiralty in 1763, he became in 1765 Treasurer of the Navy. In 1778 he defended the American coast against a superior French force. He was made a viscount of Great Britain in 1782, and, sent out to relieve Gibraltar, he disembarked troops and supplies, and then offered battle to the combined fleets of France and Spain, which declined an engagement. He was made First Lord of the Admiralty in 1783, and an earl in 1788. When war with France broke out in 1793 he took command of the Channel Fleet, and next year gained off Ushant 'the glorious first of June.' His last service was to recall to their duty the mutinous seamen at Spithead and Portsmouth in 1797. He died August 5, 1799. See Lives by G. Mason (1803) and Sir J. Barrow (1838). — A brother, WILLIAM (1729-1814), held a command under Wolfe at Quebec, succeeded General Gage in 1775 as commander-in-chief in America, commanded at Bunker Hill, took New York, defeating Washington at White Plains and at Brandywine, but was superseded by Clinton in 1778. He succeeded to his brother's viscounty in 1799.

Howe, SAMUEL GRIDLEY, M.D. (1801-76), American philanthropist, born in Boston, organised the medical staff of the Greek army in 1824-27, went to America to raise contributions, and, returning with supplies, formed a colony on the isthmus of Gorinth. Swamp-fever drove him from the country in 1830. In 1831 he went to Paris to study the methods of educating the blind, and becoming mixed up in the Polish insurrection, spent six weeks in a Prussian prison. On his return to Boston he established schools for the blind (see BRIDGMAN, LAURA) and for idiots. In 1851-53 he edited the anti-slavery Commonwealth, and in 1867 revisited Greece with supplies for the Cretans. See Life by F. A. Sanborn (N.Y. 1891). — His wife, JULIA WARD (1819-1910), born in New York, became prominent in the woman suffrage movement, preached in Unitarian pulpits, and published, besides narratives of travel and a Life of Margaret Fuller, several volumes of poems and the 'Battle-hymn of the Republic' (1861).

Howell, JAMES, whose Familiar Letters is still an English classic, was born in July 1593, son of the minister of Abernethy in Carmarthenshire, studied at Hereford and Jesus College, Oxford, and took his B.A. in 1613. He then became steward to a glass-ware manufactory. He was next employed abroad on public business in 1626, became secretary to Lord Scrope at York, and was returned to parliament for Richmond in 1627. From 1632 to 1642 he was mainly employed as a royalist spy; and in 1642 (when he was appointed an extra clerk to the Privy-council) he was sent by the parliament to the Fleet, where he lay till 1650. At the Restoration the office of historiographer-royal was created for him. He died in November 1666. Besides translations from Italian, French, and Spanish, Howell wrote forty-one works on history, politics, and philological matters. His Instructions for Forreine Travell (1642) is reprinted in Professor Arber's series (1869); and his supplement to Cotgrave's dictionary interests lexicographers; but it is by his witty and entertaining Epistole Ho-Elance; or Familiar Letters (1645-55; best ed. by Joseph Jacobs, 1890), that his name is remembered.

Howell, THOMAS BAYLY (1768-1815), a barrister who edited vols. i.-xxi. of the State Trials (1809-15), as his son, THOMAS JONES HOWELL (d. 1858), did vols. xxii.-xxxiii. (1815-26).

Howells, WILLIAM DEAN, American novelist, was born at Martin's Ferry, O., 1st March 1837. His father's family was of Welsh Quaker origin, and he himself was brought up as a Swedenborgian. His earliest serious work in journalism was in the Cincinnati Gazette and Columbus State Journal. A Life of Lincoln (1860) procured him the post of consul at Venice (1861-65), where he wrote the papers collected in Venetian Life (1866). After his return to America he wrote for the New York papers and the Atlantic Monthly, and edited the latter 1872-81. He contributed to the Century and Harper's Magazine, and was a well-known journalist and poet when his clever story, Their Wedding Journey (1871), at once brought him popularity, increased by many succeeding ones—A Chance Acquaintance (1873), A Foregone Conclusion (1874), A Counterfeit Presentment (1877), The Lady of the Aroostook (1878), The Undiscovered Country (1880), A Woman's Reason (1884), The Rise of Silas Lapham (1885), An Indian Summer (1886), A Hazard of New Fortunes (1889), Mercy (1892), The Son of Loyal Langbrith (1904), &c.

Howie, JOHN (1735-93), a farmer of Lochgoiln, near Kilmarnock, who claimed to be descended from a Waldensian refugee, Huet (1178), and whose Scots Worthies (1774) chronicles the sufferings of the martyrs of the Covenant.

Howison, Jock, the traditional rescuer of James V. ('the Gudeman of Ballengeich') from a band of Gypsies at Cramond Bridge.

Howitt, WILLIAM, born at Heanor, Derbyshire, 18th December 1792, served a four years' apprenticeship to a builder and carpenter, but meanwhile wrote poems and an account of a country excursion. In April 1821 he married MARY BOTHAM (born at Coleford, Gloucestershire, 12th March 1799, and brought up at Uttoxeter); they settled at Hanley to conduct a chemist's business, whence they removed in 1823 to Nottingham for twelve years of successful literary industry. Later places of abode were Esher in Surrey, London, Heidelberg, and Rome. In 1852-54, at the height of the gold-fever, William Howitt, with two sons, visited Australia. Husband and wife quitted the Society of Friends in 1847, and later became believers in spiritualism; Mary in 1882 joined the Catholic communion. Both died at Rome, William on March 3, 1879, and Mary on January 30, 1888, having received a pension of £100 a-year just after her husband's death. Mary Howitt wrote from her earliest years, translated Frederika Bremer and Hans Andersen, and contributed poems, stories, essays to the People's Journal, Howitt's Journal, Chambers's Journal, &c. Joint productions of husband and wife were the Forest Minstrel (1827), Desolation of Eyam (1827), Book of the Seasons (1831), Stories of English Life (1853), and Ruined Abbeys of Great Britain. William Howitt's chief works were History of Priestcraft (1833); Rural Life in England (1837); Visits to Remarkable Places (1838-41); Colonisation and Christianity (1838); Boy's Country Book (1839); Student Life of Germany (1841); Homes and Haunts of the Poets (1847); Land, Labour, and Gold (1855); Illustrated History of England (1856-61); History of the Supernatural (1863), and Discovery in Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand (1865). See Mary's Autobiography, edited by her daughter (1889).

Howson, JOHN SAUL, D.D., born at Giggleswick, 5th May 1816, in 1837 took a double first-class from Trinity College, Cambridge. Ordained in 1845, in 1849 he became principal of Liverpool College, and in 1867 Dean of Chester; the restoration of the cathedral was largely due to him. He died at Bournemouth, 15th December 1885. With Conybeare he wrote the Life and Epistles of St Paul (1852).

Hoyle, JOHN (1750-1831), a Yorkshire Quaker, who wrote on prophecy and on the Gypsies (1816), and died at Northampton.

Hroswitha (c. 932-1002), a Benedictine nun of Gandersheim near Göttingen, wrote Latin poems and six prose Terentian comedies, edited by Konrad Celtes (Nur. 1501) and Barack (ib. 1858). See W. M. Hudson in English Historical (1888).

Huber, FRANÇOIS (1750-1830), Genevese naturalist, lost his eyesight in youth, but by help of his wife and a servant made many important observations on the habits of bees, described in several works. — His son, JEAN PIERRE (1777-1841), also assisted him and wrote on ants.

Huber, LUDWIG FERDINAND (1764-1804), literary critic, was born in Paris, but was brought up and lived in Germany, and died at Ulm. He married THERÈSE (1764-1829), daughter of Heyne, and widow of Georg Forster, author of tales, &c. — Their son, VICTOR AIMÉ (1800-69), was a champion of social reform.

Hubert, ST (656-727), son of the Duke of Guienne, lived a luxurious life, but was converted, and in 708 became Bishop of Liège. In art he is a hunter converted by the apparition of a crucifix between the horns of a stag.

Hübner, JULIUS (1806-82), painter, born at Oels, studied at Düsseldorf, and became professor of Painting and director of the Gallery at Dresden.

Huc, EVARISTE RÉGIS (1813-60), born at Toulouse, in 1839 joined the mission of the Lazarist Fathers to China. In 1844, with Père Gabet and a single native convert, he set out for Tibet, and in January 1846 reached Lhasa; but scarcely had they started a mission there, when an order for their expulsion was obtained by the Chinese resident, and they were conveyed back to Canton. Huc's health having broken down, he returned to France in 1852. He wrote Souvenirs of his great journey (1850; trans. by Hazlitt, 1852); L'Empire Chinois (1854; trans. 1855); Le Christianisme en Chine (1857-58; trans. 1858). See monograph by Prince Henry of Orleans (Par. 1893).

Huddleston, JOHN (1608-98), a Benedictine monk, born at Faringdon Hall near Preston. In 1651 he had aided Charles II. in his escape from Worcester, and in 1685 he reconciled him on his death-bed to Catholicism.

Hudson, GEORGE (1800-71), the 'Railway King,' born near York, was a linen-draper there, when, inheriting £30,000 in 1828, he went into local politics and railway speculation. Everything he touched turned to gold. He bought large estates, was thrice lord mayor of York, and was elected M.P. for Sunderland (1845). But the railway mania of 1847-48 plunged him into ruin. He was accused of having 'cooked' accounts, and of having paid dividends out of capital. Legal proceedings were instituted, and his suddenly-acquired gains were swept away. Sunderland, however, continued to elect him until 1859. He died in London.

Hudson, HENRY, navigator, sailed in April 1607, in a small vessel with eleven sailors, on his first voyage for the discovery of a passage across the pole to the 'islands of spicery.' In his second voyage (1608) he reached Nova Zembla. He undertook a third voyage (1609) for the Dutch East India Company, sailed for Davis Strait, then steering southwards, entered the Hudson River, and ascended it for 150 miles. Starting in April 1610, in the Discoverie of 70 tons, he reached Greenland in June, arrived at Hudson Strait, and passing through it, entered the great bay which now bears his name. He resolved to winter there; but food fell short, and the men mutinied and cast him adrift, with eight others, on 23d June 1611, to perish miserably. Only a few wretched survivors of the expedition reached home. George Asher's monograph (Hakluyt Society, 1860) proves that, though Hudson was a bold sailor, neither river, strait, nor sea was first discovered by him.

Hudson, HENRY NORMAN (1814-86), Shakespearean scholar, was born at Cornwall, Vt., and died at Cambridge, Mass., having been a baker, wheelwright, teacher, clergyman, army chaplain, and Shakespearean professor. He took up the study of Shakespeare about 1844.

Huerta, VICENTE GARCIA DE LA (1730-87), Spanish poet and critic, born at Zafrá, was head of the Royal Library at Madrid. His famous tragedy of Raquel (1778) was founded upon the story of Alfonso VIII.'s love for the fair Jewess Rachel.

Huet, PIERRE DANIEL, born at Caen, February 8, 1630, in 1652 visited the court of Queen Christina, and discovered at Stockholm the MS. of Origen which was the basis of his famous edition (1668). In 1670 he was appointed with Bossuet tutor of the dauphin, and helped in preparing the Delphin classics. Having in 1676 taken orders, he was successively abbot of Anunay (1678), Bishop of Soissons (1685) and Avranches (1692), and abbot of Fontenay (1699). In 1679 appeared his Demonstratio Evangelica. In 1701 he withdrew to the Jesuits' house in Paris, where he died, 26th January 1721. He also published two books on the Cartesian philosophy, one on reason and faith, one on the site of paradise, a history of ancient commerce and navigation, and a Traité de la Faiblesse de l'Esprit Humain, which excited much controversy. See Latin autobiography (1713), a French Life by Bartholomew (1850), and a German by Barach (Vienna, 1860).

Hufeland, CHRISTOPH WILHELM (1762-1836), born at Langensalza, became court physician at Weimar, in 1793 professor of Medicine at Jena, in 1798 president of the medical college at Berlin, and in 1809 a university professor. Huggins, SIR WILLIAM, K.C.B. (1897), astronomer and spectroscopist, born in London, 7th Feb. 1824, in 1852 was elected a member of the Microscopical Society, and for some years studied physiology with the microscope. But having in 1855 built an observatory near London, he began the study of the physical constitution of stars, planets, comets, and nebula. By researches on the sun's spectra and the spectra of certain comets, he ascertained that their luminous properties are not the same. He determined the amount of heat that reaches the earth from some of the fixed stars. F.R.S. (1865) and P.R.S. (1900), he was president of the British and other associations, and received the Order of Merit in 1902. He died 12th May 1910.

Hugh, Sr (c. 1185-1200), Bishop of Lincoln, was born of noble family at Avalon in Burgundy. He was ordained priest at the Grande Chartreuse (1160-70). Henry II. then secured him for a Cistercian monastery at Witham in Somerset, and from 1186 he was Bishop of Lincoln. He was canonised in 1220. See Lives by Canon Perry (1879), Father Thurston (1898), and Marson (1901), and Dean Spence's Cloister Life (1893).

Hugh of Lincoln (c. 1246-55), a boy supposed to have been murdered by the Jews of Lincoln, as told in English ballads and early chronicles. See Prof. Child's Ballads (part v., 1888), and the monograph by Joseph Jacobs (1894).

Hughes, DAVID EDWARD, F.R.S. (1831-1900), inventor of the telegraph type-printer (1854-55), the microphone (1878), &c., was born in London, but brought up in Virginia, and in 1850-53 was professor of Music at Bardstown College, Ky.

Hughes, HUGH PRICE (1847-1902), a London Wesleyan minister, was born at Carnarthen.

Hughes, THOMAS, born at Uffington, Berks, 19th October 1822, was educated at Rugby under Dr Arnold; studied at Oriel College, Oxford, 1841-45; was called to the bar in 1848; and became a member of the Chancery Bar. Tom Brown's Schooldays (1856) was followed by The Scouring of the White Horse (1858), Tom Brown at Oxford (1861), and Alfred the Great (1869). Hughes became a Q.C. in 1869 and a county court judge in 1882. He associated with Maurice and Kingsley in their work among the London poor. In 1865-68 he represented Lambeth as a Liberal, in 1868-74 Frome; and in 1880 assisted in founding a settlement in the United States, of which Rugby, Tennessee (1881), is an account. He also wrote Memoirs of a Brother, G. C. Hughes (1873), Lives of Daniel Macmillan (1882) and Bishop Fraser (1887), and Vacation Rambles (1895). He died 22d March 1896.

Hugo, VICTOR-MARIE, was born at Besançon, 26th February 1802, the son of General Hugo, a soldier of the empire. He was educated in Paris at the Feuillantines (1809-11, 1813-15), in Madrid (1812), and at the École Polytechnique. At fourteen he produced a tragedy; and at twenty, when he published his first set of Odes et Ballades (1822), he had thrice been victor at the Floral Games of Toulouse. In 1823 he published Han d'Islande, that wild romance of an impossible Iceland; and followed it up with Bug-Jargal (1824), a second set of Odes et Ballades (1826), and the famous Cromwell (1827). Romanticism was now in full career; the preface to Cromwell was greeted with enthusiasm or detestation; and Hugo instantly took his place at the head of the Romantics. In 1828 he published his Orientales, wherein he revealed himself a master of rhythms. In 1830 came Hernani—the first in fact and the second in time of those 'five-act lyrics' of which Hugo's drama is composed. The same year 1831 produced Notre Dame de Paris, a pretentious but picturesque historical romance; Les Feuilles d'Automne, which includes some of his best poetry; and his best play, Marion Delorme. Le Roi s'amuse (1832), which was interdicted, is superbly written, and has gone the round of the world as Rigoletto. The next year was that of Lucrèce Borgia, and Marie Tudor; in 1834 came Claude Gueux, which is pure humanitarian sentimentalism, and the Littérature et Philosophie Mélangées, a collection of juvenilia in prose. Followed in 1835 Angelo, a third melodrama in prose, and the admirable Chants du Crépú- eule; in 1836 the opera of La Esmeralda; in 1837 Les Voix Intérieures, in which the poet's diction is held by some to have found its noblest expression; in 1838 Ruy Blas, after Hernani the most famous of his stage rhapsodies; and in 1840 Les Rayons et les Ombres, yet another collection of sonorous verse. He failed at the Français in 1843 with the ponderous trilogy of Les Burgraves. Hugo was until 1830 a Royalist, and worshipped Napoleon; between 1830 and 1848 he was a Napoleonist with a turn for humanitarianism. He sat for Paris in the Assemblée Constituante, voting now with the Right and now with the Left, but on his election to the Assemblée Legislative threw in his lot with the democratic republicans. In 1851, after the coup d'état, he withdrew to Brussels, and in 1852 was ejected to the Channel Islands, whence he issued Napoléon le Petit, perhaps the least literary of all his works, and in 1853 Les Châtiments, certainly the greatest achievement in all literature in the fusion of pure poetry with political and personal satire. Three years after appeared Les Contemplations, a gathering of poems elegiac, reflective, and lyrical; and three years after that the Légende des Siècles (1859). Les Misérables (1862) is a panoramic romance of modern life, mannered beyond measure, but including some of Hugo's most touching invention. This was followed by the extraordinary rhapsody called William Shakespeare (1864); by Les Chansons des Rues et des Bois (1865); by Les Travailleurs de la Mer, an idyll of passion, adventure, and self-sacrifice; by L'Homme qui Rit, a piece of fiction meant to be historical. He returned from Guernsey to Paris on 5th September 1870, and six months after was chosen to represent the Seine, but soon resigned. He stayed through the Commune; and then, departing for Brussels, protested publicly against the action of the Belgian government in respect of the beaten Communists, in consequence of which he was again expelled the kingdom. Again he stood for Paris, but was defeated. In 1872 he published L'Année Terrible, a series of pictures of the war; in 1874 his last romance in prose, the much-debated Quatre-Vingt-Treize; in 1875-76 a collection of his speeches and addresses. In 1876 he was made a senator, and published the second part of the Légende. L'Histoire d'un Crime (1877) has been described as 'the apotheosis of the Special Correspondent,' and L'Art d'être Grand-Père (1877) contains much charming verse. The years 1878-79 enriched us with Le Pape—a piece humanitarian, anti-clerical, and above all theatrical—and La Pitié Suprême, the effect of which is much the same, and which—like L'Ane (1880), and a great deal of Les Quatre Vents de l'Esprit (1881), and Torquemada (1882)—is merely Hugo in decay. His mastery of words remains invariable; too frequently he produces antithesis under the delusion that he is expressing ideas, he mistakes preposterousness for grandeur; he is utterly wanting in humour. But genius is always genius, and the final impression is one of unsurpassed accomplishment and abounding mental and emotional activity. The range and the capacity of his genius in rhythm and rhyme are unparalleled in the literature of France. He died in Paris, 22d May 1885. See his Correspondance, 1815-82 (1896-98; Eng. trans. 1896, &c.); his wife's Vie Hugo racontée par un Témoin de sa Vie (1863); Swinburne's Study (1886); other works by Rivet (1878), Barbon (1881), Paul de Saint-Victor (1885), Barnett-Smith (1885), Asseline (1885), Viré (1883-91), Marzials (1888), Dupuy (2d

Hull, EDWARD, LL.D., geologist, was born at Antrim, 21st May 1829, and from 1869 to 1890 was director of the geological survey of Ireland.

Hull, WILLIAM (1753-1825), American general, born at Derby, Conn., fought in the war of independence, and was governor of Michigan territory 1805-12. In the war with Britain (1812) he was sent with 1500 men to defend Detroit, was compelled to surrender, and was afterwards court-martialled for cowardice and sentenced to be shot—a sentence not carried out.—His nephew, ISAAC HULL (1773-1843), naval officer, born at Derby, Conn., had commanded a ship in the West Indian trade, when in 1798 he entered the American navy. He was appointed to the Constitution frigate, which he commanded from 1806, and on August 19, 1812, he captured the British frigate Guerriere. Hull received swords of honour and the freedom of several cities. He afterwards commanded Mediterranean and Pacific squadrons. See Life by Wilson (1889).

Hullah, JOHN PYKE, the pioneer of music for the people, was born at Worcester, 27th June 1812. In 1836 he composed The Village Coquettes to Charles Dickens's librettos; in 1841 began popular singing-classes in Exeter Hall; and in 1872-82 was musical inspector of training-schools. Hullah opposed the 'Tonic Sol-fa' method. Among his works are a History of Modern Music (1862) and The Third Period of Musical History (1865). Of his songs, 'The Three Fishers' and 'The Storm' attained wide popularity. He died 21st February 1884. See Life by his wife (1886).

Hulse, JOHN (1708-90), born at Middlewich, studied at St John's, Cambridge, took orders, and founded the Hulsean divinity lectures.

Humbert I. (Umberto), king of Italy, was born at Turin, 14th March 1844, married in 1868 his cousin Margherita of Savoy, in 1878 succeeded his father, Victor Emmanuel, was assassinated at Monza 29th July 1900, and was succeeded by his only son, VICTOR EMMANUEL, born 11th November 1869.

Humbert, JEAN JOSEPH (1755-1823), French general, originally a dealer in rabbit-skins, commanded the expedition to Ireland in 1798. Born at Bouvray in Lorraine, he died at New Orleans.

Humboldt, FRIEDRICH HEINRICH ALEXANDER, BARON VON, naturalist, was born at Berlin, 14th September 1769, son of the king of Prussia's chamberlain. He studied at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, Berlin, and Göttingen, and wrote a book on the basalts of the Rhine. In 1791 he studied under Werner in the Mining Academy at Freiberg, and published Flora Subterranea Fribergensis (1793). He now held a post in the mining department in Upper Franconia, and produced a work on muscular irritability (1799). The desire of visiting tropical countries led him to resign his office, and after some stay in Paris he sailed with Aimé Bonpland in 1799 from Corunna for South America. In five years they explored a vast extent of previously almost unknown territory in Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Cuba, and Mexico. At Paris he made, with Gay-Lussac, experiments on the chemical constitution of the atmosphere; and in 1807, after a visit to Italy, he came back to Paris with Prince Wilhelm of Prussia on a political mission. He remained in France for the publication of his travels till 1827, when he returned to Berlin, and there, in 1827-28, he gave lectures. In 1829, at the invitation of the Emperor Nicholas, he travelled through Central Asia to explore the Ural and Altai Mountains, Dzungaria, and the Caspian, along with Ehrenberg and Rose. Their examination of the strata which produce gold and platinum, magnetic observations, and geological and botanical collections are described in a work by Rose (1837-42) and in Humboldt's Asie Centrale (1843). The changes of the year 1830 led to his employment in political services; and during the ensuing twelve years he was frequently in Paris, where he published his Géographie du Nouveau Continent (1835-38). He spent the later years of his life at Berlin, occupying a high position at the Prussian court. Cosmos (1845-58), one of the greatest scientific works ever published, exhibits many of the principal facts of the physical sciences and their relations to each other, and contained the substance of his Berlin lectures, partly anticipated by his early Ansichten der Natur (1808). Humboldt died May 6, 1859. In the editing and preparing of the great work of the American journey he had the assistance of many of the most eminent scientists of the time. There is but one complete edition of the opus magnum (1807-17), in 30 vols. (20 folio and 10 quarto), Voyages aux Régions Équinoxiales du Nouveau Continent. He also published many minor works on the geography, geology, physics, botany, and zoology of the regions visited. See the great Life of him, edited by Bruhns (1872; Eng. trans. 1873); Lord Houghton's Monographs (1873); and his own correspondence with Varnhagen (1860), Von Raumer (1869), Goethe (1876), and his brother Wilhelm (1880). Humboldt, KARL WILHELM VON, elder brother of the preceding, was born at Potsdam, 22d June 1767. After travelling in Germany, France, and Switzerland, he became a diplomat, but showed little inclination for official employment. In 1791 he married, and for some years lived in retirement, associating with Schiller and devoting himself to literature. In 1801 Humboldt became Prussian minister at Rome, and was a most generous patron of young artists and men of science. He returned to Prussia (1808) to fill next year the post of first minister of Public Instruction. The Berlin University owed its existence to him. In 1810 he went to Vienna as minister-plenipotentiary, and from this time took part in all important Prussian political affairs. After 1819 he lived mostly at his country house, Schloss Tegel, where he died 8th April 1835. His 'Collected Works' fill 7 vols. (1841-52). Humboldt was the first to study Basque scientifically; he also worked much on the languages of the East and of the South Sea Islands—one of his chief books is on the Kawi language in Java (1836-40). See Life by Haym (1856); his correspondence with Schiller (1880; new ed. 1876), Goethe (1876), Körner (1879), and his brother (1880); also a book (trans. 1897) on his daughter Gabriele (1791-1887), who married the Prussian statesman, Heinrich, Freiherr von Bülow (1792-1846).

Hume, ALEXANDER HAMILTON (1797-1873), born at Paraniatta, New South Wales, in 1824 explored from Sydney to Port Phillip.

Hume, DAVID (c. 1560-1630), of Godscroft, Berkshire, wrote The Origin and Descent of the Family of Douglas (c. 1633; extended 1644), &c.

Hume, DAVID, philosopher and historian, was born at Edinburgh, 26th April 1711 (o.s.). He was bred for the law, but it was not a pursuit to his liking; and mercantile life in Bristol proved even less congenial. So in 1734 he went to France to devote himself wholly to study, and in 1739 published the first and second books of his Treatise on Human Nature—the germ of his philosophy, and still perhaps the best exposition of it. Although this book 'fell dead-born from the press,' ultimately it gave the original impulse both to the Scottish philosophy and to Kant. In 1741 and 1742 Hume published two elegantly written volumes of Essays Moral and Political. He was for a time the companion of an insane nobleman. In 1747, as secretary, he accompanied General St Clair in the expedition to the coast of France and the attack on Port L'Orient. Next year he attended him on a mission to Vienna and Turin, and as he travelled he took notes of his impressions of Holland, Germany, and Italy. In 1751 he published his Inquiry into the Principles of Morals, one of the clearest expositions of the utilitarian system. At the same time he intended to publish his Dialogues concerning Natural Religion; but they were not made public until after his death. His Political Discourses (1752) made an era in literature, for in this little work he announced those principles of political economy, comprehending the doctrine of free trade, which Adam Smith developed. Appointed Advocates' librarian (1752), he formed the design of writing the history of England. In 1754 he issued vol. i. of History of the Stuarts, in vol. ii. going down to the Revolution. He completed the work from the Roman period downwards in 1761. Meanwhile he published Four Dissertations: the Natural History of Religion; of the Passions; of Tragedy; of the Standard of Taste (1757). Two other dissertations were cancelled by him after they were printed—On Suicide and The Immortality of the Soul—but subsequently appeared in his works. In 1763 he went to France as secretary to Lord Hertford's embassy; here he found fame at last, and became familiar with Turgot, D'Alembert, Diderot, Buffon, Rousseau, and the rest. In 1767 he was made Under-secretary of State for the Home Department, but returned finally to Edinburgh in 1769. His health gave way in 1774, and he died 25th August 1776. Hume is the outcome of the empirical philosophy of Locke. His philosophical writings do not form a system, but discuss many of the salient ideas of philosophy, mainly in a sceptical or destructive manner. Ideas are but weakened copies of 'impressions' of the senses; mind is a succession of isolated impressions and ideas; the idea of cause depends on the habit of mind which expects the event that usually follows on another, and there is no necessary connection between cause and effect. Hume's History, which gave him a high rank among historians, was not too impartial. New editions, with or without the continuation by Smollett, still appear; Dr Brewer's Student's Hume (1858) is a recognised text-book. The chief edition of Hume's works is by T. H. Green and T. H. Grose (1874), with an exhaustive analysis of Hume's philosophy. See Life by Hill Burton (1846); Birkbeck Hill's edition of his letters to Wm. Strahan (1888); monographs by Huxley (1879), Knight (1886), and Calderwood (1898); and German books by Jodl (1872), Pfeiderer (1874), and Gitzky (1878).

Hume, FERGUS, author of The Mystery of a Hansom Cab (1887), The Caruncle Clue (1896), &c., was born in England 24th July 1862, but brought up at Dunedin, and called to the New Zealand bar. He came to London in 1888.

Hume, JOSEPH, politician, born at Moutrose, 22d January 1777, studied medicine at Edinburgh, and in 1797 became assistant-surgeon under the East India Company. He acquired several native languages, and in the Mahratta war (1802-7) filled important offices. On the conclusion of peace he returned to England (1808), his fortune made. A political philosopher of the school of James Mill and Bentham, he sat in parliament for Weymouth, Aberdeen, Middlesex, Kilkenny, and Montrose (1842), and died 20th February 1855. He zealously advocated savings-banks, freedom of trade with India, abolition of flogging in the army, of naval impressment, and of imprisonment for debt, repeal of the act prohibiting export of machinery, and of that preventing workmen from going abroad, reduction of election expenses, abrogation of duties on paper, and other reforms then accounted radical. He it was who denounced the Orange lodges' design to make the Duke of Cumberland king on the decease of William IV.

Hume, SIR PATRICK (1641-1724), statesman and covenanter, Lord Chancellor of Scotland, in 1690 was created Lord Polwarth, and in 1697 Earl of Marchmont. See BAILLIE (LADY GRIZEL), and Miss Warrender's Marchmont (1894).

Hummel, JOHANN NEPOMUK (1778-1837), pianist and composer, was born at Presburg, and, after a seven years' concert tour in Germany, Denmark, England, and Holland, returned to Vienna. In 1803-11 he was musical director to Prince Esterhazy; and in 1816 took a similar post at Stuttgart, but moved in 1820 to Weimar.

Humperdinck, ENGELBERT, composer, born 1st September 1854, at Siegburg near Bonn, studied music at Cologne, Frankfurt, Munich, and Berlin, and travelled in France, Spain, and Italy. He taught music in the conservatoriums of Barcelona and Cologne, and acted as musical adviser to a publishing firm in Mainz. In 1890-96 at Frankfurt, he became famous as the composer of the musical fairy play, Hänsel und Gretel (1893), which was phenomenally successful, and was followed by Schneewittchen, Die sieben Geislein, &c.

Humphrey, DUKE. See GLOUCESTER.

Humphreys, HENRY NOEL (1810-79), born at Birmingham, wrote on butterflies, coins, &c.

Hunfalvy, PAUL (1810-91), was in 1842-48 a professor of Law, took part in the Hungarian Revolution, but subsequently devoted himself to literature as member and librarian of the Academy at Pesth. He wrote on the Magyars.

Hungerford, MARGARET WOLFE, née HAMILTON (c. 1855-97), Irish novelist, author from 1877 of Phyllis, Molly Dawn, and over thirty more works.

Hunt, ALFRED WILLIAM (1830-96), a Turner-esque landscape painter, was born at Liverpool, and educated there and at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, winning the Newdigate in 1851, and in 1853 being elected a fellow.

Hunt, HENRY, 'Orator Hunt,' was born at Upavon, Wiltshire, 6th Nov. 1773. He was a well-to-do farmer, but in 1800 his hot temper embroiled him with Lord Bruce, the commandant of the Wiltshire yeomanry, which brought him six weeks in jail. He came out a hot Radical, and spent the rest of his life advocating the repeal of the Corn Laws and parliamentary reform. In 1819, on the occasion of the Peterloo massacre, he delivered a speech which cost him three years' imprisonment; in 1831-33 he sat for Preston. He died at Alresford, Hants, 13th Feb. 1835. See his memoirs (1820) and Life by Himself (1836).

Hunt, JAMES HENRY LEIGH, poet and essayist, was born at Southgate near Edmonton, 19th October 1784. His father, Isaac Hunt (1752-1809), a Barbadian, being driven by the Revolution from Philadelphia to London, gave up law for the church, but lapsed into bankruptcy and Universalism. Leigh Hunt spent eight years at Christ's Hospital, and left at fifteen as first 'Deputy-Grecian,' debarred by a stammer from further promotion. He was a clerk first under one brother, an attorney, and next for four years in the War Office, writing meanwhile much dramatic criticism; in 1808 with another brother, a printer, he set up the Examiner; and in 1809 wedded Marianne Kent (1788-1857). The Examiner's tone was Radical, and, after several government prosecutions in 1813 for a libel on the Prince Regent (he had called him a 'corpulent Adonis of fifty'), Leigh Hunt was sentenced to a fine of £500 and to two years' imprisonment. In November 1821 with his wife and seven children he sailed for Italy, but landed at Leghorn only on 1st July. He went on Shelley's invitation to help him and Byron to found the quarterly Liberal. Just a week later Shelley was drowned; Leigh Hunt and 'my noble friend' failed somehow to pull together; the Liberal died in its fourth number; and by 1825 the family was back at Highgate. Thenceforth Leigh Hunt's life was one of ceaseless activity and embarrassment, for he 'never knew his multiplication table.' From 1844, however, Sir Percy Shelley allowed him £120 a-year, and in 1847 he received a pension of £200. He died on a visit to Putney, 28th August 1859. Leigh Hunt's poetry now is little known. And yet it is better than much of the newer poetic vogues. Its charm lies in a prettiness as of childhood; its wit, cleverness, and sparkle have ever a smack of precocity. Narrative verse is his forte, his foible jauntiness. His translations are among the choicest of their kind. His essays are always worth reading, but only after the Essays of Elia. Leigh Hunt's writings, indeed, are less memorable than his friendships—with Keats and Shelley, as also with Lamb, Byron, Moore, Coleridge, Dickens, Carlyle, and a whole galaxy of lesser luminaries. Our knowledge of them, and especially the first two, is largely derived from his. In his List of the Writings of Hazlitt and Leigh Hunt (1868) Mr Alexander Ireland chronologically arranges with notes, &c., seventy-nine works by the latter, including Juvenilia (1801), The Feast of the Poets (1814), The Story of Rimini (1816), and The Palfrey (1842); besides much in prose, as Lord Byron and his Contemporaries (1828), Imagination and Fancy (1844), Wit and Humour (1846), Stories of the Italian Poets (1846), A Jar of Honey from Mount Hybla (1848), The Old Court Suburb (1855), and Dramatic Essays (1894). See his Autobiography (1850; revised ed. 1860) and Correspondence (1862), short Lives by C. Monkhouse (1893) and B. Johnson (1896), Forster's Dickens, and a study by Barnette Miller (1910).

Hunt, THOMAS STERRY, born at Norwich, Conn., 5th September 1826, was chemist and mineralogist to the Canadian Geological Survey (1847-72), as well as professor of Chemistry at Laval University (1856-62) and McGill University (1862-68), and of Geology in the Massachusetts Institute (1872-78). He was made an officer of the Legion of Honour in 1867, F.R.S. (1859), and LL.D. of Cambridge (1881). He died 12th Feb. 1892.

Hunt, WILLIAM HENRY, a creator of the English school of water-colour painting, was born in London, March 28, 1790, the crippled child of a tinplate worker. By Ruskin ranked with the greatest colourists of the school, he chose very simple subjects—'Peaches and Grapes,' 'Old Pollard,' 'Wild Flowers,' 'Too Hot,' 'Fast Asleep,' &c. He died 10th February 1864.

Hunt, WILLIAM HOLMAN, painter, was born in London, 2d April 1827. In 1845 he was admitted a student of the Royal Academy, and next year he exhibited his first picture, 'Hark!' followed by scenes from Dickens and Scott, and by the 'Flight of Madeline and Porphyro' (1848). He shared a studio with D. G. Rossetti, and the pair, along with Millais and a few others, inaugurated the 'Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood,' which aimed at detailed and uncompromising truth to nature. The first of his Pre-Raphaelite works was 'Rienzi' (1849). It was followed by 'A Converted British Family sheltering a Christian Missionary' (1850), 'Valentine rescuing Sylvia' (1851), 'The Hireling Shepherd' (1852), 'Claudio and Isabella' (1853), 'Strayed Sheep' (1853), and 'The Light of the World' (1854), now in Keble College, Oxford. The result of several visits to the East appeared in 'The Scapgoat' (1856); 'The Finding of Christ in the Temple' (1860), now in the Birmingham Art Gallery; 'The Shadow of Death' (1874), in the Corporation Gallery, Manchester; and 'The Triumph of the Innocents' (1885), to which must be added 'Isabella and the Pot of Basil' (1867), 'May Day, Magdalen Tower' (1891), not to speak of other world-famous pictures. In 1905 he was nominated O.M. See his Pre-Raphaelitism and the P.R.B. (1905). He died 7th September 1910.

Hunt, WILLIAM, born 1842, the son of a clergyman, at Weston-super-Mare, studied at Harrow and Trinity, Oxford, withdrew from university work and the vicarage of Congressbury, Somerset, to write for the Dictionary of National Biography and the reviews. With Freeman he edited the 'Historic Towns' series, and he is a large contributor to the great Histories of England and of the English Church, of which he is editor.

Hunter, COLIN (1841-1904), a painter of fisher-folk, was born in Glasgow, brought up at Helensburgh, and elected A.R.A. in 1884.

Hunter, JOSEPH (1783-1861), historian of Hall-shire, Shakespearian scholar, &c., born at Sheffield, was a Presbyterian minister at Bath 1809-33, and then entered the Record Office.

Hunter, WILLIAM, anatomist and obstetrician, was born at Long Calderwood, East Kilbride, 23d May 1718. He studied five years at Glasgow University with a view to the church, but in 1737 took up medicine, and, coming up to London from Edinburgh in 1741, was trained in anatomy at St George's Hospital and elsewhere. From about 1748 he confined his practice to midwifery; in 1764 was appointed physician-extraordinary to Queen Charlotte; in 1767 was elected an F.R.S.; and in 1768 became professor of Anatomy to the Royal Academy. In 1770 he built a house with an amphitheatre for lectures, a dissecting-room, a museum, and a cabinet of medals and coins. He died 30th March 1783. His museum was bequeathed finally, with an endowment of £8000, to Glasgow University. His chief work was on the uterus.—His brother, JOHN, physiologist and surgeon, was born at Long Calderwood, 13th February 1728. He became his brother's assistant in the dissecting-room (1748), studied surgery at Chelsea Hospital and St Bartholomew's, and in 1754 entered St George's Hospital, becoming house-surgeon in 1756 and lecturer for his brother in the anatomical school. In 1759 his health gave way, and in 1760 he entered the army as staff-surgeon, and served in the expedition to Belleisle and Portugal. At the peace in 1763 he started the practice of surgery in London, and devoted much time and money to comparative anatomy. In 1767 he was elected F.R.S., and in 1768 was appointed surgeon to St George's Hospital. In 1776 he was appointed surgeon-extraordinary to the king. In 1785 he built his museum, with lecture-rooms, and tried his famous operation for the cure of aneurism. In 1786 he was appointed deputy-surgeon-general to the army. He died 16th October 1793, and was buried in the church of St-Martin-in-the-Fields, whence, thanks to Frank Buckland, his remains were translated in March 1859 to Westminster Abbey. Hunter's collection, containing 10,563 specimens, was purchased by government in 1795 for £15,000, and presented to the Royal College of Surgeons. He married in 1771 ANNE HOME (1742-1821), author of 'My mother bids me bind my hair' and other songs set to music by Haydn. Besides numerous papers in the Transactions, he published books on the human teeth (1771-78), on venereal disease (1786), and A Treatise on the Blood and Gunshot Wounds (1794). See the edition of his works by Palmer (1835), with prefixed Life by Otley, Dr Mather's Two Great Scotsmen (1894), and S. Paget's Life of John Hunter (1897).

Hunter, SIR WILLIAM WILSON, statistician, born 15th July 1840, studied at Glasgow, Paris, and Bonn, and in 1862 entered the civil service of India. His post as superintendent of public instruction in Orissa (1866-69) gave him the opportunity to write the Annals of Rural Bengal (1868) and A Comparative Dictionary of the Non-Aryan Languages of India (1868). Then, after being secretary to the Bengal government and the government of India, he in 1871 became director-general of the statistical department of India; the Indian census of 1872 was his first work. In 1887 he retired and returned home. Among his works are Imperial Gazetteer of India (9 vols. 1881; 14 vols. 1886-88), Orissa (1872), Lord Mayo (1875), Assam (1880), Indian Mussulmans (1871; 3d ed. 1876), The Indian Empire: its People, History, and Products (1882; new ed. 1895), The Old Missionary (1895), a pathetic romance, a Life of Bryan Hodgson (1896), and a History of British India (vols. i.-vii. 1899-1900). C.S.I. from 1878, in 1887 he was knighted. In 1890-95 he edited the Rulers of India, contributing a Life of Dalhousie. He died 7th February 1900. See his Life by Skrine (1901).

Huntingdon, SELINA, COUNTESS OF, daughter of Earl Ferrers, was born in 1707, married the Earl of Huntingdon in 1728, and became a widow in 1746. Joining the Methodists in 1739, she made Whitefield (q.v.) her chaplain in 1748, and assumed a leadership among his followers, who became known as 'The Countess of Huntingdon's Connection.' For the education of ministers she established in 1768 a college at Trevecca in Brecknockshire (removed in 1792 to Cheshunt, Herts), and built or bought numerous chapels, the principal one at Bath. She died in London, June 17, 1791, bequeathing to four persons her sixty-four chapels, most of which became identical with the Congregational churches. See Life (2 vols. 1839-40).

Huntington, DANIEL (1816-1907), historical and religious and portrait painter, was born in New York, and first visited Italy in 1839.

Huntington, WILLIAM, S.S., i.e. 'Sinner Saved' (1745-1813), bastard, tramp, coalheaver, preacher, prophet, &c., was born at Four Wents near Cranbrook, and died at Tunbridge Wells.

Hun'yady Janos. John Corvinus Hunyady, one of the greatest war-captains of his age, apparently a Wallach by birth, was knighted and in 1409 presented by the Emperor Sigismund with the Castle of Hunyad in Transylvania. His life was one unbroken crusade against the Turks, its chief events his expulsion of them from Transylvania in 1442; his brilliant campaign south of the Danube in 1443; his defeats at Varna and Kossovo, 1444-48; and his glorious storming of Belgrade (1456). Shortly afterwards (11th August) Hunyady died of dysentery. During the minority of Ladislaus V. he acted as governor of the kingdom (1445-53). Hunyady left two sons, Ladislaus and Matthias; the former was beheaded on a charge of conspiracy by Ladislaus V.; the latter succeeded to the crown of Hungary.

Hurd, RICHARD, prelate and writer, named the 'Beauty of Holiness' on account of his comeliness and piety, was born at Congreve, Staffordshire, January 13, 1720, and became a fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1742. In 1750 he became a Whitehall preacher, in 1774 Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, and in 1781 of Worcester. He died May 28, 1808. Among his works are Commentary on Horace's Ars Poetica (1749); Dissertations on Poetry (1755-57); Dialogues on Sincerity, &c. (1759), his most popular book; Letters on Chivalry and Romance (1762); Dialogues on Foreign Travel (1764); and An Introduction to the Prophecies (1772). Hurtado, LUIS (c. 1530-98), Spanish poet, romancer, and playwright, was born at Toledo.

Huskisson, WILLIAM, born at Birt's Morton Court, Worcestershire, 11th March 1770, in 1783-92 was in Paris, in 1795 was appointed Under-secretary in the Colonial Department. Next year he entered parliament for Morpeth as a supporter of Pitt. Returned for Liskeard in 1804, he became Secretary of the Treasury; and held the same office under the Duke of Portland (1807-9). In 1814 he became Commissioner of the Woods and Forests, in 1823 President of the Board of Trade and treasurer of the navy, and in 1827 Colonial Secretary. But he resigned office finally in 1828. He obtained the removal of restrictions on the trade of the colonies with foreign countries, the removal or reduction of many import duties, and relaxation of the navigation laws, and was an active pioneer of free trade. He received fatal injuries at the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, 15th September 1830. See Life prefixed to his Speeches (3 vols. 1831).

Huss, or Hus, JOHN, Bohemian reformer, was born about 1369, the son of a Bohemian peasant, at Husinetz (of which Hus is a contraction) near Prachatitz. In 1398, two years after taking his master's degree at Prague, he began to lecture there on theology. He had come under the influence of Wyclif's writings, probably through Anne of Bohemia's retinue. In 1402 he was appointed rector of the university, and began to preach at the Bethlehem chapel; in 1408 he was forbidden to exercise priestly functions within the diocese. In 1409 Huss was re-elected rector, but the archbishop commissioned an inquisitor to investigate the charges of heretical teaching against him. And in connection with this in December Pope Alexander V. promulgated a bull condemning Wyclif's teaching, ordered all his writings to be publicly burned, and forbade preaching in any except collegiate, parish, and monastery churches. As Huss continued preaching, he was in July excommunicated. Popular riots followed, and Huss, backed by the people, still maintained his position; nor did he yield even after the city was laid under papal interdict in 1411. But by 1418 matters had greatly changed, Huss having spoken out yet more boldly against the church; hence some of his more influential supporters, including the university, had fallen away from him, and on the advice of King Wenceslaus of Bohemia he left Prague. He found refuge at the castles of his supporters, for nearly the whole of the nobles were with him. This enforced leisure he employed chiefly in the composition of his principal work, De Ecclesia, which, like many of Huss's minor writings, contains numerous passages taken almost verbatim from Wyclif. About this time a general council was summoned to meet at Constance, and Huss was called upon to present himself before it. Provided with a 'safe conduct' from the Emperor Sigismund, he reached Constance on 3d November 1414. Three weeks later he was seized and thrown into prison. No precise charge had been lodged against him; but he had resumed preaching in Constance. An ill-angry for Huss was the condemnation of Wyclif's writings by the council in May 1415. His own trial began on 5th June following; but he was not permitted to speak freely in his own defence, nor allowed to have a defender. Called upon to recant unconditionally, and to pledge himself not to teach the doctrines that were put in accusation against him, Huss categorically refused, and was burned on 6th July. The rage of his followers in Bohemia led to the bloody Hussite wars, in which the two parties of Hussites under such leaders as Ziska and Podiebrad more than held their own in many battles with all the forces of the empire. They were not reduced till about the middle of the century. See works by Denis (French, 1878), Wratislaw (English, 1882), Loserth (trans. 1884), Lechler (German, 1890), Lützwow (trans. 1909).

Hutcheson, FRANCIS, philosopher, son of an Arnauld Presbyterian minister, was born 8th August 1694. He studied for the church at Glasgow 1710-16, but then started a successful private academy in Dublin. His Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue, &c. (1720), attracted much notice; it was followed by his Essay on the Passions (1728). In 1729 he was appointed professor of Moral Philosophy at Glasgow, where he died in 1746. His largest work is A System of Moral Philosophy (with a Life, 1755). Hutcheson was a pioneer of the 'Scottish School' in metaphysics; his ethical system is a development of Shaftesbury's. See Fowler's Shaftesbury and Hutcheson (1852), and a monograph on his life and teaching by A. R. Scott (1900).

Hutchins, JOHN (1698-1773), the historian of Dorset, where he was born and for fifty years was a clergyman. His History (2 vols. 1774) has reached a 3d edition (4 vols. 1861-73).

Hutchinson, ANNE (c. 1590-1643), religious enthusiast, was the daughter of a Lincolnshire clergyman called Marbury. About 1612 she married a Mr Hutchinson, and in 1634 they emigrated from Lincolnshire to Boston, Mass., where she lectured and denounced the Massachusetts clergy as being 'under the covenant of works, not of grace.' Tried for heresy and sedition, and banished, she, with some friends, acquired territory from the Narragansett Indians of Rhode Island, and set up a democracy (1638). After her husband's death (1642) she removed to a new settlement in what is now New York state, where she and her family of fifteen persons were, all but one son, murdered by the Indians.

Hutchinson, COLONEL JOHN, the type of the Puritan gentleman, was baptised at Nottingham, 18th September 1615. He studied at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and Lincoln's Inn, and married in 1638 Lucy, daughter of Sir Allen Apsley. He retired to Owthorpe, his Nottinghamshire seat, and his meditations on the theology and politics of the time led him at last to side with the parliament. He became governor of Nottingham, and successfully held the town in 1643-45. Returned in 1646 to parliament for Nottingham, he was one of King Charles's judges, and signed the warrant for his execution. He sat in the first council of state, but, alarmed at the ambitious schemes of Cromwell, ceased to take part in politics. At the Restoration he was included in the Act of Amnesty, but later was imprisoned in the Tower and at Sandown Castle on a groundless suspicion of treasonable conspiracy, and died 11th September 1664. The Memoirs, written by his widow for her children, and first published in 1806 (best edition by C. H. Firth, 1885), revealed a delightful picture of a grave and courteous gentleman, beautiful and accomplished, tender to his family and the poor, fearless, frank, and honest, intense in devotion, yet wholly free from austerity and fanaticism.

Hutchinson, JOHN (1674-1737), theological writer, born at Spennithorne, Yorkshire, was steward to the Duke of Somerset, but left his service to devote himself to religious studies, the duke procuring him a government sinecure of £200 a-year. In 1724 he published Moses's Principia, defending the Mosaic cosmogony and assailing Newton's theory of gravitation. His Thoughts concerning Religion affirm the 'Hutchinsonian' heresy that the Scriptures contain the elements not only of true religion, but of all rational philosophy; the 'original Hebrew' had to be strangely twisted to justify this theory. See Life by Spearman in Hutchinson's Works (13 vols. 1748-65).

Hutchinson, THOMAS JOSEPH (1820-85), an Irishman, from 1855 a consul in South America, who wrote on the Niger, Peru, Brittany, &c.

Hutchinson, WILLIAM (1732-1814), a Barnard Castle solicitor, author of the History of the County of Durham (1785), History of Cumberland (1794), &c.

Hutchison, JOHN, sculptor, was born at Edinburgh; 1st June 1832, and was made A.R.S.A. in 1862, R.S.A. in 1867. He died 23d May 1910.

Huth, HENRY (1815-78), a great London book-collector, of German origin. [Hoot.]

Hutten, PHILIP VON (c. 1498-1546), adventurer, a cousin of Ulrich von Hutten. In 1528 Charles V. granted Venezuela to the Welsers, rich Augsburg merchants; Hutten sailed with one of their companies, and after various journeyings (1536-38) set out in 1541 in search of the Golden City. After several years of wandering, harassed by the natives, he and his followers were routed in an attack on a large Indian city. Severely wounded, he was conveyed back to Coro, and beheaded by a usurping viceroy. He left a narrative of his journeyings, published as Zeitung aus Indien (1765). See also Von Langege's El Dorado (1888).

Hutten, ULRICH VON, born 21st April 1488 at the castle of Steckelberg, was sent in 1499 to the neighbouring Benedictine monastery of Fulda, but his imperious temper drove him to flee from it (1504). He visited various universities, and then in 1512 passed into Italy. Returning to Germany in 1517, and crowned poet-laureate by the Emperor Maximilian, he entered the service of Albert, Archbishop of Mainz, and shared in the famous satires against the ignorance of the monks, the Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum. Eager to see Germany free from foreign and priestly domination, he in 1519 took part, along with Franz von Sickingen, in the campaign of the Swabian League against Ulrich of Württemberg. He espoused Luther's cause with his customary impetuosity and vehemence. A set of dialogues (1520) containing a formal manifesto against Rome moved the pope to have him dismissed from the archbishop's service. He found shelter in Sickingen's castle of Ebernburg in the Palatinate, whence he discharged a shower of invectives, denunciations, and satires on the papal party, and wrote rousing appeals to the German emperor, nobles, and people. His earliest work in German, Aufwecker der teutschen Nation (1520), is a keen satiric poem. Driven to flee to Basel in 1522, he was coldly treated by Erasmus, and irritated into a bitter epistolary quarrel; and finally found a resting-place through Zwingli's help on the island of Ufnau in the Lake of Zurich. There he died in August or September 1523. See his Opera Omnia (ed. Böcking, 1859-62), and Lives and other works by Strauss (4th ed. 1878; trans. 1874), Reichenbach (2d ed. 1888), Lange (1888), Schott (1890), and Szamatolski (1891).

Hutter, LEONHARD (1563-1616), a champion of Lutheran orthodoxy, taught theology at Wittenberg from 1596. His Compendium (1610) and Concordia concors (1614) were long standard works. Hase (q.v.) adopted Hutter's name.

Hutton, CHARLES, LL.D. (1737-1823), born at Newcastle, was a teacher there 1755-73, wrote on arithmetic (1764), mensuration (1771), and bridges (1772), and was professor of Mathematics at Woolwich Academy 1773-1807. An F.R.S., he calculated the density of the earth from Maskelyne's observations on Schiehallion. He published Recreations in Mathematics (1803), &c.

Hutton, JAMES (1726-97), a founder of geology, born at Edinburgh, studied medicine there, in Paris, and at Leyden. In 1754 he devoted himself in Berwickshire to agriculture and chemistry, which led him to mineralogy and geology; in 1768 he removed to Edinburgh. The Huttonian theory, emphasising the igneous origin of many rocks and deprecating the assumption of other causes than those we see still at work, was expounded before the Royal Society of Edinburgh in A Theory of Rain (1784) and A Theory of the Earth (1785; 2 vols. 1795). He also wrote Natural Philosophy (1792), Nature of Coal (1777), &c.

Hutton, RICHARD HOLT (1826-97), editor from 1860 of the Spectator, was born in Leeds, the son and grandson of Unitarian ministers, and was educated in London and Manchester. He wrote Studies in Parliament (1866); Essays, Theological and Literary (1871); Modern Guides of English Thought (1887), &c.

Hutton, WILLIAM (1723-1815), a Birmingham bookseller, born at Derby, author of histories of Birmingham and Derby, &c. See his Autobiography (1816).—His only daughter, CATHERINE (1756-1846), wrote novels, &c.

Huxley, THOMAS HENRY, biologist, born at Ealing, Middlesex, 4th May 1825, studied medicine at Charing Cross Hospital, and in 1846-50, as assistant-surgeon of H.M.S. Rattlesnake, surveying the passage between the Barrier Reef and the Australian coast, collected marine animals, and made them the subjects of scientific papers for the Royal and Linnean Societies—notably one on the Meduse. An F.R.S. since 1851, he in 1853 wrote his memoir on the morphology of the Cephalous Mollusca. In 1854 he was appointed professor of Natural History, including Palaeontology, in the Royal School of Mines, a post he held, with a curatorship in the Museum of Practical Geology, till 1855. In 1854 he wrote on the anatomy of the Brachiopoda. In 1856 he accompanied Tyndall to the Alps, and was joint-author of Observations on Glaciers (1857). In 1859 his Oceanic Hydrozoa was published by the Ray Society. His main work was vertebrate morphology and palaeontology, with occasional excursions into ethnology; but he produced also papers on the Aphis (1858), the Pyrosoma (1860), a manual of the Invertebrata (1877), and a work on Crayfishes (1878). In vertebrate morphology there were the Theory of the Vertebrate Skull (1858), Man's Place in Nature (1863), the article 'Amphibia' in Enc. Britannica (1875), Lectures on Comparative Anatomy (1864), and An Introduction to the Classification of Animals (1869). In palaeontology there were memoirs on Pterygotus (1858) and Belemnites (1864), Fossil Fishes (1862), the Neanderthal Skull (1864), Reptilian Remains from India (1864), and Evidences of Affinity between Reptiles and Birds (1869-70). There were separate works on Elementary Physiology (1866), Physiography (1877), Hume (1879), and Science and Culture (1881). Lay Sermons appeared in 1870; Essays on Controverted Questions in 1892; and Collected Essays were republished, with an autobiographical article (9 vols. 1893-95). Huxley greatly interested himself in educational questions, strongly advocated Darwin's views and evolutionist doctrines, and in the magazines and elsewhere dealt in a trenchant manner with what he regarded as the obscurantist views of orthodox theologians and biblical students. He held examinations and professorships in the University of London, the Royal Institution, and the Royal College of Surgeons; was president of the Ethnological Society and of the British Association; and was secretary and president of the Geological Society and of the Royal Society. He was Inspector of Salmon-fisheries 1881-85. A member of the Privy Council since 1892, he died at Eastbourne, 29th June 1895, and was buried in Marylebone Cemetery, Finchley. See Life by his son Leonard (1899), and his Scientific Memoirs, edited by Profs. Michael Foster and Ray Lankester (4 vols. 1898, et seq.).

Huygens, Christian, physicist, born at the Hague, April 14, 1629, was the second son of the poet Constantyn Huygens (1596-1687), who was secretary to the Prince of Orange, and was knighted by James I. of England in 1622. Huygens studied at Leyden and Breda. His mathematical Theoremata was published in 1651. Next he made the pendulum-clock, on Galileo's suggestion, and expounded it in Horologium Oscillatorium (1673). He also developed Galileo's doctrine of accelerated motion under the action of gravity, preparing the way for Newton. With an improved telescope of his own construction he in 1655 discovered the ring and fourth satellite of Saturn, described in Systema Saturnium (1659), along with the Micrometer. In 1660 he visited England, where he was admitted an F.R.S. He discovered the laws of collision of elastic bodies at the same time as Wallis and Wren, and improved the air-pump. In optics he first propounded the undulatory theory of Light, and he is the discoverer of Polarisation. The 'principle of Huygens' is a part of the wave-theory. In 1666 he settled in Paris, where he remained till 1681, a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences; but as a Protestant he felt it prudent to return to the Hague, where he died, 8th July 1693. His Œuvres Complètes, begun 1888, reached 12 vols. in 1910.

Huysmans, Jacob (c. 1636-96), portrait-painter, born at Antwerp, came to London about 1661.

Huysmans, Joris Karl (1848-1907), a French novelist of Dutch origin, was born in Paris, and from ultra-realism went over in 1891 to esoteric mysticism—his craze, devil-worship.

Huysum, Jan van (1682-1749), Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam, studied under his father, Justus van Huysum (1659-1716), a landscape-painter. Jan too painted landscapes, purely conventional in style. But his fruit and flower pieces are distinguished for exquisite finish.—A brother, Jacob (1680-1740), also a painter, died in London.

Hwen-Tsiang, or Hsüen-Tsiang (c. 605-664), a Buddhist monk of China, born near Honan, in 629 set out on a pilgrimage to India, travelling by way of the Desert of Gobi, Tashkend, Samarcand, Bamian, and Peshawar. He remained in India 631-44, visiting the sacred places and studying the sacred books. His memoirs (648) are important for the history of India and Buddhism. They and a Life of him were translated into French by Stanislas Julien (1853-58). See also Hsüen Tsiang (Trübner's Oriental Lib. 1888).

Hyacinthe, PÈRE, the former monastic name of Charles Loyson (1827-1912), born at Orleans. He became a priest in 1851, and taught philosophy and theology at Avignon and Nantes. Entering the order of the Carmelites (1862), he became a powerful preacher, and gathered enthusiastic audiences to the Madeleine and Notre Dame in Paris. He denounced abuses in the church with great boldness; was excommunicated (1869); protested against the Infallibility Dogma; but, although he attended the 'Old Catholic' Congress at Munich, declared his intention to remain in the Catholic Church. In 1872 he married an American lady. He published sermons and lectures, and in 1879 established a 'Gallican' congregation in Paris.

Hyde. See CLARENDON (EARL OF).

Hyder Ali (1728-82), by his bravery at a siege (1749) attracted the notice of the maharajah's minister, and soon rose to be all-powerful; after 1759, though calling himself only 'regent,' he left his master only the title of maharajah. He conquered Calicut, Bednor, and Kananur; and in 1766 his dominions included more than 84,000 sq. m. He withheld the customary tribute from the Mahrattas, and carried on war against them. He waged two wars against the British, in the first of which (1767-69) he was practically successful, and dictated peace under the walls of Madras. When Hyder was defeated by the Mahrattas in 1772 he claimed English support; and on this being refused he became the bitter enemy of the English. Taking advantage of the war between them and the French (1778), he and his son, Tippoo Saib, descended into the Carnatic, routed the English, and ravaged the country to within forty miles of Madras, but were ultimately defeated in three battles by Sir Eyre Coote. See Bowring's Haidar Ali and Tipu Sultan (1893).

Hypatia, daughter of Theon, an astronomer and mathematician of Alexandria, was born in the later part of the 4th century A.D. Her learning, wisdom, and high character made her the most influential teacher in Alexandria, and the fame of her lectures drew students from all parts of the Greek world. Her philosophy was an eclectic endeavour to combine Neoplatonism with Aristotelianism; she also taught astronomy and mechanics. She was hacked to death in a riot created by the zeal of the bishop Cyril against heathen philosophy (415). Kingsley's romance, Hyperia, appeared in 1858. See German monographs by Wolff (1879) and Meyer (1886).

Hyperídes, or HYPERIDES, Greek orator of the 4th century B.C., became a professional advocate, and earned large sums. From the first he opposed the party which advocated peace with Philip, and so supported Demosthenes till after the death of Philip and during the early portion of Alexander's career. Only when Demosthenes endeavoured to follow an impossible via mediá did Hyperides break with him, and head that accusation of bribery against Demosthenes which not only resulted in his banishment, but committed Athens to the fruitless revolt against Macedon known as the Lamian war. The leaders of this revolt were Leosthenes and Hyperides; the former perished in battle, the latter was put to death by Antipater (322 B.C.). Although Hyperides was admired and studied in Roman times, it was not until 1847 that we had any specimens of his oratory. Between 1847 and 1856 three English travellers obtained in Egypt papyri containing four of his orations; other fragments were found near the end of the 19th century. In his speeches Hyperides is always transparent, never monotonous, witty to a degree, refined in his rallery, and delightful in his irony. Above all, he never in his keenest attacks passes the bounds of good taste, as does Demosthenes. The best text is that of Blass (3d ed. 1894); and see Hager's Questiones Hyperideæ (1870).

Hyrcanus, JOHN, son of Simon Maccabæus, was Jewish high-priest in 135-105 B.C., and at first tributary to the Syrians; but on the death of Antiochus he made himself independent, and subdued the Samaritans and Idumæans, concluded an alliance with the Romans, and extended his territories almost to the limits of the Davidic monarchy. Hyrcanus was a just and enlightened ruler, and the country was prosperous during his reign. He left five sons, two of whom, Aristobulus and Alexander, governed with the title of king.—HYRCANUS II., a feeble son of Alexander, was, on the death of his father (78 B.C.), appointed high-priest by his mother Alexandra, who ruled Judæa for the next nine years. After her death (69 B.C.) his younger brother Aristobulus seized the government, but was poisoned (49 B.C.), when Hyrcanus again became high-priest. But in 47 Cæsar made Antipater of Idumæa procurator of Judæa with supreme power; and a son of Aristobulus, with the help of the Parthians, invaded the land, captured Hyrcanus, cut off his ears, and carried him off to Seleucia. But when Herod, son of Antipater, came to power, the aged Hyrcanus was invited home to Jerusalem, where he lived in peace till, suspected of intriguing against Herod, he was put to death in 30 B.C.

Hyrtl, JOSEPH (1810-94), Viennese anatomist.

Hyslop, JAMES, poet, born at Kirkconnel, Dumfriesshire, July 23, 1798, while a shepherd near Airdsmore, Ayrshire, the scene of Richard Cameron's death, wrote a poem, 'The Cameronian's Dream' (1821). He prepared himself by private study for teaching, and through the influence of Lord Jeffrey was appointed tutor on a man-of-war. He died off the Cape Verd Islands, 4th November 1827. His poems were collected by the Rev. P. Mearns in 1887.

AM'BLICHUS, Neoplatonist philosopher, was a native of Chalcis, in Cœle-Syria, and died about 333 A.D. In his hands the Neoplatonist philosophy degenerated into theurgy and demonology. His writings included a Life of Pythagoras and treatises on mathematics and philosophy.

Ibn Batuta (1304-78), Arab traveller and geographer, was born at Tangiers, spent thirty years (1325-54) in travel, then settled at Fez, and wrote the entertaining history of his journeys. His travels led him to Mecca, Persia, Mesopotamia, Arabia, Africa, Asia Minor, Bokhara, India, China, Sumatra, southern Spain, and Timbuktú. His work was published with a French translation in 1858-59 (3d ed. 1893).

Ibn Khaldun (1332-1406), Arabic historian, was born at Tunis of Seville ancestry, and died at Cairo, after a life at the courts of Fez, Granada, Tunis, &c. His History of the Arabs of Spain and Africa, which according to Prof. Flint entitles him to rank as the founder of the philosophy of history, has been largely translated into French by the Baron de Slane (7 vols. 1852-68).

Ibrahim Pasha (1789-1848), adoptive son of Mohammed Ali, pasha of Egypt, from 1825 to 1827 occupied the Morea to aid the Turks against the insurgent Greeks. In 1831 he undertook the conquest of Syria, and in 1832 routed the Ottoman army at Koniya, after which the Porte ceded Syria to Mohammed Ali on condition of tribute—a cession, however, terminated through the quadruple alliance of 1840. In 1848 he succeeded Mohammed (became imbecile) for two months.

Ibsen, HENRIK, born at Skien in south Norway, 20th March 1828, was a chemist's assistant at Grimstad 1842-50. His first drama, Catiline (1850), was a failure; but after a short spell of study at Christiania, and nearly two years of journalism, he became director of Ole Bull's theatre at Bergen, for which he wrote five romantic dramas. In 1857 he became director of the National Theatre in Christiania. His next dramas were The Warriors in Helgeland (1858), The Rival Kings (1864), and Love's Comedy (1862). The first two, reproducing the spirit of the old sagas, placed Ibsen in the foremost rank of Scandinavian dramatists; the last was a precursor of his satirical social dramas. In 1862 the National Theatre went bankrupt; and Ibsen, enraged because Norway held aloof from the Danes in their struggle against the Germans, forsook his country 1864-92, living in Rome, Dresden, and Munich. The Norwegian parliament granted him a pension in 1866. In 1866-67 appeared the lyric dramas Brand and Peer Gynt; in 1873 the double drama Emperor and Galilean (Julian and Christ; Eng. trans. 1876). There followed Pillars of Society (1877), A Doll's House (1879), Ghosts (1881), An Enemy of the People (1882), The Wild Duck (1884), Rosmersholm (1886), The Lady from the Sea (1888), Hedda Gabler (1890), The Master Builder (1892), Little Eyolf (1894), and John Gabriel Borkman (1896). These plays aroused a storm of controversy in England from 1889, as they had already done in Germany and Scandinavia. A passionate advocate of individual liberty, Ibsen strives to awaken men to a real comprehension of themselves; he is an uncompromising moral reformer, and dwells with painful insistence on the seamy side of human character and social institutions. The interest and method of his plays (translated 1876-1900 by Archer and others) are almost exclusively psychological. His Correspondence was translated in 1905. He died 23d May 1906. See works by Brandes (1867-98; trans. 1899), Vasenius (Swedish, 1881-83), Passarge (German, 1883), Jaeger (Norwegian, 1888; trans. 1895); Wicksteed's Four Lectures on Ibsen (1892); Bernard Shaw's Quintessence of Ibsenism (1894); Gosse's Ibsen (1908). There is a translation of his works in 11 vols. (ed. Archer, 1907-8).

Ibycus, Greek erotic poet, a native of Rhegium in Italy, flourished 540 B.C., and lived at the court of Polycrates, tyrant of Samos. According to the legend he was slain by robbers near Corinth, and dying called upon a flock of cranes to avenge him. The cranes went and hovered over the theatre at Corinth, and one of the murderers exclaimed, 'Behold the avengers of Ibycus!' This led to their conviction. The story is told in Schiller's beautiful ballad.

Ictinus shares with Callicrates the glory of designing the Parthenon (438 B.C.). He was also architect of temples at Eleusis and near Phigalia.

Ida, first king of Bernicia (547-59), landed at Flamborough, and founded Bamborough.

Iddesleigh, STAFFORD HENRY NORTHCOTE, EARL OF, Conservative statesman, was born in London, of an old Devonshire family, 27th October 1818, and was educated at Eton and Balliol College, Oxford, taking a first-class in classics (1839). In 1842 he became private secretary to Mr Gladstone, in 1847 was called to the bar, and in 1851 succeeded his grandfather as eighth baronet. For his services as secretary to the commissioners of the Great Exhibition he was created a C.B. In 1855 he entered parliament for Dudley, in 1858 was elected for Stamford, and in 1866-85 sat for North Devon. He was Financial Secretary to the Treasury under Lord Derby in 1859, and in 1866 was appointed President of the Board of Trade. He had already published Twenty Years of Financial Policy (1862). While at the India Office in 1868 he had charge of the Abyssinian Expedition. In 1871 Mr Gladstone appointed him an Alabama Commissioner. He was Chancellor of the Exchequer in Mr Disraeli's ministry of 1874, and introduced the Friendly Societies Bill (1875). When Mr Disraeli went to the Upper House Sir Stafford Northcote became Conservative leader in the Commons, and upon the death of Lord Beaconsfield joint-leader of the party with the Marquis of Salisbury. He was Lord Rector of Edinburgh University in 1883. In 1885 he was created Earl of Iddesleigh and Viscount St Cyres, and appointed First Lord of the Treasury. In the second Salisbury ministry he was Foreign Secretary, but resigned early in January 1887. He died suddenly in Lord Salisbury's Downing Street residence on the 12th of that month, and was buried at Upton Pyne, Devonshire. See his Lectures and Essays (1887), and the Life of him by Andrew Lang (1890).

Ideler, CHRISTIAN LUDWIG (1766-1846), Prussian astronomer and chronologist, became a professor at Berlin in 1821. [E'de-ler.] and died in Berlin. See German works on him by Duncker (1859) and Koffka (1865).

Iffland, AUGUST WILHELM (1750-1814), actor, manager, and playwright, was born at Hanover,

Ignatieff, NICOLAUS PAULOVITCH (1832-1908), was born at St Petersburg, and in 1856 entered the diplomatic service. In 1858 he induced China to give up the Amur province; and in 1860, while ambassador at Peking, secured another large strip of territory for the Maritime Province. With Khiva and Bokhara he concluded treaties. In 1867 he was made ambassador at Constantinople. An ardent Pan Slavist, he intrigued with the Balkan Slavs, and took a principal part in the diplomatic proceedings before and after the Russo-Turkish war of 1878; the treaty of San Stefano was mainly his work. Under Alexander III. he was Minister of the Interior (1881), but was dismissed in June 1882. [ig-na' tee-ef.]

Ignatius, one of the Apostolic Fathers, was reputed a disciple of St John and Bishop of Antioch. He is said to have been carried off to Rome and thrown to the lions in the circus—in 107 A.D. it used to be said. But Harnack gives the date 138; others assume 115. The martyr was said to have written the Ignatian Epistles on his way to Rome. But the warnings against Judaism and Docetism, as well as the high doctrine of the bishop's office reflected in these epistles, have led most recent critics to hold that none of the various recensions are his works—neither the three Syrian letters, the seven Greek ones (known since the 2d c.), nor the thirteen (evidently of the 4th c.). See Lightfoot's Apostolic Fathers (Part ii. 1889), and works on Ignatius by Zahn (1873), Harnack (1878), Killen (Edinb. 1886), Völter (1892), and Von der Goltz (1894).

Ignatius, FATHER, the name assumed by Joseph Leycester Lyne, who, born in London, 23d Nov. 1837, received Anglican deacon's orders in 1860, and in 1862 set about reviving the 'ancient rule of St Benedict' in the Church of England, settling eventually near Llanthony Abbey in Monmouthshire. In 1898 he was ordained priest by an 'Archbishop Mar Timotheus.' An eloquent preacher, he died 16th October 1908.

Ihne, WILHELM (1821-1902), born at Fürth, in 1849-63 was a schoolmaster at Liverpool, and in 1873 became a professor at Heidelberg. He published a great history of Rome (8 vols. 1868-90). [E'e'neh.]

Ihre, JOHAN (1707-80), born at Lund of Scottish extraction, became in 1748 professor of Belles-lettres and Political Economy. His Glossarium Suiogothicum (1769) was the foundation of Swedish philology. [E'e'reh.]

Ilbert, SIR COURTENAY PEREGRINE, G.C.B. (1911), educated at Marlborough and Balliol, and called to the bar, was in 1882-6 legal member of council in India, and arranged the measure by which in 1884 jurisdiction over Europeans in criminal cases was conferred on certain classes of judicial officers in the interior. In 1902 Sir Peregrine became clerk to the House of Commons, having been parliamentary counsel to the treasury, &c.

Immerrmann, KARL LEBERRECHT (1796-1840), dramatist and humorist, born at Magdeburg, in 1817 entered the public service of Prussia, and served at Münster, Magdeburg, and Düsseldorf. His fame rests upon his tales (Miscellen, 1830) and the satirical novels Die Epigonen (1836) and Münchhausen (1839). See Life by his widow (1870).

Impey, SIR ELIJAH (1732-1809), born at Hammer-smith, from Westminster passed in 1751 to Trinity College, Cambridge, and became a fellow in 1757, having been called to the bar the year before. Knighted and sent out to Bengal as Chief-justice (1774), from the first he acted in harmony with Warren Hastings (q.v.); and in 1775 presided at the trial of Nuncomar, charged with forgery. He conducted it with fairness and patience; the prisoner was found guilty, and sentenced to death with the concurrence of a full court. In 1777 Impey was arbitrator between Hastings and General Clavering when the latter claimed the reversion of the post on Hastings' alleged resignation, and pronounced in favour of Hastings. In 1783 Impey was recalled, and impeached for his conduct in the case of Nuncomar, but honourably acquitted. See Life by his son (1846).

Ina, West Saxon king from 689 to 726.

Inchbald, ELIZABETH, actress, dramatist, and novelist, daughter of John Simpson, a Roman Catholic farmer at Standingfield, Bury St Edmunds, was born 15th October 1753. In April 1772 she stole away to London to seek a theatrical engagement, and in June married Joseph Inchbald, an actor. She made her debut the same year at Bristol as Cordelia, lost her husband in 1779, and in 1780 appeared at Covent Garden. Here she remained, without notable success, till 1789, when she found her true vocation—literature, and to it she thenceforth devoted herself. Her earliest efforts were plays, her first being The Mogul Tale, a farce (1784). She wrote or adapted nineteen plays, her best the comedies of Such Things are (1787), The Midnight Hour (1787), and The Wedding Day (1794); and the farces of Appearance is Against Them (1785) and The Widow's Vow (1786); and her adaptation from Kotzebue, Lovers' Vows (1798). She edited Inchbald's British Theatre, a Modern Theatre, and a Collection of Farces. But her fame rests mainly upon her novels, A Simple Story (1791) and Nature and Art (1796), which rank among English standard novels. She died 1st August 1821. See the cumbersome biography by Boaden (1833) and Memoir by William Bell Scott prefixed to a new edition of A Simple Story (1880).

Incedon, CHARLES BENJAMIN, singer, born at St Keverne, Cornwall, 5th February 1763, sang in the choir of Exeter Cathedral at eight, and served in the navy in 1779-83. In 1784 he made his debut as tenor at Southampton Theatre. From 1786 to 1790 he sang in summer at Vauxhall, and in winter at Bath. In 1790 he appeared at Covent Garden; and for twenty-five years he was unrivalled as a ballad singer. In 1817 he visited America, and afterwards travelled through Britain as the 'Wandering Melodist.' He died at Worcester, 11th February 1826. [In'el-dun.]

Ingelow, JEAN, poetess and novelist, was born at Boston in 1820. Her first efforts in verse were published anonymously as A Rhyming Chronicle of Incidents and Feelings (1850). Much of her poetry is of a religious, introspective cast; but she also wrote powerful ballads. Of her minor pieces, The High-Tide on the Coast of Lincolnshire, 1871, is the best known; of her larger poems, A Story of Doom (1867). Among her novels are Off the Skelligs (1872), Fat'd to be Free (1875), Don John (1876), and Sarah de Berenger (1879). She died at Kensington, 20th July 1897. [In'je-lo.] in Falster, began with lyrics, and was extremely successful with fairy-tales. But his best work was a series of historical novels, Valdemar Sejer (1826), Erik Menveds Barndom (1828), Kong Erik (1833), and Prins Otto of Danmark (1835). The poems Valdemar the Great (1824), Queen Margaret (1836), and Holger Danske (1837) are also based on national history and tradition. From 1822 he lectured on Danish language and literature in the Royal Academy of Sorø near Copenhagen. See his two autobiographical works (1862-63) and his correspondence with Grundtvig (1881).

Ingersoll, JARED (1749-1822), American jurist, born in Connecticut, became a prominent lawyer and judge in Philadelphia. He was a member of congress in 1780-81, and in 1787 a delegate to the convention that framed the Federal constitution. —His son, CHARLES JARED (1782-1862), having sat in congress 1813-15, and advocated the principle that 'free ships make free goods,' was for fourteen years U.S. district attorney for Pennsylvania, and a prominent leader of the Democrats 1841-47. He wrote poems and a drama, a political satire entitled Inchiquin's Letters (1810), and a Sketch of the War of 1812 (1845-52).

Ingersoll, ROBERT GREEN (1833-99), born at Dresden, New York State, was the son of a Congregational minister, and became a lawyer. In 1862-65 he was colonel of a Federal cavalry regiment; in 1866 he became state attorney-general of Illinois. A successful lawyer and Republican orator, he had attracted some notice by his anti-Christian lectures, pamphlets, and books.

Ingleby, CLEMENT MANSFIELD, LL.D. (1823-86), Shakespearian scholar, born at Edgbaston, graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1847, and practised awhile as a solicitor, but in 1859 devoted himself to a life of letters. He was a vice-president of the New Shakspeare Society, and of the Royal Society of Literature. His earliest works were handbooks of logic (1856) and metaphysics (1869), and The Revival of Philosophy at Cambridge (1870). But his life-work began with The Shakspeare Fabrications (1859), and included a long series of works—the best known, Shakspeare: the Man and the Book (1877-81). See Life prefixed to his Essays (1888).

Inglis, JOHN, 'LORD GLENCORSE' (1810-91), from 1867 Lord Justice-general of Scotland and Lord President of the Court of Session, was born in Edinburgh, and died at Loganbank, Midlothian. His defence (1857) of Madeline Smith was brilliant. There is a Life by J. Crabb Watt (1893). [In'glis.]

Inglis, SIR JOHN EARDLEY WILMOT, K.C.B. (1814-62), who succeeded Lawrence as the defender of Lucknow, was born in Nova Scotia, and died at Hamburg. He married in 1851 Julia Selina, fourth daughter of Lord Chelmsford. See her Stiege of Lucknow (1892).

Ingoltsby, THOMAS. See BARHAM.

Ingraham, JOSEPH HOLT (1809-60), born at Portland, Maine, was for some time a sailor, and then taught languages at a college in Mississippi. He published some wild romances, such as Captain Kyd; but after he was ordained to the Episcopal ministry (1855), he wrote religious stories, The Prince of the House of David (1855), The Pillar of Fire (1859), and The Throne of David (1860).

Ingram, HERBERT (1811-60), the founder in 1842 of the Illustrated London News, was born at Boston, of which from 1856 he was M.P. He was drowned in a collision on Lake Michigan.

Ingram, JOHN H., biographer, editor, &c., was born in London, 16th November 1849.

Ingres, JEAN DOMINIQUE AUGUSTE, painter, was born at Montauban, 15th September 1781, studied under David, and after taking the 'Grand Prix' (1801) worked in Rome 1806-20. At Florence (where he spent four years) he painted 'The Vow of Louis XIII.' To this period belong his best portraits, and his 'Edipus and the Sphinx,' 'Venus Anadyomene,' 'Virgil reading the Æneid,' 'Raphael and the Fornarina.' In 1826 he was made professor of Fine Arts at the Academy in Paris, and became the recognised head of a great school. But the acrimonious criticisms passed upon his 'Apotheosis of Homer' (1827) and 'Martyrdom of St Symphorian' (1834) made him glad to succeed Horace Vernet as director of the French Academy in Rome in 1834. The exhibition of 'Stratonice' and the 'Portrait of Cherubini' in Paris turned the tide in his favour; he received the grand medal, and was nominated a grand officer of the Legion of Honour. He returned to Paris in 1841, and died 14th January 1867. See Lives by Delaborde (1870), Blanc (1870), and Schnarsow (1884); in Dohme's Kunst und Künstler. [Ang'r.]

Ingulph, an Englishman, was secretary to Duke William of Normandy, who in 1086 made him abbot of Crowland. He died 16th November 1109. The Historia Monasterii Croylandensis, long regarded as his, was printed in 1596-1684, and translated in 1854. Doubts of its genuineness had often been expressed, when in 1826, in the Quarterly Review, Sir Francis Palgrave endeavoured to show that the so-called History was little better than a novel, and was probably by a monk of the 13th or 14th century. This was proved by Riley in the Archæological Journal and by Sir T. D. Hardy in the Descriptive Catalogue (vol. ii.).

Inman, WILLIAM (1825-81), founder in 1857 of the Liverpool 'Inman Liners,' was born at Leicester, and died near Birkenhead.

Innes, COSMO, historian, born at Durriss, 9th September 1798, was educated at the Edinburgh High School, and graduated both at Glasgow and Oxford. In 1822 he passed as advocate, became sheriff of Moray in 1840, then an official of the Court of Session, and in 1846 professor of Constitutional Law and History in the University of Edinburgh. He is best known as the author of Scotland in the Middle Ages (1860) and Sketches of Early Scotch History (1861). He prepared vol. i. of Acts of the Scottish Parliament, was a member of the Bannatyme, Maitland, and Spalding Clubs, and edited for them several register-books of the old religious houses of Scotland. He published also Legal Antiquities (1872) and several memoirs, including one of Dean Ramsay. He died 31st July 1874. See Memoir by his daughter, Mrs Hill Burton (1874). [In'nez.]

Innes, THOMAS, Scottish historian, was born in 1662 at Drungask in Aberdeenshire, and educated at Paris. He received priest's orders in 1692, and after three years' mission work at Inverveny, Banffshire (1698-1701), became prefect of studies in the Scots College at Paris, where he died 28th January 1744. He was a staunch Jacobite, but no Ultramontane; not free, indeed, from suspicion of Jansenism. His Critical Essay on the Ancient Inhabitants of Scotland (1729) is much the earliest of all scientific histories. It was meant for an introduction to a Civil and Ecclesiastical History of Scotland, one volume of which, coming down to Columba's death, he prepared for the press, whilst another (to 831) was left incomplete.

Both were edited for the Spalding Club by Dr Grub in 1853. See Memoir by Dr Grub prefixed to the reprint of the Critical Essay ('Historians of Scotland' series, vol. viii. 1879).

Innocent, the name of thirteen popes, the periods of whose papacy were as follows:—I. (402-417); II. (1130-43); III. (1198-1216); IV. (1243-54); V. (1276); VI. (1352-62); VII. (1404-6); VIII. (1484-92); IX. (1591); X. (1644-55); XI. (1676-89); XII. (1691-1700); and XIII. (1721-24). Of these, three may be separately noticed:—INNOCENT I., a native of Albano, became Bishop of Rome in 402. His pontificate, next to that of Leo the Great, is the most important for the relations of Rome to the other churches. He enforced the celibacy of the clergy. He maintained the right of the Bishop of Rome to judge appeals from other churches, and his letters abound with assertions of universal jurisdiction. He died in 417, and was afterwards canonised.—INNOCENT III. (LOTHARIO CONTI), the greatest pope of this name, was born at Anagni in 1161, and in 1198 was elected successor of Pope Celestine III. His pontificate is regarded as the culminating point of the temporal and spiritual supremacy of the Roman see; under the impulse of his ardent but disinterested zeal for the glory of the church almost every state and kingdom was brought into subjection. He judged between rival emperors in Germany; made Philip Augustus of France take back his discarded wife, Ingeburga; and triumphed over John of England. In his time the Latin conquest of Constantinople destroyed the pretensions of his eastern rivals. To him every offence against religion was a crime against society, and every heresy was a rebellion—at his call the crusade against the Albigenses was undertaken. He was zealous in the repression of simony and other abuses of the time. He promoted the spiritual movement in which the Franciscan and Dominican orders had their origin. Under him the famous fourth Lateran Council was held in 1215. He died in July 1216. His works embrace sermons, a remarkable treatise on the Misery of the Condition of Man, a large number of letters, and perhaps the 'golden sequence' 'Veni, sancte Spiritus.' See Jorry's Histoire du Pape Innocent III. (1853), and works in German by Hurter (1834-42), Deutsch (1876), Schwemer (1882), and Brischar (1883).—INNOCENT XI. (BENEDETTO ODESCALCHI), born at Como in 1611 and elected in 1676, was a vigorous and judicious reformer, and strove hard to put an end to the abuse by Louis XIV. of the king's claim to keep sees vacant and appropriate their revenues. But the actual conflict regarded the right of asylum enjoyed by the foreign ambassadors in Rome, which had been extended to the district round their houses. These districts had gradually become nests of crime, and of frauds upon the revenue; and the pope gave notice that he would not thereafter receive the credentials of any new ambassador who should not renounce these claims. Louis XIV. instructed a new ambassador to maintain the dignity of France, and sent a large body of officers to support his pretensions. Innocent would grant no audience. Louis seized the papal territory of Avignon; but the pope died 11th August 1689, ere the dispute was adjusted. See French work by Michaud (4 vols. 1882-83).

Inverlyde, LORD. See BURNS, SIR GEORGE.
Iphicrates (419-353 B.C.), an Athenian general, who served in the Corinthian war (395-387), in Egypt (379-374), and against Sparta (372-371).

Ireland, ALEXANDER (1810-94), a Manchester bookseller, for many years connected with the Manchester Examiner, wrote The Book-lover's Encirclion, a book on Emerson, &c.

Ireland, SAMUEL WILLIAM HENRY, was born in London in 1777, the son of a dealer in old books and prints. Articled at seventeen to a London conveyancer, he was tempted by his father's unintelligent enthusiasm for Shakespeare to forge an autograph of the poet on a carefully-copied old lease. His audacity grew with the credulity of his dupes, and ere long locks of hair, private letters, annotated books, &c., were plentifully produced. Boswell, Warton, Dr Parr, and hundreds more came, saw, and believed; but those, like Malone, really qualified to judge denounced the imposture. Ireland now produced a deed of Shakespeare's bequeathing his books and papers to a William-Henry Irelande, an assumed ancestor. Next a new historical play entitled Vortigern was announced, and produced by Sheridan at Drury Lane, 2d April 1796. Vapid and un-Shakespearean, it was damned at once; and this nipped in the bud a projected series of historical plays. The uneasiness of Ireland's father at length getting the better of his credulity, the young man was forced to confess; he published a statement in 1796, and expanded it in his Confessions (1805). He soon sank into poverty, hacking out a living as a bookseller's clerk till his death, 17th April 1835. He produced a dozen poems, four or five novels, and ten or more biographical and miscellaneous compilations.

Irenæus, Sr, born probably near Smyrna between 120 and 140, in youth was acquainted with Polycarp. He became a priest of the Greco-Gaulish church of Lyons, under the Bishop Pothinus, upon whose martyrdom, in 177, he was elected to the see. Gregory of Tours states that he suffered martyrdom in the persecution under Severus in 202; but this is probably a mistake. Irenæus was a successful missionary bishop, but is chiefly known for his zeal against the Gnostics (especially the Valentiniens), and for his attempts to prevent a rupture between the Eastern and Western Churches over the computing of Easter. The only work of his extant, except a few fragments, is his treatise Against Heresies, in five books; and even that, except some quotations from the first book, we have only in a barbarous Latin version. The editio princeps was published by Erasmus (1526); the best editions are by Sieren (1851-53) and Harvey (Camb. 1857). There is a translation in Clark's Ante-Nicene Library. See works by Ziegler (1871) and Gouillard (1876). [I-rel-nee'us.]

Irene (c. 752-803), a poor orphan of Athens whose beauty and talents led the Emperor Leo IV. to marry her in 769. After 780 she ruled as regent for her son, Constantine VI. She imprisoned and blinded him and her husband's five brothers, but in 802 she was banished to Lesbos. As an opponent of the iconoclasts she was canonised by the Greek Church. [I-rel-nee.]

Ireton, HENRY, born in 1611 at Attenborough, Nottingham, graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1629, and at the outbreak of the Civil War offered his services to parliament, fighting at Edgehill, Naseby, and the siege of Bristol. Cromwell's son-in-law from 1646, he was one of the most implacable enemies of the king, and signed the warrant for his execution. He accompanied Cromwell to Ireland, and in 1650 became lord-deputy. On 26th November 1651 he died of the plague before Limerick, and was buried in Westminster Abbey till the Restoration, when his remains were shifted to Tyburn.

Iriarte, TOMAS DE (1750-91), a Spanish poet-fabulist, was born at Orotava in Tenerife.

Iriarius, the 'Lucerna Juris,' a learned jurist, born in Bologna, flourished there as a teacher of the liberal arts, and died before 1140. He was one of the earliest to devote serious study to Justinian. See monograph by Vecchio (Pisa, 1869).

Irons, WILLIAM JOSIAH (1812-83), a High Church London clergyman from 1872, Bampton lecturer (1870), and translator of the Dies Irae.

Irvine, SIR ALEXANDER (c. 1600-58), laird of Drum, an Aberdeenshire royalist, descended from the 'gude' Sir Alexander Irvine, provost of Aberdeen, who fell in single combat at Harlaw (1411).

Irvine, DAVID, LL.D. (1778-1860), born at Langholm, from 1820 to 1848 was the Advocates' Librarian, Edinburgh, and wrote a Life of George Buchanan, History of Scottish Poetry, &c.

Irvine, EDWARD, born at Annan, August 4, 1792, at thirteen entered Edinburgh University, and in 1810 became a schoolmaster at Haddington, in 1812 at Kirkcaldy. Here three years later he was licensed to preach, and in 1819 he was appointed assistant to Dr Chalmers in Glasgow. In 1822 he was called to the Caledonian Church, Hatton Garden, London; his success as a preacher there was such as had never been known. In 1825 he began to announce his convictions in regard to the imminent second advent of Christ; this was followed up by the translation of The Coming of the Messiah (1827), professedly written by a Christian Jew, but really by a Spanish Jesuit. By 1828, when his Homilies on the Sacraments appeared, he had begun to elaborate his views of the Incarnation, asserting Christ's oneness with us in all the attributes of humanity; and he was charged with heresy as maintaining the sinfulness of Christ's nature. He was now deep in the prophecies, and when in the beginning of 1830 he heard of extraordinary manifestations of prophetic power in Dumbartonshire, he believed them. He was arraigned before the presbytery of London in 1830 and convicted of heresy, ejected from his new church in Regent's Square in 1832, and finally deposed in 1833 by the presbytery of Annan, which had licensed him. The majority of his congregation adhered to him, and a new communion, the Catholic Apostolic, was developed, commonly known as Irvingite, though Irving had little to do with its development. Shortly after his health failed, and he went down to Glasgow, where he died of consumption, December 8, 1834. He is buried in the crypt of the cathedral. See Life by Mrs Oliphant (1862) and Carlyle's Essays and Reminiscences.

Irvine, SIR HENRY (JOHN HENRY BRODRIBB), actor, was born 6th February 1838 at Keinton-Mandeville near Glastonbury. Educated in London, he was for a time a clerk in the City, but made his first appearance at the Sunderland Theatre in 1856. He played in Edinburgh nearly three years, appeared in London at the Princess's in September 1859, was at Glasgow, Manchester (nearly five years), and Liverpool, and called to London in 1866, appeared at St James's Theatre with much success as Doricourt in The Belle's Stratagem, Dornton in The Road to Ruin, and (at the Gaiety) as Mr Chenevix in Uncle Dick's Darling. Performances at other London theatres followed, and in 1871, migrating to the Lyceum, he, in spite of his characteristic mannerisms, added to his reputation by his fine representation of Mathias in The Bells, by his Charles I., Eugene Aram, Richelieu, and Louis XI., and especially, in 1874, by his unconventional Hamlet. Among other successes under Mrs Bateman's management of the Lyceum were Macbeth, Othello, Richard III., and The Lyons Mail. In 1878 he entered on his own management of the Lyceum, where till 1898 his triumphs were shared by Miss Ellen Terry (q.v.). After performances of Hamlet, Othello, and The Merchant of Venice, which were marked by scenic as well as histrionic excellence, he appeared in 1880 in The Corsican Brothers; The Cup in 1881; Romeo and Juliet and Much Ado in 1882; Twelfth Night in 1884; Wills's Olivia in 1885; Faust, adapted by Wills, in 1886; The Dead Heart in 1889; King Lear in 1892; Becket in 1893; revivals of Faust and Becket and The Merchant of Venice in 1894; the new play of King Arthur in 1895; Cymbeline in 1896; and Peter the Great, by his son, Laurence, in 1897. He repeatedly toured in America, was knighted in 1895, withdrew from the management of the Lyceum in 1899, and dying on the 14th of October 1905, was buried (after cremation) in Westminster Abbey. He wrote on his art in the Nineteenth Century and elsewhere. His eldest son, HENRY (b. 5th August 1870), is also an actor. See works by Joseph Hatton (1884), F. Daly (1884), W. Archer (1885), P. Fitzgerald (1893), and Brereton (1908).

Irving, JOSEPH (1830-91), historian of Dumbarshire, born at Dumfries, was for fifteen years a Dumbarshire bookseller, and died at Paisley.

Irving, WASHINGTON, was born in New York of Orkney and Falmouth parentage, April 3, 1783. He began to read law at nineteen, but in 1804, his health being precarious, his brothers sent him to Europe. He visited Rome, Paris, the Netherlands, and London, and in 1806 returned to New York, and was admitted to the bar. His first writing was in Salmagundi (1807), a semi-monthly sheet in imitation of the Spectator, which ran for twenty numbers. His first characteristic work was A History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker (1809). The History has some grains of truth, but is openly a good-natured burlesque upon the old Dutch settlers of Manhattan Island. For many years after this Irving was in partnership with his brothers in business; but in the end they were unsuccessful; and when later he had won his place among authors and was receiving a good income, he supported two of his brothers and five nieces with unselfish devotion. In May 1815 he went to Europe for the second time, and did not return for seventeen years. After the bankruptcy (1815) of his firm he turned his whole attention to literature. The Sketch Book appeared in 1819-20, and was received with delight. All the pieces in this miscellany have a charm; but the most notable are, in different styles, 'Rip Van Winkle' and 'The Legend of Sleepy Hollow,' and 'Westminster Abbey.' Bracebridge Hall (1822) fairly maintained the reputation of 'Geoffrey Crayon, Gent.' After three or four years in Germany and France he published Tales of a Traveller (1824); then in Spain (1826-29) undertook the arduous studies which were the foundation of his Life of Columbus (1828), Conquest of Granada (1829), Voyages of the Companions of Columbus (1831), The Alhambra (1832), Legends of the Conquest of Spain (1835), and Mahomet and his Successors (1850). After leaving Spain Irving was for a short time secretary to the United States Legation in London; on his return to his native city (1832) he was received with great enthusiasm. Having made an excursion in the then Far West, he published (1835) A Tour on the Prairies—as well as Recollections of Abbotsford and Newstead Abbey. In writing Astoria (1836) he was assisted by his nephew, his future biographer. The Adventures of Captain Bonneville (in the Rocky Mountains) appeared in 1837. In 1842-46 he was U.S. minister in Spain; after his return he produced Goldsmith (1849), Wolfer's Roost (1855), and Washington (1855-59). He died at Sunnyside, 28th November 1859, and is buried in 'Sleepy Hollow,' Tarrytown. See Life by his nephew, Pierre M. Irving (1862-63), and the short biography by C. D. Warner (1881).

Isaac, one of the Hebrew patriarchs, son of Abraham and Sarah, and half-brother of Ishmael.

Isaac I., COMNENUS, became emperor of Constantinople in 1057. He established the finances of the empire on a sounder footing, laid the clergy under contribution at the tax-collections, and repelled the Hungarians attacking his northern frontier; and then resigning the crown (1059), retired to a convent, where he died in 1061. There are extant from his pen scholia on Homer.—ISAAC II., ANGELUS, emperor from 1185, was vicious and cowardly, and after a reign of war and tumult, was dethroned, blinded, and imprisoned by his brother Alexius in 1195. Restored in 1203, he reigned six months, was again dethroned, and died in prison.

Isabella of ANGOULÊME in 1200 married King John of England, and in 1220 a former lover, the Count de la Marche. She died at Fontevraud in 1246.—A daughter by John, ISABELLA (1214-41), in 1235 married the Emperor Frederic II.

Isabella (1292-1358), daughter of Philip IV. of France, in 1308 married at Boulogne Edward II. (q.v.), and, after his murder by her and Mortimer, lived chiefly at Castle Rising near Lynn.

Isabella of CASTILE (1451-1504), the daughter of John II., king of Castile and Leon, in 1469 married Ferdinand V. (q.v.) of Aragon.

Isabella II. (1830-1904), ex-queen of Spain, born at Madrid, was the elder daughter of Ferdinand VII., on whose death in 1833 she succeeded to the throne, with her mother Queen Maria Christina (q.v.) as regent. She attained her majority in 1843, but her marriage (1846) to her cousin, Francisco de Assisi, and that of her sister to the Duke de Montpensier, weakened her position. Successive ministries rose and fell, all inefficient or corrupt. Bigoted and licentious, Isabella in 1868 was expelled to France, and abdicated in favour of her son Alfonso XII.

Isabej, JEAN BAPTISTE (1767-1855), born at Nancy, painted portraits of the Revolution notabilities, and afterwards became court-painter to Napoleon and the Bourbons.—His son, EUGÈNE (1804-86), was a historical painter.

Isæus, a speech-writer in Athens, of whom, though we have ten of the fifty speeches he composed, we know absolutely nothing except that his first speech was composed in 389 B.C. and his last in 353 B.C.—all in private suits.

Isaiah (Heb. Jeshaiah), son of Amoz, first of the greater Hebrew prophets, was a citizen of Jerusalem, who came forward as prophet about 740 B.C. (probable death-year of King Uzziah), and exercised his office till at least the close of the century. Of his end we know nothing: a tradition exists that he was sawn to death in the persecution of Manasseh. The first to doubt the authenticity of the book of Isaiah was Aben-Ezra (q.v.); Koppe (1779) suspected that chaps. xl.-lxvi. were of later date; and now most critics hold this view. It is quite possible, however, that the disputed prophecies contain fragments from Isaiah himself; that, though post-exilic in the main, they contain at least pre-exilic fragments in more certain. See the commentaries of Ewald, Delitzsch, Cheyne, and Orelli; Driver's Isaiah: His Life and Times; George Adam Smith's 'Isaiah' in Expositor's Bible; Matthew Arnold's Isaiah of Jerusalem and Isaiah XL. - LXVI.; several works by Cheyne; and Robertson Smith's Prophecy of Israel, Lectures v.-viii.

Isambert, FRANÇOIS ANDRÉ (1792-1857), born at Anunay, in 1818 began to practise as an advocate in Paris, where he soon made a name as a Liberal. He greatly enhanced his reputation by publishing Recueil des Anciennes Loix Françaises (29 vols. 1821-33), Traité du Droit Public et du Droit des Gens (1823), and Code Électoral et Municipal (2d ed. 1831). After the July Revolution of 1830 he signalled himself in the Chamber of Deputies as a friend of liberty. Late works were on the religious condition of France and Europe (1834-44) and a history of Jerusalem (1856).

Ishmael, son of Abraham by Hagar, the Egyptian handmaid of his wife Sarah, represented as the progenitor of the Arabs. Mohaimmed asserted his descent from Ishmael.

Isidore de Seville, or ISIDORUS HISPALENSIS (c. 560-636), was born either at Seville or Carthage, and became Archbishop of Seville in 594. His episcopate was notable for the councils at Seville in 618 or 619, and at Toledo in 633, whose canons formed the basis of the constitutional law of Spain. He also collected all the decrees of councils and other church laws anterior to his time. Isidore was a voluminous and learned writer. His works include Etymologies or Origins, a kind of encyclopaedia treating of the whole circle of the sciences; introduction to the Old and New Testaments; a defence of Christianity against the Jews; three books of 'Sentences;' books on ecclesiastical offices and the monastic rule; and a history of the Goths, Vandals, and Suevi. See German monograph by Hertzberg (1874).

Isia, JOSÉ FRANCISCO DE, was born at Vidanes, N.W. Spain, 24th March 1703. Joining the Jesuits, for some years he lectured on philosophy and theology at Segovia, Santiago, and Pamplona, and became famous as a preacher, but still more as a humorist and satirist by his writings, especially his novel of Fray Gerundio (1758-70). The Letters of Juan de la Encina (1732) are a good example of his style; a more characteristic one is the Dia Grande de Navarra. What Cervantes had done with the sham chivalry and sentiment of the romances, Isia strove in Fray Gerundio to do with the vulgar buffooneries of the popular preachers, and especially the preaching friars of the day, and he was almost equally successful. From the king down everybody was delighted with it except the friars; but they were a power, and at their instance the Inquisition stopped the publication of the book. In 1767 Isia shared the lot of the Jesuits in their expulsion from Spain, and betook himself to Bologna, where he lived, cheerful and uncomplaining, in poverty and ill-health, until 2d November 1781. A little before his death he translated Gil Blas, which he humorously professed to have restored to its native language. The English translation of Fray Gerundio (1772) by Dr Warner (some say Dr Nugent) is somewhat abridged, but pretty faithful. [Eess'tah.]

Islip, SIMON, Archbishop of Canterbury from 1349 till his death in 1366, was probably born at Islip near Oxford, and in 1307 was a fellow of Merton. See vol. iv. of Hook's Archbishops.

Isma'il Pasha (1830-95), Khedive of Egypt, born in Cairo, was second son of Ibrahim Pasha, and grandson of the famous Mehemet Ali. Educated at Paris, in 1863 he succeeded Said as viceroy, and in 1867 assumed the hereditary title of Khedive. In 1872 the Sultan granted him also the right (withdrawn in 1879) of concluding treaties and of maintaining an army, and virtually gave him sovereign powers. Ismail now began a series of vast internal reforms, and, extending his dominions southward, annexed Dar-Fur in 1874, thereafter endeavouring, through Sir Samuel Baker and General Gordon, governors of the Soudan, to suppress the slave-trade. To provide funds for his vast undertakings he in 1875 sold to Great Britain 177,000 shares in the Suez Canal for £4,000,000. The Egyptian finances, however, were almost hopelessly involved; and after several failures, a dual English and French control was established, and the finances placed under European management. A promise of constitutional government ended in 1879 in the summary dismissal of Nubar Pasha's ministry, and this brought about the peremptory interference of the European governments. The Khedive, who declined to abdicate, was, at the instance of the Western powers, deposed by the Sultan in June 1879, and Prince Tewfik, his eldest son, was proclaimed Khedive. Ismail ultimately retired to Constantinople, where he died.

Isocrates (436-338 B.C.), the Athenian, represents the perfection of 'epideictic' oratory—i.e. oratory in which form and literary finish count for everything, and matter for very little. He received an excellent education, in his youth heard the orator Gorgias, and joined the circle of Socrates, but abandoned philosophy for speech-writing, which also he gave up when he found, after six speeches, that he had not the practical gifts for winning cases in a law court. About 390 B.C. he set up as a teacher of oratory, though he professed also to give a general practical education. He drew to him pupils subsequently distinguished as statesmen, historians, and orators. He himself composed model speeches for his pupils, such as the Panegyricus (c. 380 B.C.) and the Platonicus (373). But he also wrote speeches intended to be practical; the Archidamus may actually have been composed for the Spartan king Archidamus. But the majority, for instance the Symmachicus, the Areopagiticus, the Panathenaeus (342-339), and the letters to Philip of Macedonia, were designed to be circulated and read—they are in fact the earliest political pamphlets known. As a politician, Isocrates' one idea was to unite all Greeks together in a joint attack upon the common foe, Persia. The outcome was the destruction of Greek freedom at Chæronea by Philip, a blow which 'killed with report that old man eloquent.' For melody, artistic merit, perfection of form and literary finish, Isocrates stands unrivalled, though his work is laboured and his style is apt to become monotonous. Had but one of his speeches survived, his poverty of thought would never have been discovered, but fate with cruel kindness has preserved nearly everything he ever wrote. The first edition was printed at Milan in 1493; the best edition is that in the Teubner series. Vol. 1. of a translation by Freese appeared in 1894.

Isouard, NICCOLÒ (1775-1818), operatic composer, was born in Malta, and died at Paris.

Israëls, JOSEF, genre-painter, born at Groningen

27th Jan. 1824, exhibited in 1855 a historical picture of William the Silent. But he soon turned to scenes from humble life, and sent to the Salon of 1857 his 'Children of the Sea' and 'Evening on the Shore.' He also etched. See book by Netscher. He died 12th August 1911.

ITO, PRINCE HIROBUMI (1838-1909), four times premier of Japan, was in London in 1863, 1871, and 1882-1901, drafted the Japanese constitution, and was assassinated by a Korean at Kharbin.

Iturbide, AUGUSTIN DE (1783-1824), a Mexican general who made himself emperor in 1822-23, and a year later was shot. [Ee-toor-bee'day.]

Ivan I. (i.e. John), was made Grand-Duke of Moscow by the Tartars in 1328, and reigned till 1341.—Ivan II., his son, reigned thereafter till 1359.—Ivan III. (1462-1505), sometimes named the 'Great,' may be regarded as the founder of the Russian empire. He was at first only Grand-Duke of Moscow, but succeeded in shaking off entirely the yoke of the Tartars, and in subjecting a number of the Russian principalities to his own sway. In 1472 he married Sophia, a niece of Constantine Palaeologus, assumed the title of 'Ruler of all Russia,' and adopted the two-headed eagle of the Byzantine empire.—IVAN IV. (1531-84), called Ivan the Terrible, did much for the advancement of his country in arts and commerce, as well as for its extension by arms. He was the first Russian sovereign to assume the title of czar. He subdued Kazan and Astrakhan, and made the first annexation of Siberia. He concluded a commercial treaty with Queen Elizabeth, after the English had discovered (1553) the way to Archangel by sea. But his hand fell with merciless cruelty upon the boyars of his kingdom, and upon some of his towns, as Moscow, Tver, and Novgorod. Ivan died of sorrow for his son, whom three years before he had slain in a mad fit of rage. See Austen Pember, Ivan the Terrible (1895).

JACKSON, ANDREW, General, seventh president of the United States, was born at Waxhaw, N.C., March 15, 1767. After being admitted to the bar he removed in 1788 to Nashville, and was appointed public prosecutor. He helped to frame the constitution of Tennessee, and became its representative in congress in 1796, its senator in 1797, and a judge of its supreme court (1798-1804). When war was declared against Great Britain in 1812, as major-general of the state militia he led 2500 men to Natchez, but was ordered to disband them. Jackson, however, marched them back to Nashville, and in September 1813 took the field against the Creek Indians in Alabama. This campaign ended in a decisive victory at the Horseshoe Bend of the Tallapoosa, March 1814. In May 'Old Hickory' was made major-general in the regular army, and appointed to the command of the South. Pensacola in Spanish Florida being then used by the British as a base of operations, Jackson invaded Spanish soil, stormed Pensacola, and successfully defended New Orleans against Sir E. Pakenham (January 1815). In 1818 Jackson again invaded Florida, and severely chastised the Seminoles. After the purchase of Florida he was its first governor, but soon resigned, and in 1823 was again elected to the U.S. senate. In 1824 as a candidate for the presidency he had the highest popular vote, but not a majority; in 1828 he was elected, having a majority of electoral votes. He was fearless, honest, prompt to decide everything for personal reasons, and swept out great numbers of minor officials to fill their places with his partisans—on the principle (as was said of him): 'To the victor belong the spoils.' Questions of tariff and 'nullification' were prominent during his presidency. The president's veto power was much more freely used by Jackson than by his predecessors. After a long struggle he destroyed the Bank of the United States. In 1832 he was again elected president by an overwhelming majority. In his administration the national debt was fully paid in 1835, and the surplus revenue which accumulated was distributed to the several states. In foreign affairs Jackson won credit by enforcing the claims for spoils committed by French vessels during the wars of Napoleon. Jackson's second term having expired in 1837, he retired to private life, and died at The Hermitage, Nashville, June 8, 1845. See Lives by Parton (1860), Sumner (1882), Dyer (1891), and Buell (1904).

Jackson, CYRIL (1746-1819), born in Yorkshire, from 1783 to 1809 was dean of Christ Church, Oxford. He died at Felpham near Bognor.

Jackson, JOHN (1769-1845), pugilist, 'Gentleman Jackson,' was born and died in London.

Jackson, JOHN, R.A. (1778-1831), portrait-painter, was born, a Wesleyan tailor's son, at Lastingham, N. R. Yorkshire.

Jackson, JOHN ADAMS (1825-79), American sculptor, was born at Bath, Maine, and from 1860 made Florence his home.

Jackson, THOMAS, D.D. (1579-1640), a divine ranked by Southey with South and Sir Thomas Browne, was born at Witton-on-the-Wear, Durham, and from 1630 was president of his old college, Corpus, at Oxford. His chief work was Commentaries on the Apostles' Creed (1613-38).

Jackson, THOMAS GRAHAM, architect, born at Hampstead, 21st Dec. 1835, and educated at Brighton and Wadham, Oxford, became a fellow in 1864. He studied under Sir G. G. Scott 1855-61; has done much work at Oxford; and is the author of Modern Gothic (1873), Dalmatia (1887), Wadham College (1893), St Mary's, Oxford (1897), &c. In 1892 he was elected A.R.A., in 1896 R.A.

Jackson, THOMAS JONATHAN, 'Stonewall Jackson,' born at Clarksburg, West Va., 21st January 1824, graduated at West Point in 1846, gained two brevets in the war with Mexico, and in 1851 became professor in the Virginia Military Institute. He took command of the Confederate troops at Harper's Ferry on the secession of Virginia, and commanded a brigade at Bull Run, where his firm stand gained him his sobriquet 'Stonewall.' Promoted major-general, in the campaign of the Shenandoah valley (1862), he out-generalled McDowell, Banks, and Fremont, and eventually drove them back upon the Lower Shenandoah. Then, hastening to Richmond, he turned the scale at Gaines's Mills (27th June), and returned to defeat Banks at Cedar Run in August. He then seized Pope's depot at Manassas, and his corps bore the brunt of the fighting in the victorious second battle there on 30th August. On 15th September he captured Harper's Ferry with 13,000 prisoners, and next day arrived at Sharpsburg, where his presence, in the battle of Antietam, saved Lee from disaster. As lieutenant-general he commanded the right wing at Fredericksburg (13th December), and at Chancellorsville (1st May 1863) repulsed Hooker. Next night he fell upon the right of the National army and drove it back on Chancellorsville. Returning from a reconnaissance, his party was fired on by some of his own command, and Jackson received three wounds. His left arm was amputated; but on 10th May he died. See Lives by Cooke (1866), Dabney (1866), his wife (1892), Parton (1893), and Lieut.-Col. G. F. Henderson (1898).

Jackson, WILLIAM (1730-1808), musician, was born at Exeter, where, after some twenty or more years in London, he in 1777 became organist of the cathedral. He published many songs and canzonets, besides sonatas, dramatic pieces, &c.

Jacobi, FRIEDRICH HEINRICH, born at Düsseldorf, 25th January 1743, was trained for a mercantile career, but in 1770 was appointed finance officer for Jülich and Berg, and devoted himself to literature and philosophy. President from 1807 of the Academy of Sciences at Munich, he died there 10th March 1819. Jacobi elaborated no system of philosophy, but criticised all other philosophies from his special doctrine—that by the 'reason' (not the understanding) we have immediate conviction or belief not only of the reality of objects perceived by the senses, but also of the reality of the highest verities that lie beyond the apprehension of sense. From this standpoint he examined Spinoza (1785), Hume, Kant, and Schelling (1811). He also expounded his view in philosophical romances—Woldemar (1779) and Allwills Briefsammlung (1781)—in an Open Letter to Fichte (1799), and in other occasional writings. See monographs by Kuhn (1834), Zirmgibel (1867), and Harms (1876). [Ya-ko'bee.]

Jacobi, KARL GUSTAV JAKOB (1804-51), mathematician, born at Potsdam, was professor of Mathematics at Königsberg 1827-42. He excelled in analytical mathematics; discovered and expounded elliptic functions (1829); and did much for differential equations, the theory of numbers, and determinants. His works were published by the Berlin Academy (7 vols. 1881-91).

Jacobini, LUDOVICO (1832-87), cardinal, was born at Genzano, and died in Rome.

Jacobs, JOSEPH, folklorist and critic, born at Sydney, August 29, 1854, from Sydney University proceeded to St John's, Cambridge, and graduated in 1876. In 1900 he went to America to edit the Jewish Encyclopædia. He has published fairy tales and works on Jewish history, and edited Keynard the Fox, North's Bidpai, Howell's Letters, &c.

Jacotot, JEAN JOSEPH (1770-1840), inventor of the 'universal method' of education, born at Dijon, was successively soldier, military secretary, and holder of various professorial chairs. The principles of his system are that the mental capacities of all men are equal; the unequal results of education depend almost exclusively upon will; every one is able to educate himself, provided he is once started in the right way; knowledge should first be acquired through instinctive experience, or by the memory. He expounded his views in Enseignement Universel (1823). See Life by Guillard (1860). [Zha'ko-to.] Jacquard, JOSEPH MARIE (1752-1834), a Lyons silk-weaver who by his invention in 1801-8 of the Jacquard Loom enabled an ordinary workman to produce the most beautiful patterns in a style previously accomplished with almost incredible patience, skill, and labour. But though Napoleon rewarded him with a small pension, the silk-weavers themselves offered such violent opposition to his machine that on one occasion he narrowly escaped with his life. At his death his machine was in almost universal use. See French Life by Grandarsd (3d ed. 1884).

Jacque, CHARLES (1813-94), animal painter and etcher, was born and died in Paris.

Jacqueline OF HOLLAND, or JACOBA OF BAVARIA (1401-36), a beautiful but unfortunate princess, who was four times married—in 1407 to Prince John of France; in 1418 to her weak cousin, the Duke of Brabant; in 1422, bigamously, to Duke Humphrey of Gloucester; and in 1433, trigamously, to Frans van Borssele.

Jacquemart, JULES (1837-80), etcher, celebrated for his delicate renderings of old jewellers' work, was born in Paris, and died at Nice.

Jagellons, an illustrious dynasty which reigned in Lithuania, Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia in the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries.

Jahn, FRIEDRICH LUDWIG (1778-1852), the 'Turnvater' or Father of Gymnastics, born at Lanz in Prussia, in 1811 started the first gymnasiun in Berlin. His system, meant to revive patriotism, attracted the Prussian youth, and to the training thus obtained must be largely attributed the expulsion of the French. Jahn received the command of a volunteer corps; and after the peace of 1815 resumed his teaching, and published Die Deutsche Turnkunst (1816). But the gymnasiuns began to witness political gatherings, too liberal to please the Prussian government, and they were closed in 1818. Jahn, who had taken a prominent part in the movement, was arrested in 1819, and suffered five years' imprisonment. He was elected to the Frankfort National Assembly in 1848. See Lives by Pröhle (1855), Angerstein (1861), Diesterweg (1864), Rothenburg (1871), and Schultheiss (1894). [Yahn.]

Jahn, JOHANN (1750-1816), Catholic biblical critic, born at Tasswitz in Moravia, became professor of Oriental Languages at Olmütz, and in 1789 at Vienna; but the boldness of his criticism led in 1806 to his retirement to a canonry. Notable works were his introduction to the Old Testament (1792), Archeologia Biblica (1805; Eng. trans. 1840), and Enchiridion Hermeneutica (1812).

Jahn, OTTO (1813-69), archaeologist and classical editor, born at Kiel, lectured at Kiel, Greifswald, and Leipzig. Deprived in 1851 for his part in the political movements of 1848-49, he became in 1855 professor of Archeology at Bonn. He published works on Greek art (1846), representations of ancient life on vases (1861, 1868), and the evil eye (1850), besides a Life of Mozart (1856-60) and masterly essays on music.

James 'THE ELDER,' son of the fisherman Zebedee and brother of John, was one of the three chief among the twelve apostles, and was put to death by Herod Agrippa, 44 A.D.—JAMES 'THE YOUNGER,' son of Alphaeus, was likewise an apostle.—JAMES 'THE GREAT,' eldest among the 'brethren' of Jesus, was stoned to death in 62 A.D. He was head of the Christian community of Jerusalem, and bore the surname of 'the Just.' Most theologians consider him the author of the Epistle of James, although it has been ascribed to both the others. The first of the catholic epistles, it was put by Eusebius among the list of controverted books (Antilegomena), and was finally declared canonical by the third Council of Carthage (397). The Tübingen school regard it as a polemic against Paul. See commentaries by Basset (1876), Reuss (1878), Erdmann (1881), Schegg (1883), Plumptre (1884), Beyschlag (1888), Johnstone (2d ed. 1888), and Mayor (1893).

James I., king of Scotland, second son of Robert III., was born at Dunfermline in 1394. His elder brother, David, Duke of Rothesay, died at Falkland in 1402—murdered, said rumour, by his uncle, the Duke of Albany; and Robert in 1406 sent James for safety to France. But the vessel was seized by an English cruiser, and James was carried to London. He was detained a prisoner for eighteen years in the Tower, at Windsor, and elsewhere, no doubt with the connivance of the Duke of Albany, on whom the government of Scotland had devolved after Robert III.'s death in 1406. Henry IV. made some compensation for his injustice to the young prince by carefully instructing him in all the knightly and clerical accomplishments of the age. On Albany's death in 1420, his son Murdoch succeeded to the regency; under his feeble rule the country fell into disorder, till at length he took steps to procure the return of James. Previous to leaving England, James married on February 12, 1424, Jane Beaufort (d. 1445), a daughter of the Earl of Somerset, niece of Richard II., and granddaughter of John of Gaunt. James found his kingdom a scene of excess and rapine, and at once set himself to restore order. Eight months after his restoration he suddenly swooped down upon his cousin the late regent, two of his sons, and his aged father-in-law, the Earl of Lennox; they were all beheaded at Stirling. James then seized fifty of the Highland chiefs, and put to death the most obnoxious ringleaders. He deprived the Earl of March of his estates, and on the death of the Earl of Mar, the victor at Harlaw, he seized the earldom and annexed its immense estates to the crown. Meanwhile into the parliament he introduced the principle of representation. Its enactments related to the regulation of trade and the internal economy of the kingdom. He renewed commercial intercourse with the Netherlands, concluded a treaty with Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, and drew closer the ancient bond of alliance with France. But he persisted in harshly carrying out his measures for curbing the power of the nobles, which excited strong discontent and apprehension; and after his confiscation of the earldom of Strathern, a conspiracy was formed, headed by his kinsmen, the Earl of Athole, Sir Robert Stewart, and Sir Robert Graham. The plot was carried into effect at Perth on 20th February 1437. The king was about to retire for the night, when a band of assassins led by Graham broke into the Dominican monastery where the court was residing. The bolts had been removed from the chamber door, but Catharine Douglas is said to have thrust her arm into the staple. It was instantly broken, and the ruffians burst into the chamber. The king, who had sought refuge in a vault under the floor, was discovered, and after a desperate resistance cruelly murdered. The murderers were all taken, and tortured to death. By his wife he left one son and six daughters, one of whom, Margaret of Scotland (q.v.), married to the dauphin of France, was a gifted poetess. James was unquestionably the ablest of the Stewart sovereigns, and was possessed of high poetical genius. The tender, passionate Kings Quair ('king's quire' or book) has been accepted as his by most critics; though Mr J. T. Brown in The Authorship of the Kings Quair (1896) argues that it is by an anonymous poet fifty years later than James. Christ's Kirk on the Green and Pebbles to the Play are certainly much later compositions; but a 'Ballad of Good Counsel' is ascribed to James by Prof. Skeat. See the latter's editions of The Kings Quair (S.T.S. 1884 and 1911), Rossetti's noble ballad, 'The King's Tragedy,' and Jusserand's The Romance of a King's Life (1897).

James II., born 16th October 1430, was six years old at his father's murder. Thereupon the queen-mother took shelter in Edinburgh Castle with her son, who was put under her charge and that of Livingston of Callander. But Crichton, the Chancellor, who was governor of the castle, kept possession of the boy until the queen escaped with him, and took refuge with Livingston in Stirling Castle. Meanwhile the country was brought to the verge of ruin by the feuds of the nobles. When in 1439 the queen-dowager married Sir James Stewart of Lorn Livingston compelled her to resign her guardianship of the king; and Crichton and Livingston, reconciled, were the sole rulers of the kingdom, till in 1449 James assumed the reins of government. He displayed great prudence and vigour. War with England was renewed on the Borders in 1448, but ended next year by a truce. In 1449 James married Mary (d. 1463), daughter of the Duke of Gueldres. He procured from the parliament a number of judicious enactments, but his efforts to promote the welfare of the people were thwarted by the nobles, especially by the House of Douglas (q.v.). As the Yorkists protected the exiled Douglasses, James entangled himself in the contest between the Houses of York and Lancaster, and marched for England in 1460 with a powerful army. He laid siege to Roxburgh Castle, at that time held by the English, and was killed by the bursting of a cannon (3d August).

James III., born 10th July 1451, succeeded his father, James II., in 1460, his guardianship being entrusted to his mother and Bishop Kennedy of St Andrews, while the Earl of Angus was made lieutenant-general. Under their management the government was carried on judiciously and successfully; but the death of the earl in 1462 and of the bishop in 1466 left the country a prey to the factious and ambitious nobles, conspicuous among whom was Lord Boyd of Kilmarnock, high justiciar. His son, created Earl of Arran, obtained in 1467 the hand of the king's sister, the Princess Margaret. The ambition and arrogance of the family, however, led to their downfall, and both Boyd and Arran fled. The king had a refined and cultivated mind, but was unfitted to rule a country like Scotland and to keep in order its turbulent nobles. He spent his time in the society of architects, painters, and musicians, and the rule of these favourites soon grew intolerable to the nobles, who attached themselves to the king's brothers, Albany and Mar. James became jealous of their popularity and imprisoned them; Albany escaped to France, but Mar died in confinement. In retaliation for an invasion of the country by an English fleet, James advanced with an army towards England (1482). He had reached Lauder when the disaffected nobles suddenly seized Cochrane and the other royal favourites and hanged them, Angus, hence called 'Bell-the-Cat,' taking the initiative.

Returning to Edinburgh, they imprisoned the king in the castle. Ere long the lowland nobles again rose in open rebellion, and induced the young heir to the throne to join them, while the king was supported by the northern barons. An encounter took place (11th June 1488) at Sauchieburn near Bannockburn. The royal army was defeated, and James, in galloping from the field, was thrown from his horse and murdered. He married in 1469 Margaret of Denmark (c. 1457-86), and left three sons, the eldest of whom succeeded.

James IV., born 17th March 1473, by the murder of his father after Sauchieburn came to the throne in 1488. His confederates in the rebellion took possession of the offices of state, the royal treasury, and the late king's jewels, and even accused the loyal barons of treason, and deprived them of their estates. When James reached maturity he exhibited much energy and good sense. He gradually withdrew his confidence from the dominant barons and transferred it to Sir Andrew Wood and other trustworthy counsellors. He vigilantly guarded against the encroachments of the papal court, and asserted the ecclesiastical independence of his kingdom. Though he supported the impostor, Perkin Warbeck, and invaded England in his behalf, in 1497 a seven years' truce was concluded between the two kingdoms, and in August 1503 James married Margaret (q.v.), eldest daughter of Henry VII.—an alliance which led ultimately to the union of the crowns. When Henry VIII. joined the league against France, James adhered to the French alliance. Petty disputes arose between the Borderers, and inroads were made on both sides. James was irritated at the capture of two Scottish privateers by English men-of-war. The French king, hard pressed by the Spanish and English, made strenuous efforts to obtain assistance from the Scots, and James was induced to invade England. He lingered about the Borders until the Earl of Surrey had collected a powerful army; and on 9th September 1513 was fought the battle of Flodden, in which fell the Scottish king and the flower of his nobility. James possessed excellent abilities and great accomplishments, and was frank and splendidly hospitable, but he was headstrong, licentious, and lavish. See Gregory Smith's Days of James IV. (1890).

James V., born at Linlithgow, 10th April 1512, was but an infant when his father's death gave him the crown. The queen-dowager was appointed regent, but on her marriage (1514) with the Earl of Angus, the Duke of Albany, son of the younger brother of James III., was made regent in her stead. Amid the contentions of the rival French and English factions, and the private quarrels of the nobles, the country was reduced to a state of anarchy. Albany, after vain efforts to assert his authority, retired to France in 1524. Meanwhile James had been placed under the care of Sir David Lyndsay, who instructed him in all manly and liberal accomplishments. In 1525 he fell into the hands of Angus, who kept him a close prisoner until in 1528 he made his escape from Falkland to Stirling, and as an independent sovereign began to carry out a judicious policy. He banished the Douglasses, punished the Border freebooters, chastised the insurgent Highlanders, renewed the ancient commercial treaty between Scotland and the Netherlands, instituted the College of Justice, and protected the peasantry against the tyranny of the barons. His sympathy with the common people and his habit of visiting their houses in disguise procured for him the designation of 'the king of the commons.' In 1536 James visited France, and in 1537 married Magdalene, daughter of Francis I., who died in the following July; in June 1538 he married Mary of Guise (q.v.). Meanwhile the principles of the reformed faith were making progress in Scotland, and Henry VIII. tried to persuade his nephew to throw off the papal authority. But James had to rely on the support of the clergy in order to reduce the exorbitant power of the nobles. Henry invited the Scottish king to meet him at York in 1541, but waited there six days for him in vain. Other causes of offence arose, and war broke out in 1542. An army of 30,000 men under the Duke of Norfolk was ordered to invade Scotland, but the attempt ended in nothing. A Scottish army levied advanced to Fala; but the nobles refused to follow James beyond the frontier. Another army was shortly after levied by the exertions of the clergy; but the command having been given to Oliver Shucclair, a royal favourite, the nobles again refused to act. While the Scottish army thus disputed, a body of English Borderers fell upon and completely routed them at Solway Moss, taking many prisoners. James, overwhelmed by this shameful discomfiture, retired to Falkland Palace; and, attacked by a slow fever, died, 14th December 1542, about seven days after the birth of his ill-fated daughter Mary. See Bapst, Les Mariages de Jacques V. (1889).

James I. and VI., the only son of Mary Queen of Scots and Henry Lord Darnley, was born in Edinburgh Castle, 19th June 1566. On his mother's forced abdication in 1567 he was proclaimed king. He was placed in the keeping of the Earl of Mar, and taught by George Buchanan. Within eleven years Moray, Lennox, Mar, and Morton had successively held the regency, and when, in 1578, Morton was driven from power James nominally assumed the direction of affairs. But his advisers became unpopular, and Morton re-established himself. About this time James began to exhibit his characteristic partiality towards favourites; by help of Captain James Stewart, created Earl of Arran, and of the Duke of Lennox, he was enabled finally to break the power of Morton. After Morton's execution (1581) James ruled the kingdom through his two favourites, not without much discontent. Hence in 1582 occurred the Raid of Ruthven, when the king was seized by a party of his nobles, and obliged to sanction the imprisonment of Arran and the banishment of Lennox. In 1583 a counter-plot effected the king's freedom, when he immediately restored Arran to power. The confederate lords fled to England, whence, in 1585, through the connivance of Queen Elizabeth, they returned, and with an army forced James to capitulate in Stirling Castle. Arran was again banished. In 1586 Queen Mary, then a prisoner in England, was condemned to be executed; James's conduct on this occasion does not admit of defence. In 1589 he went to Christiania, where he married the Princess Anne (1574-1619). The king was frequently in conflict with the Presbyterians and with the Roman Catholics. Hating Puritanism, he was therefore disposed to introduce Episcopacy into Scotland, and did ultimately (in 1600) succeed in establishing bishops. From 1591 to 1594, when James marched against them, the Roman Catholic lords in the north were in a state of semi-insurrection. In 1600 occurred the Gowrie Conspiracy, if any conspiracy there was (see RUTHVEN). On the death of Elizabeth in 1603, James ascended the English throne as great-grandson of James IV.'s English wife, the Princess Margaret. He was at first well received by his subjects in England, but became unpopular from his continued partiality towards favourites. He also degraded the prerogative of the crown by the sale of titles. His chief favourite at this time was Robert Carr or Ker, a Scotsman, whom he finally created Earl of Somerset. When Carr fell out of favour he was succeeded by Buckingham—and through such minions the king governed. In 1617 James revisited Scotland, signalling the event by angry disputes with the clergy. Henry, Prince of Wales, having died in 1612, the succession devolved upon James's second son Charles, between whom and a Spanish princess the king was ineffectually anxious to effect a marriage. Buckingham, who was entrusted with the affair, acted rashly and unwisely, and war with Spain was the outcome. James died at Theobalds, 27th March 1625. Sully described him as 'the wisest fool in Christendom.' 'He was indeed,' says Macaulay, 'made up of two men—a witty, well-read scholar, who wrote, disputed, and harangued, and a nervous, drivelling idiot who acted.' By Mr Gardiner his character has been treated more broadly and mildly; perhaps the best estimate of the man is Scott's representation of him in The Fortunes of Nigel. James's literary ambitions were illustrated in his Essays of a Prentice in the Divine Art of Poetrie (1584); Poetical Exercises at Vacant Hours (1591); the newly discovered poems edited by Westcott (1912); Demonologie (1597); Basiliicon Doron and the Counterblast to Tobacco (1616). Besides the histories of Calderwood, Tytler, Burton, Ranke, and Gardiner, see Goodman's Court of James I., ed. Brewer (1839); The Secret History of the Court of King James I., ed. Scott (1911), and Henderson's James I. and VI. (1904).

JAMES II. AND VII., second son of Charles I., was born at St James's Palace, 12th October 1633, and was created Duke of York. Nine months before his father's execution he escaped to Holland, served under Turenne 1652-55, and in 1657 took Spanish service in Flanders. At the Restoration (1660) James was made Lord High Admiral of England, twice commanding the English fleet in the ensuing wars with the Dutch. In 1659 he had entered into a private marriage contract with Anne Hyde, daughter of the Earl of Clarendon (q.v.); and the year after her death in 1671 as a professed Catholic he avowed his own conversion to Catholicism. In 1673 parliament passed the Test Act, and James was obliged to resign the office of Lord High Admiral. Shortly after he married Mary, daughter of the Duke of Modena. The national ferment occasioned by the Popish Plot became so formidable that he had to retire to the Continent, and during his absence an attempt was made to exclude him from the succession. He returned at the close of 1679, and was sent down to Scotland to take the management of its affairs. The cruelties which he inflicted on the Covenanters have left an indelible stain upon his memory. Meanwhile the Exclusion Bill was twice passed by the Commons, but in the first instance it was rejected by the Lords, and on the second was lost by the dissolution of parliament. James then returned to England, and in direct violation of the law took his seat in the council, and resumed the direction of naval affairs. At the death of Charles in 1685 James ascended the throne, and immediately proceeded to levy, on his own warrant, the customs and excise duties which had been granted to Charles only for life. He sent a mission to Rome, heard mass in public, and became, like his brother, the pensioner of the French king. In Scotland the persecution of the Covenanters was renewed with increased severity; in England the futile rebellion of Monmouth (q.v.) was followed by the 'Bloody Assize.' The suspension of the Test Act by the king's authority, his prosecution of the seven bishops on a charge of seditious libel, his conferring ecclesiastical benefices on Roman Catholics, his violation of the rights of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, his plan for packing parliament, and numerous other arbitrary acts showed his fixed determination to overthrow the constitution and the church. The indignation of the people was at length roused, and the interposition of William, Prince of Orange, James's son-in-law and nephew, was formally solicited by seven leading politicians. William landed at Torbay, 4th November 1688, with a powerful army, and marched towards London. He was everywhere hailed as a deliverer, while James was deserted not only by his ministers and troops, but even by his daughter the Princess Anne. The unfortunate king, on the first appearance of danger, had sent his wife and infant son to France, and, after one futile start and his arrest at Faversham, James also escaped and joined them at St Germain. He was hospitably received by Louis XIV., who settled a pension on him. In 1689, aided by a small body of French troops, he invaded Ireland and made an ineffectual attempt to regain his throne. He was defeated at the battle of the Boyne, and returned to St Germain, where he resided until his death, 6th September 1701. He left two daughters—Mary, married to the Prince of Orange, and Anne, afterwards queen—and one son by his second wife, James Francis Edward (see STEWART). He had several illegitimate children—one of them, Marshal Berwick. See the histories of Macaulay, Ranke, Lingard; Burnet's History of his Own Time; Macpherson's History of Great Britain (1775) and Original Papers (1775); the Lives by C. J. Fox (1808) and Clarke (1816); Wellwood's Memoirs, and Luttrell's Relation of State Affairs; Wilson's James II. and the Duke of Berwick (1876); Bloxam's Magdalen College and James II. (1886); The Adventures of James II. (1904); and works cited at CHARLES II.

JAMES, GEORGE PAYNE RAINSFORD, born in London, 9th August 1801, the son of a well-known physician, was educated at Putney and in France, and by seventeen had written some Eastern tales, which found favour with Washington Irving. Thereafter he ceased to write, dictating instead to an amanuensis his 'thick-coming fancies.' In all he published seventy-seven works, historical romances mostly, but also biographies, poems, &c. The best were among the earliest—Richelieu (1829) and Henry Masterton (1832). He was British consul at Richmond, Virginia, from 1852 till 1856, and then at Venice till his death, 9th May 1860. 'G. P. R. James' may be classed as a hybrid—a productive hybrid—between Dumas and Mrs Ann Radcliffe. Leigh Hunt writes kindly of him, and Sir Archibald Alison could 'revert with pleasure to his varied compositions,' which even yet may be safely recommended to the 'young person.' But his two horsemen will be remembered best, if not indeed solely, by Thackeray's Barbazur.

JAMES, SIR HENRY (1803-77), was born near St Agnes in Cornwall, passed in 1825 from Woolwich into the Engineers, and in 1844 became director of the Geological Survey of Ireland, in 1846 head of the Admiralty works at Portsmouth, in 1852 director of the Ordnance Survey, and in 1857 chief of the Statistical Department of the War Office. Knighted in 1860, and made major-general in 1868, he died at Southampton. He wrote several works on geology, surveying, &c., and by his system of zinc-photography produced facsimiles of Domesday Book and of national MSS. of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

James of Hereford, Henry James, Lord, born at Hereford, 30th October 1828, educated at Cheltenham College, and called to the bar in 1852, became a Q.C. in 1869, and a bencher of his Inn in 1870. He was Liberal M.P. for Taunton 1869-85, and then for Bury in Lancashire. In 1873 he became first Solicitor-general and then Attorney-general (with a knighthood), and in 1880 again Attorney-general. He ably conducted the Corrupt Practices Bill through the Commons in 1883. In 1886 he declined the Lord Chancellorship as being unable to support Mr Gladstone's Home-rule policy, and was re-elected for Bury unopposed as a Liberal Unionist. He defended the case for the Times before the Parnell Commission, and in 1893 took a prominent part in the debates on Mr Gladstone's second Home-rule Bill. In 1895-1902 he was Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, with a peerage. He died in August 1911.

James, Henry, novelist, born in New York, 15th April 1843, until his father's death was known as Henry James, junior, the father (1811-82) being a well-known theological writer and lecturer, the exponent in turn of Sandemanianism and the system of Swedenborg. After the usual preliminaries of magazine-writing, James took his place among contemporary novelists with Roderick Hudson (1875). Already in 1869 he had migrated to Europe. He is only less eminent as a critic, and his perfect mastery of modern French literature, added to his natural subtlety of perception, has given an extraordinary value to his clever yet ineffective studies collected in Trench Poets and Novelists (1878) and Partial Portraits (1888). He has also published several volumes of pen-sketches written for American magazines, as Portraits of Places (1884) and A Little Tour in France (1884). Guy Domville, a play (1895), was a failure. His more important novels, dealing mainly with the uneventful lives of Americans living or travelling in Europe, are The American (1878), The Europeans (1878), Daisy Miller (1878), A Bundle of Letters (1879), Washington Square (1880), The Portrait of a Lady (1881), Tales of Three Cities (1884), The Bostonians (1886), Princess Casamassima (1886), The Tragic Muse (1890), What Maisie Knew, The Two Magpies, The Soft Side, The Awkward Age, The Sacred Fount (1901), besides a Life of W. W. Story (1903), The American Scene (1907), &c.—His brother William (1842-1910), graduated M.D. at Harvard, and became professor of Philosophy there in 1872. He published The Principles of Psychology, The Will to Believe, his Edinburgh Gifford Lectures on The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), Pragmatism (1907), and other works.

James, John Angell (1785-1859), Congregationalist minister, born at Blandford, was for over fifty years pastor of a church in Birmingham. Of his books the best known is The Anxious Inquirer. See his Life by Dale (1861).

James, Robert (1705-76), a London physician, the inventor of James's Powder.

James, William, compiler of The Naval History (5 vols. 1822-24), was a Jamaica attorney, and from 1815 till his death in 1827 lived in England.

Jameson, Anna, art-critic, was the daughter of Brownell Murphy, a miniature-painter, and was born at Dublin 17th May 1794. In 1825 she married Robert Jameson, a barrister, who from 1829 held appointments in Dominica and Canada. They never got on well together; and from that date, with the exception of a visit to Canada (1836-38), she lived apart from him. She wrote Diary of an Ennuyée (1826), Characteristics of Shakespeare's Women (1832), Beauties of the Court of Charles II. (1833), Sketches of Germany (1837), Rambles in Canada (1838), and Memoirs and Essays (1846). More important are her works in art-criticism—the Handbook to London Galleries (1832), Early Italian Painters (1845), Poetry of Sacred and Legendary Art (1848), Legends of the Monastic Orders (1850), Legends of the Madonna (1852), and History of our Lord as represented in Art (1864), completed by Lady Eastlake. Mrs Jameson died at Ealing, March 19, 1860. See Memoirs by her niece, Gerardine Macpherson (1878).

Jameson, Sir Leander Starr, C.B. (1894), was born at Edinburgh, 8th Feb. 1853, studied medicine there and at London, and began practice at Kimberley in 1878. Through Mr Rhodes 'Dr Jim' engaged in pioneer work, was in 1891 made administrator of the South Africa Company at Fort Salisbury, and won enormous popularity. During the troubles at Johannesburg between the Uitlanders and the Boer government, Jameson, who by order of Mr Rhodes had concentrated the military forces of Rhodesia at Mafeking on the Transvaal frontier, started with five hundred troopers to support the Uitlanders, 29th Dec. 1895. At Krugersdorp they were overpowered by an overwhelming force of Boers, and, sleepless and famishing, were after a sharp fight compelled to surrender, 2d Jan. 1896. Handed over to the British authorities, Dr Jameson was in July condemned in London to fifteen months imprisonment, but was released in December. In 1900 he was elected to the Cape Legislative Assembly, and in 1904-8 was (Progressive) Premier of Cape Colony. He was made a baronet in 1911.

Jameson, Robert (1772-1854), geologist, born at Leith, studied at Edinburgh and (under Werner) at Freiburg, and in 1804 became Edinburgh professor of Natural History. His Elements of Geognosy (1809) expounds the Wernerian system, but A System of Mineralogy (1804), &c., were written after his conversion to Hutton's theory.

Jamesone, George (c. 1588-1644), portrait-painter, was born in Aberdeen, and in 1612 was bound apprentice for eight years to John Anderson, a painter in Edinburgh. This overthrows the tradition that the 'Scottish Van Dyck,' as he has absurdly been called, studied under Rubens at Antwerp. He lived latterly and died in Edinburgh. See J. Bulloch's George Jamesone (1885), and Notes and Queries for April 1894.

Jamet, Marie (1820-93), a St Servan seamstress, founder in 1840 with Jeanne Jugan, Virginie Trédaniel, and the Abbé Le Pailleur of the Little Sisters of the Poor.

Jami (1414-92), the last great Persian poet, was born at Jam in Khorasan, and died at Herat. Among his poems were Yusuf u Zuleikha (trans. by A. Rogers, 1895) and Salaman u Absal (trans. by E. FitzGerald). He also wrote prose works.

Jamieson, John, D.D., born in Glasgow, March 3, 1759, in 1781 became pastor of a Secession congregation at Forfar, and in 1797 at Edinburgh, where he died July 12, 1838. His Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Lan- guage (1808-9; supplement 1825; new ed. by Donaldson, 1879-87) is of value as a collection of Scotch words and phrases, but possesses little philological merit. Jamieson also wrote on the Culdees, on the affinities of Greek and Latin to the Gothic, &c.; and he published editions of Barbour's Bruce and Blind Harry's Wallace.

Jamnitzer, or JAMITZER, WENZEL (1508-85), a Nuremberg goldsmith, born at Vienna.

Jamrach, JOHANN CHRISTIAN KARL (1815-91), born at Hamburg, from about 1840 was a London dealer in wild animals.

Jane Seymour. See SEYMOUR.

Janet, FRANÇOIS. See CLOUET.

Janet, PAUL (1823-99), anti-materialist philosopher, born in Paris, was in turn preacher at Bourges, and professor of Philosophy at Strasburg, of Logic in the lyceum Louis-le-Grand. In 1864 he was elected to the Academy of Moral Sciences, and since has lectured in the Sorbonne. His Causas Finales (1877) was translated in 1878; he had also written on the family and the history of morals, materialism, brain and thought, contemporary French philosophy, socialism, Lamennais (1890), Fénelon (1892), &c. [Zhak-nay.]

Janin, JULES GABRIEL, critic and novelist, born at St Etienne, December 24, 1804, took early to journalism, and his dramatic criticisms in the Journal des Débats made him a reputation. Janin's numberless articles, prefaces, books of travel, and miscellaneous pieces pleased his readers and filled his pockets, but did little for future fame. His strange and at least half-serious story L'Âne mort et la Femme quilloinée (1829) was followed by Barnave (1831), half-historical novel, half-polemical against the Orleans family. He was elected to the French Academy in 1870, and died 19th June 1874. His Œuvres Choiesies, in twelve volumes, appeared in 1875-78, and his Correspondance in 1877. See Life by Pédagnel (3d ed. 1883). [Zhak-nan.]

Jansen, CORNELIUS, founder of the Jansenist sect, was born at Acquoi, near Leerdam in Holland, 28th October 1585. He studied at Utrecht, Louvain, and Paris; filled a chair at Bayonne; and in 1630 became professor of Theology at Louvain. In 1636 he was made Bishop of Ypres. He died 6th May 1638, just as he had completed his great work, the Augustinus (4 vols.), which sought to prove that the teaching of St Augustine against the Pelagians and semi-Pelagians on Grace, Free-will, and Predestination was directly opposed to the teaching of the Jesuit schools. Jansen repudiated the ordinary Catholic dogma of the freedom of the will, and refused to admit merely sufficient grace, maintaining that interior grace is irresistible, and that Christ died for all. On the publication of the Augustinus in 1640, it was received with loud clamour, especially by the Jesuits, and was prohibited by a decree of the Inquisition in 1641; in the following year it was condemned by Urban VIII. in the bull In Eminentissimis. Jansen was supported by such writers as Arnauld, Pascal, and the Port-Royalists. The controversy raged in France with more or less violence for nearly a century, when a large number of Jansenists emigrated to the Netherlands. There they formed a community, with Utrecht as a centre, and here only can the sect be said to have had a regular and permanent organisation. The Jansenists of the Utrecht Church, who number about 6000 souls, are in doctrine and discipline strictly orthodox Roman Catholics, being known by their countrymen as Oude Roomsche ('Old Roman'). See works by Fuzet (1877), Neale (Jansenist Church of Holland, 1858), Sainte-Beuve (Port-Royal, 4th ed. 1878), Sèche (Les derniers Jansénistes, 1891), and Mrs Tollemache (1893).

Janssen, CORNELIS (1593 - c. 1664), portrait-painter, was born in London, and died at Amsterdam, having quitted England in 1643. [Yans'sen.]

Janssen, GERAERT. See SHAKESPEARE, p. 847.

Janssen, PETER, a Düsseldorf historical and portrait painter, was born 12th Dec. 1844, and in 1895 became Director of the Academy.

Janssen, PIERRE JULES CÉSAR, a physicist, chiefly distinguished in the field of spectrum analysis, was born in Paris in 1824, was elected to the Academy in 1873, and died in 1907.

Janssens, ABRAHAM (c. 1575-1632), Antwerp painter. His most famous pictures are the 'Entombment of Christ' and the 'Adoration of the Magi.'—VICTOR HONORIUS JANSSENS (1664-1739) painted chiefly in Rome and at Brussels.

Januarius, ST, or SAN GENNARO, a bishop of Benevento, martyred at Pozzuoli in 305. His body is preserved in Naples cathedral, where are also two phials (ampullæ) supposed to contain his blood. On 19th Sept. and two other festivals, as well as on occasions of public danger, his head and the phials are borne to the high-altar of the cathedral, or of the church of Santa Chiara, where, after prayer, the blood is believed to liquefy, and is presented for the veneration of the people. See Rolfe and Ingleby's Naples in 1888.

Japhet, the second son of Noah, once assumed to be the ancestor of all the people called Japetic—practically the European races.

Jardine, SIR WILLIAM (1800-74), naturalist, seventh baronet of Applegarth, Dumfriesshire, was born in Edinburgh, and died at Sandown, Isle of Wight. [Jar'dn.]

Jarvis, CHARLES. See JERVAIS.

Jasmin, the nom de guerre of the Provençal poet Jacques Boë, who, born at Agen, 6th March 1798, earned his living as a barber, but wrote poetry in his native Languedoc dialect. His first volume, Papillotes ('Curl Papers'), appeared in 1835, and was received with enthusiasm. He was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour in 1846, and in 1852 his works were crowned by the Academy. His best pieces are the mock-heroic Charivari (1825); The Blind Girl of Castel-Cuillé (1835), translated by Longfellow; Franco-netto (1840); The Twin Brothers (1841); Martha the Simple (1845); and The Son's Week (1849). He died 4th October 1864. See French Lives by Rabain (1867), De Montrond (2d ed. 1876), and Andrien (1882); Sainte-Beuve's Portraits Contemporains; and the Life by Samuel Smiles (1892).

Jay, JOHN (1745-1829), American statesman and jurist, born in New York, was admitted to the bar in 1768. Elected to the Continental congress in 1774 and 1775, he drafted the constitution of New York state in 1777, of which he was appointed Chief-justice; was elected president of congress in 1778; and in 1779 was sent as minister to Spain. From 1782 he was one of the most influential of the peace commissioners. In 1784-89 he was Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and ere long became Chief-justice of the supreme court. In 1794 he concluded with Lord Grenville the convention known as 'Jay's treaty,' which, though favourable to the United States, was denounced by the Democrats as a betrayal of France. Jay was governor of New York from 1795 to 1801. There is a Life (1833) by his son, William Jay (1789-1858), a notable anti-slavery leader. See also his Writings and Correspondence, ed. by Prof. Johnston (4 vols. 1890-93), and Lives by Whitlock (1887) and Pellew (1890).

Among his works are Morning and Evening Exercises, Short Discourses, Female Scripture Characters, and an Autobiography (1854). He published a collected edition in 1842-48 (new ed. 1876).

Jeafreson, JOHN CORDY, born at Framlingham, 14th January 1831, and called to the bar in 1859, from 1854 published novels, biographies, books about doctors, lawyers, and the clergy, &c. See his Recollections (1893). He died 2d Feb. 1901.

Jebb, JOHN GLADWYN (1841-93), served in India soon after the Mutiny, and, having lost most of £2000 a-year over a gun-barrel factory, went out to Central America to seek a new fortune, and met with many moving adventures. See Life by his widow (1894).

Jebb, SIR RICHARD CLAVERHOUSE (1841-1905), Greek scholar, born at Dundee, graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, as senior classic in 1862, and was elected fellow. He took a prominent part in organising inter-collegiate classical lectures, and was secretary to the newly-founded Cambridge Philological Society. In 1869 he became public orator of the university, in 1875 professor of Greek at Glasgow, and in 1889 regius professor of Greek at Cambridge. In 1891 he was elected M.P. (Unionist) for Cambridge University. Jefferies, RICHARD, born near Swindon, 6th November 1848, started as a journalist on the staff of the North Wilts Herald about 1866, and became known by a letter to the Times (1872) on the Wiltshire labourers. His first real success, The Gamekeeper at Home (1878), was followed up by Wild Life in a Southern County (1879), The Amateur Poacher (1880), Round about a Great Estate (1881), Nature near London (1883), Life of the Fields (1884), Red Deer (1884), and The Open Air (1885). The Story of my Heart (1883) is a strange autobiography of inner life; After London, or Wild England (1885), is a curious romance of the future. He died at Goring in Sussex, 14th August 1887. See works by Sir Walter Besant (1888), H. S. Salt (1893), and E. Thomas (1909).

Jefferson, JOSEPH, comedian, born in Philadelphia, 20th February 1829, came of a theatrical stock, his great-grandfather having belonged to Garrick's company at Drury Lane, while his father and grandfather were well-known American actors. Jefferson appeared on the stage at three, and had for years been a strolling actor, when in 1857, in New York, he made a hit as Doctor Pangloss, and in 1858 created the part of Asa Treuchard in Our American Cousin. In 1865 he visited London, and at the Adelphi first played his famous part of Rip Van Winkle. He died 23d April 1905. See his Autobiography (1890).

Jefferson, THOMAS, third president of the United States, born at Shadwell, Albemarle county, Virginia, 2d April 1743, in 1767 was admitted to the bar, and practised with success. In 1769 he was elected to the House of Burgesses, where he joined zealously with the revolutionary party. He took a prominent part in the calling of the first Continental Congress in 1774, to which he was sent as a delegate; he claimed the authorship of the celebrated Declaration of Independence, signed 4th July 1776. Jefferson now assisted the people of Virginia in forming a state constitution, and was governor 1779-81. In congress he secured (1783) the adoption of the decimal system of coinage. He was sent to France in 1784 with Franklin and Adams as plenipotentiary; next year he succeeded Franklin as minister there; and in 1789 Washington appointed him secretary of state. From the origin of the Federal and Republican parties, Jefferson was the recognised head of the latter, while the other members of the cabinet and the president were Federalists. In 1794 he withdrew from public life, but in 1797 was called to the vice-presidency of the United States, and in 1801 was chosen president by the House of Representatives. The popular vote re-elected him by a large majority for the next presidential term. Among the chief events of his first term were the war with Tripoli, the admission of Ohio, and the Louisiana purchase; of his second term, the firing on the Chesapeake by the Leopard, the Embargo, the trial of Aaron Burr for treason, and the prohibition of the slave-trade. In 1809 he finally retired to private life. Henceforth his time was devoted to boundless hospitality, to the interests of education, and especially to the establishment and superintendence of the University of Virginia. He died at his residence Monticello, Va., July 4, 1826. Ford edited his Works (1891 et seq.). See Lives by Tucker (1837), Parton (1874), Morse (1883), and Schouler (1893); also Henry Adams, History of the United States under Thomas Jefferson (1891).

Jeffery, DOROTHY. See PENTREATH.

Jeffery, ALEXANDER (1806-74), historian of Roxburghshire, was a Jedburgh law-agent.

Jeffrey, FRANCIS, LORD, born at Edinburgh, 23d October 1773, studied at Glasgow and Oxford, and in 1794 was called to the Scottish bar, but as a Whig made little progress for many years. In the trials for sedition (1817-22) he acquired a great reputation; in 1820 and again in 1823 he was elected Lord Rector of Glasgow University, in 1829 Dean of the Faculty of Advocates. In 1830 he was returned for Perth, and on the formation of Earl Grey's ministry became Lord Advocate. After the passing of the Reform Bill he was returned for Edinburgh, which he represented until 1834, when he was made a judge of the Court of Session. From 1815 he lived at Craigcrook, where he died, 26th January 1850. It is as literary critic and leader in a new departure in literary enterprise that Jeffrey holds his title to fame. It was he who, along with Sydney Smith, Francis Horner, and a few others, established the Edinburgh Review, of which he was editor until 1829. His own contributions were very numerous and brilliant, if biased. A selection of them was published in 1844. See Life by Lord Cockburn (1852), also Macey Napier's Correspondence (1877) and Carlyle's Reminiscences (1881).

Jeffreys, GEORGE, BARON, the 'infamous Jeffreys,' born at Acton near Wrexham in 1648, was called to the bar in 1668. He rose rapidly, and became in 1671 common serjeant of the City of London. Hitherto nominally a Puritan, he now began to intrigue for court favour, was made solicitor to the Duke of York, was knighted in 1677, and became Recorder of London in 1678. Actively concerned in the Popish Plot prosecutions, he was made chief-justice of Chester and king's serjeant in 1680, baronet in 1681, and chief-justice of King's Bench in 1683. His first exploit was the judicial murder of Algernon Sidney, but in every state-trial he proved a willing tool to the crown, thus earning the favour of James, who raised him to the peerage (1685). Among his earliest trials were those of Titus Oates and Richard Baxter; then he was sent to the west to try the followers of Monmouth (q.v.), and hanged 331, transported 849 to the American plantations, and whipped or fined 33 others. He was Lord Chancellor from Sept. 1685 until the downfall of James, and supported all the king's measures as president of the newly-revived Court of High Commission, and in the trial of the seven bishops. Yet he had rational views on witchcraft, and was too honest to turn Catholic. On James's flight he tried to follow his example, but was caught at Wapping, disguised as a sailor, and sent to the Tower to save him from the mob. Here he died four months after, April 18, 1689. See Lives by Woolrych (1827) and Irving (1898).

Jejeebhoy, SIR JAMSETJEE (Jamshedi Jijibhai), born at Bombay, 15th July 1783, was taken into partnership by his father-in-law, a Bombay merchant, in 1800. When peace was restored in Europe in 1815 Indian trade with Europe increased enormously. By 1822 he had amassed £2,000,000, and began to exhibit a magnificent liberality. He contributed generously to various educational and philanthropic institutions in Bombay, and spent upwards of a quarter of a million in benevolence. Parsee and Christian, Hindu and Mussulman, were alike the objects of his beneficence. The Queen knighted him in 1842, and in 1857 he was made a baronet. He died 14th April 1859.

Jekyll, SIR JOSEPH (1663-1738), knighted in 1700, from 1717 was Master of the Rolls.—His great-nephew, JOSEPH JEKYLL (1752-1837), educated at Westminster and Christ Church, was a wit, Whig M.P., and Solicitor-general. See his Correspondence, edited by the Hon. A. Bourke (1894).

Jelâl-ud-din (1200-73), a Sufi Persian poet, whose Contemplative Life made him the oracle of oriental mysticism. He wrote also lyrics.

Jelf, RICHARD WILLIAM (1798-1871), theologian, son of Sir James Jelf of Oaklands, Gloucestershire, from Eton passed to Christ Church, Oxford, and became a fellow and tutor of Oriel. In 1826 he was appointed preceptor to Prince George of Cumberland (king of Hanover), in 1839 Canon of Christ Church, and in 1844 Principal of King's College, London. He delivered the Bampton Lectures for 1844, on The Means of Grace, and wrote The Thirty-nine Articles Explained (1873). Dr Jelf was a pillar of orthodoxy, and it was largely owing to him that Maurice was deprived of his professorship at King's College for unsound views on eternal punishment.—His brother, WILLIAM EDWARD JELF (1811-75), Greek grammarian, was also educated at Eton and Christ Church, took a first-class in 1838, and became a tutor of Christ Church, public examiner, and proctor. He was a preacher at the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, 1846-48, and Bampton lecturer in 1857 on Christian Faith. He replied to (Archbishop) Temple's contribution to Essays and Reviews (1861). Besides his Greek Grammar (1842-43; 4th ed. 1866), he wrote on ritualism, Romanism, &c.

Jellachich, JOSEPH, BARON (1801-59), Austrian general, born at Peterwardin, the eldest son of Franz, Freiherr von Jellachich de Buzim (1746-1810), also a general who fought in the Turkish and French wars. Winning the Croats' confidence, he was in 1848 appointed Ban of Croatia, and helped to suppress the Hungarian rising. He published poems in 1851. [Yet-latch etch.]

Jenkin, HENRIETTA CAMILLA, née JACKSON (1808-85), novelist, was born in Jamaica, and married a naval officer in 1832.—Their son, HENRY CHARLES FLEEMING JENKIN, F.R.S. (1833-85), electrical engineer, born near Dungeness, and educated at Jedburgh, Edinburgh, and Genoa, became professor of Engineering at University College, London, in 1865; at Edinburgh in 1868. See Memoir by R. L. Stevenson, prefixed to his Papers, Literary, Scientific, &c. (1887).

Jenkins, JOHN EDWARD (1838-1910), born at Bangalore, and educated at Montreal and Pennsylvania University, was called to the English bar in 1864, and was Liberal M.P. for Dundee 1874-80. He wrote Gin's Baby (1870), Lord Bantam (1871), Little Hodge (1872), Pantulas (1897), &c.

Jenkins, ROBERT, an English merchant captain, trading from Jamaica, who alleged that in 1731 his sloop had been boarded by a Spanish guarda costa, and that, though no proof of smuggling had been found, he had been tortured, and his ear torn off. The said ear—some said he had lost it in the pillory—he produced in 1738 in the House of Commons. Walpole next year was driven into war against Spain.

Jenner, EDWARD, M.D., F.R.S., the discoverer of vaccination, was born at Berkeley vicarage, Gloucestershire, 17th May 1749. He was apprenticed to a surgeon at Sodbury, in 1770 went to London to study under John Hunter, and in 1773 settled at Berkeley, where he acquired a large practice. In 1775 he began to examine into the truth of the traditions respecting cow-pox, became convinced that it was efficacious as a protection against small-pox, and was led to hope that he would be able 'to propagate it from one human being to another, till he had disseminated the practice all over the globe, to the total extinction of small-pox.' Many investigations delayed the actual discovery of the prophylactic power of vaccination, and the crowning experiment was made on 14th May 1796. This experiment was followed by many others; and in 1798 Jenner published his Inquiry into the Causes and Effects of the Variolæ Vaccinæ. Yet the practice met with violent opposition for a year, when upwards of seventy of the principal physicians and surgeons in London signed a declaration of their entire confidence in it. Jenner's discovery was soon promulgated throughout the civilised world. Honours were conferred upon him, and he was elected an honorary member of nearly all the learned societies of Europe. Parliament voted him in 1802 a grant of £10,000, and in 1807 a second grant of £20,000. He died at Berkeley, 26th January 1823. See his Life and Correspondence, by Dr J. Baron (1827-38; 2d ed. 1850).

Jenner, Sir William, physician, born at Chatham in 1815, was educated at University College, London, where he was professor 1848-79. He became physician in ordinary to the Queen in 1862, and to the Prince of Wales in 1863; was made a baronet in 1868, G.C.B., F.R.S., &c. He established the difference between typhus and typhoid fevers (1851). His Lectures on Fever and Diphtheria were published in 1893. He died 11th Dec. 1898.—His brother, CHARLES (1810-93), made a large fortune as an Edinburgh linen-draper.

Jensen, Adolf (1837-1879), German song-writer and composer for the piano, born at Königsberg, from 1856 to 1868 was a musician successively at Posen, Copenhagen, and Berlin.

Jensen, Wilhelm, German poet and prose-writer, born at Heiligenhafen in NE. Holstein, 15th February 1837, has lived much in Munich.

Jenyns, Soame (1704-87), born in London, sat during 1741-80 for Cambridgeshire, Dunwich, and Cambridge, and was a commissioner to the Board of Trade. His books are forgotten, but his name survives from Dr Johnson's having criticised as shallow his Inquiry into the Origin of Evil (1756). Jenyns, now grown orthodox, published in 1776 his View of the Evidence of the Christian Religion.

Jordan, William (1782-1869), born at Kelso, settled in London in 1806, and, after working on various papers, in 1817 founded the Literary Gazette, and edited it till 1850. In 1853 he was granted a pension of £100. See his Autobiography (4 vols. 1852-53) and Men I have known (1866).

Jeremiah (Heb. Jirmejáhú), the prophet, son of Hilkiah, the priest, was a native of Anathoth, 2½ miles NNW. of Jerusalem, and prophesied in the reigns of Josiah, Jehozahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoichin, and Zedekiah, was in Jerusalem during the siege by Nebuchadnezzar, and is said to have died a martyr's death at Tahpanhes in Egypt. The text of his prophecies as given in the Septuagint differs very greatly from that in the Massoretic Hebrew. See commentaries by Ewald (trans. 1887), Graf (1862), Hitzig (1841), and Cheyne (1833-85); Cheyne's Jeremiah: his Life and Times (1888); and Ball's Prophecies of Jeremiah (1890).

Jeroboam, first king of the divided kingdom of Israel, was made by Solomon superintendent of the labours and taxes exacted from his tribe of Ephraim at the construction of the fortifications of Zion. The growing disaffection towards Solomon fostered his ambition; but he was obliged to flee to Egypt. After Solomon's death he headed the successful revolt of the northern tribes against Rehoboam, and, as their king, established idol shrines at Dan and Bethel to wean away his people from the pilgrimages to Jerusalem. He reigned twenty-two years.—JEROBOAM II., son of Joash, thrust back the Syrians, and reconquered Ammon and Moab.

Jerome, St (EUSEBIUS HIERONYMUS SOPHRONIUS), was born at Stridon on the confines of Dalmatia and Pannonia, between 331 and 345. He studied Greek and Latin rhetoric and philosophy at Rome, where he was also baptised. In 370 he had settled in Aquileia with his friend Rufinus, but went hence to the East, and after a dangerous illness at Antioch, retired in 374-8 to the desert of Chalcis. In 379, ordained priest at Antioch, he repaired to Constantinople, and became intimate with Gregory Nazianzen. In 382 he came on a mission connected with the Meletian schism at Antioch to Rome, where he became secretary to Pope Damasus, and where he attained to great influence by his sanctity, learning, and eloquence. Many pious persons placed themselves under his spiritual direction, of whom the Lady Paula and her daughter followed him to the Holy Land in 385. He fixed his residence at Bethlehem in 386, the Lady Paula founding four convents there, one of which was governed by Jerome. It was here that Jerome pursued or completed his great literary labours; and it was hence that he sent forth the fiery invectives against Jovinian, Vigilantius, and the Pelagians, and even against Rufinus and St Augustine. He died September 30, 420. His letters, treatises polemical and ascetical, commentaries on Holy Scripture, and a version and revision of former versions of the Bible were first published by Erasmus (1516). The best editions are those of the Benedictines (1693-1706) and Vallarsi (1734-42). St Jerome was the most learned and eloquent of the Latin Fathers. See works by Zöckler (1865), Anédée Thierry (1867), Goelzer (1886), E. L. Cutts (1878), and Mrs Martin (1888).

Jerome of Prague, the friend of Huss, was born at Prague between 1360 and 1370. He studied at Oxford, became a convert there to Wycliffe's doctrines, and zealously taught them after his return home (1407). The king of Poland employed him to reorganise the University of Cracow in 1410; the king of Hungary invited him to preach before him at Budapest. Jerome entered with his whole soul into the contest carried on by Huss. When Huss was arrested at Constance Jerome hastened to his side to defend him, but, being refused a safe-conduct, he set out to return to Prague, was arrested in Bavaria in April 1415, and was brought back to Constance. He recanted, but withdrew his recantation, and went to the stake 30th May 1416. See works by Helfert (1853) and Becker (1858), with others cited at Huss.

Successively a clerk, schoolmaster, reporter, actor, and journalist, he made his first and greatest hit with Three Men in a Boat (1889); in 1893 he started (and till 1897 edited) the weekly To-day.

Jerrold, Douglas William, author, dramatist, and wit, was born in London, January 3, 1803, the son of Samuel Jerrold, actor and manager. In 1813 he joined the navy as a midshipman, but on the close of the war he started life anew as a printer's apprentice, and in 1819 was a compositor on the Sunday Monitor. Jerrold's capacity for study was enormous, his perseverance indefatigable; and he became dramatic critic, as well as compositor, on the Monitor. In 1821 he made a start as a dramatist with More Frightened than Hurt; and in 1825 was engaged to write dramas, farces, &c. for the Coburg Theatre, in 1829 at £5 a-week for the Surrey Theatre. Here in that year Black-eyed Susan was acted for the first time, and here many more plays by Jerrold were produced until 1854, when The Heart of Gold came out at the Princess's Theatre. He also contributed to the Monthly, New Monthly, Ballot (which he sub-edited), Athenæum, Blackwood's, &c. Punch was started in 1841, and Jerrold was a constant contributor from its second number. He edited the Illuminated Magazine (1843-44), Douglas Jerrold's Shilling Magazine (1845-48), and Douglas Jerrold's Weekly Newspaper (1846-48). In 1852 he became editor of Lloyd's

He was admitted B.A. in 1540, and early imbibed Reformed doctrines. On Mary's accession he went abroad (Frankfort, Strasburg, Zurich, Padua), but was appointed Bishop of Salisbury by Elizabeth in 1559. His controversial ability soon made him one of the foremost churchmen of his age, as in his Apologia Ecclesie Anglicanæ (1562) against Rome. He died 22d September 1571. A collected edition of his works was published in 1609, as also by Ayre (Parker Soc. 1845–50) and Jelf (1847–48). See the Life of him by Le Bas (1835).

Joan, POPE, a fabulous personage long believed to have filled the papal chair as John VIII. about 855–8. She was said to have been daughter of an English missionary, and born at Mainz. See Döllinger's Papsfabeln des Mittelalters (1863; Eng. trans. by Plummer, 1871).

Joan. See EDWARD THE BLACK PRINCE.

Joan of Arc (Fr. Jeanne d'Arc), the Maid of Orleans, was born of poor parents, at Domremy, on the borders of Lorraine and Champagne, 6th January 1412. Her religious faith was ardent from her cradle; and she mourned with passionate prayers and tears over the sorrows of France, until these prayers returned to her with form and sound as messages from heaven. And thus there gradually grew up within her the conviction that she had been chosen by God to do a special work of deliverance for her country. At thirteen she first saw a light and heard a voice from heaven, and her terror disappeared as these signs were repeatedly vouchsafed and became dear and familiar to her. Her story was at first laughed to scorn, but at last she succeeded in making her way to the Dauphin at Chinon (23d February 1429) and convincing him of her sincerity. She put on male dress and a suit of white armour, mounted a black charger, and at the head of 6000 men advanced to aid Dunois in the relief of Orleans, which was beset by the English. On 29th April she threw herself into the city, and, after fifteen days of fighting, forced the English to retreat; within a week they were swept from the principal positions on the Loire. With restless enthusiasm Joan urged on the weak-hearted Dauphin to his coronation, until she stood beside him at Rheims, and with tears of joy saluted him as king. Joan continued to accompany the French armies, was present in many conflicts, and was mortified by the failure to carry Paris. At length, in May 1430, she flung herself with a handful of men into Compiègne, then besieged by the forces of Burgundy; and, driven back in a desperate sally, was taken prisoner, and sold to the English in November for 10,000 livres. At Rouen, the English headquarters, she was arraigned before the spiritual tribunal of the Bishop of Beauvais, a creature of the English, as a sorceress and a heretic. After a long trial, disgraced by shameful brutality, she was found guilty of sacrilege, profanation, disobedience to the church, pride, and idolatry. Tortured by alternate threats and promises, the bewildered girl at length declared that she submitted to the church, and was condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Ultimately, after suffering many indignities, on the charge that she had relapsed she was brought to the stake and burnt, May 30, 1431. Her family obtained a revival of her trial, and in 1456 she was formally pronounced innocent by Pope Calixtus III.; in 1894 she was beatified, in 1908 carried a stage nearer full canonisation. Joan, of JOANNA, OF NAVARRE (c. 1370-1437) married in 1386 the Duke of Brittany, and in 1403 Henry IV. of England.

Joannes Damascenus or CHRYSORRHOAS (c. 676-754), a Greek theologian and hymn-writer of the Eastern Church, was born at Damascus, of a Christian family of distinction. He was carefully educated by the learned Italian monk Cosmas. He replied to the iconoclastic measures of Leo the Isaurian with two addresses in which he vigorously defended image-worship. His later years were spent in a monastery near Jerusalem. Here, ordained a priest, he wrote his hymns (some of them translated by Neale) and learned works. These include an encyclopædia of Christian theology; treatises against superstitions, Jacobite and Monophysite heretics; homilies; and Barlaam and Joasaph, now known to be a disguised version of the life of Buddha. The first adequate edition of the works, that of 1712, was reprinted in 1743, and is the basis of the edition in Migne's Patrologia (1864). See Dr Neale's Hymns of the Eastern Church (1870); Lungen's Johannes von Damaskus (1879), and Lupton's St John of Damascus (1882).

Job. The Book of Job was regarded by the Jews as strictly historical. In the Christian Church the view gradually obtained currency either that it contained history poetically treated, or was simply a religious poem. Elihu's speeches (xxxii.-xxxvii.) are believed to be a later insertion. Job is assumed to have lived in the Patriarchal period, but the internal evidence points to the exile as the date of the book. There are books on Job by Dillmann, Stieckel, Schlottmann, Hitzig, as also by Delitzsch and Ewald (both translated); by Renan; and by Davidson (1884) and Bradley (1887). See also Froude's Short Studies, vol. i.

Jocelin de Brakelond, a Benedictine monk at Bury St Edmunds, wrote a domestic chronicle of his abbey from 1173 to 1202, and died after 1212. The Chronica gives a very lively picture of Abbot Samson, of his reforms, of English monastic life in his time; edited for the Camden Society in 1840 (reprinted 1890; Eng. trans. 1843, revised 1903 and 1907), it inspired Carlyle's Past and Present.

Joel, second of the twelve minor prophets, lived in or near Jerusalem after the exile.

John, the Apostle, son of Zebedee and younger brother of James, was a Galilean fisherman, probably a native of Bethsaida. It is probable that his mother was Salome, who may have been the sister of the mother of Jesus. After the ascension of Jesus, John seems to have remained in Jerusalem, but his subsequent history is involved in the greatest obscurity. Early tradition represents him as having been slain by the Jews like his brother James. But from the time of Justin (c. 150) he has been identified with the author of the Apocalypse, and from that of Irenæus (c. 175) he has been represented as spending his closing years at Ephesus, and dying there at an advanced age, after having written the Apocalypse, the Gospel, and the three Epistles which bear his name. See the New Testament Introductions of Hilgenfeld (1875), Bleek (4th ed. by Mangold, 1886), Holtzmann (2d ed. 1886), and Weiss (2d ed. 1889; Eng. trans. 1887), and Sanday's Fourth Gospel (1872). There are expository works on the Johannine writings by Lücke (1820), Ewald (1861-62), and Reuss (1879); see also commentaries on the Gospel by Meyer (new ed. Meyer-Weiss, 1880; trans.), Godet (1864-65; trans. 1877), Keil (1881), Westcott (1882), Plummer (1882), Sadler (1883), Milligan (1883), and Marcus Dods (1891-92).

John the Baptist, the forerunner of Christ, was the son of the priest Zacharias and Elizabeth, the cousin of Mary, the mother of our Lord; and baptised and preached repentance and forgiveness of sins. When he had baptised Jesus the office of the forerunner ceased. He had denounced Herod Antipas for taking Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, was flung into prison, where he was executed at the request of Salome, daughter of Herodias.

John, the name of twenty-two popes, the dates of whose papacy were as follows—John I. (523-6); II. (532-5); III. (560-73); IV. (640-2); V. (685-6); VI. (701-5); VII. (705-7); VIII. (872-82); IX. (898-900); X. (914-29); XI. (931-6, see MAROZIA); XII. (955-64); XIII. (965-72); XIV. (983-4); XV. (985-96); XVI. (997-8); XVII. (1003); XVIII. (1003-9); XIX. (1024-33); XXI. (not XX., because he included Pope Joan among his predecessors, 1276-77); XXII. (1316-34); and XXIII. (1410-15). The following deserve some special notice.—JOHN XII., the grandson of Marozia, was elected pope by the dominant party when only eighteen. The Emperor Otho in 963 in a synod of the clergy caused sentence of deposition for scandalous life to be pronounced against him, and Leo VIII. to be elected in his stead. John drove out Leo next year; but his career was cut short by a dishonourable death.—JOHN XXII., one of the most celebrated of the popes of Avignon, was born at Cahors in 1244, and elected in 1316. Attempting to carry out the vast policy of Gregory VII., he interposed his authority in the contest for the imperial crown between Louis of Bavaria and Frederick of Austria, supporting the latter and excommunicating his rival. A long contest ensued both in Germany and Italy, where the Guelph or papal party was represented by Robert, king of Naples, and the Ghibelline by Frederick of Sicily. The latter was also excommunicated by John; but in 1327 Louis entered Italy, and, crowned at Milan with the iron crown, advanced upon Rome, expelled the papal legate, and was crowned emperor by two Lombard bishops. He now caused the pope to be deposed on a charge of heresy and breach of fealty. When Louis returned to Germany, Guelphic predominance at Rome was restored; but John died at Avignon in 1334, having accumulated 18,000,000 gold florins.

John, surnamed Lackland, youngest of the five sons of Henry II., was born at Oxford, 24th December 1167. His father sent him to Ireland as governor in 1185, but his misconduct soon compelled his recall. He attempted to seize the crown during King Richard's captivity in Austria; but he was pardoned and nominated his successor by his brother on his deathbed. John was crowned at Westminster, 27th May 1199, although Arthur (q.v.), son of John's elder brother Geoffrey, was the rightful heir. On the Continent Arthur was acknowledged and his claims were supported by Philip of France, whom, however, in May 1200 John succeeded in buying off. In the same year he obtained a divorce from his cousin Hawisa of Gloucester, and married Isabel of Angoulême. In the war in France Arthur was taken prisoner, and before Easter 1203 was murdered by John's orders. Philip at once marched against John, and captured city after city, until by March 1204 only a portion of Aquitaine was left to John. In 1205 John entered on his quarrel with the church, the occasion being a disputed election to the archbishopric of Canterbury. In 1207 Innocent III. consecrated Stephen Langton, an English cardinal, and John declined to receive him. In 1208 the kingdom was placed under an interdict. John retaliated by confiscating the property of the clergy who obeyed the interdict, and banished the bishops. He compelled the Scotch king, William the Lyon, who had joined his enemies, to do him homage (1209), put down a rebellion in Ireland (1210), and subdued Llewellyn, the independent prince of Wales (1212). Meanwhile he had been excommunicated (1209), and now, in 1212, the pope issued a bull deposing him, Philip being charged with the execution of the sentence. John, finding his position untenable, was compelled to make abject submission to Rome, agreeing (May 1213) to hold his kingdom as a fief of the papacy, and to pay a thousand marks yearly as tribute. Philip, wrathful and disappointed, turned his forces against Flanders; but the French fleet was surprised at Damme by the English, 300 vessels being captured, and 100 burned. In 1214 John made a campaign in Poitou, but it turned out ill, and he returned to enter on the struggle with his subjects. A demand by the barons, clergy, and people that John should keep his oath and restore the laws of Henry I. was scornfully rejected. Preparations for war began on both sides. The army of the barons assembled at Stamford and marched to London; they met the king at Runnymede, and on 15th June 1215 was signed the Great Charter (Magna Charta), the basis of the English constitution. In August the pope annulled the charter, and the war broke out again. The first successes were all on the side of John, until the barons called over the French Dauphin to be their leader. Louis landed in May 1216, and John's fortunes had become desperate, when he died at Newark, 19th Oct. 1216. See the histories of Pearson, Green, Stubbs, Pauli, and Kate Norgate (1902).

John II., king of France, born in 1319, succeeded his father, Philip VI., in 1350. In 1356 he was taken prisoner by Edward the Black Prince at Poitiers and carried to England. After the treaty of Bretigny (1360) he returned home, leaving his second son, the Duke of Anjou, as a hostage; and when the duke broke his parole, and escaped (1363), John chivalrously returned to London, and died there 8th April 1364.

John, the blind king of Bohemia, son of Count Henry III. of Luxemburg (afterwards the Emperor Henry VII.), was born 10th August 1296. Having married (1310) the heiress of Bohemia, he was crowned king in 1311. In the struggle between Austria and Bavaria for the imperial crown he gained a victory for the Bavarians at Mühlendorf in 1322. In 1333-35 he was warring in Italy for the Guelph party. In 1334 he married a Bourbon, became an ally of the French king, and fell at Crécy 26th August 1346. He had been blind since 1340.

John III. (1624-96), king of Poland, was the son of James Sobieski, Castellan of Cracow. After the defeat of the Poles by the Russians at Pilawiecz, John took up arms, and became distinguished for his valour, and the dread of the Tartars and Cossacks. On 11th November 1673 he defeated the Turks at Choczim, and was elected king of Poland, 21st May 1674. When the Turks besieged Vienna in 1683, John hastened thither and raised the siege by a great victory on 12th September. His subsequent undertakings against the Turks were not equally successful. See French Life by Salvandy (6th ed. 1876).

John of Austria, natural son of the Emperor Charles V. and Barbara Blomberg of Ratisbon, was born there 24th February 1547. He was early brought to Spain, and after the death of his father was acknowledged by his half-brother Philip II. In 1570 he was sent with an army against the Moors in Granada, whom he completely routed out of the country. On 7th October 1571, with the fleets of Spain, the pope, and Venice, he defeated the Turks in the great sea-fight of Lepanto. In 1573 he took Tunis, and conceived the scheme of forming a kingdom for himself. But Philip, jealous of this design, sent him to Milan, and in 1576 as viceroy to the Netherlands. He sought to win the favour of the people by mildness; hard pressed for a time by William the Silent, he with the help of Parma's troops won the victory of Gembloux in 1577. But Philip now feared he might make himself king of the Netherlands, and Don John's death at Namur, 1st October 1578, was not without suspicion of poison. See Sir W. Stirling-Maxwell's Don John of Austria (1883).

John of Beverley, Sr, born at Cherry Burton near Beverley, in 687 became Bishop of Hexham, in 705 of York, and died at Beverley in 721.

John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, fourth son of Edward III., was born 24th June 1340 at Ghent (Fr. Gand). In 1359 he married his cousin, Blanche of Lancaster, and was created duke in 1362. She died in 1369, and in 1372 he married Constance, daughter of Pedro the Cruel of Castile, and assumed the title of king of Castile, though he failed by his expeditions to oust his rival, Henry of Trastamare. Before his father's death John became the most influential personage in the realm, and was thought to be aiming at the crown. He opposed the clergy and protected Wycliffe. Young King Richard, distrusting him, sent him in 1386 on another attempt to secure the crown of Castile; and this time he secured a treaty for the marriage of his daughter Catharine to the future king of Castile. After his return to England (1389) he reconciled Richard to his (John's) brother, the Duke of Gloucester, and by Richard was made Duke of Aquitaine, and sent on several embassies to France. He died 3d February 1399. On his second wife's death he had married in 1396 his mistress, Catharine Swynford, by whom he had three sons, legitimated in 1397; from the eldest descended Henry VII. See work by Armitage Smith (1904).

John of Leyden (John Beuckelszoon, Beuckels, or Boekhold), born at Leyden in 1509, wandered about for some time as a journeyman tailor, then settled in his native city as merchant and inn-keeper, and became noted as an orator. Turning Anabaptist, he in 1534 came to Münster, and, succeeding Matthiesen as head of the Anabaptists, set up a 'kingdom of Zion,' with polygamy and community of goods. In June 1535 the city was taken by the Bishop of Münster; and John and his accomplices suffered death with circumstances of fearful cruelty (Jan. 26, 1536). See Baring Gould's Historic Oddities (2d series, 1890).

John of Salisbury (c. 1118-80), a schoolman, by Bishop Stubbs styled 'for thirty years the central figure of English learning,' was born at Old Sarum, studied at Paris and Chartres, and from 1150 lived at Canterbury, whilst often visiting Italy. From 1164 to 1170 he had to take refuge at Rheims, but he returned in time to witness Becket's murder. In 1176 he became Bishop of Chartres. His Latin works (ed. by Giles, 1845) include over 300 letters, the Policraticus, &c.

Johns Hopkins. See HOPKINS.

Johnson, Andrew, seventeenth president of the United States, was born of humble parentage at Raleigh, N. C., December 29, 1808. In 1824 he went to Laurens, S. C., to work as a journeyman tailor, and in 1826 emigrated to Greenville, Tennessee. He served as alderman and mayor; in 1834 took part in framing the new state constitution; and in 1835 and 1839 became a member of the legislature. In 1841 he was elected to the state senate, and in 1843 to congress. In 1853, and again in 1855, he was chosen governor of Tennessee, and in 1857 he was sent to the U. S. senate for six years. After the breaking out of the civil war he became a leader of the Southern Union men, and for his efforts in behalf of the Union was made military governor of Tennessee (1862), and elected to the vice-presidency (March 1865). On Lincoln's assassination (14th April 1865) he became president. He sought to carry out the conciliatory policy of his predecessor, but the assassination had provoked a revulsion of public feeling, and Johnson's policy was denounced as evincing disloyal sympathies. Soon a majority of congress were opposing his policy, and while he urged the readmission of Southern representatives, the majority insisted that the Southern states should be kept for a period under military government. Johnson vetoed the congressional measures; and congress passed them over his veto. Finally, his removal of Secretary Stanton from the war department precipitated a crisis. Johnson claimed the right to change his 'constitutional advisers,' and in return he was charged with violation of the 'Tenure of Office Act,' in doing so without the consent of the senate. He was impeached and brought to trial, but acquitted. Practically this ended the contest, as the presidential election of 1868 was close at hand, and he retired from office in March 1869. He was elected to the U. S. senate in January 1875, and died near Carter's Station, Tenn., 31st July of that year. See Lives by Savage (1865), Foster (1867), Stoddard (1889), and Hughes (1893).

Johnson, Esther. See SWIFT.

Johnson, Richard Mentor (1781-1850), vice-president of the United States, was a member of congress in 1807-19, of the U. S. senate till 1829, and of congress till 1837. He served with great bravery in the war with Britain in 1812-13. In 1837-41 he was vice-president under Van Buren.

Johnson, Samuel, born at Lichfield, September 18, 1709, was the son of a second-hand bookseller. All through life he was of indolent habits; but his quickness of apprehension and his strength of memory were amazing, and so during his school-days at Lichfield and Stourbridge he became a prodigy of learning. In 1729 he went up to Pembroke College, Oxford, where a Latin translation of Pope's Messiah established his repute. But he was 'miserably poor;' and he left Oxford in October 1731 without a degree. He next attempted schoolmastering, but after a few months at Market Bosworth relinquished his situation. Visiting Birmingham in search of employment, he produced an abridged translation of Lobo's Voyage to Abyssinia. In 1735, his fortunes being at their lowest ebb, he married the widow of a Birmingham mercer, aged forty-six. She brought him £800, part of which seems to have been lost by the insolvency of an attorney. He again attempted schoolmastering at Edial Hall, near Lichfield, but was unsuccessful. In 1737, with a tragedy and twopence-halfpenny in his pocket, he came up, along with his Edial pupil, Garrick, to London; later in the year he fetched Mrs Johnson. It is certain he had a terrible struggle to make a living. But he bore all with a splendid courage. Meanwhile, in spite of circumstances, he was becoming the foremost writer of his time, and was already obtaining an influence due to something more than his writings—the force and the nobility of his character. In 1738 he became a regular contributor to the Gentleman's Magazine, and from November 1740 to February 1743 he wrote the debates in parliament published under the title of The Senate of Lilliput. In 1738 he published his London, an adaptation of Juvenal, a poem between whose lines may be read the piteous story of the harsh experiences he was undergoing. In 1747 he published his proposal of a new Dictionary of the English Language. It was paradoxical indeed that one in his starving position should undertake a task so gigantic and so unremunerative. But it was not only undertaken, but achieved. During the years mainly devoted to the Dictionary he produced also his Vanity of Human Wishes, a yet more brilliant adaptation of Juvenal, and also the series of essays called

The Rambler, in which his genius showed to less advantage. In 1752, just after he had concluded The Rambler, his wife died, and his grief was profound and enduring. In 1759 his mother died; and to meet the expenses connected with her death he wrote Rasselas in the evenings of a single week. Rasselas has been described as but a prose edition of the Vanity of Human Wishes. In 1758 he again attempted the periodical essay, adopting The Idler for his title. During all these years he performed also much hack work. Yet, for all his efforts, he was more than once arrested for debt. At last, in 1762, he was relieved from his penury by the bestowal upon him by the crown of a pension of £300 a-year. And for the last twenty-two years of life he lived in what was comparative affluence. In the London of that day he filled a unique position. He was a sort of literary monarch. In 1763 Boswell became his eager and faithful follower. It is mainly to him that we owe our intimate knowledge of the peculiarities of the great man—his insatiable tea-drinking and love of late hours; his slovenliness in dress and strange gesticulations; his physical strength and courage; his antipathy to Scotchmen, and love of London streets; his insensibility to music and painting; his hearty old Toryism, hatred of Whigs, and honest old-fashioned patriotism; his reverence for the church, and his sincere religion yet strange shrinking from death; his abhorrence of all false sentimentality, and rigid truthfulness; his delight in conversation, his marvellous dexterity in retort, and his frequent brow-beating of his antagonists. In 1764 the famous club known as the Literary Club was formed, and Johnson was amongst its original members. Probably in 1765 Johnson made the acquaintance of Mr Thrale and his sprightly wife, who did much to make his life bright and happy for more than sixteen years. In 1773 Boswell persuaded him to visit Scotland and the Hebrides, which was perhaps the most striking event of his later years. His Journey to the Hebrides and his Lives of the Poets are the only works of any importance belonging to this time of his kingship. Meanwhile, his social circle began to be sadly invaded. Goldsmith died in 1774, Garrick in 1779, Beauclerk in 1780, and Mr Thrale in 1781. In 1782 Mrs Thrale married Piozzi, an Italian musician and Catholic, and Johnson's displeasure at what he considered a degrading step dissolved their friendship. In 1783 Johnson suffered a paralytic stroke. He rallied to some extent; but in the following year dropsy and asthma attacked him. By November there was but little hope of his recovery. He died December 13, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. As a writer, he was rather of an age than for all time. His greatest interest for us is that he so exactly represents the current ideas of his age. He never fully expressed himself in literature. And we should never have known his real greatness but for Boswell's masterly reports of his conversations. The best edition of his works is that published at Oxford in 1825. See the article BOSWELL, the Life by Sir J. Hawkins (1787), and the editions of Boswell's Life of Johnson by Croker, Napier, Henry Morley, and Birkbeck Hill (6 vols. 1887); the Essays by Arthur Murphy, Macaulay, and Carlyle, as well as Macaulay's article in the Encyclopædia Britannica (1856); Birkbeck Hill's Dr Johnson, his Friends and his Critics (1878), his edition of the Letters (1892), and his Johnsonian Miscellanies (1897); Leslie Stephen's sketch ('Men of Letters,' 1878); Six Essays on Johnson, by Sir

W. Raleigh (1910). Matthew Arnold edited the chief six of the Lives of the Poets (1878); good editions of the whole are by Mrs Napier (1890), Waugh (1896), and Millar (1896). See also Madame D'Arblay's Diary, Mrs Piozzi's Autobiography, and Mrs Napier's Johnsoniana (1884).

Johnson, Sir WILLIAM (1715-74), born in County Down, in 1738 went to America, and as a fur-trader acquired great influence with the Red Indians, whom he led often against the French. His third wife (or mistress) was a Mohawk girl. In 1755 he was created a baronet. See Griffis's Sir William Johnson and the Six Nations (1891).

Johnson, ALBERT SIDNEY, born in Kentucky, 3d February 1803, served in the U.S. army until 1834. In 1836 he joined the army of Texas, and became its head, and in 1838 war secretary of Texas. He served in the Mexican war under General Taylor, who in 1849 appointed him paymaster in the U.S. army. In 1858 he brought the Mormon rebellion to an end. As brigadier-general he commanded in Utah and on the Pacific until 1861, when he passed over to the South. Appointed to the command of Kentucky and Tennessee, he fortified Bowling Green, and held the Northern army in check until Feb. 1862, when he retreated to Nashville and later to Corinth, Mississippi. Here he concentrated 50,000 men, with which force he attacked Grant at Shiloh, 6th April 1862. The National army was surprised, and the advantage lay with the Confederates till Johnston was mortally wounded. Next day Grant's supports came up, and the Confederates, now under Beauregard, were driven back to Corinth. See Life by his son (1878).

Johnston, ALEXANDER KEITH, LL.D. (1804-71), was born near Penicuik, and died at Ben Rhydding. His National Atlas (1843) procured him the appointment of Geographer Royal for Scotland. Other works are a Physical Atlas (1848) and the famous Royal Atlas (1861), besides atlases of astronomy, &c., a physical globe, and a gazetteer.—His son, ALEXANDER KEITH, born in Edinburgh, 24th Nov. 1844, also wrote geographical works. He joined an exploring expedition to Paraguay in 1874, and in 1879 was appointed leader of the Royal Geographical Society's expedition to East Africa. He died between the Coast and Lake Nyasa, 28th June 1879, and his work was taken up by Joseph Thomson.

Johnston, or JONSTON, ARTHUR (1587-1641), physician and humanist, born at Caskeine, Aberdeenshire, graduated M.D. at Padua in 1610, and visited many seats of learning. He practised medicine in France, whence his fame as a Latin poet spread over Europe. About 1625 he was appointed physician to King Charles I. His famous translation of the Psalms of David into Latin verse was published at Aberdeen in 1637. He helped to bring out the Delicia Poetarum Scotorum hujus Ævi (1637), to which he also contributed notable poems. In 1637 he became rector of King's College, Aberdeen, but his avocations as court physician kept him mainly in England. He died suddenly at Oxford in 1641. See works ed. by Sir W. D. Geddes (1892-95).

Johnston, Sir HENRY HAMILTON, born at Kennington, London, 12th June 1858, since 1879 has travelled in Africa, and written on the Congo, zoology, &c. He has held various high offices in Africa, and is G.C.M.G., K.C.B., &c.

Johnston, JAMES FINLAY WEIR (1906-1855), agricultural chemist, was humbly born at Paisley, and studied at Glasgow and at Stockholm (under Berzelius). In 1833 he became reader in chemistry and mineralogy at Durham, and there he died; but he resided chiefly in Edinburgh. He published Elements of Agricultural Chemistry (1842; 17th ed. 1894), Catechism of Agricultural Chemistry and Geology (1844; over 50 editions), and Chemistry of Common Life (1854; new ed. by Church, 1879).

JOHNSTON, JOSEPH EGGLESTON, born in Virginia, 3d February 1807, graduated at West Point, fought in the Seminole war, became captain of engineers in 1846, served in the war with Mexico, and in 1860 was quarter-master-general. He resigned in 1861 to enter the Confederate service, and as brigadier-general took command of the army of the Shenandoah. He supported Beauregard at the first battle of Bull Run, in 1862 was disabled by a wound, in 1863 failed to relieve Vicksburg, and in 1864 stubbornly contested Sherman's progress towards Atlanta, but, being steadily driven back, was relieved of his command. In February 1865 Lee ordered him to 'drive back Sherman;' but he had only a fourth of the Northern general's strength. On Lee's surrender he accepted the same terms, afterwards engaged in railway and insurance business, was elected to congress in 1877, was a U.S. commissioner of railroads, and died at Washington, 21st March 1891. See his Narrative (1874), and Life by Johnson (1891).

Johnstone, FAMILY OF, takes its surname from the lordship of Johnstone in Annandale, Dumfriesshire. In former days it was one of the most powerful and turbulent clans of the west Borders, and was at constant feud with its neighbours, especially the Maxwells. Three branches still exist, Johnstone of Annandale, Johnstone of Westerhall, and Johnston of Hilton and Caskieben in Aberdeenshire. The first, which retained the ancient patrimony, was ennobled by Charles I., and became successively Lords Johnstone of Lochwood, Earls of Hartfell, and Earls and Marquises of Annandale. These titles, being limited to heirs-male, became dormant in 1792. Both the Houses of Westerhall and Caskieben have the rank of baronet, and a branch of the former was in 1881 raised to the peerage as Baron Derwent. See work by C. L. Johnstone (1889).

Johnstone, GEORGE W. (1849-1901), Scottish landscape-painter, born at Glamis, was elected an A.R.S.A. in 1883, an R.S.A. in 1895.

Johnstone, JAMES, CHEVALIER DE (1719-c. 1800), the son of an Edinburgh merchant, as Prince Charles Edward's aide-de-camp fought at Culloden, and, then taking service with the French, was present at the capture of Louisbourg and the capitulation of Quebec. See his Memoirs (new tr. from French, 3 vols. Ab. 1870-71).

Johnstone, WILLIAM BORTHWICK (1804-68), historical and landscape painter, elected an A.R.S.A. in 1840, and an R.S.A. in 1848, was born and died in Edinburgh.

Joinville, FRANÇOIS FERDINAND D'ORLÉANS, PRINCE DE (1818-1900), born at Neuilly, the third son of Louis Philippe, served in the French navy from 1834 to 1848, and was on McClellan's staff during the Virginia campaign (1862); in 1886 he was again expelled from France. See his Vieux Souvenirs (1894; Eng. trans. 1896).

Joinville, JEAN, STRE DE, was born in 1224, and became sénéchal to the Count of Champagne and king of Navarre. He took part in the unfortunate crusade of Louis IX. (1248-54), returned with him to France, and lived thereafter partly at court, partly on his estates. He died 11th July 1319. At Acre in 1256 he composed a Christian manual, his Credo; and throughout the crusade he took notes of events and wrote down his impressions. When almost eighty he undertook his delightful Vie de Saint Louis (1309). His style conforms closely to his character: it is veracious, flowing, naïve, often singularly expressive. The best edition is by N. de Wailly (1874). See works by Didot (1870) and Delaborde (1895). Jókai, MAURICE, Hungarian novelist, born 19th February 1825 at Komorn, was an active partisan of the Hungarian struggle in 1848. Besides dramas, humorous essays, poems, &c., he has written novels and romances, good examples of which are The Turks in Hungary (1852), The Magyar Nabob (1853), and its continuation Zoltan Karpathy (1854), The New Landlord (1862), Black Diamonds (1870), The Romance of the Coming Century (1873), The Modern Midas (1875), The Comedians of Life (1876), God is One (1877), The White Woman of Leutschau (1884), and The Gipsy Baron (1885); several of them have been translated into English. A jubilee edition in 100 volumes was published in 1894. Jókai was editor of several newspapers, and conspicuous as a Liberal parliamentarian. He died May 1904. [Yo-kah'ee.]

Jolly, ALEXANDER, D. D. (1756-1838), from 1798 Episcopal bishop of Moray, was born at Stonehaven, and lived and died at Fraserburgh. See the Life of him by the Rev. W. Walker (1874).

Jom'ni, HENRI, BARON (1779-1869), born at Payerne in Vaud, after commanding a Swiss battalion attached himself to Ney, to whom he became chief of staff; he was created baron after the peace of Tilsit. He attracted Napoleon's notice by his Traité des Grandes Opérations Militaires (1804). He distinguished himself at Jena, in the Spanish campaigns, and during the retreat from Russia; but, offended at his treatment by Napoleon, he entered the Russian service (1814), and fought against Turkey (1828). He wrote a great history of the wars of the Revolution (1806), a Life of Napoleon (1827), and a Précis de l'Art de Guerre (1830). See works by Lecomte (3d. ed. 1888) and Sainte-Beuve (new ed. 1881).

Jommelli, NICCOLÒ (1714-74), operatic composer, was born at Aversa, and died at Naples.

Jonah is the name of a prophet mentioned in 2 Kings, xiv. 25; but the Book of Jonah, which is not a prophecy but a poetical narrative, does not claim to have been written by him, and seems to belong to the post-exilic period.

Jonas, JUSTUS (1493-1555), professor at Wittenberg, pastor at Halle and Coburg, and superintendent at Eisfeld, sided with Luther in the Reformation. See monograph by Pressel (1863).

JONES, CHARLOTTE (1768-1847), miniaturist.

Jones, EBENEZER, poet, born at Islington, 20th January 1820, was brought up in the strictest sect of the Calvinists, but at thirteen was writing verses. In 1837 he was forced by his father's long illness to turn clerk in a City warehouse; his hours were eight to eight six days a week. Yet he published his Studies of Sensation and Event (1843), poems 'full of the very essence of poetry,' and admired by such poets as Browning and Rossetti. But the world rejected them, and he published no more, save a pamphlet on the Land Monopoly (1849), which anticipated Henry George by thirty years in proposing to nationalise the land. In 1844 he married, miserably, the niece of Edwin Atherstone; and he died at Brentwood, 14th September 1860. See three articles by Watts-Dunton in Athenæum (1878), and two notices by Sumner Jones (elder brother of the poet, and a poet himself) and W. J. Linton prefixed to a reprint of the Studies (1879).

Jones, EDWARD (1777-1837), founder in 1800 of the Welsh Wesleyan Methodist, was born near Ruthin, and died at Leek.

Jones, EDWARD BURNE. See BURNE-JONES.

Jones, ERNEST, Chartist poet, the son of Major Jones, equerry to the Duke of Cumberland, afterwards king of Hanover, was born at Berlin, 25th January 1819, and came to England in 1838. In 1841 he published his romance, The Wood Spirit, was called to the bar in 1844, and next year became leader of the Chartist movement, issuing The Labourer, Notes of the People, and The People's Paper, and resigning nearly £2000 per annum, left to him on condition that he should abandon the Chartist cause. For his part in the Chartist proceedings at Manchester in 1848 he got two years' solitary confinement, and in prison composed an epic, The Revolt of Hindostan. After his release he wrote The Battleday (1855), The Painter of Florence and The Emperor's Vigil (1856), and Beldagon Church and Corayda (1860). He made several vain efforts to enter parliament, and only three days before his death, Jan. 26, 1869, gained a test-ballot for Manchester.

Jones, HARRY, author of Holiday Papers, East and West London, Prince Boohoo, &c., was born 8th Dec. 1823, graduated from St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1846, and from 1873 held London incumbencies, with a prebend of St. Paul's (1880). He died 30th September 1900. See his Fifty Years (1895).

Jones, HENRY (1831-99), as 'Cavendish' published many books on whist and other games.

Jones, HENRY ARTHUR, playwright, was born at Grandborough, Bucks, 28th September 1851, and till 1878 was in business. Only Round the Corner (1878) was produced at Exeter; his first great hit was The Silver King (1882). To it have succeeded Saints and Sinners (1884), The Middleman (1889), The Dancing Girl (1891), Rebellious Susan (1894), The Philistines (1895), Michael (1896), The Liars (1897), The Manœuvres of Fane (1898), Carnac Sahib (1899), Mrs Dane's Defence (1900), &c.

Jones, INIGO, architect, born in London 15th July 1573, studied landscape-painting in Italy, and from Venice introduced the Palladian style into England. In Denmark, whither he went on his way home, he is said to have designed the palaces of Rosenborg and Frederiksberg. In 1604 James I. employed him in arranging the masques of Ben Jonson; in 1613-14 he revisited Italy, and on his return was appointed surveyor-general of the royal buildings. He died in Somerset House, 21st June 1652. See Life by Cunningham (1848), and Loftie's Inigo Jones and Wren (1898).

Jones, OWEN (1741-1814), Welsh antiquary, was all his life a London furrier, but early developed a taste for Welsh poetry. His Myvyrian Archaeology of Wales (1801-7; new ed. 1870) is a collection of poetic pieces dating from the 6th to the 14th century.—His son, OWEN JONES (1809-74), art-decorator, was superintendent of works for the London Exhibition of 1851, and director of decorations for the Crystal Palace. He published Principles regulating the Employment of Colour (1853), Grammar of Ornament (1856), &c.

Jones, PAUL, was born at Arbigland, Kirkcudbrightshire, 6th July 1747, the son of a gardener, John Paul. Apprenticed as sailor-boy, he made several voyages to America, and in 1773 inherited a property in Virginia, having meanwhile for five years been mate on a slaver; about the same date he assumed the name of Paul Jones. When the American congress in 1775 resolved to fit out a naval force he offered his services. In April 1778, visiting the British coast in a brig of eighteen guns, he performed some daring exploits, including a descent on the Solway. The year after, as commodore of a small French squadron displaying American colours, he threatened Leith, and on 23d September fought off Flamborough Head a desperate engagement, in which he captured two British men-of-war. Louis XVI. created him a Chevalier of the Order of Military Merit. In 1788 he entered the Russian service, and as rear-admiral of the Black Sea fleet served against Turkey. He died at Paris, 18th July 1792. Laughton says he was a thorough seaman, and of the most determined and ferocious courage, but of excessive vanity and detestable moral character. See Lives by Sherbourne (1825), Taylor (1830), Mackenzie (1841), Simms (1845), Hamilton (1848), and Abbott (1875); also J. K. Laughton's Studies in Naval History (1887).

Jones, RICHARD (1779-1851), playwright and light comedian, was born, a builder's son, at Birmingham, and himself bred for an architect.

Jones, THOMAS RYMER (1810-80), zoologist, from 1836 to 1874 a professor in London.

Jones, WILLIAM (1726-1800), 'of Nayland, Suffolk, from 1777 its perpetual curate, was born at Lowick, Northants. See Life prefixed to his High Church theological Works (12 vols. 1801).

Jones, SIR WILLIAM, orientalist, was born in London, 28th September 1746, and from Harrow passed in 1764 to University College, Oxford, where his remarkable attainments attracted attention. In 1765 he became tutor to the son of Earl Spencer; in 1774 was called to the bar; and in 1776 became Commissioner of Bankrupts, publishing meanwhile a Persian Grammar (1772), Latin Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry (1774), and a translation of seven ancient Arabic poems (1780). In 1788 he obtained a judgeship in the Supreme Court of Judicature in Bengal, and was knighted. He at once devoted himself to Sanskrit, whose startling resemblance to Latin and Greek he was the first to point out in 1787. He established the Asiatic Society of Bengal (1784), and was its first president. He had finished his translation of Sakuntala, the Hitopadesa, parts of the Vedas, and Manu, when he died at Calcutta, 27th April 1794. See Memoirs by Lord Teignmouth appended to his works (9 vols. 1799-1804).

Jonson, BEN, dramatist, was born at Westminster about 1573, the son of a minister of Annandale descent. He was educated at Westminster under and at the cost of Camden, but it is questionable whether he was ever at Cambridge. His mother was remarried to a master-bricklayer; and for a while Ben followed the craft of his stepfather, but went off to serve as a soldier in the Low Countries. After a short stay abroad he returned and 'betook himself to his wonted studies.' We first hear of Jonson's connection with the stage in 1597, but he had doubtless been at work for some time previously both as an actor and dramatist. In 1598 Every Man in his Humour was produced. It is the only play of Jonson's which has been revived in modern times. Every Man out of his Humour (1599) is a somewhat tedious play, and was followed by The Case is Altered (1599), Cynthia's Revels (1600), and The Poetaster (1601). Subsequent productions were Sejanus, a tragedy (1603); Volpone, or the Fox (1605); Epicæne, or the Silent Woman (1609); The Alchemist (1610); Catiline (1611); and Bartholomew Fair (1614). The Devil is an Ass (1616) and The Staple of News (1625) are of smaller account. The New Inn (1629-30) was not successful on the stage, but contains some of the poet's most eloquent writing. The latest comedies were The Magnetic Lady (1632) and A Tale of a Tub (1633). A delightful pastoral play, The Sad Shepherd, was left unfinished. Ben Jonson's masques are of singular beauty. He was one of the most learned men of his age, and he lavished all the stores of his knowledge on these entertainments; but his sprightliness of fancy and fertility of invention matched his learning. The mechanism was provided by Inigo Jones, with whom he frequently quarrelled; indeed Jones finally succeeded (1627) in ousting Jonson from court favour. Jonson also wrote many elegies, epistles, love-poems, epigrams, and epitaphs. As a song-writer he had few equals. Of his songs the most popular is 'Drink to me only with thine eyes'; but many of the lyrics in his plays and masques are equally charming. His prose Discoveries are distinguished by admirable judgment and unaffected purity of diction. In 1613 he visited France, and in 1618-19 trudged to and back from Scotland, where he stayed with Drummond of Hawthornden (q.v.). In 1625 he was attacked by palsy, and afterwards by dropsy. His sufferings were intensified by poverty; but he found patrons in King Charles and the Earl of Newcastle. He died 6th August 1637, and was buried at Westminster Abbey, where the slab over his grave is inscribed 'O rare Ben Jonson!' His works were edited by William Gifford (1816; new ed. 1875, with additional notes by Lieut.-Col. Cunningham), who cleared away the baseless calumnies by which his memory had been assailed. See Life by J. A. Symonds (1886) and Swinburne's Study of Ben Jonson (1890).

Jordaens, JAKOB (1598-1678), who was born and died at Antwerp, ranks next to Rubens amongst Flemish painters. He excelled in humorous scenes of Flemish life, and painted also scriptural and mythological subjects. [For-dahns.]

Jordan, CAMILLE (1771-1821), Liberal politician, was born at Lyons, and died in Paris. [Zhor-dons.]

Jordan, MRS DOROTHEA (whose real name was Bland), actress, was born near Waterford in 1762. She made her début in Dublin (1777), soon became popular, and in 1782 obtained an engagement from Tate Wilkinson at Leeds. She appeared at Drury Lane in The Country Girl in October 1785, and in a few days had bewitched the town; but for nearly thirty years it was in the rôles of romps and boys that she mainly kept her hold on the public. In 1790 commenced her connection with the Duke of Clarence, afterwards William IV., which endured until 1811. After playing in London and in the provinces until 1814, she is said to have been compelled to retire to France for a debt of £2000—though other accounts make her out to have laid by considerable sums. She certainly lived in apparent poverty at St Cloud, and died 31st July 1816. In 1831 King William raised her eldest son to the peerage as Earl of Munster, and gave the other nine Fitz-Clarences the rank and precedence of the younger sons and daughters of a marquis. See Life by Boaden (1831) and Temple Bar (October 1877).

Jordan, RUDOLF (1810-87), painter of fisher-folk, was born at Berlin, and died at Düsseldorf.

Jordan, WILHELM (1819-1904), poet and prose-writer, born at Insterburg. [Yor-dahn.]

Jörgensen, JÖRGEN, 'King of Iceland,' the son of a Copenhagen watchmaker, was born in 1779. On 21st June 1809, having previously visited Iceland as interpreter, he arrived at Reykjavik in an armed London merchantman. But all trade being prohibited by the laws of the island, a few days afterwards he landed and seized the governor. He then proclaimed the independence of Iceland, 'under English protection,' and appropriated all he could lay his hands on for the 'state chest.' On 9th August his reign was brought to an abrupt termination by the arrival of a British sloop of war, and he was carried to England. He lived in London for some years, but was convicted of robbery in 1820, and transported to Tasmania. [Yur-gen-sen.]

Jordanes or JORDANES, born about 500, was first a notary at the Ostrogoth court in Italy, but became a monk, and finally Bishop of Crotona. He wrote two historical works in Latin—De Regnorum ac Temporum Successione, a compendium of history from the creation to 552 A.D., and De Getarum Origine et Rebus Gestis, which, based on the earlier work (now lost) of the Roman Cassiodorus, is our only source of information about much connected with the Goths. The best edition is by Closs (3d ed. Reutl. 1888).

Jortin, JOHN, D.D. (1698-1770), the son of a Huguenot refugee, born in London, became a prebendary of St Paul's and archdeacon of London. His chief works are Miscellaneous Observations upon Authors, Ancient and Modern (1731-32); Remarks on Ecclesiastical History (1751-53); Life of Erasmus (1758-60); and Tracts (1790).

Joseph, the elder of the two sons of Jacob by Rachel. His being sold into Egypt and his ultimate rise to power there are recorded in Genesis.—JOSEPH, husband of the Virgin, a carpenter at Nazareth, appears last in the gospel history when Jesus is twelve years old (Luke, ii. 43); he is never mentioned during his ministry, and may be assumed to have been already dead.—JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA, a rich Israelite who went to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus, burying it in his own rock-hewn tomb.—JOSEPH, one of the two persons chosen as worthy to fill the vacant place of Judas among the Twelve.

Joseph I. (1678-1711), succeeded his father Leopold I. as emperor of Germany in 1705. He granted privileges to the Protestants, and, in alliance with Britain, prosecuted successfully the war of the Spanish succession against France.—JOSEPH II., emperor of Germany, son of Francis I. and Maria Theresa, was born 13th March 1741. In 1764 he was elected king of the Romans, and after his father's death (1765) emperor of Germany; but until his mother's death (1780) his power was limited to the command of the army and the direction of foreign affairs. Although he failed to add Bavaria to the Austrian dominions (1777-79 and again in 1785), he acquired Galicia, Lodomeria, and Zips, at the first partition of Poland in 1772; and in 1780 he appropriated great part of Passau and Salzburg. As soon as he found himself in full possession of the government of Austria he declared himself independent of the pope, and prohibited the publication of any new papal bulls without his placet. The continued publication of the bulls 'Unigenitus' and 'In Cœna Domini' was prohibited. He suppressed 700 convents, reduced the number of the regular clergy from 63,000 to 27,000, prohibited papal dispensations as to marriage, and in 1781 pub-ished the Edict of Toleration for Protestants and Greeks. He also abolished serfdom, reorganised taxation, and curtailed the feudal privileges of the nobles. In 1788 he engaged in an unsuccessful war with Turkey; and the vexation caused by this, and by revolts in his dominions, hastened his death, 20th Feb. 1790. See works by Brunner (1868-85), Lustkandl (1881), Nossinich (1885), Schlitter (1894), and Dr Franck Bright (1897); also Léger's History of Austro-Hungary (trans. 1890).

Joseph, king of Naples. See BONAPARTE.

Joseph, PÈRE (1577-1638). Richelieu's alter ego, the 'Grey Eminence,' whose original name was François le Clerc du Tremblay, and who, nobly born in Paris, from a soldier turned Capuchin in 1593. See a work by Fagniez (Par. 1893-94).

Joséphine, MARIE ROSE, empress of the French, daughter of Count Tascher de la Pagerie, was born in Martinique, 23d June 1763, and in 1779 married there the Vicomte de Beauharnais (q.v.). In 1796, two years after his execution, she married Napoleon Bonaparte, and accompanied him in his Italian campaign, but soon returned to Paris and gratified to the full her pleasure-loving instincts. At Malmaison, and afterwards at the Luxembourg and the Tuileries, she attracted round her the most brilliant society of France, and contributed not a little to the establishment of her husband's power. But her marriage proving unfruitful, it was dissolved, 16th Dec. 1809. Joséphine retained the title of empress, and, if the allied sovereigns had permitted, would have rejoined Bonaparte after his fall. She died at Malmaison, 29th May 1814. See works by Aubenas (1859), Imbert de Saint-Amand (1883-84; Eng. trans. 1891), F. Masson (1898), and Sergeant (1908).

Josephus, FLAVIUS, Jewish historian, was born at Jerusalem in 37 A.D., the son of a priest, while his mother was descended from the Asmonean princes. His acquirements in Hebrew and Greek literature soon drew public attention upon him, and he became conspicuous amongst the Pharisees, the national party, at twenty-six being chosen delegate to Nero. When the Jews rose in their last and fatal insurrection against the Romans, Josephus, as governor of Galilee, displayed great valour and prudence; but the advance of Vespasian (67) made resistance hopeless, and Jotapata, the city into which he had thrown himself, was taken after a desperate resistance of forty-seven days. Josephus was kept in a sort of easy imprisonment for three years, and was present in the Roman army at the siege of Jerusalem by Titus (70). After this he appears to have resided at Rome. He survived Agrippa II., who died in 97. His works are History of the Jewish War, written both in Hebrew and Greek (the Hebrew version is no longer extant); Jewish Antiquities, containing the history of his countrymen from the earliest times to the end of the reign of Nero; a treatise on the Antiquity of the Jews, against Apion; and an Autobiography (37-90 A.D.). Josephus was in the main honest and veracious. His Greek style is easy and elegant; and the influence of Greek philosophy and learning has given to his conception of biblical history a somewhat rationalistic tinge. The famous passage about Jesus is certainly an interpolation. The editio princeps of the Greek text appeared at Basel in 1544. Other important editions are those of Hudson (1720), Havercamp (1726), Dindorf (1845-47), Bekker (1855-56), and Niese (1885-92). There are English translations by L'Estrange (1702), Whiston (1737; revised by Shilleto, 1889-90), Maynard (1800), and Trall and Taylor (1851). See German works by Bärwald (1877), Böttger (1879), Bloch (1879), Destimon (1882), Olitzki (1886), and Krenkel (1894).

Joshua, son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, was one of the twelve spies sent to collect information about the Canaanites, and during the forty years' wanderings acted as 'minister' or personal attendant of Moses. After 'the Lord was angry with Moses' Joshua was expressly designated to lead the people into Canaan. The Book of Joshua is a narrative of the conquest and settlement of Canaan under his leadership. The best commentary is by Dillmann (1886).

Josiah (649-609 B.C.), king of Judah, succeeded his father Amon at eight. He re-established the worship of Jehovah, and instituted the rites in the newly-discovered 'Book of the Law.' He fell at Megiddo attempting to check Pharaoh-Necho's advance against the Assyrians.

Josika, NICHOLAS, BARON (1794-1865), Hungarian novelist after Sir Walter Scott, was involved in the revolution of 1848, and had to live an exile in Brussels and Dresden. See Magyar Life by Szaak (1891). [Yo'shee-ko.]

Jost, ISAAK MARKUS (1793-1860), born at Bernburg in Anhalt, was a schoolmaster at Berlin 1826-35 and Frankfort-on-Main 1835-60. He wrote a Geschichte der Israeliten (15 vols. 1829-59), and edited a German translation of the Mishnah (1832-34). [Yost.]

Joubert, JOSEPH, was born at Montignac in Périgord, 6th May 1754, and studied and taught till twenty-two at the college of Toulouse. He then went to Paris, and lived through all the fever of the Revolution. In 1809 he was nominated by Napoleon to the council of the new university. At Villeneuve and at Paris he lived henceforward, reading, talking, and writing letters. He published nothing, although he was the keenest if kindest critic to the writings of all his friends. He died 4th May 1824. Fourteen years after his friend Chateaubriand edited a small volume from his papers, and Joubert's fame was from that moment assured; his Pensées are worthy of their place beside those of La Rochefoucauld, Pascal, La Bruyère, and Vauvenargues. There are translations by Calvert (1867), Attwell (1877), and Lyttelton (1899). See Sainte-Beuve's Causeries du Lundi (vol. i.), Portraits Littéraires (vol. ii.), and Chateaubriand et son Groupe; also Matthew Arnold's Essays in Criticism (1865). [Zhoobayr'.]

Joubert, PETRUS JACOBUS, born about 1831, commandant-general of the Transvaal, was conqueror of Colley in 1881 and of Jameson in 1896, and organised the first Boer successes in the South African war of 1899-1902, but died after a short illness, 27th March 1900.

Jouffroy, THÉODORE SIMON (1796-1842), philosopher, born at Pontets in the Jura, studied under Cousin, and from 1817 taught philosophy in Paris, till in 1838 he exchanged his chair for the post of librarian to the university. The lucid interpreter of the Scottish philosophers Reid and Dugald Stewart, he translated their works. His own best books were Mélanges Philosophiques (1833), Cours du Droit Naturel (1835), and Cours d'Esthétique (1843). See Life by Tissot (1876).

Jouffroy d'Abbans, CLAUDE, MARQUIS DE (1751-1832), claimed by the French as the inventor of steam-navigation, served in the army, and in 1783 made a small paddle-wheel steamboat. Compelled to emigrate and ruined by the Revolution, he failed to float a company till after Fulton had made his successful experiments on the Seine in 1803. See monograph by Prost (Par. 1889).

Joule, James Prescott, physicist, born at Salford, 24th December 1818, studied chemistry under Dalton, and early made notable experiments with reference to electro-magnetic engines, from which he passed to quantitative determinations regarding heat, and the transformation of various forms of energy. He was the experimental founder of the theory of conservation of energy. In 1878 he received a pension of £200. F.R.S., LL.D., and D.C.L., he died 11th October 1889, at Sale near Manchester. His collected papers were published by the Physical Society of London (2 vols. 1884-87). See Nature (October 1882), and Memoir by Prof. Osborne Reynolds (1893).

Jourdan, Jean Baptiste, Comte (1762-1833), French marshal, born at Limoges, defeated the Austrians at Wattignies (16th Oct. 1793), gained the victory of Fleurus (26th June 1794), and then drove the Austrians across the Rhine, took Luxemburg, and besieged Mainz. But on 11th October 1795 he was defeated at Höchst, as four times in 1796-99 by the Archduke Charles. Napoleon employed him in 1800 in Piedmont; and in 1804 he was made marshal, in 1806 governor of Naples. In 1813 he was defeated by Wellington at Vittoria, and in 1814 transferred his allegiance to the Bourbons, who made him a count. He supported the Revolution of 1830. [Zhoor-dow'.]

Jouy, Victor Joseph Étienne (1764-1846), playwright, librettist, and author of L'hermite de la Chaussée d'Antior (1812-14) and other prose works, was born at Jouy near Versailles; till 1797 served as a soldier in India and at home; and in 1815 was elected to the Academy.

Jowett, Benjamin, born at Camberwell, 15th April 1817, was educated at St Paul's School and Balliol, Oxford, where he won the Hertford in 1837, a classical first in 1839, and the Latin essay in 1841. Already a fellow in 1838, he was tutor from 1840 till his election as master in 1870; from 1855 to 1893 he was regius professor of Greek. As master of Balliol his influence permeated the college to a degree almost unexampled. He was made Doctor by Leyden (1875), Edinburgh (1884), and Cambridge (1890), and was vice-chancellor from 1882 till 1886. Jowett belonged to the Broad Church party. For his article 'On the Interpretation of Scripture' in Essays and Reviews (1860) he was tried but acquitted by the vice-chancellor's court. He published a Commentary on the Epistles of St Paul to the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Romans (1855; 3d ed. 1894), but is best known by his translation, with learned and lucid introductions, of the Dialogues of Plato (1871; 3d ed. 1892) and his (less happy) versions of Thucydides (1851) and the Politics of Aristotle (1885). He died 1st October 1893; his College Sermons appeared in 1895. See his Life and Letters by Evelyn Abbott and Lewis Campbell (1897).

Joy, William, born near Ramsgate, appeared in London as the 'English Sampson' in 1699, and was drowned smuggling in 1734.

Juan, Don. See JOHN OF AUSTRIA.

Juarez, Benito, president of Mexico, born of Indian parents in Oaxaca, 21st March 1806, became an advocate, and was governor of his native state in 1847-52. Exiled by Santa-Anna (1853), he returned two years later, and in 1857 was elected president of the Supreme Court. In 1858 he assumed the executive, but was compelled to retire to Vera Cruz, whence he issued decrees abolishing religious orders and confiscating church property. In 1861 he entered the capital, and was elected president for four years. In 1866 the French emperor declared war against Juarez, who retreated to the northern frontier. But on the withdrawal of the French, he re-entered Mexico city in July 1867, the Emperor Maximilian (q.v.) having meanwhile been shot by court-martial. Juarez was elected president, and again in 1871, though the risings became fiercer and more frequent. He died 18th July 1872. See Life by U. R. Burke (1894). [Hoo-ah'teth.]

Juba, king of Numidia, having supported Pompey against Caesar, committed suicide, 46 B.C.

Judah, fourth son of Jacob and Leah, was founder of the greatest of the twelve tribes.

Judas, the betrayer of Jesus, surnamed Iscariot, was probably a native of Kerioth in the tribe of Judah. See the essay by De Quincey.

Judd, John Wesley, C.B., F.R.S., geologist, was born at Portsmouth in 1840, and entered the Royal School of Mines. In 1867 he joined the Geological Survey Staff; in 1876 became professor of Geology at the School of Mines, in 1881 at the Royal College of Science; and in 1895 was made a C.B. Volcanoes (1881) is by him.

Judd, Sylvester (1813-53), born at West-hampton, Mass., and from 1840 a Unitarian pastor at Augusta, Ma., wrote against slavery, war, intemperance, &c.

Jude, St. was probably the Judas who was one of the 'brethren of the Lord' (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3). His epistle was placed among the Antilegomena, or disputed books, by the primitive church. Many critics hold that it is directed against the Gnostics of the 2d century. See commentaries by Brückner, Meyer, Hoffmann (1875), Reuss (1878), and Plumpré (1886).

Judith, a Jewish heroine, who, in the Apocryphal book named after her, is said to have made her way into the tent of Holofernes, general of Nebuchadnezzar, cut off his head, and so saved her native town of Bethulia.

Judson, Adoniram (1788-1850), born in Malden, Mass., thought of turning playwright, but in 1812, having married, sailed for India. Settling in Rangoon as a Baptist missionary, he began to preach and write in Burmese, translating portions of the New Testament (1817-21). During the Burmese war he was imprisoned at Ava; and he subsequently laboured in various towns of British Burmah and amongst the Karens with remarkable success. In 1833 his translation of the Bible was completed, and there followed a Burmese-English dictionary. He died at sea. His first wife, Ann Haseltine (1789-1826), was author of a History of the Burmese Mission. His second, Sarah Hall (1803-45), was the widow of G. D. Broadman (q.v.). His third, Emily Chubbuck (1817-54), wrote poetry, &c. as 'Fanny Forrester.' See Lives by Wayland (1853) and Judson's son Edward (1883).

Jugurtha, king of Numidia, by the murder of one cousin secured a part of the kingdom of his grandfather Masinissa, and bribed the Roman senate to support him (117 B.C.). But he soon invaded his surviving cousin Adherbal's part of the kingdom, in spite of Roman warnings, besieged him in Cirta (112), and put him and the Romans who were with him to death. Thereupon war was declared by the Romans; but, by bribery, Jugurtha contrived to baffle their power, until in 106 he had to flee to the king of Mauritania, whom Marius compelled to deliver him up. He was starved to death in prison at Rome (104). Sallust's history of the war is a masterpiece.

Jukes, JOSEPH BEETE, geologist, born near Birmingham, 10th October 1811, in 1839 became geological surveyor of Newfoundland, and in 1842 helped to explore the coasts of Australia. He next surveyed part of North Wales for the Geological Survey (1846-50), and in 1850 became local director of the survey in Ireland. He lectured on geology in Dublin, and died 29th July 1869. His chief works are Excursions in and about Newfoundland (1842), Surveying Voyage of H.M.S. 'Fly,' in Torres Strait, &c. (1847), Physical Structure of Australia (1850), and Student's Manual of Geology (1858; 5th ed. 1890). See his Letters (1871).

Jülg, BERNHARD (1825-86), philologist and Mongol folklorist, was successively professor at Lemberg, Cracow, and Innsbruck. [Yülg.]

Julia (89 B.C.-14 A.D.), daughter of the Emperor Augustus, was married at fourteen to her cousin Marcellus, sister's son of Augustus, and after his death in 23 B.C. to Marcus Vipsanius Agrippa, to whom she bore three sons and two daughters. He died in 12 B.C., whereupon Julia was married to Tiberius. The marriage was an unhappy one, and her conduct far from irreproachable; but it was chiefly the jealous hatred of Livia, Tiberius's mother, that procured Julia's banishment first to the isle of Pandataria, and then to Rhegium.

Julian (Flavius Claudius Julianus), 'the Apostate,' Roman emperor, born at Constantinople in 331 A.D., was the youngest son of Constantius, half-brother of Constantine the Great. On Constantine's death in 337, and the accession of his three sons, there was a general massacre of the males of the younger line of the Flavian family. Julian and his elder half-brother Gallus were alone spared as too young to be dangerous, when their father, brother, uncle, and cousins perished. His youth was embittered by this tragedy, which stripped him of all belief in the Christian religion now established. In 355 he spent a few happy months at Athens in the study of Greek philosophy, and the same year was summoned to Milan to assume the rank of Caesar, and marry the emperor's sister, Helena. The next five years he served as soldier, overthrowing the Alemanni near Strasburg, and subduing the Frankish tribes along the Rhine. He endeared himself to the soldiers by his personal courage, his success in war, and the severe simplicity of his life. In April 360 the emperor, alarmed at his growing popularity, demanded that he should send some of his best troops to serve against the Persians, but his soldiers rose in insurrection and proclaimed him Augustus. Ere long he set out with his army for Constantinople. At Sirmium on the Danube he first threw off the mask and openly declared himself a pagan. Here also he learned of the opportune death of his cousin (361), which opened up to him the government of the world. The first winter he spent at Constantinople in a course of public reforms. Towards Christians and Jews he adopted a policy of toleration, but none the less he devoted himself to restoring the dignity of the old religion. He stripped the church of its privileges by every means short of persecution, but was mortified by the little success of his ardent propagandism alike among citizens and soldiers. He spent part of 362-363 at Antioch, and made himself somewhat unpopular by fixing an arbitrary price on corn in order to stave off a threatened famine. In 363 he set out on his long-meditated expedition against the Persians. He crossed the Tigris, advanced to Ctesiphon, was enticed farther by a Persian traitor, and was at length forced to retreat through a barren country, harassed by swarms of Persian cavalry. The enemy were repeatedly beaten off, but in one of the attacks the emperor was wounded by a spear-thrust, and died June 26, 363. The tale that in dying he exclaimed, 'Thou hast conquered, O Galilee,' is hardly authenticated. Julian was a soldier and a statesman wrapped in a student's cloak. He was superstitious and fanatical, loquacious, restless, and irritable, vain and pedantic, yet passionately devoted to truth, chaste, just, liberal, and affectionate. Julian's extant writings are a series of Epistles; nine Orations; Cæsares, a series of satires on past Cæsars; and the Misopogon. His chief work, Kata Christianōn, is lost. A serviceable edition is that by Hertlein (1875). The early Christian authors made Julian a monster: Gibbon's account of him is a masterpiece. See works by Neander (1813; trans. 1830), Mücke (1869), Rendall (1879), and Alice Gardner (1895).

Julien, STANISLAS AIGNAN, Chinese scholar, born at Orleans, 19th September 1799, became at twenty-one assistant-professor at the Collège de France. He gave himself with such zeal to the study of Chinese that in less than a year he was able to make a Latin translation of Mencius (1824-26). He succeeded Rémusat at the Collège de France (1832), and became head of the Collège Impériale (1854). He was also keeper of the Bibliothèque Impériale. He died February 14, 1873. Julien produced admirable French versions of specimens of the Chinese drama (1832-34) and of Chinese romances (1836-63), as well as a collection of Indian novels (1859). Among his translations were the great manuals of Chinese religion and philosophy containing the doctrines of Lǎo-tszé (1835-41) and others; and the life and journey of Hwen-T'siang (1852). His Syntaxe Nouvelle de la Langue Chinoise appeared 1869-70.

Julius I., pope from 337 to 352.—JULIUS II. (Giuliano della Rovere), born at Albizuola near Savona, in 1443. On his election to the pontificate in 1503, he resumed possession of the Romagna, which had been bestowed upon Cæsar Borgia. His public career was mainly devoted to political and military enterprises for the re-establishment of papal sovereignty in its ancient territory, and for the extinction of foreign domination in Italy. To compel Venice to restore the papal provinces on the Adriatic, Julius entered into the league of Cambrai with the Emperor Maximilian, Ferdinand of Aragon, and Louis XII. of France, and placed the republic under the ban of the church. On the submission of Venice, suspecting the designs of Louis, he entered into a 'Holy League' with Spain and England. Louis XII. ineffectually attempted to enlist the church against the pope. The Council of Pisa, convened under Louis's influence, was a failure; and the fifth Lateran Council, assembled by Julius, completely frustrated the designs of the French king. As a spiritual ruler Julius has little to recommend him. He was a liberal and judicious patron of art, and a friend of the rising literature of the time. He died 20th February 1513. See Lives by Dumesnil (1873), Brosch (1877), and Grassi (1886); and vols. iii. and iv. of Bishop Creighton's History of the Papacy (1887).—JULIUS III. (Giannaria del Monte), born at Rome in 1487, was one of the three legates under whom the Council of Trent was opened, and after his election to the papacy in 1550 himself reopened that council. He sent Cardinal Pole to organise with Mary of England the reunion of the kingdom with Rome. He died 23d March 1555.

Jullien, LOUIS ANTOINE (1812-60), born in the Basses Alpes, became conductor of concerts at Paris in 1836, but in 1838 made London his headquarters, and did much to popularise music. Bankrupt in 1857, he retired to Paris, was imprisoned for debt, and died in a lunatic asylum.

Jumièges, ROBERT OF, a Norman, abbot of Jumièges from 1037, came to England in 1043 with Edward the Confessor, who made him Bishop of London (1044) and Archbishop of Canterbury (1050). He was the head of the anti-English party which in 1051 banished Earl Godwin and his sons. Their return next year drove him to Normandy. The Witan stripped him of his archbishopric, and he died at Jumièges.—WILLIAM OF JUMIÈGES, a Norman monk who compiled a history of the Dukes of Normandy from Rollo to 1071, of value for the story of the Conquest.

Jung, JOHANN HEINRICH ('Jung Stilling'; 1740-1817), studied medicine at Strasburg, practised at Elberfeld, and won fame as an operator for cataract. Professor of Political Economy at Marburg (1787-1804) and then at Heidelberg, he wrote semi-mystical, semi-pietistic romances and works on political economy, but is best remembered for his charming autobiography (1777-1817; Eng. trans. 1835). [Yoong.]

Jung, SIR SALAR (1829-83), in 1853 succeeded his uncle as chief minister to the Nizam of Hyderabad. He at once began to reorganise the administration; and to repay a loan the province of Berar was ceded to the British. The mercenary Arab soldiery were reduced to obedience, robber chiefs crushed, courts of justice established, the police organised, irrigation works attended to, and schools established. During the Mutiny Salar Jung remained faithful to British interests; and on the death in 1869 of the Nizam, who had lent his reforming minister no aid, he became one of the two regents. He was made K.S.I. in 1867, G.C.S.I. in 1871. In 1876 he visited England seeking (in vain) the restoration of the Berar province.

Jung Bahadur, SIR (1816-77), prime-minister of Nepal, assisted the British during the Mutiny with a body of Goorkhas, and was made a K.G.S.I.

Junius, FRANCISCUS (1589-1677), born at Heidelberg, and brought up in Holland by his brother-in-law Vossius, from 1621 to 1651 lived in England in the Earl of Arundel's family, returned in 1674, and died near Windsor. He studied Anglo-Saxon and Gothic, and wrote also on ancient art. See also FRANCIS (SIR PHILIP).

Junker, WILHELM, traveller, was born of German parents in Moscow, 6th April 1840, and studied medicine in Germany. In 1876-78 he travelled amongst the western tributaries of the Upper Nile; in 1879 he explored the Welle-Makna, afterwards proved to be identical with the Ubangi, an affluent of the Congo. After four years among the Monbuttu and Niam-Niam, and some time with Emin Pasha, he reached Cairo in 1887. He died at St Petersburg, 13th Feb. 1892. See his Travels (1889; trans. 1890).

Junot, ANDOCHE, Marshal of France, was born at Bussy-le-Grand, October 23, 1771, and distinguished himself in the early wars of the republic. Napoleon carried him to Egypt as adjutant. In 1804 he was made governor of Paris, in 1807 was appointed to the command of the army of Portugal. He quickly made himself master of all the strong places in the kingdom, was created Duc d'Abrantès, and appointed governor of Portugal; but, defeated by Wellington at Vimiera, was obliged to conclude the Convention of Cintra and retire from Portugal. He served in Germany and Russia, and made one of the scapegoats for the Russian disaster, was sent to govern Illyria. Becoming deranged, he was taken to his father's house near Dijon, threw himself from a window, July 22, 1813, and died seven days afterwards.—His wife, the extravagant Duchesse d'Abrantès (1784-1838), gained a reputation by her Mémoires (1831-35), and several minor works.

Jurien de la Gravière, JEAN (1812-92), a French admiral who wrote much on naval subjects.

Jurieu, PIERRE (1637-1713), Protestant professor at Sedan, and pastor at Rotterdam.

Jusserand, JEAN ADRIEN ANTOINE JULES, born at Lyons in 1855, served in the French embassy at London in 1887-90, and in 1902 became ambassador to the United States. He has written, in French and in English on English wayfaring life, on the literary history of the English people, and on Shakespeare in France.

Jussieu, ANTOINE DE (1686-1758), a Paris botanist, born at Lyons, was assisted by his brother, BERNARD (1699-1777), who helped to develop the 'natural system' of botanical classification.—A nephew, ANTOINE LAURENT DE JUSSIEU (1748-1836), by his Genera Plantarum (1789) finally established the principles on which modern botanical classification is based.—His son, ADRIEN (1797-1853), wrote very valuable botanical memoirs and Cours Élémentaire de Botanique (1842).

Juste, THÉODORE (1818-1888), became in 1859 keeper of the Museum of Antiquities at Brussels, and in 1870 professor of History. He wrote Fondateurs de la Monarchie Belge (1865-81), &c.

Justin. See JUSTINUS.

Justin, surnamed the MARTYR, was born at Sichein in Samaria about 100 A.D., and was successively a Stoic and a Platonist; and after his conversion to Christianity wandered about, arguing for the truth of the new faith. At Rome between 150 and 160 he wrote the Apologia of Christianity addressed to the Emperor, followed by a second one. He is said to have been martyred about 165 A.D. There is an edition by Otto of his works, including numerous treatises falsely attributed to him (1876-81). There are two English translations. See works by Semisch (1842), Anbé (1874), Stählin (1880), Freppel (1885), Huth (1894), and Veil (1895).

Justin I. (450-527), born in Illyria, became commander in the imperial bodyguard, and in 518 was raised to the Byzantine throne by the army. Owing to his total want of learning, he wisely resigned the civil administration to the quaestor Proclus. In 519 he entered into an arrangement with the pope; in 523 resigned to Theodoric, king of Italy, the right of appointing 'consuls' in Rome; and in the same year became involved in a war with the Persians. He was succeeded by his nephew Justinian.—JUSTIN II. succeeded his uncle, Justinian I., in 565, and married and was ruled by Sophia, the unscrupulous niece of the Empress Theodora. He yielded part of Italy to the Lombards, was unsuccessful against the Persians and Avars, and had for four years been insane when he died 26th Sept. 578.

Justinian I. Flavius Anicius Justinianus, nephew of Justin I., was born in 482 or 483 A.D. at Tauresium in Illyria, the son of a Slavonic peasant, and was originally called Sabbatius. Through his uncle he was educated at Constantinople, in 521 was named consul, and in 527 was proclaimed by Justin his colleague in the empire. Justin died the same year, and Justinian, proclaimed sole emperor, was crowned along with his wife Theodora, once an actress. His reign is the most brilliant in the history of the late empire. He had the good fortune or the skill to select the ablest generals; and under Narses (q.v.) and Belisarius (q.v.) his reign may be said to have restored the Roman empire to its ancient limits, and to have reunited the East and West. His first war—that with Persia—ended in a favourable treaty. But the conflict of the Blue and Green factions in 532 was an outburst of political discontent, which went so far as to elect a rival emperor. Justinian had thought of flight, when Narses, Belisarius, and Theodora repressed the tumults relentlessly; 35,000 victims fell in a single day. By the arms of Belisarius the Vandal kingdom of Africa was reannexed to the empire; and Belisarius and Narses restored the imperial authority in Rome, Northern Italy, and Spain. Justinian constructed or renewed a vast line of fortifications along the eastern and south-eastern frontier of his empire, which, with his great public buildings, involved a burdensome expenditure. It is as legislator that Justinian gained his most enduring renown. He set himself to collect and codify the principal imperial constitutions or statutes in force at his accession. The Codez, by which all previous imperial enactments were repealed, was published in 529. The writings of the jurists or commentators were next harmonised, and published under the title Digesta or Pandectæ in 533. The direction of this work was entrusted to Tribonian, with a committee of professors and advocates, who also prepared a systematic and elementary treatise on the law—the Institutiones (533), based on the Institutiones of Gaius. A new edition of the Codez was issued in 534. During the subsequent years of his reign Justinian promulgated from time to time several new laws or constitutions, known as Novellæ. The Institutes, Digest, Code, and Novels together make up what is known as the Corpus Juris Civilis. An able ruler, and in the main an upright man, Justinian died 14th November 565. See the Lives by Isambert (1856) and G. Body (6th ed. 1889); Newman, Doctrine of Justinian (4th ed. 1885); Roby, Introduction to the Digest (1884); and Muirhead, Roman Law (1886).

Justi'nus, MARCUS JUNIANUS, a Roman historian who in the 3d or 4th century A.D. wrote a history of the world 'down to the Roman conquest of the East, based on a lost work of the Augustan author, Trogius Pompeius. The best edition is by Rühl (Leip. 1886).

Juvenal. Decimus Junius Juvenalis, born about 55 A.D. at Aquinum in the Volscian country, received the usual rhetorical education, and served as tribune in the army, fulfilled some local functions at Aquinum, was in Britain, and returned home in safety. That he was in Upper Egypt is certain, but that he was banished thither by Hadrian is merely a more plausible conjecture than that he died an octogenarian under Antoninus Pius. His interest for posterity depends altogether on his sixteen satires, still extant, which occupy the very first rank in satirical literature, and are of priceless value as pictures of the Roman life of the empire. As Horace is the satirist of Ridicule, so Juvenal is the satirist of Indignation, not a man of the world so much as a reformer. Dryden's versions of five of Juvenal's satires are amongst the best things he ever did. Johnson imitated two of the most famous in his London and Vanity of Human Wishes; and the version of the whole of them by Gifford is full of power and character. The best editions of Juvenal are those of Jahn (2d ed. by Bücheler, 1886), Weidner (1889), Mayor (1878-86), and Friedländer (1896). Other annotated editions are those of Maclean, Lewis (with a literal prose translation), and Pearson and Strong.

Juxon, WILLIAM, born at Chichester in 1582, from Merchant Taylors' School passed to St John's College, Oxford, succeeded Laud as its president in 1621, and became a prebendary of Chichester and dean of Worcester (1627), Bishop of London (1633), and Lord High Treasurer (1635). In Charles's vacillation about the fate of Strafford, Juxon advised him to refuse his assent to the bill. He ministered to the king in his last moments, and it was into his hands that Charles delivered his George with the word 'Remember.' During the Commonwealth Juxon amused himself with his hounds at Little Compton, his Gloucestershire seat, and after the Restoration was appointed Archbishop of Canterbury. He died 4th June 1663. See Hook's Archbishops and Life by the Rev. W. H. Marsh (1869).

KALIDĀSA, India's greatest dramatist, flourished about 450 A.D., and is best known through his drama Sakuntala, first translated by Sir William Jones in 1789. A recent translation is that by Sir Monier Williams (5th ed. 1887).

Kal'noky, COUNT GUSTAV SIEGMUND, Austrian statesman, born at Lettowitz in Moravia, 29th December 1832, entered the diplomatic service in 1850. Attached to the Austrian embassy in London 1860-70, he was sent an ambassador to Copenhagen in 1870, to St Petersburg in 1880, and in 1881 became Minister of Foreign Affairs, and practically prime-minister. He resigned in 1895, and died at Brünn, 13th Feb. 1898.

Kames, HENRY HOME, LORD (1696-1782), Scottish philosopher, born at Kames in Berwickshire, was called to the bar in 1723, and raised to the bench as Lord Kames in 1752. Besides books on Scots law he published Essays on Morality (1751), An Introduction to the Art of Thinking (1761), Elements of Criticism (his best-known work, 1762), and Sketches of the History of Man (1774).

Kämpfer, ENGELBERT (1651-1716), a German, after visiting India, Java, and Siam, spent two years in Japan (1692-94). His History of Japan and Siam appeared in English in 1727 and in 1906.

Kanaris, CONSTANTINE (1790-1877), a Greek merchant-captain, born in the Isle of Ipsara, who blew up the Turkish admiral's ship in the Strait of Chios (1822), repeated a like feat in the harbour of Tenedos, and in 1824 burnt a Turkish frigate and some transport-ships. He was appointed to important commands, was made senator in 1847, and was repeatedly at the head of ministries. He died at Athens. [Ka-nah'reess.]

Kane, ELISHA KENT, Arctic explorer, born in Philadelphia, 3d February 1820, and entering the U.S. navy as surgeon, visited China, the East Indies, Arabia, Egypt, Europe, the west coast of Africa, and Mexico. In 1850 he sailed as surgeon and naturalist with the first Grinnell expedition.

His account of it appeared in 1854. In 1853 he again set out, this time as commander of an expedition; the results of it are fully detailed in his Second Grinnell Expedition (1856). He died at Havana, 16th February 1857. See Life by Elder (1858), and the briefer one by Jones (1890).

Kane, SIR ROBERT, chemist, born in Dublin, 24th September 1809, studied medicine, and in 1831 became a professor of Chemistry there, next year starting the Dublin Journal of Medical Science. In 1846 he originated the Museum of Industry in Ireland, was appointed its first director, and was knighted. He was president of Queen's College, Cork (1845-73), and in 1877 was elected president of the Royal Irish Academy. He died 16th February 1890. His chief books are Elements of Chemistry (1842) and Industrial Resources of Ireland (1844).

Kant, IMMANUEL, probably the greatest of modern philosophers, was born April 22, 1724, at Königsberg, where, February 12, 1804, he died. The son of a saddler or strap-maker of Scottish origin, he received a thorough education at his native university, and then for nine years was a family tutor. Graduating doctor of philosophy in 1755, he qualified as a privat-docent at Königsberg University, and became an ordinary professor in 1770. For nearly fifty years Kant was a teacher of philosophy, but only during the last twenty years of his life he was famous. Thoughts on the True Estimate of Living Forces (1747) was his earliest publication. In the Theory of the Heavens (1755) he was the first to suggest the nebular hypothesis. The Dissertatio de Mundi Sensibilis atque Intelligibilis Forma et Principiis (1770) is the first of his critical endeavours, and is the prelude to his great work, the Critique of Pure Reason (1781). What led to the whole work of Kant was the endeavour to find in causality that apodeictic necessity which Hume challenged. Change, said Hume, can only be known by experience; we know that it is, but not that it must be; the necessity we attribute to it is one of custom only. On the contrary, says Kant, we really do attribute to any appearance of change a perfect necessity, not less apodeictic than we attribute to any proposition of mathematics; every effect, every change, must have a cause. A mathematical truth depends just on the fact of perception; but inasmuch as a mathematical truth is an apodeictic truth, the perception on which it depends cannot be a perception of experience. Such perception cannot be a posteriori; it must be a perception absolutely independent of experience; a perception special, proper, and peculiar; a perception a priori! But how can that be? Why, only by space, which is the source and the seat of mathematics, being itself a priori. And if space be a priori, so will time be. But though time and space may be a priori, change, a mere experience of special sense, cannot lie there. Could we not add from the intellect an inferential a priori form, which, in combination with the a priori perceptive form, might give birth to an a priori schema supplying necessity to causality? Hence the suggestion of logic gave to Kant his whole tree of Categories as syntheses in correspondence with the analyses of the functions of Judgment—his twelve categories being unity, multitude, allness; reality, negation, limitation; substance, causality, reciprocity; possibility, actuality, necessity. In like manner he arrives at the three Ideas, the objects of psychology, cosmology, and theology, or the soul, the world, and God. These, however, are but ideas. It is for the Critique of Practical Reason (1788) now to come in and extend the conviction of existence to these transcendental objects—soul, world, God; and what supplies authority and fulcrum to this critique in this is the fact of the practical ego possessing a categorical imperative in determination of its own will. Kant had now his Categories in the a priori of the understanding, and his Ideas in the a priori of the reason; but what of aesthetic? And so it was that Kant was led to his third great critique, the subjects of which were, the products of Art, Beauty, Sublimity, Design. Among his remaining works are Anthropologie, Logik, Streit der Facultäten, Rechtslehre, Tugendlehre, Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft, Prolegomena, and Metaphysische Anfangsgründe der Naturwissenschaft. It is impossible to overrate the enormous impulse which Kant has given to philosophy; the subsequent history of philosophy is largely either a development from his suggestions, or criticism and refutation of his method and its results. Kant's whole works have been edited by Rosenkranz and Schubert (1838-42), Hartenstein (1838-39; new ed. 1867-69), and V. Kirchmann (1868-73). Of translations of the Critique of Pure Reason into English there are those of Meiklejohn and Max Müller, and the text-book to Kant of Hutchison Stirling. Abbott and Bax also have translated, the one the Ethics and the other the Prolegomena. Works on Kant are innumerable, especially in Germany; in English there are Hodgson, Laurie, Montgomery, Bolton, Ingleby, Adamson, Seth, Hastie, Bowen, Morris, Porter, Caird, Watson, Mahaffy, Maguire, Monck, Green, Wallace, Mansel, Lewes, Nakashima, and A. J. Balfour.

Karamsin, NICHOLAS MICHAILOVITCH (1765-1826), author of a great History of Russia (1816-29), only brought down to 1613.

Karr, ALPHONSE, French novelist, was born at Paris, November 24, 1808. His Sous les Tilleuls (1832) by its originality and wit found its author an audience for a long series of novels, of which Geneviève (1838) only need be mentioned. In 1839 he became editor of Figaro, and started the issue of the bitterly satirical Les Guêpes. His Voyage autour de mon Jardin (1845) is one of his best-known books. From 1855 he lived at Nice, and there died September 30, 1890. See his reminiscences, Livre de Bord (4 vols. 1879-80).—His daughter, THÉRÈSE KARR (1835-87), published tales and historical books.

Kate, JAN JACOB L. TEN (1819-89), Dutch poet, was born at the Hague, and died at Amsterdam.

Kater, HENRY (1777-1835), physicist, born at Bristol, entered the army in 1799, went out to India, and was engaged in the great trigonometrical survey. He returned home in 1808, and laboured six years in the Military College, Sandhurst. His papers on the pendulum, compass, &c., appeared in the Philosophical Transactions.

Katharine. See CATHARINE.

Katkov, MICHAEL NIKIFOROVITCH (1818-87), professor of Philosophy at Moscow, and after 1861 editor of the Moscow Gazette, was at first an advocate of reform, but was converted by the Polish rising of 1863 into a Panslavist leader and a supporter of reactionary government.

Katterfelto, GUSTAVUS, a Prussian conjurer, who flourished in England from 1782 till his death at Bedale, Yorkshire, 25th November 1799.

Kauffmann, ANGELICA, painter, born 30th October 1741 at Chur in the Grisons, at eleven was painting portraits of notabilities in Italy, and in 1766 was persuaded to go to London. There she soon became famous as a painter of classic and mythological pictures, and as a portrait-painter, and was nominated one of the first batch of Royal Academicians (1769). But her life was for a while embittered by a marriage (c. 1767) with an adventurer, the 'Count de Horn.' In 1781 she married the Venetian painter, Antonio Zucchi (1729-95), and returned to Italy; she died in Rome, 9th November 1807. Her rather pretty paintings are well known from engravings by Bartolozzi. She was also an accomplished singer. Her beauty and talents were sung by Goldsmith, Klopstock, and Gessner, and her story furnished the theme for Lady Ritchie's Miss Angel (1875). See Lives by Schran (Brünn, 1890) and Gerard (1892). [Kovff'man.]

Kaufmann, CONSTANTINE VON (1818-82), Russian general, distinguished himself at Kars (1855), in 1867 became governor of Turkestan, in 1868 occupied Samarcand, and in 1873 conducted the campaign against Khiva. He died at Tashkend. See Boulger's Central Asian Portraits (1880).

Kaulbach, WILHELM VON, painter, born at Arolsen, 15th October 1805, from 1849 was director of the Munich Academy of Painting. His realistic tendencies came out in his illustrations of Schiller, Goethe's Faust, and Reineke Fuchs, and in his 'Mad-house.' In 1834 he completed his grandiose 'Battle of the Huns;' in 1846 the 'Destruction of Jerusalem by Titus.' For several years (from 1847) he was painting the vestibule of the new museum at Berlin with a cycle illustrating the progress of civilisation. His last gigantic painting is the 'Sea-fight of Salamis' at Munich. He died 7th April 1874. See Mrs Howitt-Watt's Art-Student in Munich (2d ed. 1879), and Life by H. Müller (Berl. 1892).—His son, HERMANN (1846-1909), painted historical pictures of the genre class, such as 'Mozart's Last Days.'—A nephew, FRIEDRICH (born 1822), and his son, FRIEDRICH AUGUST (born 2d June 1850), also became painters of merit. [Kowl'-bakh.]

Kaunitz, WENZEL ANTON, PRINCE VON (1711-94), Austrian statesman, distinguished himself in 1748 at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, and as Austrian ambassador at the French court in 1750-52 converted old enmity into friendship. In 1753 he was appointed chancellor, and for almost forty years had the principal direction of Austrian politics. He took an active part in the ecclesiastical reforms of Joseph II., and was a liberal patron of arts and sciences. See Life by Beer (1872).

Kavanagh, ARTHUR MACMORROUGH (1831-89), of Borris House, co. Carlow, an Irish Conservative M.P. from 1866 to 1880, who, though all but armless and legless, rode, shot, yachted, painted, and in 1849-51 travelled overland to India. See Life by Mrs Steele (1891). [Kav'a-nah.]

Kavanagh, JULIA, novelist, born at Thurles, co. Tipperary, in 1824, daughter of Morgan Kavanagh, author of various philological works, spent great part of her life in Normandy and Paris, and died at Nice, October 28, 1877. Among her works were Madeleine, a Tale of Auvergne (1848), Nathalie (1850), Daisy Burns (1853), Adèle (1857), Queen Mab (1863), Beatrice (1865), Silvia (1870), John Dorrien (1875), and The Pearl Fountain (1876). The scenes of almost all her stories are laid in France. Other books are A Summer and Winter in the Two Sicilies (1858), French Women of Letters (1862), and English Women of Letters (1863). She was a devout Catholic.

Kay, JOHN (1742-1826), caricaturist, born near

Dalkeith, was a prosperous Edinburgh barber until (1785) he opened a print-shop for miniatures and sketches of local celebrities etched by himself. His portraits have little merit beyond humour and catching likenesses. His Original Portraits, with Biographical Sketches (2 vols. 1838; new ed. 1877), is an invaluable record of Edinburgh social life.

Kay, JOHN. See ARKWRIGHT.

Kay - Shuttleworth, SIR JAMES PHILLIPS, D.C.L. (1804-77), educationist, born at Rochdale, studied and practised medicine, in 1835 became an assistant poor-law commissioner, and then as the secretary to the Committee of the Privy-Council on Education was instrumental in establishing a system of government school inspection. On his retirement in 1849 he was created a baronet. In 1842 he married the heiress of the Shuttleworths of Gawthorpe, and assumed her surname.

Kaye, SIR JOHN WILLIAM (1814-76), historian, served from 1832 in the Bengal Artillery, but in 1841 devoted himself to literature. A secretary from 1855 in the India Office, he was knighted in 1871. Kaye's works include The War in Afghanistan (1851-53), History of the Administration of the East India Company (1853), Life of Sir John Malcolm (1856), Christianity in India (1859), History of the Sepoy War in 1857-58 (1864-76, completed by Malleson in 1890), and Essays of an Optimist (1870).

Kean, EDMUND, was born in London, 4th November 1787, the son of Nance Carey, hawker and strolling actress. A stage Cupid and a cabin-boy to Madeira, he himself about sixteen turned a 'stroller,' and after ten years in the provinces made his first appearance at Drury Lane as Shylock (26th January 1814), and at once took rank as the first actor of the day. A period of wonderful success followed; but by his irregularities he gradually forfeited public approval, his reputation being finally ruined by the crim.-con. cause célèbre of Cox v. Kean (1825). He was cordially received in 1827 after a twelve-month's visit to America; but both mind and body gave way, and breaking down hopelessly in March 1833, he died at Richmond on 15th May. See Lives by Barry Cornwall (1835), F. W. Hawkins (1869), and J. F. Molloy (1888).—His son, CHARLES JOHN, born at Waterford, 18th January 1809 or 1811, and educated at Eton, to support his mother and himself became an actor. He appeared at Drury Lane in 1827 as Young Norval, with ill success, but worked assiduously in the provinces until he attained a fair position. In 1850 he became joint-lessee of the Princess's Theatre, and produced a long series of gorgeous 'revivals.' In 1859 he virtually retired, though he played in America and the provinces to within seven months of his death, 22d January 1868. In 1842 he married the actress, ELEEN TREE (1805-80). See Life by J. W. Cole (1860).

Keane, AUGUSTUS HENRY (1833-1912), ethnologist, born at Cork, taught languages at Hameln and Southampton, and was Hindustani professor at University College, London, 1882-85.

Keary, ANNIE (1825-79), novelist, was born at Bilton rectory, Yorkshire, and died at Eastbourne. Her Castle Daly (1875) was hailed as an Irish novel of unusual excellence. See Memoir (1882).

Keate, JOHN (1773-1852), head-master of Eton 1809-34, was born at Wells, and died at his Hampshire rectory of Hartley Westpall. A diminutive man, he once flogged eighty boys together.

Keats, JOHN, was born 31st October 1795, in London, the son of a livery-stable keeper, and went to school at Enfield. In 1810 he was apprenticed to an Edmouton surgeon, during 1814-17 continued his studies at the London hospitals, then withdrew from medicine to devote himself wholly to poetry. He had already the acquaintance of Charles Cowden Clarke (son of his Enfield schoolmaster), of Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Haydon, Shelley, and Godwin. His first volume, Poems (1817), is coloured throughout by the sentimental tone of the later eighteenth century, and contains many mannerisms borrowed from Hunt. Endymion (1818) is Elizabethan-romantic; and though it still abounds in over-sensuous pictures and fancifully coined words, it breathes the 'morning freshness' of Chaucer, and has many passages of splendid vividness and wonderful felicity. Yet, warmly though it was welcomed by his friends, Endymion was no mere failure; it was savagely assailed in Blackwood and the Quarterly. Meanwhile his small patrimony was rapidly shrinking; his health was broken by the exposure of a walking-tour in Scotland and by assiduously nursing a dying brother; and from the winter of 1818-19 a passionate love for Miss Fanny Brawne shook him terribly. His last volume, Lamia, Isabella, and other Poems, appeared in 1820, and contains two of his highest achievements, The Eve of St Agnes and Hyperion. Lamia, his last and strongest poem, according to Palgrave, is too Asiatic: Hyperion, with pictures of unsurpassed magnificence, fails in epic unity and interest. Praise would be idle for the dignity and tenderness of the Odes, the pictorial splendour, the affluence of charm diffused throughout this little volume. Long threatened with consumption, Keats left England for Italy in September 1820, accompanied by his friend Severn (q.v.), who nursed him devotedly till his death at Rome, 23d February 1821. He was buried in the old Protestant cemetery near the pyramid of Caius Cestius. Shelley's Adonais attests the friendship of those two great poets. Professor Palgrave reprinted literally and correctly Keats's three volumes in 1884, with notes and the addition of a few first-rate pieces from the great mass of incomplete and inferior work, withheld by Keats himself. Buxton Forman published a Complete Edition in 4 vols. in 1883. See Lives by Lord Houghton (1848) and Sidney Colvin (1886), Keats's Letters to Fanny Brawne, published, unwisely many think, by Buxton Forman in 1878; the Letters to his Family and Friends, edited by Sidney Colvin in 1891; and the introduction by Robert Bridges to G. T. Drury's edition of the Poems (1896).

Keble, JOHN, was born at Fairford, Gloucestershire, near his father's living of Coln St Aldwins, April 25, 1792. At fifteen he was elected a scholar at Corpus, Oxford; in 1810 took a double first; in 1811 was elected a fellow of Oriel; and in 1812 won the Latin and English prize essays. In 1815 he was ordained deacon, beginning active work as curate of East Leach, while still continuing to reside in Oxford, college tutor 1818-23. In 1827 he published The Christian Year. His theory of poetry, explained in the British Critic in 1838, was worked out at length in his Latin lectures delivered as Oxford Professor of Poetry (1831-41). Meanwhile Keble had gathered round him a small band of pupils of whom the most striking was Hurrell Froude, and in this circle originated the Tractarian movement. In his sermon on National Apostasy (1833) Keble gave the signal for action, and for the next eight years was engaged with Newman, Pusey, I. Williams, and others in the issue of Tracts for the Times, brought to an end by Tract No. 90 in 1841. Keble had in 1835 married, and had removed to the Hampshire living of Hursley, where he remained until his death. With Dr Pusey he was the steady influence which supported the party under the shock caused by Newman's secession to Rome. He died at Bourne-mouth, March 29, 1866. Other works are a Life of Bishop Wilson, an edition of Hooker, the Lyra Innocentium (1846), a poetical translation of the Psalter, Letters of Spiritual Counsel, twelve volumes of parochial sermons, Studia Sacra, &c. Keble College, Oxford, was erected as a memorial of him (1870). See Memoir by Sir J. Coleridge (1869), J. C. Shairp's Essay and Studies (1872), a collection of memorials by J. F. Moor (1866), and a short Life by Locke (1893).

Keeley, ROBERT (1793-1869), comedian, was born and died in London. He married Miss Mary Goward (1806-99), who, born at Ipswich, made her debut at the Lyceum in 1825. Their daughters, both actresses, Mary Lucy (1831-70) and Louise (1835-77), married Albert Smith and Montagu Williams, Q.C. See W. Goodman's The Keeleys on the Stage and at Home (1895).

Keene, CHARLES SAMUEL, an imitable artist in black and white, born of Ipswich ancestry at Hornsey, 10th August 1823, was educated at Bayswater and Ipswich, and, having tried both law and architecture, was apprenticed to a wood-engraver. He worked for Punch from 1851 to within five months of his death at Hammer-smith, on 4th Jan. 1891. See Life by Layard (1893) and work by Pennell and Chesson (1897).

Keightley, THOMAS (1789-1872), writer, born in Dublin, in 1824 settled in London to a life of letters. His histories of Rome, Greece, and England long held their place as school manuals; of less moment were his notes to Virgil and Horace. But his Fairy Mythology (1850) largely retains its value, as also to a less extent do his Life and annotated edition of Milton (1855-59).

Keim, THEODOR (1825-78), German theologian, was born at Stuttgart, studied under Baur at Tübingen, and became professor of Theology at Zurich (1860), at Giessen (1873). He published Celsus' wahres Wort (1873), Aus dem Urchristentum (1878), &c.; but his great work was the Geschichte Jesu von Nazara (1867-72; Eng. trans. 1873-83), unequalled in learning, acuteness, and insight, in which, though he eliminates the miraculous, he is in the highest degree reverent in tone.

Keiser, REINHARD (1674-1739), operatic composer, lived and died at Hamburg.

Keith, ALEXANDER, D.D. (1791-1880), writer on prophecy, was born at Keithhall manse, Inverurie, and himself became an Established minister, but joined the Free Church. He visited Palestine in 1839 and 1844, and lived latterly and died at Buxton.—One of his three sons was the ovariotomist, THOMAS KEITH, M.D. (1827-95).

Keith, GEORGE KEITH ELPHINSTONE, VISCOUNT (1746-1823), son of the tenth Lord Elphinstone, was born at Elphinstone Tower, Stirling, entered the navy in 1761, saw service in most parts of the world, and fought in the American and French wars. He commanded the expedition (1795-97) which took Cape Town, and the fleet which landed Abercromby's army in Aboukir Bay (1801). He was made Baron Keith in 1797, and a viscount in 1814. See Life by Allardyce (1882).

Keith, JAMES, Marshal Keith, was born at the castle of Inverigie near Peterhead, 11th June 1696. He came of a family represented now by the Earl of Kintore, which from the 12th century had held the hereditary office of Great Marischal of Scotland. Sir William Keith was created Earl Marischal in 1458; and George, fifth Earl (c. 1553-1623), in 1593 founded the Marischal College in Aberdeen. William, ninth Earl (d. 1712), was the father of Marshal Keith and of his elder brother, George, tenth Earl Marischal (1693-1773). James was destined for the law, but in 1715 he engaged with his brother in the Jacobite rising, and in 1719 in Alberoni's expedition to the West Highlands, which ended in the 'battle' of Glenshiel. Both times the brothers escaped to the Continent; and James held for nine years a Spanish colonelcy, and took part in the siege of Gibraltar (1726-27). But his creed, the Episcopal, was against him; and in 1728 entered the Russian service as a major-general. He distinguished himself in the wars with Turkey and Sweden, particularly at the siege of Otchakoff (1737) and the reduction of the Aland Islands (1743). He next visited Paris and London, where he made his peace with the Hanoverian government. In 1747, finding the Russian service disagreeable, he exchanged it for that of Prussia, and Frederick the Great gave him at once the rank of field-marshal. From this time his name is associated with that of Frederick, who relied as much on Keith's military genius as he did on the diplomatic ability of his brother, the Earl Marischal. Keith's talents became still more conspicuous upon the breaking out of the Seven Years' War (1756). He shared Frederick's doubtful fortunes before Prague, was present at the victories of Lobositz and Rossbach, and conducted the masterly retreat from Olmütz. On 14th October 1758 at Hochkirch he was shot dead while for the third time charging the enemy. Keith died poor and unmarried, but he left children by his mistress, the Swedish captive, Eva Merthens, who survived him till 1811. See his own Memoir, 1714-34 (Spalding Club, 1843); Memoir of Marshal Keith (Peterhead, 1869); Carlyle's Frederick; and German Lives by Varnhagen von Ense (1844; new ed. 1888) and Lieut. von Paczynski-Tenczyn (1889).

Keith, ROBERT (1681-1757), from 1727 an Episcopal bishop, was born at Uras, Kincardineshire, and lived in Edinburgh and Leith. His History of the Scottish Reformation (1734) was republished by the Spottiswoode Soc. in 1844-45.

Keith, SIR ROBERT MURRAY (1730-95), soldier and diplomatist. See his Memoirs (2 vols. 1849).

Kekulé von Stradonitz, FRIEDRICH AUGUST, chemist, born 7th September 1829, at Darmstadt, became professor at Ghent and at Bonn (1865). His most important researches were on the chemistry of carbon and other organic substances. He published a handbook of organic chemistry (1861-67). He died 13th July 1896.

Keller, GOTTFRIED (1819-90), poet and novelist, born near Zurich, studied landscape-painting at Vienna 1840-42, but took to literature. From 1861 to 1876 he was state secretary of his native canton. His chief works are Der grüne Heinrich (1854), Die Leute von Seldweyla (1856), Sieben Legenden (1872), Züricher Novellen (1878), and Martin Salander (1886). See Lives by Brahm (1883), Brenning (1892), and Frey (2d ed. 1893).

Kellermann, FRANÇOIS CHRISTOPHE, Duke of Valmy, born 28th May 1735 at Wolfsbuchweiler in Alsace, entered the French army at seventeen, and was major-general at the Revolution. In 1792 he repelled the Duke of Brunswick, and delivered France by the famous 'cannonade of Valmy.' Yet on allegation of treason he was imprisoned by Robespierre. He afterwards served in Italy, and under the Empire was made a marshal and duke. In 1809 and 1812 he commanded the reserves on the Rhine. At the Restoration he attached himself to the Bourbons. He died 12th Sept. 1820.—His son, FRANÇOIS ÉTIENNE (1770-1835), by a charge turned Marengo into a victory.

Kellgren, JOHAN HENRIK (1751-95), a Swedish poet, best in satiric and lyric poems.

Kellie, LAWRENCE, composer and singer, was born in London, 3d April 1862.

Kelly, of KELLEY, EDWARD. See DEE, JOHN.

Kelly, SIR FITZROY (1796-1880), a lawyer and Conservative M.P., who became Solicitor-general in 1845 and 1852, Attorney-general in 1858, and Chief Baron of the Exchequer in 1866.

Kelly, FRANCES MARIA (1790-1882), actress and singer, born at Brighton, died at Feltham.

Kelly, NED (1854-80), horse-thief and from 1878 bushranger in Victoria and New South Wales, was hanged at Melbourne.

Kelvin, WILLIAM THOMSON, LORD, physicist, was born in Belfast, 26th June 1824, and at eleven entered Glasgow University, where his father had become mathematical professor. At Cambridge he highly distinguished himself as an original thinker even in his undergraduate days. He was second wrangler and first Smith's prizeman of 1845, and was elected a fellow in St Peter's College. In 1846 he became professor of Natural Philosophy in the University of Glasgow. In an early paper (1842) he solved important problems in electrostatics. To his refined researches in the transmission of electric currents in submarine cables it was largely owing that the Atlantic cable was successful—for which in 1866 he was knighted. In 1892 he was created a peer with the title of Lord Kelvin. His electrometers of various design—absolute, portable, quadrant, &c.—embody the perfection of mechanical and geometrical adjustment. He constructed ampere-meters, volt-meters, and watt-meters, suitable alike for the electrical workshop and laboratory. His sounding apparatus and compass have been adopted by the Admiralty and the principal mercantile lines. In pure science Lord Kelvin had done incomparable work. Specially may be mentioned his thermo-dynamic researches from 1843 onwards, including the doctrine of the dissipation or degradation of energy; his magnetic and electric discoveries, including general theorems of great value and the beautiful method of electric images; and his work in hydrodynamics, more especially in wave-motion and in vortex-motion. Basing upon the phenomena of gyrostatic motion, he imagined a kinetic theory of inertia of high interest; and his dynamical theory of dispersion, and indeed all his views on the nature of the ether, are full of suggestiveness. In 1872 his electrostatic and magnetic papers were reprinted in collected form (2d ed. 1884); and his other papers have been similarly published under the title Mathematical and Physical Papers (6 vols. 1882-1911), besides Popular Lectures (3 vols. 1889-94), Molecular Tactics of a Crystal (1894), &c. He was joint-author with Professor Tait of A Treatise on Natural Philosophy (vol. 1. 1867; 2d ed. 1879). He was president of the British Association (1871), repeatedly president of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and (1890) president of the Royal Society of London. He was a member of the Institute of France and of the Privy Council (1902), O.M. and G.C.V.O.; and died 17th Dec. 1907. See the Life by Sylvanus Thompson (1910), and a book by Mrs King (1910).

Kemble, JOHN MITCHELL, Anglo-Saxon scholar, son of Charles Kemble, the actor, was born in London, 2d April 1807, from Bury St Edmunds school passed in 1826 to Trinity, Cambridge, and studied at Göttingen under Jakob Grimm. His edition of Beowulf (1833-37) and Codex Diplomaticus Evi Sazonici (1839-48) were valuable, but less important than his unfinished History of the Saxons in England (1849; new ed. by Birch, 1876). He lived much in Germany, and died in Dublin, 26th March 1857. He edited the British and Foreign Review (1835-44), and in 1840 succeeded his father as Examiner of Plays.

Kemble, JOHN PHILIP, eldest son of Roger Kemble (1721-1802), a travelling manager, was born at Prescot, 1st February 1757. His father intended him for the Catholic priesthood, and sent him to a seminary at Sedgley Park, Staffordshire, and to the English college at Douay. But the stage mania was on him, and he became an actor. His first appearance was at Wolverhampton, 8th January 1776; he joined the York circuit under Tate Wilkinson; and he played in Ireland. The success of his sister, Mrs Siddons, gave him his opportunity, and on 30th September 1783 he played Hamlet at Drury Lane, and aroused the keenest interest. He continued to play leading tragic characters at Drury Lane for many years, and in 1788 became Sheridan's manager. In 1802 he purchased a share in Covent Garden Theatre, became manager, and made his first appearance there in 1803 as Hamlet. In 1808 the theatre was burned, and on the opening of the new building (1809) the notorious O. P. (i.e. 'Old Price') Riots broke out. Kemble retired in 1817. He afterwards settled at Lausanne, where he died, 26th February 1823. Kemble probably has had no superior as a tragedian. He was magnificently handsome; stately, if rather stiff, in bearing; and a man of remarkable intellectual power.—His brother, STEPHEN, born at Kington, Herefordshire, 3d May 1758, was chiefly remarkable for his enormous bulk, which enabled him to play Falstaff without stuffing. He was in 1792-1800 manager of the Edinburgh theatre, where he was in continual hot water through law-suits and other troubles. He died near Durham, 5th June 1822.—Another brother, CHARLES, born at Brecon, 27th November 1775, in 1792 made his first appearance at Sheffield, and in 1794 played Malcolm to John Kemble's Macbeth. He retired from the stage in 1840, when he was appointed Examiner of Plays. He died 12th November 1854. As an actor he chiefly excelled in characters of the second rank, and in comedy he specially distinguished himself.—His daughter, FRANCES ANNE, 'Fanny Kemble' (1809-93), made her début at Covent Garden on 5th October 1829, when her 'Juliet' created a great sensation. For three years she played leading business in London, then in 1832 went with her father to America, where in 1834 she married Pierce Butler, a Southern planter. They were divorced in 1848; and resuming her maiden name, she gave Shakespearean readings for twenty years. She published dramas, poems, eight volumes of autobiography, &c.—Her sister, ADELAIDE (1816-79), was distinguished as an operatic singer, but retired in 1842 on her marriage with F. Sartoris. She was author of A Week in a French Country House (1867), Medusa and Other Tales (1868), and Past Hours (1880). See Boaden's Life of John Kemble (1825), and Percy Fitzgerald's The Kembles (1871).

Kemp, GEORGE MEIKLE, architect, born at Hillriggs, near Biggar, 26th May 1795, up to fourteen assisted his father, a shepherd. Becoming a carpenter and millwright, he sought work in England and France, settling where he could study Gothic architecture. He returned to Scotland in 1826, and became a draughtsman in Edinburgh. In 1838 his second design for the Scott Monument at Edinburgh was accepted, but before its completion he was drowned in the canal at Edinburgh, on the night of 6th March 1844. See Life by T. Bonnar (1892).

Kemp, JOHN (c. 1380-1454), born at Olantigh near Ashford, Kent, became a fellow of Merton College, Oxford, Bishop of Rochester (1419), and of Chichester and London (1421), chancellor and Archbishop of York (1426), a cardinal (1439), and Archbishop of Canterbury (1452). See Hook's Lives of the Archbishops, vol. v.

Kemp, WILLIAM, a comedian who in 1599 danced from London to Norwich. See his Nine Dates Wonder (ed. by Dyce, Camden Soc.).

Kempenfelt, RICHARD (1718-82), an admiral of Swedish ancestry, who, with 800 others, went down in the foundering of his flagship the Royal George at Spithead, 29th August 1782.

Kempis, THOMAS λ (1379-1471), was so called from his birthplace, Kempen. He was educated at Deventer, in 1400 entered the Augustinian convent of Agnetenberg near Zwolle, took priest's orders in 1413, was chosen sub-prior in 1429, and died as superior. His writings consist of sermons, ascetical treatises, pious biographies, letters, and hymns. The only one which deserves special notice is the treatise On the Following (or Imitation) of Christ. In its pages, says Dean Milman, 'is gathered and concentrated all that is elevating, passionate, profoundly pious in all the older mystics. No book, after the Holy Scripture, has been so often reprinted, none translated into so many languages, ancient and modern.' The earliest English translation, by Atkinson, canon of Windsor, was printed in 1503. Strange to say, the authorship was also ascribed to the celebrated Jean Gerson (q.v.), and, from the 17th century, to a so-called abbot of Vercelli, also called Gersen, whose very existence has not been proved. But the learned now generally assign it to Kempis. The theology of the Imitation is almost purely ascetical, and (excepting the 4th book, which is based on the doctrine of the real presence) the work has been used by Christians of all denominations. The most ancient perfect MS., written by Thomas's own hand, is in the Bourgogne Library at Brussels, and bears date 1441, but we know that this was not the earliest MS.; probably the work was completed between 1415 and 1424. An exact fac-simile was published at London in 1879. A new English translation, 'in Rhythmic Sentences,' was published in 1889, with a preface by Canon Liddon. See books on the Imitatio and Kempis by Kettlewell (1877 and 1882), Becker (1883), Hirsche (1873-94), Leonard A. Wheatley (1891), and A. L. Humphreys (1897); and Wolfgruber's Gioanni Gersen (1880).

Ken, THOMAS, was born at Little Berkhamstead, Herts, in July 1637, and educated at Winchester and Hart Hall and New College, Oxford, where he was elected a fellow in 1667. He held in succession the livings of Little Easton in Essex, Brixton in the Isle of Wight, and East Woodhay in Hants; in 1666 was elected a fellow of Winchester, and here prepared his Manual of Prayers for Scholars of Winchester College (1674), and wrote his famous morning, evening, and midnight hymns, the first two of which, 'Awake, my soul,' and 'Glory to Thee, my God, this night,' are perhaps the best-known hymns in the language. In 1679 Ken was appointed by Charles II. chaplain to the Princess Mary, wife of William of Orange, but offended William, and returned home in 1680, when he became a royal chaplain. In 1683, on the king's visit to Winchester, Ken refused to give up his house for the accommodation of Nell Gwynne. In 1683 too he went to Tangiers as a chaplain, and in 1685 was consecrated Bishop of Bath and Wells. The chief event of his bishopric was his trial and acquittal among the 'Seven Bishops' in 1688, for refusing to read the Declaration of Indulgence. At the Revolution he found himself unable in conscience to take the oath to William, having already sworn allegiance to King James, and was deprived of his bishopric in 1691. He spent the remainder of his days in retirement at Lord Weymouth's seat of Longleat. He died at Longleat, 19th March 1711, and was buried at Frome. Bishop Ken was esteemed a great preacher in his day, but is now remembered for his hymns and for his saintly character. His Exposition on the Church Catechism (1685) is his most important work in prose. Hawkins published a selection from the works, with a Life, in 1713. The poetical works were collected in four volumes (1721); the prose works in one volume (1838). See Lives by Bowles (1831), Anderdon (1851-54), Plumpton (2 vols. 1888), and Clarke (1896).

Kendal, Mrs, the stage name of Margaret Brunton Grimston, née Robertson ('Madge Robertson'), who, born of actor ancestry at Great Grimsby, 15th March 1849, appeared at the Haymarket as 'Ophelia' on 29th July 1865, and in 1869 married Mr 'Kendal' (William Hunter Grimston). T. W. Robertson was her brother.

Kenealy, EDWARD VAUGHAN HYDE (1819-80), poet and advocate of the Tichborne claimant, was born at Cork, and called to the Irish bar in 1840, to the English in 1847. He got a month in 1850 for cruelty to a natural son, was disbenched in 1874, and sat for Stoke-upon-Trent (1875-80).

Kennan, GEORGE, born at Norwalk, Ohio, 16th February 1845, as the outcome of two journeys has published Tent Life in Siberia (1870) and Siberia and the Exile System (1891).

Kennedy, BENJAMIN HALL, was born at Summerhill near Birmingham in 1804, son of the Rev. Rann Kennedy (1772-1851), second master of King Edward's School, Birmingham. He had his education there, at Shrewsbury under Dr Butler, and St John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1827 as senior classic, senior Chancellor's medallist, and a senior optime. In 1828 he became fellow and classical lecturer of his college, in 1830 an assistant-master at Harrow, and in 1836 Dr Butler's successor at Shrewsbury. Here for thirty years he laboured with vigour and success, forming a series of brilliant scholars. Sabrinæ Corolla (1850; 4th ed. 1890) is an imperishable memorial of his brilliant scholarship and of the spirit he could inspire. In 1867 he became Greek professor at Cambridge and canon of Ely. He died at Torquay, April 6, 1889. Among his books were Palestra Latina (1850), Curriculum Stili Latini (1858), the Public School Latin Grammar (1871), and Occasional Sermons (1877).

Kennedy, GRACE (1782-1825), author of Father Clement, Anna Ross, &c., was born at Pinmore, Ayrshire, and lived and died in Edinburgh.

Kennedy, QUINTIN (1520-64), son of the second Earl of Cassillis, in 1547 became abbot of Crossraguel, and steadfastly opposed the Reformation, disputing both with Willcock and with Knox.

Kennedy, WALTER (c. 1460-1508), an Ayrshire poet of the Cassillis line, best known by the Flying between Dunbar and Kennedy.

Kenneth I., 'Macalpine,' seems to have succeeded his father Alpin as king of the remnant of the Dalriad Scots in 834, and to have repelled a Danish invasion and completely conquered the Picts in 846. He was connected by blood with the Pictish royal family. He now became king of a united Alban to the Firths of Clyde and Forth; and the Pictish language, usages, and name mysteriously vanish, superseded by those of the smaller people the Scots.

Kenney, JAMES (1780-1849), born in Ireland, from 1803 wrote farces, comedies, &c.—His son, CHARLES LAMB KENNEY (1821-81), was a librettist.

Kennicott, BENJAMIN, biblical scholar, born at Totnes, April 4, 1718, distinguished himself at Wadham College, Oxford, by his acquirements in Hebrew and theology. Elected a fellow of Exeter, in 1767 he became Radcliffe librarian, and in 1770 a canon of Christ Church. He died August 18, 1783. His great work was his edition of the Hebrew Old Testament (1776-80), for which 615 Hebrew MSS. and 16 MSS. of the Samaritan Pentateuch were collated.

Kent, CHARLES (1823-1902), poet, biographer, editor, &c., was born in London and educated at Prior Park (Bath) and Oscott.

Kent, EDWARD, DUKE OF, fourth son of George III., was born at Buckingham Palace, 2d November 1767. At Gibraltar, first (1790-91) as colonel, and then (1802) as governor, his martinet discipline caused continual mutinies. These culminated on Christmas Day in an encounter in which blood was shed, after which the Duke was recalled. In 1818 he married Victoria Mary Louisa (1786-1861), daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Saalfeld-Coburg, and widow of the Prince of Leiningen. For the sake of economy they lived at Leiningen, and came to England for the birth (24th May 1819) of their child the Princess Victoria. The dukedied eight months later—23d January 1820. Owing to the deaths of his three elder brothers, George IV., the Duke of York, and William IV., without issue, the crown came to the Princess Victoria.

Kent, JAMES (1763-1847), after serving in the New York legislature was professor of Law in Columbia College 1794-98, and then a justice of the supreme court of New York; in 1804 he became chief-justice, and in 1814-23 was state chancellor. Kent's Commentaries on American Law (1826-30) has not been superseded.

Kent, WILLIAM (1684-1748), painter, landscapergardener, and Palladian architect, was a native of Yorkshire, and died at Burlington House.

Kentigern, St, the apostle of Cumbria, was son of the Princess Thenew, who, being found to be with child, was first cast from Traprain Law, and next exposed on the Firth of Forth in a coracle. It carried her to Culross, where she bore a son (about 518). Mother and child were baptised by St Serf, who reared the boy in his monastery, where he was so beloved that his name Kentigern ('chief lord') was often exchanged for Mungo ('dear friend'). Arrived at manhood, he planted a monastery at Cathures (now Glasgow); and in 543 was consecrated Bishop of Cumbria. In 553 he was driven to seek refuge in Wales, where he visited St David, and where he founded another monastery and a bishopric, which still bears the name of his disciple, St Asaph. In 573 he was recalled by a new king, Rederech Hael; and about 584 was visited by Columba. He died 13th January 603, and was buried in Glasgow Cathedral. A fragment of a Life and the Vita Kentigerni by Joceline of Furness both belong to the 12th century. Bishop Forbes gives translations of them. Joceline's Life teems with miracles, some of them commemorated in the Glasgow city arms. 'St Enoch's' church commemorates his mother, St Thenev. See Bishop Forbes's Lives of SS. Ninian and Kentigern (1874), Skene's Celtic Scotland (vol. ii. 1877), and Beveridge's Culross and Tulliallan (1885).

Kenyon, JOHN (1784-1856), the wealthy friend of Coleridge, Lamb, Landor, Crabb Robinson, Ticknor, the Brownings, &c., was born in Jamaica, and died at Cowes. He published some poetry.

Kepler, or KEPLER, JOHANN, astronomer, was born at Weil der Stadt in Württemberg, 27th December 1571. He studied at Tübingen, in 1593 was appointed professor of Mathematics at Gratz, about 1596 commenced a correspondence with Tycho Brahe, and in 1600 went to Prague to aid him in his work. After Tycho's death (1601) Kepler was astronomer, often unpaid, to the Emperor Rudolf II.; in 1612, the year after his abdication, he became a mathematical teacher at Linz, and in 1628 astrologer to Wallenstein. He died at Ratisbon, 15th November 1630. Kepler, in his Mysterium (1596), proclaimed that five kinds of regular polyhedral bodies govern the five planetary orbits; and he at last announced (in his Harmonice Mundi, 1619), what has come to be known as Kepler's Third Law—that the 'square of a planet's periodic time is proportional to the cube of its mean distance from the sun.' He endeavoured to find a law for the movements of Mars, and in 1609 published what are called his First and Second Laws. These laws formed the groundwork of Newton's discoveries, and are the starting-point of modern astronomy. Besides, we owe to Kepler many discoveries in optics, general physics, and geometry. His collected works were published by Frisch (1858-71). See Brewster's Lives of Galileo, Tycho Brahe, and Kepler (1841); Reitlinger, Neumann, and Gruner, Johannes Kepler (1868); and other German works by Reuschle (1871), Donsky (1880), and Herz (1895).

In 1778 he encountered the French fleet off Ushant on 27th July; a sharp but indecisive action ensued; but owing to a disagreement between Keppel and Palliser, his second in command, the French were suffered to escape. Both admirals were tried by court-martial, but acquitted. In 1782 he was created Viscount Keppel, and became First Lord of the Admiralty. He died 3d October 1786. See Life by T. Keppel (1842).

Keppel, SIR HENRY (1809-1904), successively vice-admiral (1867), admiral (1869), and admiral of the fleet (1877), was a son of the fourth Earl of Albemarle. He saw service during the war against China in 1842, and in a campaign against pirates, and commanded the naval brigade before Sebastopol. In 1857 he took part in the destruction of the Chinese fleet. A G.C.B. (1871), he wrote books on his Expedition to Borneo (1846), and Visit to the Indian Archipelago (1853). See his A Sailor's Life under Four Sovereigns (3 vols. 1899).

Ker, or KERR, an Anglo-Norman family, found in Scotland in the end of the 12th century. Sir Andrew Ker of Cessford (d. 1526), whose younger brother, George, was ancestor of the Kers of Fandonside, had two sons—Sir Walter, whose grandson, Robert Ker, was created Earl of Roxburghe 1616, and Mark, commendator of Newbattle, whose son, Mark Kerr, was created Earl of Lothian 1606. The second Earl of Roxburghe was only a Ker by his mother. His grandson, fifth Earl, was created duke in 1707. Kidd, WILLIAM, pirate, born probably at Greenock, is supposed to have been the son of a persecuted Covenanting minister who died in 1679. The lad went early to sea, saw much privateering service, and gained a high reputation for courage, and in 1691 a reward of £150 from New York city. In 1696 a ship of 30 guns was given to Kidd, who was commissioned both to act against the French and to seize pirates. In 1697 he reached Madagascar, the pirates' chief rendezvous, but ere long disquieting reports reached England that Kidd was playing pirate himself. After a two years' cruise he returned to the West Indies, and venturing to Boston, was sent to England, where he was hanged for piracy and the murder of one of his men, 23d May 1701.

He was an advanced High Churchman, and in 1890 was tried by the Archbishop of Canterbury and other bishops for ritualistic practices, but was condemned on only two charges. He died 8th March 1910.

King, HENRY (1592-1669), poet, became Bishop of Chichester in 1642.—His father, JOHN KING, D.D. (c. 1599-1621), was Bishop of London from 1611.

King, WILLIAM, D.C.L. (1685-1763), Jacobite, from 1719 principal of St Mary Hall, Oxford, was born at Stepey, and lived much at Ealing. See his Anecdotes of his Own Times (1818).

King, WILLIAM RUFUS (1786-1853), vice-president of the United States, was a member of the legislature for three years, entered congress in 1810, and represented Alabama in the senate 1820-44. He was then minister to France, and a senator again from 1848 to 1853, when, shortly before his death, he became vice-president.

Kinglake, ALEXANDER WILLIAM, historian, born at Wilton House near Taunton, 5th August 1809, from Eton passed in 1828 to Trinity College, Cambridge. He was called to the bar in 1837, and made a fair practice, but retired in 1856 to devote himself to literature and politics. A tour about 1835 had already given birth to Edthen (1844), one of the most brilliant and popular books of Eastern travel; in 1854 he went out to the Crimea. He was returned for Bridgwater as a Liberal in 1857, took a prominent part against Lord Palmerston's Conspiracy Bill, and denounced the French annexation of Savoy. His History of the War in the Crimea (8 vols. 1868-87), largely based upon Lord Raglan's papers, has been blamed as prejudiced; but on the literary side it is one of the finest historical works of the century. The criticism of Napoleon III. was so searching that its circulation was prohibited in France during the Empire. In 1868 Kinglake was again returned for Bridgewater, but was unseated on petition. He died 2d January 1891. See memoir by Innes Shand in an edition of Eöthen (1896), and a study by Tuckwell (1902).

Kingsford, ANNA, née BONUS (1846-88), born at Stratford, Essex, in 1867 married a Shropshire clergyman, and thereafter became a convert to Catholicism (1870), an anti-vivisectioner, an M.D. of Paris (1880), a vegetarian, a Theosophist, &c. See Life by Edward Maitland (1895).

Kingsley, CHARLES, born at Holne vicarage, Dartmoor, 12th June 1819, in 1838 entered Magdalene College, Cambridge, and took a classical first in 1842. As curate and then (1844) rector, he spent the rest of his life at Eversley in Hampshire. His dramatic poem, The Saint's Tragedy, or The True Story of Elizabeth of Hungary (1848), was followed by Alton Locke (1850) and Yeast (1851), brilliant novels which deal with social questions in a strikingly original manner; their influence at the time was enormous. Kingsley had thrown himself with ardour into various schemes for the improvement of the working-classes, and like Maurice was a 'Christian Socialist'; as 'Parson Lot' he published an immense number of articles on current topics, especially in the Christian Socialist and Politics for the People. Hypatia (1853) is a brilliant picture of early Christianity in conflict with Greek philosophy at Alexandria. Westward Ho! (1855) is a lifelike presentment of Elizabethan England and the Spanish Main. Two Years Ago (1857) and Hereward the Wake (1860) were his later novels. In 1860 Kingsley was appointed professor of Modern History at Cambridge. The Roman and the Teuton (1864) is based on his Cambridge lectures. In 1869 he resigned his professorship and was appointed canon of Chester. In 1869-70 he made a voyage to the West Indies, and on his return issued the charming record At Last. In 1873 he was appointed canon of Westminster and chaplain to the Queen. He died 23d January 1875. The collected works of the enthusiastic, combative, infinitely sympathetic apostle of what was called (not by him) 'muscular Christianity' fill 28 volumes (1879-81), and include Glaucois (1855), The Heroes (1856), The Water Babies (1863), Town Geology (1872), Prose Idylls (1873), and Health and Education (1874). See Life by his widow (2 vols. 1877).—His second daughter, MARY ST LEOGER, born 4th June 1852, married in 1876 the Rev. William Harrison, rector of Clovelly, and as 'Lucas Malet' has written some powerful novels—Mrs Lorimer (1882), Colonel Enderby's Wife (1885), The Wages of Sin (1890), The Carissima (1890), and Sir Richard Calmady (1901). She became a Roman Catholic in 1899.—His brother GEORGE HENRY (1827-92) studied medicine, travelled much, and wrote many books of sport and travel, including South Sea Bubbles (1872).—His daughter MARY (1862-1900) was an enterprising traveller in West Africa, wrote admirably, and died a nurse in a South African hospital during the Boer war.—Another brother, HENRY KINGSLEY (1830-76), was educated at King's College, London, and Worcester College, Oxford. From 1853 to 1858 he resided in Australia, and on his return published a vigorous picture of colonial life in Geoffrey Hamlyn (1859). To this succeeded Ravenstoe (1861), his masterpiece; Austin Elliot (1863); The Hillyars and the Burtons, another novel of Australian life (1865), &c. In 1869-70 he edited the Edinburgh Daily Review. See memoir by Clement Shorter prefixed to a new edition of his novels (1894).

Kingston, WILLIAM HENRY GILES, writer of boys' books, born in London, 28th February 1814, was the son of a merchant in Oporto, and there spent much of his youth. He had already published two stories and a book of Portuguese travel, when he found his life-work in the immediate success of Peter the Whaler (1851), the first of over 150 similar books, simple, vigorous, healthy in tone, and full of daring adventures and hair-breadth escapes. Among the most popular were The Three Midshipmen (1862), The Three Lieutenants (1874), The Three Commanders (1875), and The Three Admirals (1877). Kingston took an active interest in many philanthropic schemes, as the mission to seamen and assisted emigration. In 1842 he received a Portuguese order of knighthood for helping to bring about a commercial treaty with England. He died at Willesden, 5th August 1880.

Kinkel, GOTTFRIED, born at Oberkassel near Bonn, 11th August 1815, lectured at Bonn on theology, poetry, and the history of art. But, involved in the revolutionary movement of 1848, he was imprisoned in Spandau (1850), whence he made a wonderful escape; and he taught German in London until 1866, when he was appointed professor of Archaeology and Art at Zurich. He died 13th November 1882. As a poet Kinkel's fame rests upon Otto der Schütz (1846; 73d ed. 1894), Der Grobschmied von Antwerpen (1872), Tanagra (1883), Gedichte (1843-68), and a drama, Nimrod (1857). He also wrote a history of art (1845), and monographs on Freiligrath (1867), Rubens (1874), &c. See Lives by Strodtmann (1850), Henne-Am Rhyn (1883), and Lübke (1893).—His first wife, JOHANNA (1810-58), a distinguished musician, wrote a novel, Hans Ibeles in London (1860), and, with her husband, Erzählungen (1849), a collection of tales.

Kipling, RUDYARD, was born at Bombay, 30th December 1865, the son of John Lockwood Kipling, C.I.E. (1837-1911), principal in 1875-93 of the School of Art at Lahore, and author of Beast and Man in India (1891). Rudyard was educated in England, but returned in 1880 to India, where he began to contribute verses, tales, and articles to Indian journals, making his literary début in Echoes (1884). But it was his Departmental Ditties (1886), Plain Tales from the Hills (1888), and Soldiers Three (1889) that made him well known in England; of a sudden he sprang into the front rank of popular favourites. There followed close The Story of the Gadsby's, In Black and White, Under the Deodars, Wee Willie Winkie, and The Phantom Rickshaw. The City of Dreadful Night (1891) illustrates certain aspects of Calcutta. More ambitious, though hardly so successful, was The Light that Failed (1891). Barrack-room Ballads (1892) were amongst his most brilliant successes; The Naulakha, a Story of East and West (1892), was produced in conjunction with the author-publisher, WOLCOTT BALETIER (1863-91). Life's Handicap (1891), Many Inventions (1893), and The Day's Work (1899) are other collections of short tales. The two Jungle Books appeared in 1894-95; in 1896 the poems, The Seven Seas; in 1897 Captain Courageous; in 1899 Stalky & Co.; and in 1901 Kim. 'The Absent-minded Beggar' (1900) and the 'Recessional Hymn' were oddly unlike. In 1892-00

he lived mainly in the United States, where in 1899 he nearly died. See books by Monkhood (1899) and Le Gallienne (1900).

He was hanged on 3d August. See Lives by James Grant (1849) and Barbé (1897).

Kirke, Colonel Percy (c. 1646-91), an officer who had served 1681-84 in Tangiers, and whose men after the defeat of Sedgemoor (1685) inflicted such fearful atrocities upon the followers of Monmouth as to make their nickname, 'Kirke's Lambs,' a byword for cruelty. Kirke early deserted to William of Orange, and helped to raise the siege of Londonderry. He died at Brussels.

Sirdar of the Egyptian army from 1890, he by the final rout of the Khalifa at Omdurman, 2d Sept. 1898, won back the Soudan for Egypt, and was made a peer. Successively chief of the staff and commander-in-chief in South Africa (1900-2), he finished the Boer war, received a grant of £50,000, was made viscount, O.M., commander-in-chief in India (1902-9), and Agent and Consul-General in Egypt (1911).

Klapka, George (1820-92), Hungarian general, born at Temesvar, became lieutenant-gener. in the Austrian army, but in the revolution fought valiantly against the Austrians, holding Komorn for eight weeks after the rest of Hungary had submitted. The amnesty of 1867 let him return from exile, and he died at Budapest. He wrote a history of the war (1851) and Memoirs (1850-87).

He wrote much on his travels, Asiatic philology and ethnology, Egyptian hieroglyphics, &c.

Kléber, Jean Baptiste, born at Strasburg, 9th March 1753, in 1776 obtained a commission in the Austrian army. Inspector for a time of public buildings at Belfort, in 1792 he enlisted as a volunteer, and by 1793 had risen to a general of brigade. As such he commanded in the Vendean war, but was recalled for leniency. In 1794 he led the left wing at Fleurus, and captured Maestricht; in June 1796 he gained the victory of Altenkirchen. He accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt, was wounded at Alexandria, and won the battle of Mount Tabor (1799). When Bonaparte left Egypt he entrusted the chief command to Kléber, who concluded a convention with Sir Sidney Smith for its evacuation; but on Admiral Keith's refusal to ratify it Kléber resolved to reconquer Egypt, and destroyed the Turkish army at Heliopolis. In the course of an attempt to conclude a treaty with the Turks, he was assassinated by a Turkish fanatic at Cairo, 14th June 1800. See Lives by Ernouf (1867), Pajol (1877), and Teicher (German, 1890).

He settled in Hamburg in 1771 with a sinecure appointment, and pensions from Frederick V. of Denmark (since 1751) and the Margrave of Baden. Regarded in his own time as a great religious poet, he helped to inaugurate the golden age of German literature. Odes, tragedies, biblical dramas, and hymns make up the rest of his poetry. Of these his Odes alone possess interest now. See Life by Muncker (1888).

His best-known works are the 'Beauties of Hampton Court' (painted for William III.), his forty-eight portraits of the 'Kit-Cat Club,' and of nine sovereigns (Charles II. to George I., Louis XIV., Peter the Great, and the Emperor Charles VI.).—His brother, JOHN ZACHARIAS (1644-1702), architectural and portrait painter, also settled in England.

Knickerbocker, HERMAN JANSEN, of Friesland, was one of the earliest settlers (1623) of New Amsterdam (New York). A descendant, Johannes (1749-1827), was a friend of Washington Irving, who immortalised the name through his History of New York by 'Diedrich Knickerbocker' (1809).

Greenwich Hospital. Removing to London in 1822, Knight began general publishing, and founded Knight's Quarterly Magazine. For the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge he published many works and serials, including the Penny Magazine (1832-45). The Penny Cyclopædia was begun in 1838, followed by the English Cyclopædia (1854-61), the British Almanac, and its Companion. He edited the Pictorial Shakespeare, and was the author of William Shakespeare: a Biography (1843). Other works were The Land We Live In (1848), Once Upon a Time (1853), and Knowledge is Power (1855). In 1862 he completed his Popular History of England. Half-hours with the Best Authors, Half-hours of English History, and Half-hours with the Best Letter-writers were compilations by him. Early a contributor to literature, he in 1869 founded the Metaphysical Society, became editor of the Contemporary Review in 1870, and in 1877 founded the Nineteenth Century.

Knowles, JAMES SHERIDAN, dramatist, born at Cork, 21st May 1784, was the son of James Knowles (1759-1840), lexicographer and teacher of elocution, who was cousin-german to Richard Brinsley Sheridan. After serving in the militia and studying medicine, he came out on the stage at Bath first and then at Dublin. But he never attained much eminence, and subsequently he conducted schools in Belfast and (1816-28) in Glasgow. His Caius Gracchus (1815) was first performed at Belfast. Virginus, his most effective play, had been a success in Glasgow before Macready in 1820 produced it at Covent Garden. Besides William Tell, in which Macready achieved one of his greatest triumphs, Knowles's other best plays are Love, The Hunchback, The Love Chase, and The Wife. Several are still among standard acting-plays. Knowles appeared with fair success in many of his own pieces; but about 1844 he became a Baptist preacher, drew large audiences to Exeter Hall, and published two anti-Roman Catholic works. From 1849 he had a civil list pension of £200 a-year. He died at Torquay, 30th November 1862. Of a Life (1872) by his son only twenty-five copies were printed.

Knowlton, THOMAS (1692-1782), botanist, in 1728 became gardener at Lanesborough, Yorkshire, to the Earl of Burlington.

Knox, ALEXANDER (1757-1831), a pious Dublin recluse, who was a link between Wesley and the Oxford movement. See his Remains and Correspondence (6 vols. 1834-37).

Knox, JOHN, was born at or near Haddington in 1505 (perhaps 1515), and was educated there and at the University of Glasgow, or more probably St Andrews, in any case a pupil of Major. From 1540 to 1543 he acted as notary in Haddington, and must till the latter year have been in Catholic orders. In 1544 he was acting as tutor to the sons of two families, by whom he was brought into contact with George Wishart (q.v.), now full of zeal for the Lutheran reformation; and with him Knox thenceforward identified himself. Wishart was burned in March 1546, and Beaton was murdered in May. The cardinal's murderers held the castle of St Andrews; and here Knox joined them with his pupils (1547). Here he was formally called to the ministry, and preached with acceptance. A few months later the castle surrendered to the French; for eighteen months Knox remained a prisoner on the French galleys, and this experience seriously impaired his health. In February 1549, on the intercession of Edward VI., Knox regained his liberty, and for four years made his home in England. In 1551 he was appointed one of six chaplains to Edward VI., and in 1552 was offered but refused the bishopric of Rochester. Knox, with five others, was consulted by Cranmer regarding his forty-two articles; and largely on Knox's representation the thirty-eighth article was so couched as to commit the Church of England to the Geneva doctrine of the eucharist. On Mary's accession Knox fled to Dieppe, and thence early in 1554 went to Geneva. In the autumn he accepted a call from the English congregation at Frankfort-on-Main, where he remained only a few months. At Geneva he found a congregation of his own way of thinking; but ventured into Scotland in September 1555, making preaching journeys to Kyle, Castle Campbell, &c., and returned to Geneva in July 1556. For the next two years he remained chiefly in Geneva, and was much influenced by Calvin. To 1558 belongs his First Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Regiment of Women. In 1557 the advocates of reform in Scotland bound themselves to religious revolution by the First Covenant; and by 1558 they felt themselves strong enough to summon Knox to their aid. From May 1559 Knox, again in Scotland, was the life and soul of his party. By his preaching at Perth and St Andrews he gained these important towns to his cause, and by his labours in Edinburgh he also won a strong party. But the Reformers could not hold their ground against the regent, Mary of Guise, subsidised by France with money and soldiers. Mainly through the efforts of Knox, the assistance of England was obtained against the French invasion; and by the treaty of Leith and the death of the regent (1560) the insurgent party became masters of the country. Parliament ordered the ministers to draw up a Confession of Faith; and Protestantism was established. Now the ministers drew up the first Book of Discipline, with its wise and liberal suggestions for the religious and educational organisation of the country. The return of the young queen to Scotland (August 1561) introduced new elements into the strife of parties; and during the six years of her reign Knox's attitude towards her was that of uncompromising antagonism. The celebration of mass in Holyrood Chapel first roused his wrath; and a sermon delivered by him in St Giles led to the first of his famous interviews with Mary. He went so far as to alienate the most powerful noble of his own party—Lord James Stuart, afterwards the Regent Moray; but the marriage of Mary with Darnley (1565) brought them together again. After the murder of Rizzio he withdrew to Kyle in Ayrshire, where he wrote great part of his History of the Reformation. The murder of Darnley, Mary's marriage with Bothwell, and her subsequent flight into England again threw the management of affairs into the hands of the Protestant party; and under Moray as regent the acts of 1560 in favour of the Reformed religion were duly ratified by the Estates. The assassination of Moray in 1570, and the formation of a strong party in favour of Mary, once more endangered the cause, and Knox removed to St Andrews for safety. He had already had a stroke of apoplexy, but his spirit was as indomitable as ever. His congregation of St Giles desired to hear him once more before he died. Accordingly, on 9th November 1572, at the induction of his successor, he made his last public appearance. He died on the 24th, and was buried in the churchyard then attached to St Giles. His first wife, Marjory Bowes, died in 1560, leaving him two sons. By his second wife, Margaret Stewart, daughter of Lord Ochiltree, whom (then not above sixteen) he married in 1564, he had three daughters. Knox is the pre-eminent type of the religious Reformer—dominated by his one transcendent idea, indifferent or hostile to every interest of life that did not subserve its realisation. The term fanatic is hardly applicable to one who combined in such degree the shrewdest worldly sense with ever-ready wit and native humour. The impress of his individuality, stamped on every page of his History of the Reformation in Scotland, renders his work unique. Knox's works were admirably edited by David Laing (6 vols. 1846-64). See Lives by M'Crie (1812; 7th ed. 1855), Lorimer (1875), P. Hume Brown (2 vols. 1895), Mrs Maccum (1895), Taylor Innes (1896), H. Cowan (1905), A. Laing (1905), and others.

Koch, KARL (1809-79), botanist, born near Weimar, in 1836 visited southern Russia, and in 1843-44 Armenia, Transcaucasia, &c. He became extra-ordinary professor of Botany at Jena in 1836, and in 1848 at Berlin. His chief work is Dendrologie (1869-72); with books of travel, Flora des Orients (1848-54), &c. [ch gntural.]

Koch, ROBERT (1843-1910), bacteriologist, born at Klausthal in the Harz, practised medicine at Hanover and elsewhere. His work on wounds, septicæmia, and splenic fever gained him a seat on the imperial board of health in 1880; further researches in microscopy and bacteriology led to his discovery in 1882 of the Bacillus tuberculosis. In 1883 he was leader of the German expedition sent to Egypt and India in quest of the cholera germ. For his discovery of the cholera bacillus he received a gift of £5000 from government; his discovery in 1890 of the phthisis bacillus and his lymph-inoculation cure raised higher hopes than have been realised. In 1885 he became professor at Berlin, and director of the hygienic institute, in 1891 director of the new institute for infectious diseases. In 1896 he was summoned to Cape Colony to study the cattle plague raging in South Africa. He had written on splenic fever (1876-82), wounds (1878), bacteriological diagnosis (trans. 1894), &c.

Kock, PAUL DE (1794-1871), novelist, was born at Passy. He was originally intended for a mercantile career, but devoted himself to literature, and produced an endless series of novels vivacious, piquant, and readable, but marred by a coarse vulgarity. Here may be named Georgette; Gustave; Le Barbier de Paris; La Femme, le Mari et l'Amant; Mœurs Parisiennes. His collected works fill 56 vols. (1844-45).—His son, HENRI DE KOCK (1821-92), followed with a series of far weaker novels. Another work is his Souvenirs de Napoléon III. à Wilhelmshöhe (1871).

Kohl, JOHANN GEORG (1808-78), traveller, was born and died at Bremen. His writings include works on Austria, Britain, the Rhine, the Alps, Russia, Denmark, Netherlands, and Montenegro (1842-51); also books of travel in Canada (1856) and the United States (1857); and histories of the discovery of America (1861), of Maine (1869), and of Magellan Strait (1877). [Koal.]

Köhler, REINHOLD (1830-92), born at Weimar, in 1857 became a ducal librarian at Weimar. He wrote on Kleist's Works (1862) and Herder's Cid (1867), edited dialogues of Hans Sachs (1858), discussed translations of Dante, and annotated Estonian and Sicilian folk-tales. [Kel'ler.]

Kollar, JAN (1793-1852), Bohemian poet and scholar, was a Hungarian Slovak, Protestant pastor at Pesth, and then, from 1849, professor of Archaeology at Vienna. See Autobiography in his Collected Works (2d ed. 1868).

Kölliker, ALBERT VON (1817-1905), anatomist and embryologist, born at Zurich. He became professor of Physiology and Comparative Anatomy at Zurich in 1845, and of Anatomy at Würzburg in 1847. Among his principal works are his Manual of Human Histology (1852; trans. 1854), Die Siphonophora, the Challenger Report on Penatulia (vol. i. 1880), and Entwickelungsgeschichte des Menschen. Koltzoff, ALEXEI VASSILIEVICH (1809-42), Russian poet, was born and died at Voronej.

König, FRIEDRICH (1774-1833), inventor of the steam-press, born at Eisleben, obtained in 1810 through the support of Bensley, a printer in London, a patent for a press. A second patent was obtained in 1811 for a cylinder-press, improved and adopted in 1814 by the Times. Latterly König made steam printing-presses near Würzburg. See Goebel's monograph (1833). Königsmark, COUNT PHILIPP CHRISTOPH VON, a Swede born about 1662, who, having entered the service of Hanover, was accused of carrying on an intrigue with Sophia Dorothea (1666-1726), wife of the future Elector, afterwards George I. of England, and suddenly disappeared, 1st July 1694. It is believed that he was murdered. Sophia was confined in the castle of Ahlden, near Celle, until her death. See the Quarterly for July 1885, and Vitzelly's Count Königsmark (1890).—His sister, MARIE AURORA, Countess of Königsmark (1670-1728), became in 1694 mistress of Augustus II., Elector of Saxony, and by him mother of Marshal Saxe; she died prioress at Quedlinburg. See German Life by Corvin-Wiersbitzky (2d ed. 1890). [o nearly as eh.]

Körner, KARL THEODOR, born at Dresden, 23d September 1791, was dramatist to a Vienna theatre, and wrote some light comedies, such as Der Grüne Domino and Der Nachtwächter, and some tragedies, of which Zriay was the most successful. The uprising of the German nation against Napoleon inspired him with patriotic ardour, and in March 1813, joining Lützow's corps, he distinguished himself by his valour and encouraged his comrades by fiery patriotic songs, published in 1814 under the title of Leier und Schwert (trans. Lyre and Sword, 1839). The most famous, the Schwert-Lied, was dashed off in a pause of battle only a few hours before the author fell at Gadebusch near Schwerin, 26th August 1813. See Lives by his father (trans. 1845), Lehmann (1819), Erhard (1821), Bauer (1833), and Kreyenberg (2d. ed. 1894). [Kür-ner.]

Kosciusko (Kosciuszko), TADEUSZ, Polish patriot, born near Slonim in Lithuania, 12th February 1746, chose the career of arms, and was trained in France. In 1777 he went to the United States, where he fought for the colonists and became brigadier-general. When Russia attacked his country in 1792, with 4000 men he held Dubienka for five days against 18,000. In 1794, after the second partition of Poland, he headed the national movement in Cracow, and was appointed dictator and commander-in-chief. His defeat of a greatly superior force of Russians at Raclawice was followed by a rising in Warsaw. He established a provisional government and took the field, but, defeated, fell back upon Warsaw and maintained himself there, until overpowered by superior numbers in the battle of Maciejowice, 10th October 1794, and covered with wounds, he fell into the hands of his enemies—it is then that Ségur falsely makes him cry, 'Finis Polonie!' Two years later the Emperor Paul restored him to liberty. He went first to England, then in 1797 to America, and finally in 1798 to France, where he farmed near Fontainebleau. In 1806 he refused to support Napoleon's plan for the restoration of Poland. He settled at Soleure in Switzerland in 1816, and died 15th October 1817, by the fall of his horse over a precipice. See Lives by Falkenstein (1834), Chodzko (Paris, 1837), Michelet (1863), and Cholomiejski (1902). [Kosh-yoosh'ko.]

Kosgarten, JOHANN GOTTFRIED LUDWIG (1792-1860), orientalist, died at Greifswald.

Kossuth, LOUIS, leader of the Hungarian revolution, was born in September 1802 at Monok near Zemplin of poor Protestant parents. He practised law for a time, in 1832 was a deputy at the diet of Presburg, and edited a journal which, owing to the law, was not printed, but transcribed. The issue of a lithographed paper led, in 1837, to imprisonment. Liberated in 1840, he became editor of the Pesti Hirlap, advocating extreme Liberal views. In 1847, sent by Pesth to the diet, he became leader of the opposition; and after the French Revolution of 1848 he demanded an independent government for Hungary. In September 1848, at the head of the Committee of National Defence, he prosecuted with extraordinary energy the measures necessary for carrying on war; and in April 1849 he induced the National Assembly at Debreczin to declare that the Hapsburg dynasty had forfeited the throne. Appointed provisional governor of Hungary, he sought in vain to secure the intervention of the Western Powers; and finding that the dissensions between himself and Görgei (q.v.) were damaging the national cause, he resigned his dictatorship in favour of Görgei. After the defeat at Temesvar on 9th August 1849 he fled into Turkey, where he was made a prisoner, but not extradited. In September 1851, liberated by British and American influence, he came to England, where, as subsequently in the United States, he was received with respect and sympathy. From 1852 he resided mainly in England till, on the Franco-Italian war with Austria in 1859, he proposed to Napoleon to arrange a Hungarian rising against Austria. The peace of Villafranca bitterly disappointed Kossuth; and in 1861 and in 1866 he tried in vain to bring about a rising against Austria. When in 1867 Deák effected the reconciliation of Hungary with the dynasty, Kossuth retired from active political life, and afterwards lived mostly in Turin. In 1867 he refused to avail himself of the general amnesty. In 1880-82 he published three volumes of Memoires of my Exile (Eng. ed. vol. i. 1880); others followed in 1890; and at his death, 20th March 1894, he had completed a work on Hungarian history. His body was conveyed to Budapest and buried with national solemnities. See German Life by Somogyi (1894).

Kotzebue, AUGUST FRIEDRICH FERDINAND VON, German dramatist, born at Weimar, 3d May 1761, filled various offices in the service of Russia, and was a facile writer of plays, tales, satires, historical works, &c.; he was stabbed, 23d March 1819, by Sand, a Jena student, because he had ridiculed the Burschenschaft movement. Besides quarrelling with Goethe, Kotzebue satirised the leaders of the Romantic school. Among his two hundred lively but superficial dramas are Menschenhass und Reue (known on the English stage as The Stranger), Die Hussiten vor Naumburg, Die beiden Klingsberge, Der arme Poet, Armuth und Edelsinn, Die Kreuzfahrer, Oktavia, &c. See French Life by Rabany (1893).—His son, OTTO VON KOTZEBUE, born 30th December 1787, at Reval, accompanied Krusenstern round the world in 1803-6, and afterwards made two voyages of exploration in the Pacific. He died at Reval, 15th February 1846. His two books on his voyages were translated into English (1821 and 1830). [Kof-zeh-boo.]

Kovalevsky, ALEXANDER (1840-1901), embryologist, was born at Dinaburg, and became professor at St Petersburg. He is known for his researches on the embryology of invertebrates, which led to Haeckel's Gastrea theory; for his discovery of the life-history and true position of the Ascidians; and for investigations of the development of the Amphioxus, Balanoglossus, Sagitta, and Brachiopods.—His brother, WOLDEMAR (1843-83), professor of Paleontology at Moscow, became bankrupt, and died by his own hand. He married in 1868 SONIA or SOPHIE (1850-91), daughter of a Moscow artillery officer. She made a distinguished name for herself throughout Europe as a mathematician, in 1884 became professor of Mathematics at Stockholm, and left a brilliant series of novels, of which Vera Barantova was translated in 1895. See Lefler's monograph on her (trans. 1895).

Krafft-Ebbing, RICHARD, FREIHERR VON, specialist in nervous diseases, born at Mannheim, 14th August 1840, in 1889 accepted a chair at Vienna. He has published a dozen works.

Krasinski, SIGISMUND, COUNT (1812-59), Polish poet, was born and died in Paris. One of his principal works is the strange poem Nieboska Komedya ('The Undivine Comedy') (1834).

Kraszewski, JOSEPH IGNACY (1812-87), historical novelist and poet, born in Warsaw, was the most prolific of all Polish authors, his works exceeding 300. His best-known novel is Jermola the Potter (1857). In 1884 he was imprisoned at Magdeburg for treason. [Krash-zev-skee.]

Krause, KARL CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH, philosopher, born at Eisenberg 6th May 1781, qualified as privat-docent at Jena, lived at Dresden 1805-13, lectured at Göttingen 1823-30, and died at Munich 27th September 1832. A translation of the Ideal of Humanity by Hastie appeared in 1890. See German monographs by Hohlfeld (1879), Procksch (1880), and Martin (1881). [Krow-zeh.]

Kreisler, FRITZ (b. 1875), violinist, born in Vienna, studied medicine and was an Uhlán officer.

Krilof, IVAN ANDREEVICH (1768-1844), was born at Moscow, a soldier's son, and at twenty was writing dramas and doing magazine work. He was for a while secretary to a prince, and next wandered aimlessly about the towns of Russia. He returned to St Petersburg in 1806, and soon after obtained a government appointment, and in 1821 a post in the Imperial Public Library. The first collection of fables (contributed to a Moscow paper in 1805-6) appeared in 1809; the second in 1811. See the sketch prefixed by Ralston to his Krilof and his Fables (a prose translation, 1868; 4th ed. 1883). [Kree'lof.]

Kropotkin, PRINCE PETER, Nihilist, was born at Moscow, 9th December 1842. At fifteen he entered the Corps of Pages at St Petersburg, whither, after five years' service and exploration in Siberia, he returned in 1867 to study mathematics at the university, whilst acting as secretary to the Geographical Society. In 1871 he explored the glacial deposits of Finland and Sweden; in 1872, whilst on a visit to Belgium and Switzerland, he associated himself with the extreme section of the International. Two years after his return to Russia he was arrested (March 1874), but in July 1876 effected his escape to England. In France at Lyons he was condemned in 1883 to five years' imprisonment for anarchism, but was released in 1886 and returned to England. He is author of Paroles d'un Révolté (1885), In Russian and French Prisons (1887), À la recherche du pain (1892), and articles in the Nineteenth Century, the Encyclopædia Britannica, Chambers's Encyclopædia, &c.

Krüdener, BARBARA JULIANA DE, religious enthusiast, daughter of Baron von Vietinghoff, was born at Riga, 22d November 1766. Married in 1782 to Baron von Křtdener, an elderly Livonian nobleman who was Russian ambassador at Venice, she from 1789 lived mostly apart from him, but by no means always alone, in Riga, St Petersburg, and Paris. In 1803 she published a remarkable novel, Valérie, supposed to be autobiographical, and presently gave herself up to an exaggerated mysticism. Expelled in 1817-18 from Switzerland and Germany, and repulsed by her former worshipper, the Emperor Alexander, she retired to her paternal estates near Riga, where she entered into relations with the Moravian Brethren. She died at Karasu-Bazar in the Crimea, December 25, 1824. See Krug's Conversations with Madame von Krüdener (1818), also Lives by Eynard (1849), Lacroix (1880), and Clarence Ford (1893). Kruger, STEPHANUS JOHANNES PAULUS, born 10th Oct. 1825 at Colesberg in Cape Colony, with his fellow-boers 'trekked' to Natal, the Orange River Free State, and the Transvaal, and won such a reputation for cleverness, coolness, and courage that in the war against England (1881)

he was appointed head of the provisional government. In 1883 he was elected president of the Transvaal or South African Republic, and again in 1888, 1893, and 1898. 'Oom Paul' was the soul of the policy that issued in the war of 1899-1902, showed consummate 'slinness,' resolution, and energy, but after the tide had fairly turned against the Boers, came to Europe to seek (in vain) alliances against Britain. He made his headquarters at Utrecht, and thence issued The Memoirs of Paul Kruger, told by Himself (1902). He died at Clarens, 14th July 1904.

Krummacher, FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1796-1868), court chaplain at Potsdam, wrote popular works on Solomon and Elijah the Tishbite.

Krupp, ALFRED, born at Essen, 26th April 1812, succeeded his father, FRIEDRICH KRUPP (1787-1826), who had founded a small iron-forge there in 1810. Krupp established the first Bessemer steel works and the first forging-hammer erected in Germany. The first steel gun manufactured by him (1847) was a 3-pounder muzzle-loader; in 1880 at the Düsseldorf Exhibition he showed the first 100-ton steel gun. He acquired large mines and collieries, and every year saw additions made to his works. Krupp died 14th July 1887.—He was succeeded by his son, FRIEDRICH ALFRED (1854-1902), and he by his daughter, BERTHA KRUPP VON BOHLEN UND HALBACH.

Krusenstern, ADAM JOHN, BARON VON (1770-1846), Russian admiral, born at Haggud in Esthonia, served 1793-99 in the British navy, and was put in command of a Russian exploring expedition in the North Pacific, which ultimately became a voyage round the world (1803-6). To his account of it (1810-12, Eng. ed. 1813) he added Hydrography of the Pacific Ocean (1819), Atlas of the Pacific, &c. See Life by Bernhardt (Eng. ed. 1856).

Kubelik, JAN (b. 1880), violinist, born near Prague, studied there, and marrying Countess Czaky-Szell (1903), lived in Hungary.

Kublai Khan (1214-94), Khan of the Mongols and emperor of China, was the grandson of Genghis Khan, and completed the conquest of northern China. An energetic prince, he suppressed his rivals, adopted the Chinese mode of civilisation, encouraged men of letters, and made Buddhism the state religion. An attempt to invade Japan ended in disaster. He established himself at Cambaluc (the modern Peking), the first foreigner that ever ruled in China. His dominions extended from the Arctic Ocean to the Strait of Malacca, and from Corea to Asia Minor and the confines of Hungary. The splendour of his court inspired the graphic pages of Marco Polo, who spent seventeen years in the service of Kublai—and at a later date the imagination of Coleridge. See Yule's Marco Polo (1875) and Howorth's History of the Mongols (part 1. 1876).

Kuenen, ABRAHAM, theologian, was born at Haarlem, 16th September 1828, and became, in 1855, professor at Leyden. His first important work was his Historisch-Critisch Onderzoek on the Old Testament (1861-65; trans. in part by Colenso, 1865), the result of which was to reconstruct the history of Israel, the priestly code and the historical portions connected with it being made the latest element in the Pentateuch. This view was developed further in his best-known book, De Godsdiens van Israel (1869-70; trans. 1873-75), and in the second edition of his Onderzoek (1885-89). Other works of Kuenen's are on prophecy (1875; trans. 1877) and National Religions and Universal Religions (Hibbert Lectures, 1882). He died at Leyden, 9th December 1891. [Nearly Kee-nen.]

Kugler, FRANZ (1808-58), born at Stettin, in 1833 became professor in the Academy of Art and docent at the University of Berlin. Of his great history of painting from the time of Constantine the Great (1837), the part relating to the Italian schools was translated by the Eastlakes (1842; 5th ed. 1887); that relating to the German, Spanish, French, and Dutch schools by Sir E. W. Head (1854). Kugler's other principal works are a Handbuch der Kunstgeschichte (1841-42), an unfinished Geschichte der Baukunst (1855-60), and a Life of Frederick the Great (with ill. by Menzel, 1840; new ed. 1887; Eng. trans. 1843 and 1877). He was also a poet and playwright. [Koogh'-ler].

Kuhn, FRANZ FELIX ADALBERT (1812-86), philologist and folklorist, died in Berlin.

Kunigunde, ST, who vindicated her chastity by walking barefoot over hot ploughshares, was the daughter of Count Siegfried of Luxemburg, and wife of Duke Henry of Bavaria, chosen emperor in 1014. After his death in 1024 she retired into the convent of Kaufungen near Cassel, which she had founded, and here she died, 3d March 1030. She was canonised in 1200.

Kurtz, JOHANN HEINRICH (1809-90), theologian, born at Montjoie near Aix-la-Chapelle, became in 1850 professor of Church History at Dorpat. He retired in 1870, and died at Marburg. His numerous writings include books on Bible history, sacrifice, the Bible and astronomy, and Christian doctrine. But his best-known are on church history, his Handbuch der allgemeinen Kirchengeschichte (1853-56), and Lehrbuch der Kirchengeschichte für Studierende (1849; 12th ed. 1892). Of the last there are three English translations.

Kutu'soff, MICHAEL ILARIONOVICH (1745-1813), Prince of Smolensk, Russian field-marshal, distinguished himself in the Turkish war, and in 1805 commanded against the French. In 1812, as commander-in-chief, he fought Napoleon obstinately at Borodino, and obtained a great victory over Davout and Ney at Smolensk.

Kyan, JOHN HOWARD (1774-1850), inventor 1812-86 of the 'kyanising' process for preserving wood. Born in Dublin, he died in New York.

Kyd, THOMAS, dramatist, probably born in London about 1558, and educated at Merchant Taylors' School, was most likely brought up as a scrivener under his father. His bloody and bombastic tragedies early brought him reputation, specially The Spanish Tragedy. Kyd translated from the French (1594) a tedious tragedy on Pompey's daughter Cornelia, almost certainly produced Solyman and Perseda (1592). He has been credited with a share in other plays, and probably wrote the lost original Hamlet. In 1590-93 he was in the service of an unknown lord. Imprisoned in 1593 on a charge of atheism (Unitarianism), which he tried to shift on to Marlowe's shoulders, Jonson's 'sporting Kyd' died in poverty in 1594. An edition of his plays by Boas was published in 1901.

Kyrle, JOHN (1637-1724), philanthropist, was styled the 'Man of Ross' by Pope, having passed most of his life at Ross in Herefordshire. He spent his time and fortune in building churches and hospitals on an income of £600 a-year. Pope sang his praises in his third Moral Epistle, and Warton said that he deserved to be celebrated beyond any of the heroes of Pindar.

LAAR, PIETER VAN (c. 1590-1653), painter of pastoral scenes, fairs, &c., was born and died at Haarlem.

Labadie, JEAN DE (1610-74), ex-Jesuit Protestant pietist, was born at Bourg, and died at Altona.

See works by Gonon (1844) and Laur (1873).

Labédoyère, CHARLES, COMTE DE (1786-1815), a Napoleonic field-marshal, born in Paris, was shot after the second Bourbon restoration.

Labiche, EUGÈNE (1815-88), author during 1838-77 of over a hundred comedies, farces, and vaudevilles, was born and died in Paris, and in 1880 was elected to the Academy. His Frisette (1846) was the original of Morton's 'Box and Cox.' See Augier's introduction to the Théâtre de Labiche (10 vols. 1879). [La-besh'.]

Lablache, LUIGI (1794-1858), operatic singer, was born and died in Naples; his father was a Frenchman who had fled from Paris during the Revolution, his mother an Irishwoman. He sang from 1812 at Naples, Rome, and Vienna, and from 1830 at Paris, London, and elsewhere. His voice was a magnificent deep bass; his acting was almost as remarkable as his singing. [La-blaash.]

Labouchère, HENRY, BARON TAUNTON (1798-1869), of Huguenot ancestry, was educated at Winchester and Christ Church, Oxford; in 1826 became a Whig M.P., from 1830 for Taunton; and, having been President of the Board of Trade and Colonial Secretary, was in 1859 raised to the peerage.—His nephew, HENRY (1831-1912), was educated at Eton, and from 1854 to 1864 was attaché or secretary at Washington, Munich, Stockholm, St Petersburg, Dresden, Constantinople, &c. He became a Liberal M.P. in 1865 (1880-1906 for Northampton), and was proprietor and editor of Truth (1877). [La'boo-shair.]

Laboulaye, ÉDOUARD RENÉ DE (1811-83), was born and died in Paris, and in 1849 became professor of Comparative Jurisprudence in the Collège de France. His chief works are on French law, and a Histoire Politique des États-Unis (1855-66; 6th ed. 1876). He edited a historical review; some of his tales, including Paris en Amérique, have been translated. He entered the National Assembly in 1871, and in 1876 became a life senator. See Life by Wallon (1889). [La-boo-lay'.]

Labourdonnais, BERTRAND FRANÇOIS MAHÉ DE (1699-1753), born at St Malo, by 1723 had distinguished himself as captain in the naval service of the French Indies. In 1734 he became governor of Île de France and Bourbon; as such he lives for ever in Paul and Virginia. In 1740 he inflicted great loss upon England; in 1746 compelled Madras to capitulate, but granted terms on payment of 9,000,000 livres. Accused by Duplex of betraying the company's interests, he returned to Paris in 1748, and he languished in the Bastille until 1752, when he was declared guiltless. He wrote Mémoires (1750).—His grandson, BERTRAND (1795-1840), a famous chess-player, wrote a Life of him (1827). [La-boor-don-nay'.]

La Bruyère, JEAN DE (1645-96), born at Paris, and educated by the Oratorians, was chosen to aid Bossuet in educating the dauphin. For a time he was treasurer at Caen. He became tutor to the Duc de Bourbon, grandson of the Great Condé, and received a pension from the Condés until his death. His Caractères (1688), which gained him a host of implacable enemies as well as an immense reputation, consists of two parts, the one a translation of Theophrastus, the other a collection of maxims, reflections, and character-portraits of men and women of the time. He found a powerful protectress in the Duchesse de Bourbon, a daughter of Louis XIV. In 1693 he was elected to the Academy. His Dialogues sur le Quétisme (1699) were directed against Fénelon. A great writer rather than a great thinker, his insight into character is shrewd rather than profound. See the edition by Servois (3 vols. 1864-82); the translation of the Caractères by Helen Stott (1890); Sainte-Beuve's Portraits Littéraires; and works by Allaire (1886), Pellisson (1892), and Morillot (1904). La Calprenède. See CALPRENÈDE.

Lacépède, BERNARD DE LAVILLE, COMTE DE (1756-1825), born at Agen, became curator in the Royal Gardens at Paris in 1785, and at the Revolution professor of Natural History in the Jardin des Plantes. He was made senator in 1799, minister of state in 1809, and in 1814 peer of France. Besides continuing Buffon's Natural History, he wrote Histoire Naturelle des Poissons (1803), Les Âges de la Nature (1830), &c. An edition of his works appeared in 1876. [La-say-pehd'.]

Lachaise, FRANÇOIS D'AIX (1624-1709), Jesuit, born at the castle of Aix in Forez, was already provincial of his order when Louis XIV. selected him for his confessor in 1675—a post he retained till his death in spite of the difficulties of his position. His garden was in 1804 included in the cemetery called Père-la-Chaise. See Life by Chantelauze (1859). [La-shehz.]

Lachmann, KARL KONRAD FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1793-1851), critic and philologist, born at Brunswick, was professor successively at Königsberg and Berlin, and a member of the Academy. He edited the Nibelungenlied, Walter von der Vogelweide, Propertius, Catullus, Tibullus, Babrius, Gaius, and Lucretius. In his Betrachtungen he maintained that the Iliad consisted of sixteen independent lays enlarged and interpolated. The smaller edition of his New Testament appeared in 1831; the larger in 1842-50—both based mainly on uncial MSS. See Life by Hertz (1851). [ch guttural.]

Lachner, FRANZ (1803-90), composer of operas, sonatas, &c., was born at Rain, Upper Bavaria, and in 1836 returned from Vienna to Munich.—Two brothers, IONAZ (1807-95) and VINZENZ (1811-93), were also composers.

Lacombe, LOUIS TROUILLON (1818-84), composer, his best-known work the cantata Sappho (1878), was born at Bourges. His opera Winkel- ried was produced at Geneva in 1892. See Life by Boyer (Par. 1888).

Lacondamine, CHARLES MARIE DE (1701-74), who was born and died in Paris, served in the army, travelled extensively, and was sent to Peru (1735-43) to measure a degree of the meridian. He explored the Amazon, brought back curari and definite information as to india-rubber, and wrote in favour of inoculation. [Lah-conv-da-meen.]

Lacordaire, JEAN BAPTISTE HENRI, born at Recey-sur-Orce, dep. Côte-d'Or, March 12, 1802, came from Dijon to Paris in 1821, to continue his legal studies. He was a deist, but a spiritual change came suddenly, and, after three years at the seminary of St Sulpice, he was ordained priest in 1827, and became chaplain to a convent and to the Collège Henri IV. He assisted Lamennais and Montalembert with the High Church and Radical Avenir, and was once summoned for opposing the government. A free school opened in Paris by him and Montalembert was closed by the police; and the Avenir, condemned by the pope, was given up. In 1834 Lacordaire gave a series of 'Conferences' or lectures to students which attracted great attention, and led the way to his famous Conferences in Notre Dame (1835-36). His success as a preacher has at its height, when he withdrew and went to Rome. In 1839 he entered the Dominican order, and in 1840 reappeared in the pulpit of Notre Dame, where, from 1843 to 1851 he continued his Conferences. In 1848 Lacordaire accepted the republic, and was elected to the Constituent Assembly, but resigned in ten days. His last Conferences, delivered at Toulouse in 1854, are the most eloquent of all. Thenceforward till his death, 21st November 1861, he was director of the military school of Sorrèze. He was a member of the Academy. A collected edition of his works appeared in 1872. See his Letters, his Testament (1870), and Lives by Montalembert (1862; trans. 1863), Dora Greenwell (1867), Lear (1882), Chocarne (8th ed. 1894; trans. 1867), De Broglie (1889), and D'Haussonville (1895).

Lacretelle, JEAN CHARLES DOMINIQUE DE (1766-1855), born at Metz, was attracted to Paris on the outbreak of the Revolution; and taking to journalism, helped to edit the Débats and the Journal de Paris. In 1809 he was made professor of History, in 1810 censor of the press. From 1811 a member of the French Academy, he became its president in 1816. He died near Mâcon, leaving two sons, HENRI (1815-85), poet, and CHARLES NICOLAS (1822-91), general. Of his works the best-known are Histoire du Dix-huitième Siècle (1808), Précis Historique de la Révolution (1801-6), and Histoire de France pendant les Guerres de Religion (1814-16).—His elder brother, PIERRE LOUIS (1751-1824), was an advocate and journalist, and wrote on law. [Lak'r-tell.]

Lacroix, PAUL (1806-84), better known as 'P. L. Jacob, Bibliophile,' was born and died in Paris. Whilst still at school he began to edit the old French classics, as Marot, Rabelais, &c. His industry was prodigious, and the number of his works immense—romances, plays, histories, biographies, and a great series on the manners, customs, costumes, arts, and sciences of France from the middle ages. He also wrote two elaborate works on the History of Prostitution. From 1856 he was keeper of the Arsenal library.—His brother JULES (1809-87) also wrote romances and poems. [La-kroah'.] mathematician, was born and died in Paris. His works on the Calculus (1797-1800) are famous.

Lactantius, LUCIUS CÆLIUS (or CÆCILIUS) FIRMIANUS, Christian apologist, was brought up in Africa, and settled as a teacher of rhetoric in Nicœnedia in Bithynia, where he was converted by witnessing the constancy of the Christian martyrs under the persecution of Diocletian. About 313 he was invited to Gaul by Constantine, to act as tutor to his son Crispus, and died about 325. His principal work is his Divinarum Institutionum libri vii. De Mortibus Persecutorum was formerly attributed to him. The best editions are by Migne (vol. vi. 1844) and Brandt and Laubmann (Vien. 1890). There is a translation in Clark's Ante-Nicene Library.

Lacy, PETER, COUNT (1678-1751), Russian field-marshal, was born in Limerick, and had fought as an Irish Jacobite and in the French service, when about 1698 he entered that of Russia.—His son, FRANCIS MAURICE, COUNT LACY (1725-1801), was an Austrian field-marshal.

Laennec, RENÉ THÉODORE HYACINTHE (1781-1826), born at Quimper in Brittany, from 1799 an army-doctor, in 1814 became editor of the Journal de Médecine, and in 1816 chief physician to the Hôpital Necker, where he invented the stethoscope. In 1819 he published his Traité de l'Auscultation Médiate. See Lives by Lallour (1868) and Du Chatellier (1885). [Lan-neck.]

La Farge, JOHN (1835-1910), landscape and ecclesiastical painter, best known by his mural and stained-glass work, was born in New York, and wrote Lectures on Art, Letters from Japan, &c.

La Farina, GIUSEPPE (1815-63), Italian historian, was born at Messina, and died in Turin.

La Fayette, MARIE PISCHE DE LAVERGNE, COMTESSE DE (1634-93), reformer of French romance-writing, was born in Paris, her father being marshal and governor of Havre. She married the Comte de La Fayette in 1655, and in her thirty-third year formed a liaison with La Rochefoucauld, which lasted until his death in 1680. Down to her own she still played a leading part at the French court, as was proved by her Lettre inédite (Turin, 1880); prior to their publication it was believed that her last years were given to devotion. Her novels Zaïde and La Princesse de Clèves—a vivid picture of the court-life of her day—led to a reaction against the long-winded romances of Calprenède and Scudéry. See Mémoires (ed. by Assé, 1890), Hanssonville's Madame de la Fayette (1891), Life by Lillian Rea (1908), and Ste-Benve's Portraits de Femmes.

Lafayette, MARIE JOSEPH PAUL ROCH YVES GILBERT MOTIER, MARQUIS DE, was born in the castle of Chavagnac in Auvergne, September 6, 1757. He came to his estates at thirteen, married at sixteen, entered the army, sailed for America in 1777 to aid the colonists, and by Washington was given a division. He was home for a few months in 1779, crossed the Atlantic again, was charged with the defence of Virginia, and shared in the battle of Yorktown. On a third visit to America in 1784, he had an enthusiastic reception. Now a pronounced reformer, he was called to the Assembly of Notables in 1787, sat in the States General, and in the National Assembly of 1789. He laid on its table a declaration of rights based on the American Declaration of Independence; and, appointed to command the armed citizens, formed the National Guard. He struggled incessantly for order and humanity; but the Jacobins hated his moderation, the court abhorred his reforming zeal. He supported the abolition of title and all class privileges. He won the first victories at Philippeville, Maubeuge, and Florennes. But the hatred of the Jacobins increased, and at length he rode over the frontier to Liège. He was imprisoned by the Austrians till Bonaparte obtained his liberation in 1797. He sat in the Chamber of Deputies in 1818-24 as one of the extreme Left, and in 1825-30 he was again a leader of the Opposition. In 1830 he took part in the Revolution, and commanded the National Guards. In 1824 he revisited America, by invitation of Congress, who voted him a grant of 200,000 dollars and a township of land. He died at Paris, 20th May 1834. See Mémoires, Correspondance, et Manuscrits (1837-40); studies by Rognault Marin (1824) and Sarrane (1832); Life by Tuckerman (1889); two works by Bardoux (1892); and Tower's Lafayette in the American Revolution (1895).

Laffan, ROBERT STUART DE COURCY, born 18th Jan. 1853, took a classical first in 1878 from Merton, Oxford, and became headmaster in 1895 of Cheltenham College, and in 1899 a London clergyman. In 1883 he married BERTHA LEITH ADAMS, author since 1877 of many novels.

Lafitte, JACQUES (1767-1844), born at Bayonne, acquired great wealth as a Paris banker, and in 1814 became governor of the Bank of France. After the second restoration he joined the Opposition in the Chamber of Deputies, and was elected by all twenty sections in Paris in 1817. In 1830 his house was the headquarters of the Revolution, and he supplied great part of the funds needed. In November he formed a cabinet, but he only held power until March. Meanwhile he had to sell his property to pay his debts. A national subscription preserved him his house in Paris; and from the ruins of his fortune he founded a Discount Bank in 1837. As the government became less liberal, Lafitte became more active in opposition; in 1843 he was elected president of the Chamber of Deputies. See his Souvenirs (1844), as recorded by Marchal.

Lafontaine, JEAN DE, born July 8, 1621, at Château-Thierry in Champagne, and assisted his father, a superintendent of woods and forests. He early devoted himself to the study of the old writers and to verse-writing. In 1654 he published a verse translation of the Eunuchus of Terence, and then went up to Paris, where Fouquet awarded him a pension of 1000 francs for a piece of verse quarterly. His Contes et Nouvelles en Vers appeared in 1665, his Fables Choiesies mises en Vers in 1668, and his Amours de Psyche et de Cupidon in 1669. For nearly twenty years he was maintained in the household of Mme de la Sablière. In 1684 he read an admirable Discours en Vers on his reception by the Academy. He died April 13, 1695. He was one of the idlest, most frivolous and dissipated of men, but he was likewise one of the most charming and gifted. The subjects, generally gross, of the Contes are taken from Boccaccio, Ariosto, Machiavelli, Rabelais, the Hep-tameron, Apuleius, Athenæus, and other writers; and the stories are retold with inimitable skill and wit. The Fables are free from the impropriety of the Contes. Lafontaine was a great and brilliant writer, but not a great poet. The best edition is by Regnier (11 vols. 1883-92). See Sainte-Beuve's Portraits, vol. i.; Girardin, Lafontaine et les Fabulistes (2d ed. 1876); Taine's Lafontaine et ses Fables; works by Lucas Collins (1882), Grouchy (1893), Lafenestre (1895), Pagnet (1900), and F. Hamel (1912); and bibliographies of illustrated editions of Lafontaine by Després (1892) and Hédé-Haty (1893).

Lagarde, PAUL ANTON DE (1827-91), a Semitic scholar, till 1854 called Bötticher, was born at Berlin, and died at Göttingen, a professor there since 1869. See Life by Anna de Lagarde (1894).

Lagrange, JOSEPH LOUIS, COMTE, algebraist, was born of French ancestry at Turin, 25th January 1736. In 1754 he became mathematical professor in the Royal School of Artillery there; in 1766 Frederick the Great appointed him director of the Berlin Academy, he having gained a European reputation by his completion of the Calculus of Variations, investigations of sound, harmonics, &c. While in Prussia (1766-87), Lagrange read before the Berlin Academy about sixty dissertations on the application of the higher analysis to mechanics and dynamics; one of these was his principal work, the Mécanique Analytique (1788), its central theory the principle of virtual velocities, which he had established in 1764. In Paris he was welcomed by the court and lodged in the Louvre with a pension of 6000 francs. After the Revolution he was appointed professor in the Normal and Polytechnic Schools and a member of the Bureau des Longitudes; Napoleon made him a member of the senate and a Count, and gave him the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour. Other important works are Théorie des Fonctions, Leçons sur le Calcul des Fonctions, and Résolution des Equations Numériques. Lagrange died at Paris, 10th April 1813, and was buried in the Panthéon. His works have been edited by Serret and Darboux (14 vols. 1866-92). [La-gron'zh'.]

Lagarre, LOUIS (1663-1721), allegorical painter, born in Paris, in 1683 came to London.

Laharpe, FRÉDÉRIC CÉSAR (1754-1838), president of the Helvetic Republic in 1798-1800, lived a good deal in Russia as tutor and as guest of Alexander I. He was born at Rolle in Vaud, and died at Lausanne.

La Harpe, JEAN FRANÇOIS DE (1739-1803), born at Paris, in 1763 produced a successful tragedy, Warwick. His best-known works are, however, his critical lectures, Lycée, ou Cours de Littérature (1799-1805). His Correspondance Littéraire (1801) by the bitterness of its criticisms rekindled fierce controversies. He supported the Revolution at first, but after five months' imprisonment (1794) became a firm supporter of church and crown.

Laidlaw, WILLIAM, the friend and amanuensis of Sir Walter Scott, was born at Blackhouse in Selkirkshire, 19th November 1780. After farming with little success at Traquair and Liberton, he settled in 1817 as a kind of factor on the Abbotsford estate, and was Scott's trusted counsellor in all his schemes of improvement. Here, with the exception of but three years after the disaster in Scott's affairs, he lived till Scott's death in 1832. The simple pathos of his ballad, 'Lucy's Plittin'' would alone have preserved his name from oblivion. Afterwards factor successively on two Ross-shire estates, he died at his brother's farm at Contin in that county, 18th May 1845.

Laing, ALEXANDER GORDON (1793-1826), born at Edinburgh, served seven years as an officer in the West Indies, and, sent to explore the Niger's source, was murdered after leaving Timbuctoo.

Laing, DAVID (1793-1878), antiquary, the son of an Edinburgh bookseller, for thirty years followed his father's trade, and from 1837 till his death was librarian of the Signet Library. He was honorary secretary of the Bannatyne Club, and edited many of its issues; while his contributions to the Transactions of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland were innumerable. An LL.D. of Edinburgh, he left behind him a private library of unusual value, and bequeathed many rare MSS. to Edinburgh University. His more important works were his editions of Baillie's Letters and Journals (1841-42), of John Knox (1846-64), and of the Scottish poets, Sir David Lyndsay, Dunbar, and Henryson.

Laing, JOHN. See HALKETT, SAMUEL.

Laing, MALCOLM (1762-1818), historian, was born in Orkney, educated at Kirkwall and Edinburgh University, and called to the bar in 1785, but never became a successful advocate. He wrote in 1798 the last volume of Henry's History of Great Britain, and in 1802 published his own History of Scotland, 1603-1707. He insisted that Queen Mary was privy to Darnley's murder. His Poems of Ossian are an onslaught on Macpherson.—His brother, SAMUEL (1780-1868), travelled and wrote on Norway, Sweden, Russia, France, &c.

Laird, JOHN (1805-74), a Birkenhead ship-builder and M.P., born at Greenock, one of the earliest constructors of iron vessels.—His brother, MACGREGOR (1808-61), also born at Greenock, shared Lander's last expedition.

Lairesse, GÉRARD DE (1640-1711), Dutch painter and etcher, the author, after he became blind in 1690, of Art of Painting (trans. 1738).

Lais, the name of two Corinthian courtesans, famous for their beauty. The elder flourished during the Peloponnesian war; the younger, born in Sicily, came as a child to Corinth, and sat as a model to Apelles.

Lake, GERARD, VISCOUNT (1744-1808), general, served in Germany 1760-2, America 1781, and the Low Countries 1793-94, his most brilliant exploit the capture of some forts near Lille. In 1798 he routed the rebels at Vinegar Hill, and received the surrender of the French under Humbert near Cloone; in N.W. India (1801-7), against Sindia and Holkar, he won the four battles of Laswari, Farakhabad, &c., and took Aligarh, Delhi, and Agra, for his splendid services being created Baron Lake in 1804, and Viscount in 1807. See Memoir by Pearce (1908).

Lalande, JOSEPH JÉRÔME LE-FRANÇOIS DE (1732-1807), French astronomer, born at Bourgen-Bresse, was sent to Berlin in 1751 to determine the moon's parallax. He became on his return an astronomer-royal, and from 1762 professor of Astronomy in the Collège de France, from 1795 Director of the Paris Observatory. His chief work is Traité d'Astronomie (1764; 3d ed. 1792).

Lally-Tollendal, THOMAS ARTHUR, COMTE DE LALLY and BARON DE TOLLENDAL, French general, born at Romans in Dauphiné, January 1702. His father, Sir Gerard O'Lally, was an Irish Jacobite refugee in the French service. Lally distinguished himself in Flanders, accompanied Prince Charles Edward to Scotland in 1745, and in 1756 became commander-in-chief in the French East Indies. He commenced vigorous hostilities against the British, and besieged Madras; but being defeated, retreated to Pondicherry, which was attacked in March 1760 by a superior British force. Lally capitulated in January 1761, and was conveyed to England. Accused of cowardice, he returned to France, and was thrown into the Bastille. The parliament of Paris at last condemned him, and he was executed 7th May 1766. But his son, supported by Voltaire, procured a royal decree in 1778, declaring the condemnation unjust, and restoring all the forfeited honours. See Malleon's French in India (new ed. 1893).—That son, TROPHIME GÉRARD, MARQUIS DE LALLY-TOLLENDAL (1751-1830), was one of those nobles who acted in the States General in 1789 with the Third Estate, but soon allied himself with the court. He advocated a constitution with two chambers, and sought to protect the king, but had to flee to England. Louis XVIII. made him a peer. He wrote Defence of the French Emigrants (1794), and Life of Wentworth, Earl of Strafford (2d ed. 1814).

Lamachus, a warlike Athenian general, who fell before Syracuse in 414 B.C.

Lamarck, JEAN BAPTISTE ANTOINE PIERRE MONET DE (1744-1829), naturalist and pre-Darwinian evolutionist, was born at Bazentin, and at seventeen joined the French army in Germany. Stationed as an officer at Toulon and Monaco, he became interested in the Mediterranean flora; and resigning after an injury, he held a post in a Paris bank, and meanwhile worked at botany. In 1773 he published a Flore Française. In 1774 he became a member of the French Academy and keeper of the royal garden (afterwards the nucleus of Jardin des Plantes), and here he lectured for twenty-five years on Invertebrate Zoology. About 1801 he had begun to think about the relations and origin of species, expressing his conclusions in his famous Philosophie Zoologique (1809). His Histoire des Animaux sans Vertèbres appeared in 1815-22. Hard work and illness enfeebled his sight and left him blind and poor. Lamarck broke with the old notion of species, expressly denied the unchangeableness of species, sought to explain their transformation and the evolution of the animal world, and prepared the way for the now accepted theory of descent. See Cuvier's Eloge of him (1832); C. Clans, Lamarck als Begründer der Descendenztheorie (1888); Duval in Bull. Soc. Anthropol. tome xii. (1889); Haeckel, Darwin, Goethe, und Lamarck (1882); E. Perrier, Lamarck et le Transformisme (1893); and Packard, Lamarck the Founder of Evolution (1902).

La Marmora, ALFONSO FERRERO, MARQUIS DE (1804-76), born at Turin, distinguished himself in the national war of 1848, and in 1849 was appointed Minister of War. He commanded the Sardinian troops in the Crimea (1855), took part in the war of 1859, was commander-in-chief in 1861, and in 1864 prime-minister. In the campaign against Austria in 1866 he lost the battle of Custoza. Latterly he was intrusted with several diplomatic missions; he preferred the French to the Prussian alliance; and his publication (1873) of the secret negotiations between Prussia and Italy incurred the censure of Bismarck. See monograph by Massari (1880).

Lamarque, MAXIMILIEN, COMTE (1770-1832), Napoleonic general, born at St Sever, Landes.

Lamartine, ALPHONSE MARIE LOUIS DE, statesman, poet, and historian, born at Mâcon, 21st October 1790, was brought up on ultra-royalist principles, spent much of his youth in Italy, and on the fall of Napoleon entered the Garde Royale. His first volume of poems, the Méditations, were published in 1820. He was successively Secretary of Legation at Naples and chargé d'affaires at Florence. In 1829 he declined the post of Foreign Secretary in the Polignac ministry, and by another series of poems, Harmonies Poétiques et Religieuses, achieved his unanimous election to the Academy. Lamartine, still a royalist, disapproved of the Revolution of 1830. A tour to the East produced his Souvenirs d'Orient. Recalled to France in 1833, he became deputy for Mâcon. Between 1834 and 1848 he published his poems, Jocelyn and La Chute d'un Ange, and the celebrated Histoire des Girondins. The Orleanist régime was repugnant to him; and he became a member of the Provisional Government (1848), and, as Minister of Foreign Affairs, the ruling spirit. After two risings of the extreme party of Louis Blanc and Ledru Rollin, the executive committee resigned, and conferred the command of the forces on Cavaignac. After a terrible conflict the insurrection was suppressed. When Napoleon came to power Lamartine devoted himself to literature, publishing Confidences, Raphaël (a kind of autobiography), Geneviève, the Tailleur de Pierres de St-Point (a prose tale), and Histoire de la Restauration. He wrote on Columbus, Joan of Arc, Cromwell, Madame de Sévigné, Cesar, Rousseau, and Tasso, edited Discours divers, and issued his monthly Entretiens Familiers. He died at Passy, February 28, 1869. See Lives by Lady M. Doimville (Lond. 1888), Reyssié (La Jeunesse de Lamartine, 1892), Rod (1892), and Deschanel (2 vols. 1893).

Lamb, LADY CAROLINE. See MELBOURNE.

Lamb, CHARLES, was born 10th February 1775, in the Temple, London, where his father was clerk and confidential servant to Samuel Salt, a wealthy bencher. At Christ's Hospital 1782-89, he soon afterwards obtained a situation in the South Sea House, but in 1792 procured promotion to the India House, where he remained for more than thirty years. In 1792 also died Samuel Salt; and with a legacy from him, Charles's salary, and whatever his elder sister Mary (1764-1847) could earn by needlework, the family retired to humble lodgings. In 1796 the terrible disaster occurred which was destined to mould the future life of Charles Lamb. There was a strain of insanity in the children, inherited from the mother. The father was growing old and childish; the mother was an invalid, and the stress and anxiety of the many duties devolving on Mary Lamb began to tell upon her reason. In an attack of mania she stabbed her mother. Mary would have been transferred to a public asylum; but the brother's guardianship was accepted by the authorities. To this trust Charles Lamb from that moment devoted his life. Mary remained subject to attacks of temporary aberration, and at such seasons she was removed to some suitable asylum. In the meantime Charles had fallen in love, but renounced all hope of marriage when the duty of tending his sister appeared to him paramount. Lamb's earliest poems (1795), first printed with Coleridge's in 1796-97, were prompted by this deep attachment. In 1798 Lamb and Charles Lloyd made a venture in a slight volume of their own (Blank Verse); and here for the first time Lamb's individuality made itself felt in the 'Old Familiar Faces.' In 1797 he also published his little prose romance, The Tale of Rosamund Gray and Old Blind Margaret; and in 1801 John Woodvil—the fruit of that study of the dramatic poetry of the Elizabethan period, in whose revival he was to bear so large a part. Meantime, Lamb and his sister were wandering from lodging to lodging, and after 1801 they removed to Lamb's old familiar neighbourhood, where they continued for sixteen years. Charles's experiments in literature had as yet brought him neither money nor reputation; and the gradual accession of new friends had the drawback of bringing him face to face with social temptations which he could not resist. In Lamb's anxiety to raise a few pounds, he wrote a farce, Mr H., produced at Drury Lane in December 1806, and famous only for its failure. For William Godwin's 'Juvenile Library,' Charles and Mary wrote in 1807 their Tales from Shakespeare—Mary Lamb taking the comedies, Charles the tragedies. This was Lamb's first success. The brother and sister next composed jointly Mrs Leicester's School (1807) and Poetry for Children (1809). Charles also made a prose version of the Adventures of Ulysses; and a volume of selections from the Elizabethan dramatists exhibited him as one of the most subtle and original of poetical critics. Three years later his unsigned articles in Leigh Hunt's Reflector on Hogarth and the tragedies of Shakespeare proved him a prose writer of new and unique quality. In 1818 Lamb collected his scattered verse and prose in two volumes, as the Works of Charles Lamb, and this paved the way for his being invited to join the staff of the new London Magazine. His first essay, in August 1820, 'Recollections of the old South Sea House,' was signed Elia, the name of a foreigner who had been a fellow-clerk. The Last Essays of Elia were collected in 1833. In 1825 Lamb, who had been failing in health, resigned his post in the India House, with a pension of £441. The brother and sister were now free to wander; finally they removed to Edmonton. The absence of settled occupation had not brought Lamb the comfort he had looked for: the separation from his friends and the now almost continuous mental alienation of his sister left him companionless, and with the death of Coleridge in 1834 the chief attractions of his life were gone. In December of that year, while taking his usual walk, he fell, slightly injuring his face. Erysipelas ensued, and he died on the 29th. He was buried in Edmonton churchyard. His sister survived him nearly thirteen years, and was buried by his side. Lamb's place in literature is unique and unchallengeable. As a personality he is more intimately known to us than any other figure in literature, unless it be Samuel Johnson. He is familiar to us through his works, which are composed in the form of personal confidences; through his many friends who have made known his every mood and trait; and through his letters, the most fascinating correspondence in our language. The profound and imaginative character of his criticism, and with it the reckless humour of the Bohemian and the farceur; his loyalty and generosity to his friends; the wild fun of Trinculo and Stephano, alternating with the tenderness of Miranda and Ferdinand, or the profound philosophic musings of Prospero—it is this wondrous blending of opposites that has made Lamb the most dearly loved of English men of letters. The chief authorities for Lamb are his own writings, and the Life and Letters (1837) and Final Memorials (1848) by Talfourd. Enlarged editions of these works are by Percy Fitzgerald (1875) and W. C. Hazlitt (1886). See, too, the memoir (1866) by B. W. Procter ('Barry Cornwall'); that by Ainger (1882); Life of Mary Lamb by Mrs Gilchrist (1883); The Lambs by Hazlitt (1897); the editions of Lamb by Ainger (1883-88), W. Macdonald (12 vols. 1902-3), and E. V. Lucas (in 7 vols., together with the Life in 2 vols., 1902-5).

Lamballe, MARIE THÉRÈSE LOUISE OF SAVOY-CARIGNAN, PRINCESSE DE, born at Turin, 8th September 1749, daughter of the Prince of Carignan, and in 1767 married Louis of Bourbon, Prince de Lamballe, but next year was left a widow. Beautiful and charming, she was made by Marie Antoinette superintendent of the household (1774), and her own intimate companion. She proved her devotion by returning to France (whence she had escaped to England, 1791) after the unsuccessful flight from Versailles, by sharing the queen's imprisonment in the Temple, and by refusing to take the oath expressing detestation of the king, queen, and monarchy (3d September 1792). As she stepped out of the court-room she was cut to the ground; her head was paraded on a pike in front of the queen's windows; and her heart was cooked and eaten. See Lives by Lescurie (1865), Bertin (2d ed. 1894), Sir Francis Montefiore (1896), and Miss B. C. Hardy (1908).

Lambe, JOHN, an astrologer, patronised by Buckingham, and mobbed to death in 1628.

Lambert, DANIEL (1770-1809), a fat man, weighing 739 lbs. (52½ stone). He was born at Leicester, and died at Stanford.

Lambert, JOHANN HEINRICH (1728-77), mathematician, was born at Mülhausen in Alsace, and died in Berlin, from 1764 a member of the Academy of Sciences. He first showed how scientifically to measure the intensity of light, in his Photometria (1760). A work of his on analytical logic (1764) was greatly valued by Kant. Among his other works are Kosmologische Briefe (1761) and Anlage zur Architektonik (1771). See Life by Huber (1829) and Baensch's monograph on his philosophy (1902).

Lambert, JOHN (1619-83), born at Calton near Settle, Yorkshire, studied at the Inns of Court, but on the outbreak of the Great Rebellion became a captain under Fairfax, and at Marston Moor led Fairfax's cavalry. Commissary-general of the army in the north (1645), and major-general of the northern counties (1647), he helped Cromwell to crush Hamilton at Preston, and captured Pontefract Castle in March 1649. In 1650 he went with Cromwell to Scotland as major-general, led the van at Dunbar, won the victory of Inverkeithing, followed Charles to Worcester, and at the battle commanded the troops on the eastern bank of the Severn. He helped to instal Oliver as protector, but opposed the proposition to declare him king, and became completely estranged from him. He headed the cabal which overthrew Richard Cromwell; was now looked upon as the leader of the Fifth Monarchy or extreme republican party; suppressed the royalist insurrection in Cheshire, August 1659; and virtually governed the country with his officers as the 'Committee of safety.' Monk's counter-plot frustrated his designs, and his soldiers melted away. He was sent to the Tower, tried in 1662, and banished to Guernsey.

Lambton, JOHN GEORGE. See DURHAM.

Lamennais, FÉLICITÉ-ROBERT DE, was born at St Malo, 16th June 1782, the son of a merchant and shipowner. After his eldest brother Jean was ordained a priest, the two retired in 1805 to the solitude of their joint estate of La Chesnaie near Dinan, and there the real education of Lamennais began. In 1807 he translated the Guide Spirituel of Louis de Blois: Napoleon's police suppressed his Réflexions sur l'État de l'Église (1808). He received the tonsure in March 1809. He taught mathematics in his brother's seminary, shared his quarrel with the new university, and wrote with him the ultramontane Tradition de l'Église sur l'Institution des Evêques (1814). In 1815, during the Hundred Days, he took refuge in London. In November he returned to Paris, and was ordained priest at Vannes. In 1816 he wrote the first volume of his famous Essai sur l'Indifférence en matière de Religion (1818-24), a magnificent, if paradoxical, denunciation of private judgment and toleration, since the unity of society depends ultimately on the unity of truth. In 1824 Lamennais received a flattering reception at Rome; but already notions of popular liberty appear in the Progrès de la Révolution (1829). The Revolution of July (1830) quickened his pulse, and in the L'Avenir, founded in September, with Lacordaire, Montalembert, and Gerbet, ideas strange to Ultramontanism were eagerly advocated. Jesuits and bishops took fright, and the journal was suspended in 1831. Lamennais and his friends set out for Rome to lay bare their hearts to the Holy Father, and he tells the disastrous story in Les Affaires de Rome (1836). A severe condemnation reached them at Munich (1832) on their way home. Lamennais signed obedience, but the iron had entered his soul, and he retired to La Chesnaie. The Paroles d'un Croquant (1834), a glowing poem rather than a treatise, expressed in rhythmical prose, brought about the complete rupture of the apostle with his old associates. His further books, Le Livre du Peuple, Une Voix de Prison, Du Passé et de l'Avenir du Peuple, were but weaker echoes of his masterpiece. For one he got a year's imprisonment in Sainte Pélagie. In the Revolution of 1848 he started paper after paper and poured forth a succession of pamphlets in spite of broken friendships, ill-health, and poverty; and his piety survived the shipwreck of his faith. He sat in the Constituent Assembly till the coup d'état. At his death, February 27, 1854, he refused to make his peace with the church, and was buried, by his own desire, without religious rites, among the poor at Pèrela-Chaise. Besides his Correspondance (3 vols. 1858-86), five posthumous volumes (1855-58) and his Œuvres Inédites (1866), Lamennais's works include Esquisse d'une Philosophie (1840-46), perhaps the most really remarkable of them all. See works by Blaize (1858), Janet (1890), Roussel (2 vols. 1892), Spuller (1892), Mercier (1894), and the Hon. W. Gibson (1896). [La-men-nay'.]

Lametrie, JULIEN OFFRAY DE (1709-51), philosopher, born at St Malo, became a French army surgeon in 1742; but the publication in 1745 of a materialistic work, L'Histoire Naturelle de l'Âme, roused such odium that he sought refuge in Leyden (1746). He published L'Homme Machine (1748), and escaped arrest by accepting an invitation from Frederick the Great. In Berlin he continued his materialistic studies in L'Homme Plante (1748), L'Art de Jouir (1751), La Volupté, &c. He also wrote satirical books against doctors. See a memoir by Frederick prefixed to his works (1774), and monographs by Quépat (1873), Du Bois-Reymond (1875), and Poritzky (1900).

Lamont, JOHANN VON (1805-79), born at Braemar, Aberdeenshire, was sent in 1817 to the Scottish seminary at Ratisbon, and became in 1835 director of the Observatory at Bogenhausen, in 1852 professor of Astronomy at Munich.

Lamorière, CHRISTOPHE LÉON JUCHAULT LE (1806-65), general, born at Nantes, entered the army in 1826, and served in Algeria 1833-47. Through his energy chiefly the war was brought to an end by the capture of Abd-el-Kader in 1847. In June 1848 he carried the Paris barricades and quelled the Socialists. He was war-minister under Cavaignac, but was banished at the coup d'état of 1851. He went to Rome in 1860, commanded the papal troops, but, defeated by Cialdini

(18th September), capitulated at Ancona. He died near Amiens. See Lives by Keller (new ed. 1891) and Rastoul (1894). [La-mor-is-yehr'.]

Lamothe, JEANNE DE VALOIS, COMTESSE DE (1756-91), an adventuress who duped the Cardinal de Rohan over the Diamond Necklace, and was branded and imprisoned (1786), but escaped (1787) to London, where she was killed by falling drunk from a three-story window. See her autobiography (1793), Carlyle's essay on the Diamond Necklace (1837), and books thereon by Vizetelly (new ed. 1880) and Auge (Par. 1889). [La-mot'.]

La Motte, ANTOINE HOUDAR DE (1672-1731), poet and playwright, was born and died in Paris.

La Motte Fouqué. See FOUQUÉ.

Lancaster, CHARLES WILLIAM (1820-78), a London gun-maker, an improver of rifled arms.

Lancaster, SIR JAMES, was a soldier and merchant in Portugal, visited the East Indies in 1591-94, and in 1595 captured Pernambuco. In 1600-8 he commanded the first fleet of the East India Company that visited the East Indies, and on his return was knighted. He promoted the voyages of Hudson, Baffin, &c., in search of the North-west Passage. He died in May 1618. See Markham's Voyages of Sir James Lancaster (1877).

Lancaster, JOSEPH (1778-1838), educationist, opened a school in London in 1798. He organised a corps of elder boys or monitors, to take charge of the rest and instruct them under his supervision. The system quickly found favour, and was taken up by the Nonconformists, while Andrew Bell and his rival system were supported by the Church of England. The Lancastrian schools were undenominational, and the Bible formed a large part of the teaching. The Royal Lancastrian Society, afterwards known as the British and Foreign School Society, was formed in 1808. Lancaster's enthusiasm was little controlled by prudence; he was thriftless and unmethodical. He quitted the Society in anger, emigrated in 1818 to the United States, and died poor at New York. See Life by Corston (1840).

Lance, GEORGE (1802-64), born at Little Easton near Dunmow, studied seven years under Haydon, but discovered that his strength lay in painting fruit, game, and similar subjects. He died at Sunnyside near Birkenhead.

Landells, EBENEZER (1808-60), a wood-engraver, the originator in 1841 of Punch, was born at Newcastle-on-Tyne, worked under Bewick, and in 1829 settled in London.—His eldest son, ROBERT THOMAS (1833-77), was a war artist for the Illustrated London News.

Lancret, NICOLAS (1690-1743), a Watteauque painter, was born and died in Paris. [Lonv-kray.]

Lander, RICHARD, traveller, born at Truro, 8th February 1805, in 1825 accompanied Clapperton as his servant to Sokoto. There Clapperton died, and Lander published an account of the expedition. The British government sent him and his brother John (1807-39) to make further researches along the lower Niger; and in 1830 they proved that the Niger falls by many mouths into the Bight of Benin, as described in their Journal (1832). During a third expedition, Richard Lander was wounded by Niger natives, and died at Fernando Po in February 1834. See Laird and Oldfield's Narrative of this Journey (1837).

Landesmann, HEINRICH ('Hieronymus Lorn'), a deaf and blind poet and prose-writer, born at Nikolsburg in Moravia in 1821, and died in 1902.

Landon, LETITIA ELIZABETH (L. E. L.), born in

Chelsea, August 14, 1802, published poems and three novels in 1824-38, besides contributing to 'Annuals,' the New Monthly Magazine, and the Literary Gazette. In 1838 she married Mr Maclean, governor of Cape Coast Castle; but, on 15th October, two months after her arrival, she died from an over-dose of prussic acid, taken for spasms. See Life by Blanchard (1841).

Landor, WALTER SAVAGE, was born at Warwick, 30th Jan. 1775, the son of an ex-doctor. At ten he was sent to Rugby, but was removed for insubordination; and from Trinity College, Oxford, which he entered in 1793, he was rusticated next year. Soon after publishing Poems in 1795, he quarrelled with his father, but was reconciled, and retired to South Wales on an allowance of £150 a-year. Gebir (1798), a poem showing the influence of Milton and Pindar, was the occasion of his lifelong friendship with Southey; but it was a failure. On his father's death in 1805 Landor settled in Bath, and lived beyond his now considerable income. In 1808, with a band of volunteers raised at his own expense, he went to Spain to free it from Bonaparte. Next year he purchased Llanthony Abbey, but soon quarrelled with neighbours and tenantry alike, and had ruin staring him in the face. In 1811 he married Miss Julia Thuillier, but the union proved an ill-assorted one, and in 1814 he left her in Jersey and crossed to France. Rejoined by his wife at Tours, he went in 1815 to Italy, where he remained at Como, Pisa, and Florence till 1835, with the exception of a short visit to England. Count Julian, lacking in all the qualities of a successful tragedy, had appeared in 1812; and to this period belongs his best-known work, Imaginary Conversations (i. and ii. 1824-1829). A second quarrel with his wife in 1835 led to his return to Bath till 1858. During these years he wrote the Examination of Shakespeare (1834), Pericles and Aspasia (1836), Pentameron (1837), Hellenics (1847), and Poemata et Inscriptiones (1847). In 1858 an unhappy scandal (see his Dry Sticks Fagoted), which involved him in an action for libel, again drove him to Italy; and at Florence he lived till his death, 17th Sept. 1864. His imposing personal appearance, his imperious will, and his massive intelligence made Landor one of the most original figures. By a narrow circle of English he is ranked with the great names of English literature. But most readers, while admitting that there are admirable passages in all his work, find its form essentially artificial. See Forster, Life and Works (2 vols. 1869; new ed. 1895); Sidney Colvin, Landor (1881); Mrs Lynn Linton in Fraser's, July 1870; Evans's Landor, a Critical Study (1892); and S. Wheeler's Letters of Landor (1897-99).—His grandson, A. HENRY SAVAGE LANDOR, born about 1873 in Florence, and educated there and in Paris, has travelled much in Japan, China, Corea, Australia, and Tibet, where he suffered severe torture. He has written Alone with the Haiyri Aivu (1893), In the Forbidden Land (1898), &c.

Landborough, DAVID, D.D. (1779-1854), born at Dalry, Kirkcudbrightshire, in 1811 became minister of Stevenston, after the Disruption (1843) Free Church minister of Saltcoats. A zealous naturalist, he published a well-known work on Arran (new ed. with memoir, 1875).—His son, WILLIAM, born at Stevenston, in 1862 crossed Australia from the Gulf of Carpentaria to Melbourne. He died at Brisbane in May 1886.

Landseer, SIR EDWIN HENRY, animal painter, son of the engraver. John Landseer, A.E.R.A.

(1769-1852), was born in London, 7th March 1802. He was carefully trained by his father to sketch animals from life, and began exhibiting at the Royal Academy when only thirteen; but his first noteworthy work was 'Fighting Dogs getting Wind' (1818). Down to about 1823 he was content to reproduce the natural expression and character of animals; after that date his animal pieces are generally made subservient to some sentiment or idea, without, however, losing their correctness and force of draughtsmanship. Dogs and deer were his favourite and best subjects; the scene of several fine pictures is laid in the Highlands of Scotland, which he first visited in 1824. In 1826 he was elected an A.R.A., in 1830 an R.A., and in 1850 was knighted. His 'Monarch of the Glen,' which in 1892 fetched 6900 guineas, was exhibited in 1851; the bronze lions at the foot of Nelson's Monument in Trafalgar Square were modelled by him (1859-66). Landseer was elected P.R.A. in 1866, but declined the honour. The last dozen years of his life were clouded by much mental suffering; he died October 1, 1873, and was buried in St Paul's. Most of Landseer's pictures are well known from the excellent engravings of them by his elder brother THOMAS (1796-1880). Another brother, CHARLES (1799-1879), was a historical painter. See works by Stephens (1880), Loftie (1891), Manson (1902).

Lane, EDWARD WILLIAM (1801-76), Arabic scholar, born at Hereford, the son of a prebendary, began life as an engraver; but the need of a warmer climate took him to Egypt, and with Egypt the whole of his subsequent work was connected. The result of his first (1825-28) and second (1833-35) visits was his Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians (1836; 5th ed. 1871), still the standard authority. This was followed by the annotated translation of the Thousand and One Nights (1838-40), which was the first accurate rendering, and by Selections from the Koran (1843). Lane's third visit to Egypt (1842-49) was devoted to laborious preparation for the great work of his life, the Arabic Lexicon (5 vols. 1863-74), completed (1876-90) by his grand-nephew, who also wrote his Life (1877).—That grand-nephew, STANLEY LANE-POOLE, was born in London, 18th Dec. 1854, and graduated from Corpus, Oxford, in 1878. He has written much on Oriental numismatics, Egypt, &c. In 1898-1904 he was Arabic professor at Dublin.—Edward's brother, RICHARD JAMES LANE (1800-72), born at Berkeley Castle, in 1827 was elected an A.E.R.A. Abandoning engraving for lithography, he made portraits of most of the royal family, and was lithographer to the Queen. His best lithographs (which number 1046) include Lawrence's cycle of George IV., Gainsborough's sketches, and many works of Leslie, Landseer, and G. Richmond. He was also no mean sculptor.

Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Pavia about 1005, and educated for the law. About 1039 he founded a school at Avranches, in 1041 became a Benedictine at Bee, and in 1046 was chosen prior. He contended against Berengarius in the controversy as to the real presence. He at first condemned the marriage of William of Normandy with his cousin, but in 1059 went to Rome to procure the papal dispensation; and in 1062 William made him prior of St Stephen's Abbey at Caen, and in 1070 Archbishop of Canterbury. He died 24th May 1089. His chief writings are Commentaries on the Epistles of St Paul, a Treatise against Berengarius, and Sermons. See French Life by Crozals (1877), Hook's Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, vol. ii., and Freeman's Norman Conquest, vols. ii.-v.

Lanfranco, GIOVANNI (1581-1647), religious painter, was born at Parma, and died in Rome.

Lanfrey, PIERRE (1828-77), historian and republican politician, was born at Chambéry, and died at Pau. His great work was his (hostile) Histoire de Napoleon I. (5 vols. 1867-75).

Lang, ANDREW, born at Selkirk, March 31, 1844, was educated at Edinburgh Academy, St Andrews University, and Balliol College, Oxford. He took a classical first-class, and was elected a fellow of Merton in 1868. Ere long he became one of the busiest and brightest writers in the world of London journalism. He has taken a foremost part in the controversy with Max Müller and his school about the interpretation of mythology and folk-tales. He was made LL.D. of St Andrews in 1885, and in 1888 was first Gifford lecturer there. Ballads and Lyrics of Old France (1872), Ballades in Blue China (1880), Helen of Troy (1882), Rhymes à la Mode (1884), Grass of Parnassus (1888), and Ballades of Books (1888) are volumes of graceful verse. Custom and Myth (1884), Myth, Ritual, and Religion (1887; 2d ed. 1899), Modern Mythology (1897), and The Making of Religion (1898) are solid contributions to the study of the philosophy and religion of primitive man. Other works have been The Library (1881), In the Wrong Paradise (1886), Books and Bookmen (1886), Letters to Dead Authors (1886), Lost Leaders (1889), Homer and the Epic (1893), a history of St Andrews (1894), a novel, The Monk of Fife (1895), Life of Lockhart (1896), Pickle the Spy (1897), Companions of Pickle (1898), and a History of Scotland (3 vols. 1899-1904), Prince Charles Edward (1900), The Mystery of Mary Stuart (1901), Magic and Religion (1901), Sir George Mackenzie (1909), and books on various historic mysteries. He has translated Theocritus and (with others) Homer.

Lange, FRIEDRICH ALBERT (1828-75), professor in Marburg, wrote a History of Materialism (1881).

Lange, JOHANN PETER (1802-84), theologian, born at Sonnborn near Elberfeld, in 1841 became professor of Theology at Zurich, in 1854 at Bonn. His best-known works are a Life of Jesus Christ (1839; Eng. trans. by Marcus Dods), treatises on dogmatics (1849-52), Christian ethics (1878), and his great Bibelwerk (1857 et seq.).

Langevin, SIR HECTOR LOUIS, Q.C. (1826-1906), Canadian statesman, born in Quebec, was called to the bar in 1850. He became Secretary of State in 1867, Minister of Public Works (1869-73), Postmaster-general (1878), and Minister of Finance (1879-91). He was created K.C.M.G. in 1881. [Lon'zh-van'.]

Langham, SIMON, born at Langham in Rutland, became prior and abbot of Westminster (1349), treasurer of England (1360), Bishop of Ely (1362), chancellor (1363), Archbishop of Canterbury (1366), and a cardinal (1368). He died at Avignon, 22d July 1376. See vol. iv. of Hook's Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury.

Langhorne, JOHN (1735-79), born at Winton, Kirkby Stephen, from 1766 was rector of Blagdon, Somerset. He wrote poems and, with his brother, the Rev. WILLIAM LANGHORNE (1721-72), translated Plutarch's Lives (6 vols. 1770).

Langland, or LANGLEY, WILLIAM, the supposed name of the author of Piers the Plowman, who was born about 1332, probably at Clebury Mortimer in Shropshire; became a clerk, but, having married early, could not take more than minor orders, and earned a poor living by singing the placebo, dirige, and 'seven psalms' for men's souls, and by copying legal documents. He lived many years in London, and poverty seems to have made him embittered and somewhat churlish in disposition. The last trace of him is in his poem of Richard the Redeles, from which we learn that he was at Bristol in 1399. His famous Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman has great defects as a work of art, but the moral earnestness and energy of the author sometimes glow into really noble poetry, particularly in his invectives against injustice and wrong, the idleness and pride of the clergy, and the dissolute habits of the mendicant friars. The theological discussions are not seldom tedious, but are brightened by vivid glimpses of the life of the poorer classes. The conception of the Plowman grows as the poem proceeds, and from a mere honest labourer he passes into Christ Himself. The verse is alliterative. The earlier editions were superseded by Prof. Skeat's for the Early English Text Society (1867-84; new ed., Clar. Press, 1886). See Jusserand, La Poésie Mystique de William Langland (1893; trans. 1894), and the modern prose version of the Vision by Kate E. Warren (1895). A new theory of multiple authorship was advanced by Prof. Manly in the Cambridge English Literature, vol. ii. (1908).

Langton, BENNET (1737-1801), a Lincolnshire gentleman and militia officer, one of Johnson's greatest friends. See Birkbeck Hill, Dr Johnson, his Friends and his Critics (1878).

Langton, STEPHEN, was born about 1150 (in what part of England is not known), and educated at the University of Paris. His friend and fellow-student Pope Innocent III. in 1206 gave him a post in his household and made him a cardinal. On the disputed election to the see of Canterbury in 1205-7 Langton was recommended by the pope, and, having been elected, was consecrated by Innocent himself at Viterbo, June 27, 1207. His appointment was resisted by King John, and Langton was kept out of the see until 1213, living mostly at Pontigny. He sided warmly with the barons against John, and his name is the first of the subscribing witnesses of Magna Charta. Although the pope excommunicated the barons, Langton refused to publish the excommunication, and was suspended from his functions in 1215. Reinstated (1218) in his see, he died July 9, 1228. See Hook's Archbishops of Canterbury, vol. ii. (1861).

Langtry, LILLIE (LADY DE BATHE), née LE BRETON, born in 1852, daughter of the Dean of Jersey, married in 1874 and 1899, and in 1881 went on the stage.

Lanigan, JOHN, D.D. (1758-1828), born at Cashel, studied and taught in Italy (1776-96), having taken R.C. orders, and then was a librarian in Dublin. He wrote a Church History of Ireland to the 13th century (4 vols. 1822).

Lankester, SIR EDWIN RAY, zoologist, the son of Dr Edwin Lankester (1814-74), scientific writer, was born in London, 15th May 1847. Educated at St Paul's School and at Christ Church, Oxford, he was fellow and tutor of Exeter College, and in 1898-1907 was Director of the Natural History Departments in the British Museum. Among his numerous writings are Comparative Longevity (1871), Degeneration (1880), Advancement of Science (1890), and Zoological Articles from the Enc. Brit. (1891).

Lanier, SIDNEY (1842-81), poet, was born at Macon, Ga., and died at Lynn, N.C., having been a Confederate private in Virginia, an advocate at Macon, a flute-player at Baltimore, and a lecturer on English literature at Johns Hopkins University. Twelve volumes by him of verse and prose appeared during 1867-84. [Lan-eeer.]

Lanjuinais, JEAN DENIS (1753-1827), a Girondist statesman, born at Rennes, and made a count by Napoleon, a peer by Louis XVIII. See Life by his son, prefixed to his Œuvres Complètes (4 vols. 1832). [Lons-zhwee-nuy.]

Lannes, JEAN, DUKE OF MONTEBELLO (1769-1809), French marshal, was born, the son of a livery-stable keeper, at Lectoure (Gers), entered the army in 1792, and by his conspicuous bravery in the Italian campaign fought his way up to be general of brigade by 1796. He rendered Napoleon important service on the 18th Brumaire. On 9th June 1800 he won the battle of Montebello, and had a distinguished share at Marengo, Austerlitz, Jena, Eylau, and Friedland, and took Saragossa. In 1809 he commanded the centre at Aspern (22d May), where he was mortally wounded. See Life by Thoumas (Par. 1891). [Lann.]

Lansdowne, HENRY PETTY-FITZMAURICE, third MARQUIS OF, was the son of the first marquis, better known as the Earl of Shelburne (q.v.), and was born in London, July 2, 1780. He received his education at Westminster School, Edinburgh University, and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1801, and was returned for Calne next year. An opponent of Pitt, he led in the attack on Lord Melville (1803), and on Pitt's death (1806) succeeded him as member for Cambridge University, and also as Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Grenville administration, but held office for about a year only. In 1809 he succeeded by the death of his half-brother to the marquise. A cautious Liberal, he in 1826 entered the Canning cabinet; and in the brief Goderich administration (1827-28) presided at the Foreign Office. When, in 1830, the Whigs came into power under Lord Grey, Lansdowne became President of the Council, and helped to pass the Reform Bill of 1832. He held office, with a short interval, till 1841. In 1846, under Russell, he resumed his post, taking with it the leadership of the Lords, and held it till 1852, when he was requested to form an administration, but consented to serve without office in the Aberdeen coalition. When that ministry fell in 1855, he was again offered the premiership, but again declined. He formed a great library and a valuable collection of pictures and statuary. He died at Bowood, January 31, 1863.

Lansdowne, HENRY CHARLES KEITH PETTY-FITZMAURICE, fifth MARQUIS OF, was born January 14, 1845, and was educated at Eton and Balliol College, Oxford. He succeeded to the marquise in 1866, from 1868 held minor offices in the Liberal administration, and in 1872-74 was Under-secretary for War. In 1880 he became Under-secretary for India, but resigned owing to a difference with Mr Gladstone over the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill. He was Governor-general of Canada (1883-88), and of India (1888-94), War Secretary in 1895-1900, and in 1900-1905 Foreign Secretary, promoting the entente with the United States and France and the treaties with Japan.

Lanzi, LUIGI (1732-1810), a Jesuit antiquary, held Etruscan to be akin with Latin, Oscan, Umbrian, and Greek; his History of Painting in Italy (1792-1806) was translated by Roscoe (1828). See Life by Cappi (1840). [Lan-tzee.]

Lào-tsze ('Old Philosopher') is said to have been the founder of Taoism, which shares the allegiance of the Chinese with Confucianism and Buddhism. He seems to have been born in 604 B.C., and was for some time a curator of the royal library at Loh in Ho-nan. The date of his death is unknown. The treatise called the Tao Teh King is our sole record of his teaching. The character Tao properly means 'path,' 'course,' or 'way;' and Lao-tsze's 'great way' is a metaphorical expression for the way in which things came at first into being, and in which the phenomena of nature go on quietly without striving. The secret of good government is to let men alone. The appeal to arms is hateful. All learning is injurious. The wisdom of men defeats its own ends. Humility, gentleness, and economy are the 'three precious possessions.' Lao-tsze even exhorts to 'recompensing injury with kindness.' The origin of Taoism as a religion cannot be placed earlier than our 1st century. See works by Stanislas Julien (1842), Chalmers (1848), Strauss (1870), and Plänckner (1870); Douglas, Confucianism and Taoism (1879); Legge, Religions of China (1880); Balfour, Taoist Texts (1884).

La Pérouse, JEAN FRANÇOIS DE GALAUP, COMTE DE, born at Guo near Albi, 22d August 1741, distinguished himself in the naval war against England (1778-83) by destroying the forts of the Hudson Bay Company. In 1785, in command of an expedition of discovery, he visited the north-west coast of America, explored the north-eastern coasts of Asia, and sailed through La Pérouse Strait between Saghalien and Yezo. In 1788 he sailed from Botany Bay; after that all trace of him was lost, till in 1826 it was ascertained that his two ships had been wrecked on a coral-reef off Vanikoro, north of the New Hebrides. Part of his journals had been sent home and was published as Voyage autour du Monde (1797). See Life by Marcel (1888). [Pay-roos.]

Laplace, PIERRE SIMON, MARQUIS DE, mathematician and astronomer, born 28th March 1749, was the son of a poor farmer at Beaumont-en-Auge near Trouville. He studied at Caen, and, after teaching mathematics, went to Paris and, as professor in the Royal Military School, became famous for his mastery of the whole range of mathematical science and its application to practical astronomy. He was chosen an associate of the Academy of Sciences in 1773 and member in 1785. His great generalisation that our planetary system is stable bestowed upon astronomy the 'Three Laws of Laplace.' He explained the 'secular inequalities' in the motions of Jupiter and Saturn. He was the first to construct a complete theory of the satellites of Jupiter, and his investigation of the tidal theory was one of his greatest achievements. He helped to establish the Polytechnic and Normal Schools in Paris, and was president of the Bureau des Longitudes. Bonaparte made him Minister of the Interior, but superseded him in six weeks. In 1799 Laplace entered the senate; in 1803 he was appointed its chancellor. A count under the empire, he was created in 1815 a peer, in 1817 a marquis, by Louis XVIII. Elected to the Academy in 1816, he was next year appointed president; and he died 5th March 1827. He published many treatises on lunar and planetary problems, molecular physics, electricity, and magnetism. Mécanique Céleste (1799-1825) stands alone amongst works on mathematical astronomy. Le Système du Monde (1796; 6th ed. 1824), written for non-mathematicians, is a clear statement of all the leading astronomical facts and theories.

In a note at the end of the later editions occurs the famous Nebular Hypothesis. In 1784 Laplace issued his Théorie des Planètes, and in 1812-14-20 his Théorie analytique des Probabilités. The last remains a classical work to algebraists. His Œuvres complètes were issued by the Academy (13 vols. 1878-98). [La-plass'.]

Lappenberg, JOHANN MARTIN (1794-1865), was keeper of the Hamburg archives for forty years. His best-known work is his Geschichte von England (1834-37), continued by Pauli (1853-58), and trans. into Eng. by Thorpe (1845-57). He also completed Sartorius's history of the Hanse towns, wrote on the history of Heligoland and the Steelyard in London, and edited documents relating to Hamburg and Bremen, sundry old chroniclers, &c. See Memoir by Meyer (1867).

Laprade, VICTOR DE (1812-83), poet, was born at Montbrison and died in Lyons. See Lives by Condamin (1886) and L. Roux (1888).

Lardner, DIONYSIUS, was born in Dublin, 3d April 1793, and, after four years as clerk to his father, a solicitor, entered Trinity College. He attracted attention by works on algebraic geometry (1823) and the calculus (1825), but is best known as the originator and editor of Lardner's Cyclopaedia (132 vols. 1830-44). This was followed by the historical Cabinet Library (12 vols. 1830-32) and Museum of Science and Art (12 vols. 1854-56). In 1828 Lardner had been appointed professor of Natural Philosophy and Astronomy in University College, London; but in 1840, married man though he was, he ran away with the wife of an army officer, went to the United States, and made £40,000 by lecturing. He lived in Paris 1845-59, and died at Naples 29th April 1859.

Lardner, NATHANIEL (1684-1768), English Non-conformist (ultimately Unitarian) divine, was born and died at Hawkhurst in Kent. He wrote Credibility of the Gospel History (2 vols. 1727 and 12 vols. 1733-55) and Jewish and Heathen Testimonies (1764-67). See Life by Kippis prefixed to his works (10 vols. 1788).

Largillière, NICOLAS (1656-1746), portrait-painter, was born and died in Paris, having lived for some years in England. [Lar-zheel-yehr.]

La Rochefoucauld, FRANÇOIS, DUC DE, born at Paris 15th September 1613, devoted himself to the cause of the queen in opposition to Richelieu, and became entangled in a series of love-adventures and political intrigues, the result being that he was forced to live in exile from 1639 to 1642. About 1645 he formed a liaison with Mme de Longueville. He then joined the Frondeurs and was wounded at the siege of Paris. In 1652, wounded again, he retired to the country. On Mazarin's death in 1661 he repaired to the court of Louis XIV., and about the same time began his liaison with Mme de Sablé. A surreptitious edition of his Mémoires, written in retirement, was published in 1662; as it gave wide offence he disavowed its authorship. His Réflexions, ou Sentences et Maximes Morales, appeared in 1665. His last years were brightened by his friendship with Mme de La Fayette, which lasted until he died, March 17, 1680. For brevity, clearness, and finish of style the Maxims could hardly be excelled. Their author was a remorseless analyst of man's character, tracks out self-love in its most elusive forms and under its cunningest disguises, and forgets that self-love is not the sole motive by which men are impelled. The best edition of La Rochefoucauld's works is that by D. L. Gilbert and J. Gourdault (1868-84). See work in German by Rahstede (Brunsw. 1888) and French by Bourdeau (1895). [Rosh'-foo-kō.]

Larochejaquelein, Du Verger de, an old noble family named from a place in Poitou.—HENRI, Comte de Larochejaquelein (1772-94), after 10th August 1792 headed the insurgent royalists in La Vendée. He for a time successfully repelled the republican forces, but was defeated on 21st December 1793. He raised a new body of troops, but was killed at Nouaillé, 4th March 1794.—His brother, LOUIS DU VERGER, Marquis de Larochejaquelein (1777-1815), emigrated at the Revolution, returned to France in 1801, and in 1813 headed the royalists in La Vendée. Louis XVIII. gave him in 1814 the command of the army of La Vendée, where, during the Hundred Days, he maintained the royalist cause, supported by the British. He fell at Pont-des-Mathis, 4th June 1815. His wife, MARIE-LOUISE VICTOIRE (1772-1857), published valuable Mémoires de la war (1815). See her Life by Nettement (3d ed. 1876). Larrey, JEAN DOMINIQUE, BARON (1766-1842), French surgeon, born at Beaudéan near Bagnères-de-Bigorre, served as a naval surgeon, and in 1793 joining the army, introduced the 'flying ambulance' service. From 1797 he accompanied Napoleon in his campaigns, became head of the army medical department, and a baron. He wrote on army surgery and the treatment of wounds. See German memoir by Werner (1885).

La Salle, ANTOINE DE (c. 1398-1470), born in Burgundy or Touraine, lived at the courts of Provence and Flanders, and wrote Chronique du petit Jehan de Saintré, a knightly romance (ed. by Hellény 1890), Quinze Joyes de Mariage (ed. by Jonaust, 1887), and Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles (ed. by Thomas Wright, Par. 1858). La Salle, JEAN BAPTISTE, ABBÉ DE (1651-1719), a canon of Rheims, his birthplace, the founder in 1684 of the Brothers of Christian Schools.

La Salle, ROBERT CAVELIER, SIEUR DE (1643-87), French explorer, was born at Rouen, and, in Canada at twenty-three, descended the Ohio and Mississippi to the sea (1682). Two years later an expedition was fitted out to establish a French settlement on the Gulf of Mexico. But La Salle spent two years in fruitless journeys, while his harshness embittered his followers, and he was assassinated. See works by Parkman (q.v.).

Las'caris, CONSTANTINE, after the capture of Constantinople by the Turks, fled to Italy, and revived the study of Greek at Rome, Naples, and Messina, where he died in 1493. His Greek grammar (1476) was the first Greek book printed in Italy. His library is now in the Escorial.—JOHN or JANUS LASCARIS (c. 1445-1535) collected MSS. for Lorenzo de Medici, taught Greek, and on Lorenzo's death went to Paris, and finally was employed in literary work and diplomatic missions to France and Venice by Leo X. He died at Rome. He edited Greek classics, and wrote grammars, letters, and epigrams. See works by Villainain (1825), Vast (1878), and P. de Nolhac (1856).

Las Casas, BARTOLOMÉ DE, the 'Apostle of the Indians,' was born at Seville in 1474. He sailed in the third voyage of Columbus, and in 1502 went to Hispaniola. Eight years later he was ordained to the priesthood. In 1511 he accompanied Diego Velasquez to Cuba, assisted in the pacification of the island, and was rewarded by a commandery of Indians. But ere long love for the unhappy natives filled his heart; he gave up his own slaves, and went to Spain, where he prevailed on Cardinal Ximenes to send a commission of inquiry to the West Indies. He revisited Spain to secure stronger measures; and finally, to prevent the extirpation of the natives, he proposed that the colonists should be permitted to import negro slaves—a proposal only too readily acceded to. He also attempted to carry out Castilian peasants as colonists, but failed, and spent eight years (1522-30) in a convent in Hispaniola. In 1530 he again visited Spain, and, after missionary travels in Mexico, Nicaragua, Peru, and Guatemala, returned to devote four years to the cause of the Indians, writing his Veynte Razones and Brevissima Relacion. Appointed Bishop of Chiapa, he was received (1544) with hostility by the colonists, returned to Spain, and resigned his see (1547). He still contended with the authorities in favour of the Indians until his death in Madrid, July 1566. His most important work, the unfinished Historia de las Indias, was first printed in 1875-76. See Life by Sir Arthur Helps (1868).

Las Cases, EMMANUEL DIEUDONNÉ, COMTE DE (1766-1842), was a lieutenant in the French navy, but fled to England at the Revolution. After Napoleon became consul, he started as bookseller in Paris; his Atlas historique (1803-4) attracted the attention of the emperor, who made him a baron and employed him in the administration. After Waterloo he shared Napoleon's exile in St Helena, but was sent back in 1816 to Europe, and published Mémorial de Ste-Hélène (1821-23).

Lasco, JOHANNES A. or JAN LASKI (1499-1560), Polish reformer, was highly born at Lask, Piotrkow. He was ordained priest in 1521, and in 1523 at Basel came in contact with Erasmus and Farel. Caught in the current of the Reformation, he left home in 1538, and about 1540 moved to East Friesland, where he established a presbyterian form of church government as superintendent at Emden. In 1550, on Cranmer's invitation, he became head of a congregation of Protestant refugees in London. Mary's accession in 1553 drove him back to Emden, and he finally returned to Poland in 1556. See Dalton's unfinished John a Lasco (Eng. trans. from the German, 1886), and Pascal's Jean a Lasco (Par. 1894).

Lasker, EDUARD (1829-84), Prussian Liberal politician, was born of Jewish parentage in Posen, and died at New York on a visit to America.

Lasker, EMANUEL, Prussian chess-player, born 25th Dec. 1868, defeated Blackburne (1892), Steinitz (1894), and won the Moscow first prize (1897).

Lassalle, FERDINAND, social democrat, was born, the son of a rich Jewish merchant, at Breslau, April 11, 1825. A disciple of Hegel, he wrote a work on Heraclitus (published 1858), and in Paris made the acquaintance of Heine. On his return to Berlin he met in 1844-45 the Countess Sophie Hatzfeld (1805-81), a lady at variance with her husband, prosecuted her cause before thirty-six tribunals, and after eight years of litigation forced the husband to a compromise favourable to the countess. He took part in the revolution of 1848, and for an inflammatory speech got six months in prison. He lived in the Rhine country till 1857, when he returned to Berlin, and wrote his System der erworbenen Rechte (1861). At Leipzig he founded the Universal German Working-men's Association to agitate for universal suffrage. In 1863-64 he tried to win the Rhineland and Berlin to his cause; in his Bastiat-Schulze, or Capital and Labour, he attacked Schulze-Delitzsch, the representative of Liberalism. In 1864 Lassalle met Helene von Dönniges, and they resolved to marry in spite of the strongest opposition from her parents. Under pressure from them she at last renounced Lassalle in favour of the Wallachian Count Racowitza; the rejected sent to both father and lover a challenge, which was accepted by the latter. At Geneva Lassalle fell mortally wounded, and died two days afterwards, August 31, 1864. He taught that Europe's historical development is to culminate in a democracy of labour, in which political interests shall be subservient to social—the social democracy. The democracy of workers are to be guided by science and the highest ideals of culture and morality. But they need organisation, which they will find in the state, and this is and should be simply the great association of workers, the overwhelming majority of every community. Lassell, WILLIAM (1799-1880), astronomer, born at Bolton, built an observatory at Starfield near Liverpool, where he constructed and mounted equatorial reflecting telescopes. He discovered several planetary satellites; at Malta with a larger reflecting telescope made observations 1861-65; and then settled near Maidenhead.

Lassen, CHRISTIAN (1800-76), orientalist, born at Bergen, assisted Schlegel and Eugène Burnouf, and was professor of Ancient Indian Languages at Bonn from 1830 till he became blind in 1864. Amongst his most important books are works on Persian Cuneiforms (1836-45), the Greek Kings in Bactria (1838), Prakrit (1837), and Indian civilisation (1844-61; new ed. 1867-74).

Lassen, EDUARD (1830-1904), composer, was born at Copenhagen and educated at Brussels.

Lassus, ORLANDUS, OR ORLANDO DI LASSO (1532-94), composer of 2337 masses, motettes, &c., was born at Mons, and died at Munich, having visited Italy, England, and France, and been ennobled by Maximilian II. in 1570. See Lives by Declève (Mons, 1894) and Destouches (Mun. 1894).

Latham, JOHN, M.D. (1740-1837), ornithologist, born at Eltham, lived from 1796 at Romsey.

Latham, ROBERT GORDON, ethnologist and philologist, was born at Billingborough vicarage, Lincolnshire, 24th March 1812. From Eton he passed in 1829 to King's College, Cambridge, of which he was elected fellow. From 1842 (when he took his M.D.) to 1849 he held appointments in London hospitals; in 1839 he became professor of English in University College, London, a tour six years before in Denmark and Norway having directed his attention to Scandinavian philology. Norway and the Norwegians (1840) was followed by English Language (1841), Natural History of the Varieties of Mankind (1850), Ethnology of the British Colonies (1851), Ethnology of the British Islands (1852), Man and his Migrations (1851), Descriptive Ethnology (1859), Ethnology of Europe (1852), Native Races of the Russian Empire (1854), a new edition of Johnson's Dictionary (1870), Outlines of General Philology (1878). In Elements of Comparative Philology (1862) he advanced the view, since affirmed by Penka, Schrader, Isaac Taylor, and Sayce, that the Aryan race originated in Europe. He died at Putney, 9th March 1888. In 1863 he received a government pension of £100. See obituary by T. Watts-Dunton in Athenæum (17th March 1888). [Lay'tham.]

Latimer, HUON, Protestant martyr, was born, a yeoman's son, at Thurcaston near Leicester, in 1490 or 1491. He was sent at fourteen to Cambridge, in 1510 was elected a fellow of Clare, and was in 1522 appointed a university preacher. In 1524 for his B.D. thesis he delivered a philippic against Melancthon, for he was, in his own words, 'as obstinate a papist as any in England.' Next year, however, through Bilney (q.v.), he 'began to smell the Word of God, forsaking the school doctors and such fooleries,' and soon becoming noted as a zealous preacher of the reformed doctrines. One of the Cambridge divines appointed to examine the lawfulness of Henry's marriage, he declared on the king's side; and he was made chaplain to Anne Boleyn and rector of West Kington in Wiltshire. In 1535 he was consecrated Bishop of Worcester; and at the opening of Convocation in June 1536 he preached two powerful sermons urging on the Reformation. As that work rather retrograded, Latimer, out of favour at court, retired to his diocese, and laboured there in a continual round of 'teaching, preaching, exhorting, writing, correcting, and reforming.' Twice during Henry's reign he was sent to the Tower, in 1539 and 1546, on the former occasion resigning his bishopric. At Edward VI.'s accession he declined to resume his episcopal functions, but devoted himself to preaching and practical works of benevolence. Under Mary he was (1554) examined at Oxford, and committed to jail, where he lay for more than a twelvemonth. In September 1555, with Ridley and Cramer, he was found guilty of heresy, and on 16th October was burned with Ridley opposite Balliol College, exclaiming, 'Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man: we shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England as I trust shall never be put out.' His powerful, homely, humorous sermons, letters, &c. were edited, with a memoir, by the Rev. G. Elwes Corrie (2 vols. 1844-45). See Lives by Gilpin (1755), the Rev. R. Demaus (3d ed. 1886), and J. J. Ellis (1890).

Latini, BRUNETTO (c. 1210-95), a Florentine statesman, author during his banishment to France of the encyclopædic Livres dou Trésor, as also of an Italian poem. [La-tee'-nee.]

La Tour d'Auvergne, THÉOPHILE MALO CORRET DE, born 23d November 1743, at Carhaix in Finistère, enlisted in 1767, distinguished himself at Port Mahon in 1782, steadily refused advancement, and was killed, a simple captain, 28th June 1800 at Oberhausen in Bavaria. His remains were interred in the Panthéon in 1889. French biographies are full of instances of his daring valour, Spartan simplicity of life, and chivalrous affection for his friends. He wrote a book on the Breton language and antiquities (1792). See Lives by Buhot de Kersers (2d ed. 1874) and Simond (1895). [La-toor' dō-vayr-nye.]

Latude, HENRI MASERS DE (1725-1805), was a young artillery officer sought to secure Madame de Pompadour's favour by revealing a plot to poison her. The plot was of his own contriving, and he was sent to the Bastille in 1749, where, spite of daring efforts to escape, he remained till released in 1777, on condition of living in his native village of Montagnac in Languedoc. But having come to Paris again, he was imprisoned till 1784. At the Revolution he was treated as a victim of despotism. See monograph by Thierry (1792; re-edited by Bertin, 1889). [La-teed.]

Laube, HEINRICH (1808-84), playwright and manager, was born at Sprottau in Silesia and died in Vienna. [Low'beh.]

Laud, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Reading, a well-to-do clothier's son, 7th October 1573. From Reading free school he passed at sixteen to St John's College, Oxford, of which four years later he became a fellow. Ordained in 1601, he made himself obnoxious to the university authorities by his open antipathy to the dominant Puritanism; but his solid learning, his amazing industry, his administrative capacity, his sincere and unselfish churchmanship, soon won him friends and patrons. One of these was Charles Blount, Earl of Devonshire, whom in 1605 Laud married to the divorced Lady Rich (an offence that ever weighed heavy on his conscience); another was Buckingham, to whom he became confessor in 1622, having a month previously disputed before him and the countess his mother with Fisher the Jesuit. Meanwhile he rose steadily from preferment to preferment—incumbent of five livings (1607-10), D.D. (1608), president of his old college and king's chaplain (1611), prebendary of Lincoln (1614), Archdeacon of Huntingdon (1615), Dean of Gloucester (1616), prebendary of Westminster and Bishop of St Davids (1621), Bishop of Bath and Wells, Dean of the Chapel Royal, and a privy-councillor (1626), Bishop of London (1628), Chancellor of Oxford (1630), and finally Archbishop of Canterbury (1633), in the very week that he received two offers of a cardinal's hat. Already, after Buckingham's assassination, he had virtually become the first minister of the crown, one with Strafford and Charles I. in the triumvirate whose aim was absolutism in church and state. Laud's task was to raise the English Church to its rightful position of a branch of the Church Catholic, to root out Calvinism in England and Presbyterianism in Scotland. In the former country he drew up a list of 'Orthodox' and 'Puritan' ministers, whom he proceeded to separate by scolding, suspending, depriving. Freedom of worship was withdrawn from Wallon and French refugees; Englishmen abroad were forbidden to attend Calvinistic services; and at home 'gospel preaching,' justification by faith, and Sabbatarianism were to be superseded by an elaborate ritual, by the doctrine of the real presence, celibacy, and confession, and by the Book of Sports—changes rigorously enforced by the court of High Commission and the Star Chamber. In Scotland Laud's attempt (1635-37) to Anglicise the Scottish Church gave birth to the riot in St Giles', Edinburgh, that riot to the Covenant, the Covenant and the 'Bishops' war,' and this to the meeting of the Long Parliament, which on 18th December 1640 impeached the archbishop of treason, and ten weeks later sent him to the Tower. He would not escape (Grotius urged him to do so); and at last, after a tedious and complicated trial before a handful of peers, on 17th December 1644 he was voted 'guilty of endeavouring to subvert the laws, to overthrow the Protestant religion, and to act as an enemy to Parliament.' The judges declared that this was not treason; but under an unconstitutional ordinance of attainder, he was beheaded on Tower Hill, 10th January 1645. He was buried first in the church of All-Hallows, Barking, and in 1663 translated to the chapel of St John's at Oxford. Of Laud's works (7 vols. Anglo-Catholic Library, 1847-60) the most interesting is his Diary, published in 1694. Peter Heylin, Laud's chaplain, first wrote his biography, Cyprianus Anglicanus (1668); and there are modern Lives by Le Bas (1836), Mozley (1845; republished in Essays, 1878), Hook (Lives of Archbishops, 1875), A. C. Benson (1887), Simpkinson (1894), and W. H. Hutton (1895).

Lauder, SIR JOHN. See FOUNTAINHALL.

Lauder, ROBERT SCOTT (1803-69), painter, born near Edinburgh, in 1829 became R.S.A. He lived in Italy and at Munich in 1833-38, then in London till 1849, when he returned to Edinburgh.—His brother, JAMES ECKFORD LAUDER, R.S.A. (1811-69), was also a painter.

Lauder, SIR THOMAS DICK (1784-1848), eldest son of Sir Andrew Lauder of Fountainhall, Haddingtonshire, served for a time in the Cameron Highlanders, married in 1808 the heiress of Relugas in Elginshire, succeeded to the baronetcy in 1820, and lived at the Grange near Edinburgh from 1832 until his death. For the last nine years of his life he was secretary to the Board of Scottish Manufactures. Of Lauder's two romances, Lochandhu (1825) and The Wolfe of Badenoch (1827), the latter is still popular. But his best works are his Morayshire Floods (1830) and unfinished Scottish Rivers, which appeared in Tait's Magazine 1847-49. His Legendary Tales of the Highlands (1841) may also be mentioned. He was a Liberal, and of unwearingly public spirit. See Dr John Brown's preface to the reprint of Scottish Rivers (1874).

Lauder, WILLIAM (c. 1680-1771), a one-legged Edinburgh scholar, who, having shortly before come to London, sought in 1747-50 by impudent forgeries to prove Milton a plagiarist. He died poor in Barbadoes.

Lauderdale, JOHN MAITLAND, DUKE OF, was born at Lethington (now Lennoxlove) near Haddington, 24th May 1616. He simulated ardent zeal for the Covenant, and in 1643 was a Scottish commissioner at the Westminster Assembly. He succeeded his father as second Earl of Lauderdale in 1645, was taken prisoner at Worcester in 1651, and lay nine years in the Tower, at Windsor, and at Portland. At the Restoration he became Scottish Secretary of State, and for the first seven years he was engaged in an incessant struggle to maintain his place against rivals. His main object was to bring about the absolute power of the crown in church and state, and for this end he laboured with unceasing persistence. His harsh measures goaded the peasants of the west country into the rebellion of 1666, but the inbringing of the 'Highland host' there in 1677-8 lies on the shoulders of the bishops no less than on Lauderdale's. He formed a militia of 20,000 men, and drilled the Episcopal Church into complete subservience. A member of the privy-council, he had a seat in the Cabal ministry, and was created duke in 1672. Fresh intrigues against him (1674) were foiled by his own ability and the king's regard for him. In May 1678 a vote was carried in the Commons praying for Lauderdale's removal from the royal presence for ever; but through corrupt practices, it was thrown out by a single vote. Another short struggle with Hamilton in the Convention of Estates left him again triumphant for two years more. In order to marry the ambitious Lady Dysart, it was alleged he hastened the death of his countess. He had but one daughter, and his dukedom died with him, while the earldom passed to his brother. He died at Tunbridge Wells, 20th August 1682, and was buried at Haddington. See Osmund Airy in Quarterly (1884) and English Historical (1886), and his selection (Camden Soc. 1884-85) from the Lauderdale MSS. in the British Museum.

Laurence, SAMUEL (1812-84), a portrait-painter, born at Guildford, well known by his crayon-drawings of Spedding, Thackeray, Thompson of Trinity, Carlyle, 'George Eliot', Lowell, &c.

Laurier, SIR WILFRID, P.C., G.C.M.G. (1897), born in 1841, rose to distinction at the Canadian bar, in 1877 held a post in the Liberal ministry, and in 1896-1911—when he was defeated on reciprocity with the U.S.—was premier of the Dominion.

Lauriston, ALEXANDRE JACQUES BERNARD LAW, MARQUIS DE (1768-1828), a French marshal, was a grand-nephew of John Law (q.v.), the financier, and was born at Pondicherry. He was Napoleon's comrade at the Artillery School, filled diplomatic appointments at Copenhagen and London, held high commands at Wagram (1809) and in the retreat from Moscow (1812), fought at Bantzen (1813) and Katsbach, and was taken prisoner at Leipzig. Already ennobled, he was made a peer by Louis XVIII., and became marquis in 1817 and marshal in 1821.

Lauzun, ANTOINE NOMPAR DE CAUMONT, DUC DE (1633-1723), a Gascon favourite of Louis XIV.'s, who, however, imprisoned him for five years at Pignerol. In 1688 he conducted Mary of Modena in her flight from London to Paris. Armand Louis de Gontaut, Duc de Biron (q.v.), also formerly bore the title of Duc de Lauzun.

Lavalette, ANTOINE MARIE CHAMANS, COMTE DE (1769-1830), a Napoleonic general, who after the second Bourbon restoration (1815) was condemned to death, but escaped by changing clothes with his wife, a niece of the Empress Josephine, and with the assistance of Gen. Sir R. Wilson. In 1822 he received permission to return to France. See his Memoirs (Eng. trans. 1894).

La Vallière, LOUISE FRANÇOISE DE LABAUME LEBLANC, DUCHESSE DE (1644-1710), born at Tours of an ancient and noble family, was brought to court by her mother. She was not a great beauty, and was slightly lame; but the winning charm of her manners and the sweetness of her face quickly captured the affections of Louis XIV., whose mistress she became in 1661. She really loved him, bore him four children, of whom two grew up; but although she and they received wealth and titles of honour, she never lost her sensitiveness to the dishonour of their birth. When Madame de Montespan became royal favourite she retired into a Carmelite nunnery in Paris (1674). Her Réflexions sur la Miséricorde de Dieu par une dame pénitente (1680) was re-edited in 1854; her letters were printed in 1767. See Lives by Quatremère de Roissy (1823), Capefigue (1859), Houssaye (1860), Duclos (4th ed. 1890), Lair (1881), and Paultie (1891). [La Val-yehri'.]

La'vater, JOHANN KASPAR, born at Zurich, 15th November 1741, in 1769 received Protestant orders. He made himself known by a volume of poems (1767); his Aussichten in die Ewigkeit (1768-78) is characterised by religious enthusiasm and mysticism. He attempted to elevate physiognomy into a science in his Physiognomische Fragmente (1775-78; trans. by Holcroft 1793). Whilst tending the wounded at the capture of Zurich by Massena (September 1799) he received a wound, of which he died, 2d January 1801. See works by Gessner (1802), Heisch (English, 1842), Muncker (1883), Steck (1884), Hosius (1888), Funck (1890), Waser (1894), and Hang (1894).

Laveleye, ÉMILE LOUIS VICTOR DE (1822-92), economist, born at Bruges, in 1864 became professor of Political Economy at Liège. His works include De la Propriété (1874; Eng. trans. 1878); Lettres d'Italie (1880-84); Le Socialisme Contemporain (1881; trans. 1885); Éléments d'Économie Politique (1882); La Péninsule des Balkans (1886; trans. 1887); and works on rural economy in the Netherlands, and on current topics of the day. His contributions to the Revue des Deux Mondes, Athenaeum, &c., are collected in his Essais et Études (1894-95). He was made a baron a few weeks before his death. See Life by Count Goblet d'Alviella (1894). [Lahv-lay'.]

Lavergne, LÉONCE GUILHARD (1809-80), Orleanist politician and political economist, was born at Bergerac. [La-vern-ye.]

Lavery, JOHN, portrait-painter, a leading member of the Glasgow school, was born at Belfast in 1857, studied in Glasgow, London, and Paris, and became A.R.S.A. 1892, R.S.A. 1896.

Lavigerie, CHARLES MARTIAL ALLEMAND, CARDINAL (1825-92), born at Bayonne, in 1863 became Bishop of Nancy, in 1867 Archbishop of Algiers. See Clarke's Cardinal Lavigerie and the African Slave-trade (1890), and French Lives by Prévillé (1894) and Lavigerie (1896). [La-veeh-ree.]

La Villemarqué (1815-95), THÉODORE-CLAUDE HERSART, VICOMTE DE, Celtic antiquary, was born of an ancient Breton family at Quimperlé. Part of his work on Breton folklore was marred by 'cooking.' [La Veel-mar-kay'.]

Lavisse, ERNEST, a French historian, born at Novion-en-Thérache, Aisne, 17th December 1842, and elected in 1892 to the Academy.

Lavoisier, ANTOINE LAURENT, founder of modern chemistry, was born in Paris, 26th August 1743. To obtain means for his investigations he accepted in 1769 the office of farmer-general; in 1768 he was made an Academician. As director of the government powder-mills he (1776) greatly improved gunpowder; he successfully applied chemistry to agriculture, and discovered oxygen by rightly interpreting Priestley's facts. His services to science could not save him from the rage against farmers of taxes during the Terror, and he was guillotined, 8th May 1794. Traité Élémentaire de Chimie (1789) is his masterpiece; he also wrote Mémoires de Chimie (1805). His Complete Works were published in 1864-93. See Lives by Grimaux (1888), Berthelot (1890), and Schultze (Hamb. 1895). [La-vvaz-yay'.]

Law, ANDREW BONAR, born in New Brunswick, 16th September 1858, was an iron-merchant in Glasgow. He was Unionist member for various constituencies from 1900, was Parliamentary Secretary of the Board of Trade (1902-6), and in 1911 succeeded Mr Balfour as Unionist leader in the House of Commons.

Law, EDWARD. See ELLENBOROUGH.

Law, JOHN, born 21st April 1671, son of an Edinburgh goldsmith and banker, who was proprietor of the estate of Lauriston. In 1694 he had to flee from London for having killed 'Beau' Wilson in a duel. At Amsterdam he made a study of the credit operations of the bank. In 1700 he returned to Edinburgh, a zealous advocate of a paper currency; but his proposals to the Scottish parliament on this subject were unfavourably received. Back on the Continent, he won and lost vast sums in gambling and speculation, but sought in vain to gain the favour of governments for his financial schemes. At last settling in Paris, he and his brother William (1675-1752) set up in 1716 a private bank. This prospered so that the Regent Orleans adopted in 1718 Law's plan of a national bank. In 1719 Law originated a joint-stock company for reclaiming and settling lands in the Mississippi valley, called the Mississippi Scheme, and next year he was made Comptroller-general of Finances. When the bubble burst he became an object of popular hatred, quitted France, and spent four years in England. He finally settled in Venice, where he died poor and forgotten, 21st March 1729. See Lives by Wood (1824), Thiers (1826; new ed. 1878; American trans. 1859), Levasseur (1854), Alexi (Berl. 1885), and Wiston-Glynn (1908). [French pronunciation, Lakf.]

LAW, WILLIAM, born a grocer's son at Kingscliffe, Northamptonshire, in 1686, entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1705, and became a fellow in 1711. He was unable to subscribe the oath of allegiance to George I., and forfeited his fellowship. About 1727 he became tutor to the father of Edward Gibbon, and for ten years was 'the much-honoured friend and spiritual director of the whole family.' The elder Gibbon died in 1737, and three years later Law retired to Kingscliffe, and was joined by his disciples, Miss Hester Gibbon, sister of his pupil, and Mrs Hutcheson. The two ladies had a united income of about £3000 a-year, and most of this they spent in works of charity. About 1733 Law had begun to study Jacob Boehme, and most of his later books are expositions of his mysticism. He died April 9, 1761. Law won his first triumphs against Bishop Hoadly in the famous Bangorian controversy with his Three Letters (1717). His Remarks on Mandeville's Fable of the Bees (1723) is a masterpiece of caustic wit and vigorous English. Only less admirable is the Case of Reason (1732), in answer to Tindal the Deist. But his most famous work remains the Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1729), which profoundly influenced Dr Johnson and the Wesleys. There are two collected editions of his works—that of 1762 and that by Moreton (1893 et seq.). See Walton's Notes and Materials for a Complete Biography (1848), Overton's William Law, Nonjuror and Mystic (1881), and the Rev. Dr A. Whyte's Characters of William Law (1892).

LAWES, HENRY (1596-1662), a song-composer, who set Milton's Comus to music, was born at Dinton in Wiltshire.—His elder brother, WILLIAM (d. 1645), was also a composer.

LAWRENCE, ST., said to have been born at Huesca in Spain, became a deacon at Rome. In the persecution of Valerian, being called on to deliver up the treasures of the church, he produced the poor and the sick; and on his persistent refusal to sacrifice, he was condemned to be broiled on a gridiron (c. 258 A.D.).

LAWRENCE, GEORGE ALFRED (1827-76), novelist, was born at Braxted rectory, Essex, and from Rugby passed in 1848 to Balliol College, Oxford. He was called four years later to the bar, and was also a militia officer. He died at Edinburgh. Of his nine or ten 'Ouidaesque' novels the best known is Guy Livingstone (1857).

LAWRENCE, SIR HENRY MONTGOMERY, born at

Matura, Ceylon, 28th June 1806, was one of the twelve children of Lieut.-Col. Alexander Lawrence, an Irish Protestant, who served in the Mysore campaign and at the storming of Seringapatam. Educated at Derry, Bristol, and Addiscombe, in 1823 he joined the Bengal Artillery. He took part in the first Burmese war (1828), in the first Afghan war (1838), and in the Sikh wars (1845 and 1848), and in 1848 was made a K.C.B. In 1856 he published two articles pointing out the danger of reducing the British army, and the latent germs of rebellion; in 1857 he was appointed to Lucknow, and did all he could to restore contentment there, but the mutiny broke out in May. It was owing to his foresight that it was made possible for a thousand Europeans and eight hundred natives to defend the Residency for nearly four months against 7000 rebels. He was injured by a shell, 2d July 1857, and died two days afterwards. 'Here lies Henry Lawrence, who tried to do his duty,' is his self-chosen epitaph. See Lives by Edwards and Merivale (1872-73) and McLeod Innes (1898).

His brother, JOHN LAIRD MAIR, LORD LAWRENCE, was born at Richmond, Yorkshire, 4th March 1811. In 1827 he obtained a presentation to Haileybury; his first years in the Indian civil service were spent at Delhi. Successively commissioner and lieutenant-governor of the Punjab, he used every effort to curb the oppression of the people by their chiefs, devised a system of land tenure, and devoted his whole energy to restoring peace and prosperity. The once restless Sikhs had become so attached to his rule that Lawrence was enabled to disarm the mutineers in the Punjab, to raise an army of 59,000 men, and to capture Delhi from the rebels after a siege of over three months. On his return to England he received the thanks of parliament, with a pension of £1000; he was made a baronet in 1858, a privy-councillor in 1859, and in 1861 a K.S.I. In 1863 he succeeded Lord Elgin as Governor-general of India; and the East India Company granted him a life pension of £2000. As viceroy, he did not believe in British interference in Asia beyond the frontier of India, and was especially opposed to intriguing in Afghanistan. Created Baron Lawrence on his return home in 1869, he was chairman of the London School-board 1870-73. He devoted the last days of his life in parliament (1878) to an exposure of the policy which led up to the disastrous Afghan war. He died 27th June 1879, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. See Lives by Bosworth Smith (1883), Sir Richard Temple (1889), and Sir Charles Aitchison (1892).

LAWRENCE, SIR THOMAS, was born at Bristol, an innkeeper's son, 4th May 1769, and was famed as a child for his recitations and portraits. At twelve he had his studio at Bath, at eighteen he entered as a student of the Royal Academy, having a year before given up crayons for oils. In 1791 he was elected A.R.A., and in 1794 R.A., in 1792 was appointed limner to the king, in 1815 was knighted by the Prince Regent, and in 1820 succeeded West as P.R.A. He died in London, 7th Jan. 1830, and was buried in St Paul's. Lawrence was the favourite portrait-painter of his time, and had an immense practice. His flattering portraits scarcely rise above the conventional level; they renewed their vogue, however, in 1895, his 'Miss Farren' (sold in 1863 for 79 gs.) fetching 2250 in 1897. See Life by Williams (1831), and Lord R. Gower's Romney and Lawrence (1882).

LAWRENCE, SIR WILLIAM, F.R.S. (1783-1867), surgeon, born at Cirencester, became in 1815 professor of Anatomy to the College of Surgeons, and in 1824 surgeon at Bartholomew's; two months before his death he was created a baronet. He wrote some important medical works.

Lawson, CECIL GORDON (1851-82), landscape-painter, was born at Wellington, Shropshire, but brought up in London. He exhibited at the Academy in 1870, but remained obscure, many of his pictures being rejected, till 1878, when his 'Minister's Garden' at the Grosvenor made him famous. The short remainder of his life was a brilliant success. See Memoir by Gosse (1883).

Lawson, SIR WILFRID (1829-1906), Radical M.P. and temperance advocate, succeeded as second baronet in 1867. He sat for Carlisle 1859-65 and 1868-85, and 1880-1900 for the Cockermouth division of Cumberland.

Layamon, a priest at Ernley (now Areley), on the Severn near Bewdley, flourished about 1200. He produced an amplified imitation of Wace's Brut d'Angleterre, the earliest English poem of any length. See Madden's edition (1847).

Layard, SIR AUSTEN HENRY, was born in Paris, March 5, 1817, a son of a dean of Bristol, and passed his boyhood in Italy. Travelling along the Tigris on his way to Ceylon in 1840, he was struck with the ruins of Nimrud, the supposed site of Nineveh; and in 1845-47 carried on excavations there, finding the remains of four palaces. The walls of the North-west Palace, built by Sardanapalus, were lined with large slabs covered with bas-reliefs and cuneiform inscriptions. Many of these, together with gigantic winged human-headed bulls and lions, were sent by Layard to the British Museum. He published Nineveh and its Remains (1848), Monuments of Nineveh (1850), &c. He was presented with the freedom of the city of London, was made D.C.L. by Oxford, and was Lord Rector of Aberdeen University 1855-56. He was M.P. for Aylesbury 1852-57, for Southwark 1860-69, Foreign Undersecretary 1861-66, Chief Commissioner of Works 1868-69. In 1869 he went as British ambassador to Spain, in 1877 to Constantinople (where he showed strong philo-Turkish sympathies), being made G.C.B. in 1878. He died July 5, 1894. See his Early Adventures (1878) and his Autobiography and Letters (ed. Bruce, 1903).

Leade, JANE, née WARD (1623-1704), born in Norfolk, married in 1644, and was left a widow in 1670, shortly after founding with Dr John Porridge the mystic sect of Philadelphians.

Leake, LIEUT.-COL. WILLIAM MARTIN (1777-1860), topographer of Greece, born in London, in 1799 was sent, as an officer of artillery, to instruct the Turks, and was otherwise employed in the Levant till in 1823 he retired from the army. His works include Researches in Greece (1814), Topography of Athens (1821), Tour in Asia Minor (1824), Travels in the Morea (1830), Travels in Northern Greece (1835), Numismata Hellenica (1854). See Memoir by Marsden (1864).

Leander. See HERO.

Lear, EDWARD, born in London, 12th May 1812, had a passion for painting, and was sent by the Earl of Derby to Italy and Greece, where he painted many landscapes. He exhibited at the Royal Academy from 1850 to 1873. His later years were spent in Italy, and he died at San Remo, January 30, 1888. Lear is less known by his paintings than by his illustrated books of travels — Sketches of Rome (1842) Illustrated Excursions in Italy (1846), Journal in Greece and Albania (1851), Journal in Calabria (1852), and In Corsica (1869). But he is far best known by his Book of Nonsense (1846; 29th ed. with introduction by Sir E. Strachey, 1894), which has gone to the hearts of all English children. More Nonsense Rhymes followed in 1871, Nonsense Songs, Stories, and Botany in 1870, Laughable Lyrics in 1876.

He was the first director of the Gobelins Tapestry Works (1662), and from 1668 to 1683 was employed by Louis XIV. in the decoration of the Palace of Versailles; but being superseded, he sickened and died, 12th February 1690. See works by Genevay (1885) and Jouin (1889). [Le-brun'.]

Le Brun, MARIE ELISABETH LOUISE, born in Paris, 16th April 1755, a daughter of one Vigée, a painter, in 1776 married J. B. P. Le Brun, picture-dealer and grand-nephew of Charles Le Brun. Her great beauty and the charm of her painting speedily made her the fashion. Her portrait of Marie Antoinette (1779) led to a lasting friendship with the queen; she painted numerous portraits of the royal family. She left Paris for Italy at the outbreak of the Revolution, and after a species of triumphal progress through Europe, arrived in London in 1802. There she painted portraits of the Prince of Wales, Lord Byron, &c. In 1805 she returned to Paris. She died 30th March 1842. See her Souvenirs (1837).

A decided Unionist, he became M.P. for Dublin University in 1895, a P.C. in 1897, and a member of the Order of Merit in 1902. He died 22d October 1903. See Life by his wife (1909).

Leclaire, EDMÉ-JEAN (1801-72), trained in Paris as a house-painter, at twenty-six began business on his own account, and soon took the front rank in the trade. His desire to do away with the antagonism between employer and employed led him in 1842 to his system of profit-sharing. See Hart's Maison Leclaire (1883).

Le Clerc, JEAN, or JOHANNES CLERICUS (1657-1736), Reformed theologian, born at Geneva, became in 1684 professor of Philosophy in the Remonstrant seminary at Amsterdam. Other volumes are Poèmes Barbares (1862) and Poèmes Tragiques (1884); and he translated Theocritus, Anacreon, Homer, Hesiod, the Orphic Hymns, Æschylus, Horace, Sophocles, and Euripides. His verse is marked by classic regularity and faultlessness of form. See a monograph by Dornis (1895). [Le-kont-deh-leel.]

Lécoureur, ADRIENNE, actress, born near Châlons, 5th April 1692, made her début at the Comédie Française in 1717, and soon became famous for her acting, her fascinations, and her admirers, amongst whom were Marshal Saxe, Voltaire, and Lord Peterborough. Her death, 20th March 1790, was by some ascribed to poisoning by a rival, the Duchess de Bouillon. This is the plot of the play by Scribe and Legouvé. See Monval's Lettres d'Adrienne Lécoureur (1892). [Le-koo-ruh.]

Ledru-Rollin, ALEXANDRE AUGUSTE, was born at Fontenay near Paris, 2d Feb. 1807. Admitted to the bar in 1830, he made a name as defender of Republicans and as a democratic agitator, in 1841 was elected deputy for Le Mans, and visited Ireland during O'Connell's agitation. His Appel aux Travailleurs (1846) declared universal suffrage the panacea for the miseries of the working-classes. At the Revolution of 1848 he became Minister of the Interior in the Provisional Government, and in May was elected one of the interim government. But he gave offence by his arbitrary conduct, and resigned 28th June. As candidate for the presidency against Louis Napoleon he was ignominiously beaten. An unsuccessful attempt to provoke an insurrection in June 1849 drove him to England, whence he and others sought to control the democratic agitations throughout Europe. He was amnestied in 1870, and after his return was elected to the Assembly. He died 31st December 1874. His Discours Politiques et Ecrits Divers appeared in 1879. [Le-dree' Rol-lan'.]

Lee, ANN (1736-84), the illiterate daughter of a Manchester blacksmith, married in 1762 Abraham Stanley, also a blacksmith, was imprisoned in 1770 for street-preaching, emigrated to America in 1774, and in 1776 founded at Niskayuna (now Watervliet) near Albany, N.Y., the parent Shaker settlement. See The Shakers, by F. W. Evans (N.Y., 1859), and short Life by Axon (1876).

Lee, CHARLES (1731-82), a cantankerous general in the American war of independence, was born in Cheshire, and had served seventeen years as a British officer in America. Juntius's Letters have been ascribed to him

Lee, FREDERIC GEORGE, D.D., vicar of All Saints, Lambeth, was born at Thame, 6th January 1832, and educated there and at Oxford. He published poems and a mass of ritualistic works.

Lee, FREDERIC RICHARD, landscape-painter, born at Barnstaple, June 1798, left the army through ill-health, and turned to painting (1818). He was elected A.R.A. in 1834 and R.A. in 1835, retiring in 1871. He died 4th June 1879.

Lee, HARRIET (1766-1851), author of The Canterbury Tales, was born in London and died at Clifton.—Her sister, SOPHIA (1750-1824), wrote plays and novels.

Lee, JAMES PRINCE (1804-69), born in London, from St Paul's passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, and was a master at Rugby 1830-38, head of King Edward's School, Birmingham, 1838-47, and from 1848 Bishop of Manchester.

Lee, NATHANIEL (c. 1653-92), dramatist, from Westminster passed to Trinity College, Cambridge, failed as an actor through nervousness (1672), produced nine or ten tragedies between 1675 and 1682, then spent five years in Bedlam, and perished drunk in the snow. In his best-known play, The Rival Queens, or Alexander the Great, is the line, 'When Greeks join'd Greeks then was the tug of war.'

Lee, ROBERT, D.D., was born at Tweedmouth, 11th November 1804, and educated at Berwick (where he was also for a time a boat-builder) and St Andrews. In 1833 he became minister at Arbroath, in 1836 at Campsie, and in 1843 at Old Greyfriars, Edinburgh. In 1846 he was appointed also professor of Biblical Criticism in Edinburgh University and a Queen's chaplain. In 1857 he began his reform of the Presbyterian church-service. He restored the reading of prayers, as well as the custom of kneeling at prayer and standing during the singing; and in 1863 he introduced a harmonium, in 1865 an organ, into his church. These 'innovations' brought down upon him bitter attacks. He died at Torquay, 14th March 1868. His works include a Handbook of Devotion (1845), Prayers for Public Worship (1857), The Family and its Duties (1868), and The Reform of the Church (1864). See Life by R. H. Story (1870).

Lee, ROBERT EDWARD, was fifth in descent from Richard Lee of Shropshire, who emigrated to Virginia in the reign of Charles I., received large grants of land between the Potomac and Rappahannock rivers, and built the original Stratford House. In the later edifice, erected by his grandson, Thomas Lee, were born the distinguished brothers, Richard Henry Lee (1732-94), mover of the resolution in favour of American Independence and a signer of the Declaration; Francis Lightfoot Lee (1734-97), a signer of the Declaration; and William (1737-95) and Arthur Lee (1740-92), diplomatists. There also, on 19th January 1807, was born Robert Edward, the son of General Henry Lee. At eighteen he entered West Point, graduated second in his class in 1829, and received a commission in the engineers. In the Mexican war (1846) he was chief-engineer of the central army in Mexico, and at the storming of Chapultepec was severely wounded. In 1852-55 he commanded the U.S. Military Academy, and greatly improved its efficiency. His next service was as a cavalry officer on the Texan border 1855-59. At the John Brown raid he was ordered to Harper's Ferry to capture the insurgents. He was in command in Texas in 1860, but was recalled to Washington in March 1861 when seven states had formed the Southern Confederacy. Virginia seceded on April 17, and Colonel Lee, believing that his allegiance was due to his state, sent in his resignation. Within two days he was made commander-in-chief of the forces of Virginia. At Richmond he superintended the defences of the city till the autumn, when he was sent to oppose General Rosecrans in West Virginia. In the spring of 1862 he was working at the coast defences of Georgia and South Carolina, but on McClellan's advance was summoned to the capital. General J. E. Johnston, chief in command, was wounded at Seven Pines in May, and Lee was put in command of the army around Richmond. His masterly strategy in the seven days' battles around Richmond defeated McClellan's purpose; his battles and strategy in opposing General Pope, his invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania, and other achievements are cardinal to the history of the war. The increasing resources of the North and the decreasing resources of the South could only result in the final success of the former. On April 9, 1865, Lee surrendered his army of 28,231 men to General Grant at Appomattox Courthouse, Virginia, and the war was practically ended. After the close of the war he frankly accepted the result, and although deprived of his former property at Arlington on the Potomac, and the White House on the Pamunkey, he declined proffered offers of pecuniary aid, and accepted the presidency of what came to be called the Washington and Lee University, at Lexington, Virginia. He died October 12, 1870. He married in 1832 Mary Randolph Custis (1806-73). Their eldest son, George Washington Custis Lee, resigned as first-lieutenant in the U.S. army in 1861, was aide-de-camp to Jefferson Davis 1861-63, major-general of a division in 1864, and successor of his father as president of the Washington and Lee University. William Henry Fitzhugh Lee, second son, was major-general of Confederate cavalry, and was elected to congress. Captain Robert E. Lee of the Confederate cavalry was the third son. See Lives by J. E. Leech, JOHN, born in London, 29th Aug. 1817, the son of a coffee-house proprietor, went to the Charterhouse with Thackeray, studied medicine, but at eighteen published Etchings and Sketchings, by A. Pen, Esq. In 1836 he was contributing to Bell's Life; and in Punch's fourth number, 7th Aug. 1841, we find his first contribution. His Punch cartoons are full of high qualities; but even more delightful are the smaller woodcuts. In the intervals of work for Punch Leech contributed much to other journals and publications, including woodcuts in Once a Week (1859-62) and The Illustrated London News (1856), in The Comic English and Latin Grammars (1840), Hood's Comic Annual (1842), Smith's Wassail Bowl (1843), and A Little Tour in Ireland (1859); etchings in Bentley's Miscellany, Jerrold's Magazine, the Christmas books of Dickens, the Comic History of England (1847-48), Comic History of Rome (1852), and the Handley Cross sporting novels; he also drew several lithographed series, of which Portraits of the Children of the Mobility (1841) is the most important. Leech died in Kensington, 29th Oct. 1864, and was buried close to Thackeray at Kensal Green. See Dr John Brown's John Leech (1882), F. G. Kitton's Biographical Sketch (1883), and Life by W. P. Frith, R.A. (1891).

Leeds, THOMAS OSBORNE, DUKE OF, better known as Earl of Danby, English statesman, was born in 1631, the son of a Yorkshire baronet. He entered parliament for York in 1661, and in 1667 became a Treasury auditor, in 1671 Treasurer of the Navy, in 1673 Viscount Latimer and Baron Danby, and in 1674 Lord High Treasurer and Earl of Danby. He sought to enforce the laws against Roman Catholics and Dissenters, used his influence to get Princess Mary married to William of Orange in 1677, and negotiated with Louis XIV. for bribes to Charles. Louis, however, intrigued for Danby's downfall; and the Commons impeached him in 1678 for treating with foreign powers, aiming at the introduction of arbitrary power, and squandering public money. He was kept in the Tower until 1684, although Charles at once gave him a full pardon, as the Commons persisted in the impeachment. When James began to threaten the Established Church Danby signed the invitation to William of Orange. His reward was the marquise of Carmarthen and the presidency of the council; and he resumed his old methods of government. He was created Duke of Leeds in 1694. In 1695 again impeached for accepting 5000 guineas from the East India Company, he staved off condemnation; but his power was gone, and in 1699 he retired, though he spoke in defence of Sacheverell in 1710. He died at Easton, Northants, 26th July 1712. See Life by T. P. Courtenay (1838).

Leeuwenhoek, ANTON VAN (1632-1723), born at Delft, was a clerk in an Amsterdam cloth-warehouse till 1654, and after that became at Delft the most famous microscopist, conducting a series of epoch-making discoveries in support of the circulation of the blood, and in connection with blood-corpuscles, spermatozoa, &c. He first detected the fibres of the crystalline lens, the fibrils and striping of muscle, the structure of ivory and hair, the scales of the epidermis, and the distinctive characters of Rotifers. He contributed 112 papers to the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society and 26 to the Memoirs of the Paris Academy of Sciences. His Opera appeared at Leyden in 1719-22; an English selection at London in 1798-1801. See Life in Dutch by Haaxman (1875). [Leh-wen-hook.]

Le Fanu, JOSEPH SHERIDAN (1814-73), novelist and Conservative editor, was born and died in Dublin. He wrote The House by the Churchyard (1863), Uncle Silas (1864), In a Glass Darkly (1872), and fourteen other works—a leading feature in them their weird uncanniness. His Poems were edited by A. P. Graves (1896). See Memoir prefixed to his Purcell Papers (1880), and Seventy Years of Irish Life, by his brother, W. R. Le Fanu (1893). [Le'fa-new.]

Lefebvre, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH (1755-1820), Marshal of France, was born at Ruffach in Alsace, and was a sergeant in the Guards at the Revolution. He fought at Fleurus, Altenkirchen, and Stockach, in 1799 took part with Bonaparte in the overthrow of the Directory, and in 1804 was made a Marshal. He took Danzig, and was created Duke of Danzig (1807), distinguished himself in the early part of the Peninsular war, and suppressed the insurrection in the Tyrol. During the Russian campaign he had the command of the Imperial Guard, and in 1814 of the left wing of the French army. Submitting to the Bourbons, he was made a peer, a dignity restored to him in 1819, though he had sided with his old master during the Hundred Days. [Le-febvr'.]

Lefort, FRANÇOIS JACOB (1653-99), born at Geneva of Scottish extraction, served in the Swiss Guard at Paris, but entered the Russian service in 1675, and heading the intrigues which made Peter sole ruler, became his first favourite, backed up his reforms, and in 1694 was made admiral and generalissimo. See German Lives by Posselt (1866) and Blum (1867). [Le-forr'.]

Legendre, ADRIEN MARIE, mathematician, was born at Toulouse, 18th September 1752, studied at Paris, and became professor of Mathematics at the Military School, and (1783) member of the Academy of Sciences. Appointed in 1787 one of the commissioners to connect Greenwich and Paris by triangulation, he was elected an F.R.S. In his report Legendre first enunciated the 'proposition of spherical excess,' just as in 1806 he made the first proposal to use the 'method of least squares.' In 1827 appeared his famous Traité des Fonctions Elliptiques. His Théorie des Nombres (1830) is still a classic; his Éléments de Géométrie (1794) was translated by Thomas Carlyle (1824). He died 10th January 1833. [Le-zhonvd'r.]

Legge, JAMES, D.D., LL.D., Chinese scholar, born at Huntly, 20th Dec. 1815, graduated at Aberdeen in 1835. He went out to Malacca under the London Missionary Society, and took charge of the Anglo-Chinese college there; next laboured thirty years at Hong-kong; and in 1876 became professor of Chinese at Oxford, where he died 29th Nov. 1897. His greatest work was the Chinese Classics, with text, translation, notes, &c. (1861-86; 2d ed. 1893). A series of lectures on The Religions of China was published in 1880.

Legouvé, JEAN BAPTESTE (1764-1812), poet and dramatist, was born and died in Paris.—His son, ERNEST (1807-1903), playwright and prose-writer, was born in Paris, and in 1855 was elected to the Academy. Legros, ALPHONSE, painter and etcher, was born at Dijon, 8th May 1837, of poor parents, who apprenticed him to a house-painter. He attracted attention by pictures exhibited in the Salon between 1859 and 1866, when he settled in London, and becoming naturalised, was in 1876 appointed Slade Professor in University College, London. He died in 1911. [Le-groh'.]

Legros, PIERRE (1656-1719), sculptor, was born in Paris, and lived and died in Rome.

Lehmann, HEINRICH (1814-82), painter, was born at Kiel, and settled in Paris.

Lehmann, RUDOLF (1819-1905), painter, born near Hamburg, in 1866 settled in London. He married a daughter of Dr Robert Chambers. See his An Artist's Reminiscences (1894).—His son, RUDOLPH CHAMBERS, born 1856, became a journalist, member of the Punch staff, and M.P. for a division of Leicester (1906); and his daughter, LIZA (Mrs Herbert Bedford), was a soprano concert-singer 1885-94, then a composer.

Leibnitz (more accurately LEIBNIZ), GOTTFRIED WILHELM, was born 6th July 1646 at Leipzig (where his father was professor of Moral Philosophy), studied law there, and in 1667 dedicated to the archbishop-elect of Mainz a proposal for reform of the Corpus Juris. In 1672 he was summoned to Paris to explain a plan for the conquest of Egypt, which is believed to have suggested Napoleon's invasion of Egypt, 1798. In London Leibnitz became acquainted with Boyle and Newton. He invented a calculating machine and devised a novel method of the Calculus—giving rise to the controversy as to the priority of Newton's 'Fluxions.' In 1676 Leibnitz entered the service of Hanover, and was appointed librarian. He improved the drainage of mines and the coinage, arranged the library at Wolfenbüttel, and in Austria and Italy gathered materials for a history of the Brunswick ducal house. He also laboured for the reconciliation of the Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches; his Systema Theologicum (1686) was a conciliatory Protestant response to Bossuet; he sought as unsuccessfully to reconcile the Lutheran and Reformed Churches. He induced Frederick I. to found (1700) the Academy of Sciences at Berlin, and was himself first president. He was made a privy-councillor and a baron (Freiherr) of the empire. He died at Hanover, 14th November 1716. He held that substance exists only in the form of atoms or monads, each a self-contained individuality. The entire series of monads, from the very highest (God) to the very lowest, is so constituted that, whilst each obeys the laws of its own self-determined development, it is at every moment in complete accord and harmony with all the rest. Since God is the contriver of the universal harmony, this, world must be the best of all possible worlds. He collected specimens of languages, and grouped them in Aramaic and Japhetic or Celto-Scythian (nearly corresponding to Semitic and Indo-Germanic). Even his philosophical views have to be gathered from letters, essays in the Acta Eruditorum, Journal des Savants, &c., and a few treatises, such as De Principio Individui (1668), Théodicée (1710), Nature et Grâce (1718), Monadologie (1714), and Nouveaux Essais sur l'Entendement (1765, criticising Locke). There are editions by Dutens (1768), Gerhardt (1875-90), and Klopp (1862-84). See Lives by Guhrner (1842-46), E. Leicester, ROBERT DUDLEY, EARL OF, born about 1532, was fifth son of John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, and grandson of the notorious Edmund Dudley (q.v.) beheaded by Henry VIII. His father was executed for his support of Lady Jane Grey (q.v.). He too was sentenced to death, but liberated in 1554, was by Elizabeth made Master of the Horse, Knight of the Garter, a Privy-councillor, High Steward of the University of Cambridge, Baron Dudley, and finally in 1564 Earl of Leicester. In 1550 he had married Amy, daughter of Sir John Robsart. On 8th September 1560, at Gumnor Place, Berkshire, the house of Anthony Forster, a creature of her husband's, she was found dead at the foot of a staircase. It was generally believed that she was murdered, and that Dudley, if not Elizabeth herself, was an accessory to the crime; and the archives at Simancaz indicate that there had been a plot to poison her. Elizabeth continued to favour Leicester in spite of his unpopularity and of his secret marriage in 1573 to the Dowager Lady Sheffield. In 1563 she had suggested him as a husband for Mary Queen of Scots, and in 1575 she was magnificently entertained by him at his castle of Kenilworth. In 1578 he bigamously married the widow of Walter Earl of Essex; yet Elizabeth, though greatly, was only temporarily, offended. In 1585 he commanded the expedition to the Low Countries in which Sir Philip Sidney, his nephew, met with his death at Zutphen. In 1587 he again showed his military incapacity in the same field, and had to be recalled. In 1588 he was appointed to command the forces assembled at Tilbury against the Spanish Armada. He died suddenly on 4th September of the same year at Cornbury, in Oxfordshire, of poison, said rumour, intended for his wife. See ELIZABETH, with works there cited. [Les'ter.]

Leicester of Holkham, THOMAS WILLIAM COKE, EARL OF, was born 4th May 1752, a descendant of the famous lawyer Coke. He was one of the first agriculturists of England; by his efforts north-west Norfolk was converted from a rye-growing into a wheat-growing district, and more stock and of better breeds was kept on the farms. Coke represented Norfolk as a Whig most of the period 1776-1833, and in 1837 he was created Earl of Leicester of Holkham, to distinguish the title from the Townshend Earldom of Leicester. He died at Longford Hall, Derbyshire, 30th June 1842. [Les'ter of Hôk'am.]

Leichhardt, LUDWIG, Australian explorer, born at Trebatsch near Frankfort-on-Oder, 23rd October 1813, in 1841 went to Australia, and conducted an expedition (1843-48) from Moreton Bay, in Queensland, to the Gulf of Carpentaria. In 1846; he failed to cross Cape York Peninsula. In December 1847 he again started from Moreton Bay to cross the continent from east to west, but was last heard of on 3d April 1848. The Journal of his first journey was published in 1847, and his Letters in German in 1881. [Lîkh-hart, kh guttural.]

Leighton, FREDERICK, LORD, P.R.A., was born at Scarborough, a doctor's son, 3d December 1830. He early showed a bias towards painting, visited Rome, Florence, Frankfort, Berlin, Paris, and Brussels, and everywhere received instruction from the most distinguished masters. He exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1855 his 'Cimabue's Madonna carried in Procession through Florence'—a picture purchased by the Queen. Among his later works were 'The Triumph of Music' (1856), 'Paolo and Francesca' (1861), 'The Odalisque' (1862), 'Ariadne' (1868), 'Hercules wrestling with Death' (1871), 'The Harvest Moon' (1872), 'The Daphnephoria' (1876; sold in 1893 for £3700), 'Wedded' (1882), 'Cymon and Iphigenia' (1884), 'Andromache' (1888), 'The Bath of Psyche' (1890), 'The Garden of the Hesperides' (1892), 'Rizpah' (1893), and 'Flaming June' (1895). Lord Leighton also won distinction as a sculptor, and in 1877 his 'Athlete struggling with a Python' was purchased out of the Chantrey Bequest. In 1864 he was elected A.R.A., in 1869 R.A., and in 1878 president and knighted. His Addresses were published in 1896. He was created a baronet in 1886, and Lord Leighton of Stretton in Jan. 1896. He died unmarried, 25th Jan. 1896, and was buried in St Paul's. His Academy Addresses appeared in 1897. See a study by Ernest Rhys (new ed. 1900), and his Life and Letters by Mrs Russell Barrington (1906). [Lay'ton.]

Leighton, ROBERT, born in 1611, probably in London, was the second son of Alexander Leighton, M.D. (c.1568-c.1649), Presbyterian minister in London and Utrecht, author of Sion's Plea against the Prelacie (1628), which earned him from Laud scourging, the pillory, branding and mutilation, heavy fine and imprisonment. The boy studied at Edinburgh University and spent some years in France. He was ordained minister of Newbattle in 1641, signed the Covenant two years later, and took part in all the Presbyterian policy of the time; most of the Sermons and the Commentary on the First Epistle of Peter were the work of the Newbattle period. In 1653 he was appointed Principal of Edinburgh University. Soon after the Restoration Leighton was induced by the king himself to become one of the new bishops, chose Dunblane, the poorest of all the dioceses, and for the next ten years he laboured to build up the shattered walls of the church. His aim was to preserve what was best in Episcopacy and Presbytery as a basis for comprehensive union; but he succeeded only in being misunderstood by both sides. The continued persecution of the Covenanters drove him to London in 1665 to resign his see, but Charles persuaded him to return. Again in 1669 he went to London to advocate his scheme of accommodation, and immediately after assumed the duties of commendator of the arch-diocese of Glasgow. Next followed his fruitless conferences at Edinburgh (1670-71) with leading Presbyterians. In despair of success he begged for permission to retire, and at length in 1674 was allowed to lay down his archbishopric. His last ten years he spent at Broadhurst Manor, Sussex, often preaching in the church of Horsted Keynes, where he lies. He died in a London inn, 25th June 1684. There are editions of his works—than which no books reveal a deeper spirituality, a more heavenly exaltation and devotion—by Fall (1692-1708), Dodridge (1748), Jerment (1805-8), Pearson (1825), Aikman (1831), and West (6 vols. 1869-75, unfinished). There are Selections (1883) by Blair.

Leland, CHARLES GODFREY, 'Hans Breitmann' (1825-1903), born in Philadelphia, graduated at Princeton in 1845, and afterwards studied at Heidelberg, Munich, and Paris. He was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1851, but turned to journalism. From 1869 he resided chiefly in England and Italy, and investigated the Gypsies, a subject on which between 1873 and 1891 he published four valuable works. But Leland is best known for his poems in 'Pennsylvania Dutch,' the famous Hans Breitmann Ballads (1871; continued in 1895). Other works are The Poetry and Mystery of Dreams (1855), Meister Karl's Sketch-book (1855), Legends of Birds (1864), Egyptian Sketch-book (1873), Fu-Sang, or the Chinese Discovery of America (1875), Algonquin Legends (1884), Etruscan Roman Remains in Tradition (1892), a translation of Heine's works, and Legends of Florence (1895). Leland, JOHN, antiquary, born in London about 1506, was educated at St Paul's School under William Lily, then at Christ's College, Cambridge, and All Souls', Oxford. After a residence in Paris he became chaplain to Henry VIII., who in 1533 made him 'king's antiquary,' with power to search for records of antiquity in the cathedrals, colleges, abbeys, and priories of England. In six years he collected 'a whole world of things very memorable,' and for the rest of his life laboured in vain to arrange and digest his vast collection of materials, into which burrowed his successors, Stow, Camden, William Burton, and Dugdale. His church preferences were the rectories of Peuplingues near Calais and Haseley in Oxfordshire, a canonry of King's College (now Christ Church), Oxford, and a prebend of Salisbury. He died April 18, 1552. Most of his papers are in the Bodleian and British Museum. Besides his Commentarii de Scriptoribus Britannicis (ed. by Hall, 1709), his chief works are The Itinerary (ed. by L. T. Smith, 1905-10) and De Rebus Britannicis Collectanea (ed. by Hearne, 1715). See Huddesford's Lives of Leland, Hearne, and Wood (1772).

Leland, JOHN (1691-1766), born at Wigan, was educated at Dublin, where from 1716 he was a Presbyterian minister. He wrote against Tindal (1733) and Morgan (1739-40); his chief work is A View of the Principal Deistical Writers (1754-56). See Life prefixed to his Discourses (1768-89).

Lely, SIR PETER (1618-80), originally Pieter van der Faes, was born probably at Soest, Westphalia, and settled in London in 1641 as a portrait-painter. He was employed by Charles I., Cromwell, and Charles II.; the last nominated him court-painter and in 1679 knighted him. His best-known pieces, apart from portraits of his royal patrons, are the Beauties of the court of Charles II. at Hampton Court.

Lemoine, JOHN ÉMILE, born in London, 17th Oct. 1815 of French parents, in 1840 became English correspondent to the Journal des Débats, and subsequently editor. In 1876 he was elected to the Academy. His Études Critiques et Biographiques (1852) and Nouvelles Études (1862) are his best works. He died 14th Dec. 1892. [Le-mvahn.]

Lemon, MARK, born in London, 30th November 1809, in 1835 wrote a farce, the first of a long series of melodramas, operettas, &c. He produced several novels (the best, perhaps, Falkner Lyle, 1866), children's stories, and essays, and appeared as a lecturer and public reader. In 1841 he helped to establish Punch, of which for the first two years he was joint-editor with Henry Mayhew, and thereafter sole editor till his death at Crawley in Sussex, 23d May 1870. His Jest Book (1864) was reissued in 1892.

His descendant, Charles Colmor Grant, had his Canadian title of seventh Baron de Longueuil recognised by the Queen in 1880. Another son, JOSEPH (1668-1734), served in the French navy, and in 1719 captured Pensacola.

Lemprière, JOHN, D.D. (c. 1765-1824), born in Jersey, was head-master of Abingdon and Exeter grammar-schools, and rector of Meeth and Newton-Petrock in Devon. His Classical Dictionary (1788) was long a standard work. Another book was Universal Biography (1806).

Lenau, NIKOLAUS (Nikolaus Niembusch von Strehlenau), German poet, born at Czstad in Hungary, 13th August 1802, studied law and medicine at Vienna. His life was rendered unhappy by his morbid poetic discontent; and in 1844 he became insane, dying in an asylum near

Vienna, 22d August 1850. His poetic power is best shown in his short lyrics; his longer pieces include Faust (1836), Savonarola (1837), and Die Albigenser (1842). See Lives by Schurz (1855), Frankl (1885-92), and Roustan (1899). [Lay-nov.]

Lenbach, Franz (1836-1904), greatest German portrait-painter of the 19th century, a Bavarian born, worked mostly in Munich. His portraits of Bismarck are specially famous.

Lençlos, Ninon de, born of good family at Paris, 15th May 1616, commenced at sixteen her long career of gallantry. Among her lovers were two marquises, two marshals, the great Condé, the Duc de Larocheoucauld, and an abbé or two. She had two sons, but never showed the slightest maternal feeling. One of them, brought up in ignorance of his mother, conceived a passion for her. When she informed him of their relationship he was seized with horror, and blew out his brains. Ninon was nearly as celebrated for her manners as for her beauty. The most respectable women sent their children to her to acquire taste, style, politeness. She died 17th October 1706. Mirecourt's Mémoires is a romance; the letters attributed to her are mostly spurious; see Capefigue's Ninon de Lençlos (1864). [Lons-klô.]

Le Neve, John (1679-1741), compiler of Fasti Ecclesie Anglicanæ and other antiquarian works, was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, took orders, and became rector of Thornton-le-Moor, Lincolnshire (1722), but that same year was thrown for debt into Lincoln jail. See Life by Duffus Hardy, prefixed to his edition of the Fasti (1754).—Peter Le Neve (1661-1729), the Norfolk antiquary, was a kinsman.

Lennepe, Jacob van (1802-62), the 'Walter Scott of Holland,' was born at Amsterdam, and educated for the bar, and achieved a great reputation for legal knowledge. His most popular works were comedies, Het Dorp aan die Grenzen and Het Dorp over die Grenzen. Of his numerous novels several (including The Rose of Dekama and The Adopted Son) have been translated into English, French, and German.

Lennox, Lord William Pitt (1799-1881), soldier, Liberal M.P., sportsman, and author of ten volumes of reminiscences, besides novels, &c., was a son of the fourth Duke of Richmond.

Lenormant, François, was born in Paris, 17th January 1837, the son of Charles Lenormant (1802-59), himself profoundly learned in Egyptology, numismatics, and archaeology generally. At twenty he carried off the prize in numismatics of the Académie des Inscriptions, at twenty-three was digging at Eleusis; and his explorations he continued, in the intervals of his work as sub-librarian at the Institute (1862-72), and professor of Archaeology at the Bibliothèque Nationale (1874-83), until his health broke down from overwork and a wound received during the siege of Paris. He died December 9, 1883, having just been converted to a good Catholic from scepticism. His divination of the non-Semitic element in Accadian was a triumph, and it would be difficult to overpraise his essay on the propagation of the Phœnician alphabet and his great Origines de l'Histoire d'après la Bible (1880-84). Other works are Manuel d'Histoire Ancienne de l'Orient (1868-69; 9th ed. 1881), Lettres Assyriologiques (1871-79), Les Premières Civilisations (1874), Les Sciences Occultes en Asie (1874-75), La Monnaie dans l'Antiquité (1878-79), Monnaies et Médailles

Leo, the name of thirteen popes, whose tenures of the papacy were as follows:—I. (440-461); II. (682-3); III. (795-816); IV. (847-55); V. (903); VI. (928-9); VII. (936-9); VIII. (963-5); IX. (1049-54); X. (1513-21); XI. (1605); XII. (1823-29); XIII. (1878-1903).—Leo I., 'the Great,' a saint, and one of the most eminent of the Latin Fathers, was of good Roman family. In a council held at Rome in 449 he set aside the proceedings of the Council of Ephesus, which had pronounced in favour of Eutyches, and summoned a new council at Chalcedon, in which Leo's celebrated 'Dogmatical Letter' was accepted 'as the voice of Peter.' He interposed with Attila (q.v.) in defence of Rome, and with Genseric (q.v.). Leo died in 461. See books by Arendt (1835), Perthel (1843), Saint-Chéron (1846), Canon Gore (1880), and the Rev. C. L. Feltoe (Library of Fathers, vol. xii. 1896).—The pontificate of Leo III. was the epoch of the formal establishment of the Empire of the West. In the 8th century the popes, through the practical withdrawal of the Eastern emperors, had exercised a temporal supremacy in Rome, under the protectorate of the Frank sovereigns. Leo was in 799 obliged to flee to Spoleto, whence he repaired to Paderborn to confer with Charlemagne. On his return to Rome he was received with honour. In 800 Charlemagne, having come to Rome, was crowned emperor by the pope, and the temporal sovereignty of the pope over the Roman city and state was formally established, under the suzerainty of the emperor.—Leo X., Giovanni de' Medici, second son of Lorenzo the Magnificent, was born 11th December 1475. He was created cardinal at the age of thirteen. In the expulsion of the Medici from Florence the young cardinal was included. He was employed as legate by Julius II., at whose death in 1513 he was chosen pope as Leo X. He brought to a successful conclusion the fifth Lateran Council. He concluded a concordat with Francis I. of France; he consolidated and extended the reconquests of his warlike predecessor, Julius II. His desertion of Francis I. for Charles V. was dictated by the interests of Italy. But it is as a patron of learning and art that the reputation of Leo has lived. He founded a Greek college in Rome and established a Greek press. His vast project for the rebuilding of St Peter's, and his permitting the preaching of an indulgence in order to raise funds, provoked Luther's Reformation. He regarded the movement as of little importance; and though he condemned the propositions of Luther, his measures were not marked by severity. In his moral conduct he maintained a strict propriety, and, although not free from nepotism, he was an enlightened prince. He died 1st December 1521. See works on him by Roscoe (1805), Audin (6th ed. 1886), Hergenröther (1884-91), and Nitti

(1892); the Histories of the Popes by Ranke and Creighton; and Symonds's Renaissance (1875-86). —LEO XIII., 258th Roman pontiff, was born at Carpignano, son of Count Ludovico Pecci, 2d March 1810. Having become Doctor of Laws, he was appointed by Gregory XVI. a domestic prelate in 1837, received the title of protonotary apostolic, and was a vigorous apostolic delegate at Benevento, Perugia, and Spoleto. He was made Archbishop of Damietta in partibus and sent to Belgium as nuncio in 1843, nominated Archbishop of Perugia in 1846, and in 1853 created a cardinal by Pius IX., holding ere long the important office of Cardinal Camerlengo. Upon the death of Pius IX. in 1878 Cardinal Joachim Pecci was elected to the papacy under the title of Leo XIII. He restored the hierarchy in Scotland and composed the difficulty with Germany. In 1888 he denounced the Irish Plan of Campaign. He manifested enlightened views, but on questions affecting the church and his own status held staunchly to his rights. He regarded himself as the despoiled sovereign of Rome, and as a prisoner at the Vatican; and persistently declined to recognise the law of guarantees. He protested against heresy and 'godless' schools, and in his encyclicals affirmed that the only solution to the socialistic problem is the influence of the papacy. In 1894 he constrained the French clergy and the monarchists to accept the republic. In 1883 he opened the archives of the Vatican for historical investigations, and he made himself known as a poet, chiefly in the Latin tongue. The jubilee of his episcopate in 1893 was marked by pilgrimages, addresses, and gifts, as was that of his priesthood in 1887. In 1896 he issued an encyclical pronouncing Anglican orders null and void. He died 20th July 1903. See Lives by De Waal (Münster, 1878), Vidien (1879), and O'Reilly (1887), Serclaes (Paris, 1894), B. d'Agén (Jeunesse de Léon XIII., 1896), Jeyes (1896), and M'Carthy (1896); also his addresses, &c., in Eyre's The Pope and the People (1895).

Leo III., called the Isaurian from being born in Isauria in Asia Minor, raised the Byzantine Empire from a very low condition, having, as a general in the East, seized the crown in 716. He reorganised the army and financial system, and in 718 repelled a formidable attack of the Saracens. In 726 he by an edict prohibited the use of images (i.e., pictures or mosaics; statues were hardly known as yet in churches) in public worship. In Italy, however, the appearance of the Image-breakers or Iconoclasts roused an enthusiastic resistance on the part of the people, and the controversy raised by the edict rent the empire for over a century. In 728 the exarchate of Ravenna was lost, and the eastern provinces became the prey of the Saracens, over whom, however, Leo won a great victory in Phrygia. He died in 741.

Leo Africanus (properly ALHASSAN IBN MOHAMMED ALWAZZAN), a Cordovan Moor, who from 1492 travelled in northern Africa and Asia Minor. Falling into the hands of Venetian corsairs, he was sent to Leo X. at Rome, where he lived twenty years, and accepted Christianity, but returned to Africa and his old faith, and died at Tunis in 1552. He wrote (1526) an account of his African travels in Italian (first printed 1569), long the chief source of information as to the Soudan. Dr R. Brown re-edited John Pory's translation of 1600 (Hakluyt Soc. 1896).

Leonardo da Vinci, painter, sculptor, archi-itect, and engineer, was born in 1452 at Vinci, between Pisa and Florence, the natural son of a Florentine notary. About 1470 he entered the studio of Andrea del Verrocchio. When about twenty-eight he visited the East, and served as engineer to the sultan of 'Babylon' or Cairo. In 1482 he settled in Milan, and attached himself to Ludovico Sforza. His famous 'Last Supper' (1498), commissioned jointly by the Duke and the monks of Santa Maria delle Grazie, was painted on a wall of the refectory of the convent. Owing to the dampness of the wall, and to the method of oil-painting—not fresco—upon plaster, it soon showed signs of deterioration, and it has been often 'restored'; yet still it is one of the world's masterpieces. Among other paintings in Milan were portraits of two mistresses of the duke—one of them perhaps 'La Belle Ferronnière' of the Louvre. Leonardo also devised a system of hydraulic irrigation of the plains of Lombardy and directed the court pageants. After the fall of Duke Lodovico in 1500 Leonardo retired to Florence, and entered the service of Cæsar Borgia, then Duke of Romagna, as architect and engineer. In 1503 he returned to Florence, and commenced a Madonna and Child with St Anne, of which only the cartoon now in the Royal Academy, London, was completed. Both he and Michelangelo received commissions to decorate the Sala del Consiglio in the Palazzo della Signoria with historical compositions. Leonardo dealt with 'The Battle of Anghiari,' a Florentine victory over Milan, and finished his cartoon; but, having employed a method of painting upon the plaster which proved a failure, he in 1506 abandoned the work. About 1504 was completed the most celebrated of Leonardo's easel-pictures, 'Mona Lisa,' stolen from the Louvre 1911. Another work, now lost, portrayed the celebrated beauty Ginevra Benci; and Pacioli's De divina Proportione (1509) contained sixty geometrical figures from Leonardo's hand. In 1506 he was employed by Louis XII. of France. Francis I. bestowed on him in 1516 a yearly allowance, and assigned to his use the Château Cloux, near Amboise; hither he came that same year, and here he died 2d May 1519. Among his later works are 'The Virgin of the Rocks,' now in the National Gallery, London (a replica in the Louvre), a figure of 'St John the Baptist,' and a 'Saint Anne.' In his art Leonardo was hardly at all influenced by the antique; his practice was founded upon the most patient and searching study of nature. He occupies a supreme place as an artist, but so few in number are the works by his hand that have reached us that he may be most fully studied in his drawings, of which there are rich collections at Milan, Paris, Florence, and Vienna, as well as in the British Museum and at Windsor. His celebrated Trattato della Pittura was published in 1651; but a more complete manuscript was discovered by Manzi in the Vatican, and published in 1817. Voluminous manuscripts by him are extant in Italy, France, and England. See Richter's Literary Works of Leonardo da Vinci (1853), and his Leonardo ('Great Artists' series, 1880); Lives by Mrs Heaton (1874), Séailles (1892), Müntz (trans. 1899), Gronau (1903), M'Gurdy (1904); Uzielli's Ricerche (1872-85); the fac-similes of his Paris MSS. by Sabachnikoff and others (1881-93); and the noble one of his Codice Atlantico undertaken by the Italian government (2 vols. 1893-95).

Leoncavallo, RUGGERIO, operatic composer, was born at Naples, 8th March 1858, and in 1892 produced I Pagliacci, in 1893 I Medici.

Leoni, LEONE (1509-90), goldsmith, metallist, and sculptor, was born at Arezzo, worked at Milan, Genoa, Brussels, and Madrid, and was the rival of Benvenuto Cellini in talent, vice, and violence. See French monograph by Plon (1886).

Leonidas, king of Sparta, succeeded his half-brother, Cleomenes in 491 B.C. When the Persian monarch Xerxes approached with an immense army Leonidas opposed him at the narrow pass of Thermopylæ (480 B.C.) with his 300 Spartans; there all of them found a heroic death.

Leopardi, GIACOMO, Italian poet, was born of poor but noble parentage at Recanati, 29th June 1798. At sixteen he had read all the Latin and Greek classics, could write with accuracy French, Spanish, English, and Hebrew, and wrote a commentary on Plotinus. After a short and disappointing sojourn in Rome, he devoted himself at home to literature. As a confirmed invalid, he lived successively in Bologna, Florence, Milan, and Pisa. In 1833 he accompanied his friend Ranieri to Naples, and there in constant bodily anguish and hopeless despondency he lived till his death, 14th June 1837. Of late years a more sober estimate has been formed of his claims both as poet and thinker. His pessimism was unquestionably the genuine expression of Leopardi's deepest nature as well as of his reasoned conviction. Ranieri edited his works in 1845. His most noteworthy writings are, in poetry, his Cante and Canzoni, and a 'Continuation of the Battle of the Frogs and Mice;' and, in prose, the Dialogues and Essays classed as Operette Morali. His Essays and Dialogues were trans. into English by Edwardes (1882), his Poems by Townsend (1888). See Gladstone's Gleanings, vol. ii.; Sainte-Beuve, Portraits Contemporains, tom. iii.; and works by Antona-Traversi (1887-89), Moroncini (1891), and Cesareo (1893).

Leopold I. (1640-1705) in 1658 succeeded his father, the Emperor Ferdinand III. He provoked the Hungarians to rebellion by his severity. Tekeli received aid from the Porte, and Kara Mustapha besieged Vienna (1683), which was rescued only by an army of Poles and Germans under John Sobieski. The power of the Turks now declined. In 1686 they lost Buda, after occupying it for nearly 150 years; and by the treaty of Carlowitz (1699) they were almost entirely cleared out of Hungary. The struggle between Leopold and Louis XIV. of France for the heirship to the king of Spain led to the war of the Spanish Succession. Leopold was of sluggish and phlegmatic character, wholly under Jesuit influences. See German Life of him by Baumstark (1873).—LEOPOLD II. (1747-92), third son of Francis I. and Maria Theresa, succeeded his father as Grand-duke of Tuscany in 1765, and his brother, Joseph I., as emperor in 1790. He succeeded in pacifying the Netherlands and Hungary; was led by the downfall of his sister, Marie Antoinette, to form an alliance with Prussia against France; but died before the war broke out.

Leopold I., king of the Belgians, son of Francis, Duke of Saxe-Coburg, and uncle of Queen Victoria, was born 16th December 1790. He became a general in the Russian army, and served at Lützen, Bautzen, and Leipzig. Whilst on a visit to England (1815) he won the affections of the Princess Charlotte (q.v.), married her, and was naturalised in 1816. The princess died in 1817; and Leopold twelve years later marriedmorganatically Caroline Bauer (q.v.). He accepted provisionally in February 1830 the offer of the crown of Greece, but declined it in May; in June 1831 he was elected king of the Belgians. He conducted himself with prudence and moderation, with constant regard to the principles of the Belgian constitution. He died 10th December 1865. See Life by Juste (Eng. trans. 1868).—His son, LEOPOLD II., born in Brussels, 9th April 1835, was responsible for some of the worst abuses in the Congo. He died 17th Dec. 1909.

Lepidus, MARCUS ÆMILIUS, declared for Cæsar against Pompey (49 B.C.), and was by Cæsar made dictator of Rome and his colleague in the consulate (46 B.C.). He supported Antony, and became one of the triumvirate with Octavian and Antony, with Africa for his province (40-39 B.C.). He thought to have maintained himself in Sicily against Octavian, but his soldiers deserted him. He died 13 B.C.

Le Play, FRÉDÉRIC (1806-82), political economist, was born at Honfleur, and lived in Paris.

Lepsius, KARL RICHARD, Egyptologist, was born at Naumburg, 23d December 1810. His first work on palæography as an instrument of philology (1834) obtained the Volney prize of the French Institute. In 1836 at Rome he studied Egyptology, Nubian, Etruscan, and Oscan, writing numerous treatises. In 1842-45 he was at the head of an antiquarian expedition sent to Egypt by the king of Prussia, and in 1846 was appointed professor in Berlin. His Denkmäler aus Aegypten und Aethiopien (963 plates, 1849-60) remains a masterpiece. His Chronologie der Aegypter laid the foundation for a scientific treatment of early Egyptian history. Other works are his letters from Egypt, Ethiopia, and Sinai (1852); the work in which he expounds a modified Roman alphabet for hitherto unwritten languages; the Königsbuch (1858); the Todtenbuch (1867), the Egyptian Book of the Dead. He wrote on Chinese, Arabic, and Assyrian philology; and was a member of the Royal Academy, director of the Egyptian section of the Royal Museum, and chief librarian of the Royal Library at Berlin. He died 10th July 1884. See Life by Ebers (1885; trans. New York, 1887).

Lermontoff, MIKHAIL YUREVITCH, Russian poet, was born, of Scotch extraction (Learnont), in Moscow, 15th October 1814. He entered the army, and was sent on active service in the Caucasus. There he was shot dead in a duel, 15th July 1841. The sublime scenery of the Caucasus inspired his best poetic pieces, such as The Novice, The Demon, Ismail Bey, &c. His novel, A Hero of our Time (1839), is said to have occasioned the duel that cost him his life.

Le Sage, ALAIN-RENÉ, born at Sarzeau in Brittany, 8th May 1668, and educated at the Jesuit school of Vannes, in 1692 went to Paris to study law, but an early marriage drove him to seek a less tardy livelihood in literature. The Abbé de Lionne, who had a good Spanish library, made Le Sage free of it, with a pension of 600 livres. The first fruit was a volume (1700) containing two plays imitated from Rojas and Lope de Vega. In 1702 Le Point d'honneur, from Rojas, failed on the stage. His next venture (1704) was a rifacimento of Avelaneda's Don Quixote. In 1707 Don César Ursin, from Calderon, was played with success at court, and Crispin rival de son maître in the city; more successful was the Diable Boiteux (largely from Luis Velez de Guevara). In 1708 the Théâtre Français accepted but shelved one play and rejected another, afterwards altered into his famous Turcaret. In 1715 Gil Blas (vols. i. and ii.) came out, followed in 1717-21 by an attempt at an Orlando. In 1724 came vol. iii. of Gil Blas; in 1726 a largely extended Diable Boiteux; in 1732 Guzman de Alfarache and Robert Chevalier de Beauchêne; in 1734 Estebanillo Gonzalez; in 1735 vol. iv. of Gil Blas and the Journées des Parques; in 1736-38 the Bachelier de Salamanque; in 1739 his plays, in two vols.; in 1740 La Valise trouvée, a volume of letters; and in 1743 the Mélange Amusant, a collection of facetiæ. The death of his son (1743), a promising actor, and his own increasing infirmities, made him abandon Paris and literary life, and retreat with his wife and daughter to Boulogne, where his second son held a canonry; and there he died 17th November 1747, in his eightieth year. Le Sage's reputation as a dramatist and as a novelist rests in each case on one work. The author of Turcaret might have become, but did not, almost a second Molière; the author of Gil Blas stands in the front rank of the novelists. Some deny originality to one who borrowed ideas, incidents, and tales from others as Le Sage did; some even deny (as did Voltaire, whom he satirised) that the author of Gil Blas was anything more than a translator. The figment had a wide circulation, especially in Spain, and Isla developed it. No doubt, with an artistic eye to versimilitude of detail, Le Sage borrowed plots freely; but he was the first to perceive the capabilities of the picaresque novel. His delightful style makes him the prince of raconteurs, and the final effect of his work is all his own. See works by Barberet (1887), Claretie (1890-94), and Lintilhac (1893).

Lescot, PIERRE (1510-78), Renaissance architect of the Louvre, was born in Paris.
